Orphans enjoyed many special privileges in Talmudic law. They were exempt from contributing to public offerings and to the poor fund. They did not have to pay damages in case of an injury inflicted by an animal owned by them. They could not waive any claim. Some regulations protected orphans against the claims of creditors, who could not proceed against them until they had reached the age of majority. Originally it was only the real estate that they inherited which could be mortgaged for debt, and not their chattels; thus the law of Deut. 24:17, which forbade taking the raiment of a widow in pledge, did not need to be extended to orphans. The claims of orphans upon others were not cancelled by the Sabbatical year, as were other debts; for by a legal fiction these claims were considered as being under the care of the Jewish authorities, who were to act as "fathers of the orphans." Orphans are less stringently bound by the regulations prohibiting all kinds of usury. In ancient times orphans seem to have possessed the right of depositing their money in the Temple in order to protect it. II Macc. 3:10 vividly depicts the excitement that seized the people when an attempt was made to seize such orphans' money (cf. Git. 52a).

Traditional Jewish law pays particular attention to orphans without means. The second tithe, which is reserved for the poor in the third and sixth years of the seven-year cycle, is to be given to orphans as well as to Levites, strangers and widows (Deut. 14:28-29). The fatherless have also a share in the gleanings of the field and the forgotten sheaves. These contributions are regarded not as charity, but as rights due to the poor; hence the owner of the field can not give them to a particular orphan of his choice.

Orphan girls and boys have generally the same privileges, but girls receive an additional one in regard to their trousseaus: the administrator of the poor fund must, if necessary, advance a sum in order to bring about the marriage of an orphan girl (Yer. Keth. 6:5). Originally the guardianship of orphans was undertaken by blood relations, together with the obligation to repurchase a field that had been sold or to contract a Levirate marriage. At the time when family ties were strong, adoption of orphans was unnecessary. Later on a special guardian for orphans would be appointed by the authorities; it was regarded as especially meritorious to bring up orphans in one's own house (Keth. 50a).

For the modern care of orphans, see SOCIAL SERVICE.

MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Cohn, M., "Jüdisches Waisenrecht," Festschrift für Joseph Kohler; Grunwald, M., in Mitteilungen für jüdische Volkskunde, vol. 23 (1922).

ORSHANSKI, ILYA GRIGORIEVICH, jurist and author, b. Ekaterinoslav, Russia, 1846; d. Ekaterinoslav, 1875. His early Hebrew education stirred in him an interest in Jewish history and affairs which later, after his graduation as lawyer in 1868, prompted him to combine his studies in both fields. While studying law, he had found time to write on Jewish political problems and on Jewish literature for the Russian supplement to the Hebrew periodical Hakarmel (1868). Later, while continuing his theoretical research into law, he continued to write for Den a series of studies of Jewish history.

In law Orshanski specialized in comparisons between Russian jurisprudence and the jurisprudence of Western countries. His work in this field became recognized as basic material for legal opinions. Unlike his brother (Isaac Grigorievich Orchanski), he refused to become converted and thereby lost the chance for a professorship that was offered to him. The same clarity and thoroughness that marked his interpretation of law dominated his studies of the Jews.

The most important of his works on the economic, social and legal conditions of the Jews in Russia were: Russkol Zakonodatelstvo o Yevreyakh (1877); Izslyedovaniya po Russkomu Pravu Semeinomu i Naslyedstvennomu (1877); Izslyedovaniya po Russkomu Pravu Obychonomu i Brachnomu (1879); Izslyedovaniya po Russkomu Pravu (1892).

Lit.: Yampolski, Keneseth Yisrael, vol. 1 1886); idem, in Yevreiskaya Starina (1911); Yevreiskaya Entziklopedia, vol. 12, p. 140.

ORSHANSKI, ISAAC GRIGORIEVICH, professor of neurology and psychiatry, b. Ekaterinoslav, Russia, 1851. He was the brother of the well-known lawyer and publicist Ilya Grigorievich Orshanski. After working for the Russian Jewish press, he became (1884) a member of the Greek Orthodox church and a private lecturer. In 1894 he was appointed professor at the University of Kharkov, Russia. Orshanski's scientific works include studies in neurology, psychiatry, the anatomy of the brain and heredity.

ORSKA, DAISY MARIA (originally Rachel Orska), actress, b. Nikolaev, Russia, 1894; d. Vienna, 1930. Conditions in czarist Russia forced her to embrace Christianity. She made her debut at the Deutsches Volkstheater in Vienna as Recha in Grillparzer's Die Jüdin von Toledo. Subsequently she played leads in Mannheim, Hamburg and Berlin, where she appeared on the stage of Max Reinhardt. Her most successful roles were her appearances in the dramas of Strindberg, Wedeking (Lulu) and Schnitzler. She was first married to H. Blindermann and then to Baron Werner von Bleichroeder, from whom she was divorced in 1924. Orska appeared on the stage for the last time in 1929 (Lessing Theater, Berlin).

Lit.: Kerr, Alfred, Das Mimenreich, 454-58.

ORSZÁGOS RABBIKÉPZŐ INTÉZET (FERENC JÓZSEF ORSZÁGOS RABBIKÉPZŐ INTÉZET), the national rabbinical seminary of Hungary, founded at Budapest (1877) out of a fund of 2,300,000 gulden levied upon the Jews of Hungary as punishment for their participation in the national revolution of 1848 to 1849. The seminary is under the supervision of the Hungarian ministry of education, which exercises its right through a board of governors composed of twenty-four members with the authority to appoint the teaching staff. Presidents of the board of governors were Márton Schweiger, Baron József Hatvany, Ferenc Mezey, Ferenc Székely and Adolf Wertheimer. The term of study is extended over a period of ten years, the graduation certificate of the lower division affording admission to the university. The student of the upper division is required to take courses also at the University of Budapest, from which he receives the Ph.D. degree. In addition to a written work in the field of history or philosophy of religion, the student has to submit also a thesis on a Biblical and one on a Talmudic-rabbinical subject, and on passing an oral examination he is awarded a rabbinical diploma, recognized by the state.

The religious policy of the seminary is in accord with positive historical Judaism. Among its first teachers were: Moses Bloch (Talmud and Shulḥan Aruch), who was rector from 1877 to 1907; Wilhelm Bacher (Bible and Midrash), rector from 1907 to 1913; David Kaufmann (history and philosophy of religion). Others who taught there afterwards include Lajos (Ludwig) Blau (Bible and Talmud), rector from 1914 to 1932; Ignaz Goldziher (philosophy of religion); Michael Guttmann (Talmud), rector from 1933 on; Bernát (Bernhard) Heller (Bible); Samuel Löwinger (Bible and history); Miksa (Max) Weisz (Bible and practical theology). Up to 1942 more than 200 rabbis graduated from the seminary, most of whom occupied the pulpits of Hungary and its succession states, while others taught the various branches of Jewish knowledge in institutions of learning throughout the world.

The library of the Seminary contained (1942) about 40,000 volumes, including fifteen incunabula, among which there were two editions of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah (1490 and 1509). It also possessed 3,000 Hebrew manuscripts. Its nucleus was the library of Lelio Della Torre of Padua.

Lit.: Banoczi, J., Geschichte des ersten Jahrzehnts der Landesrabbinerschule (1887); Festschrift zum 50jährigen Bestehen der Franz Josef Landesrabbinerschule, Budapest, edit. L. Blau (1927).

ORT students trained in construction work

ORT. In 1880, at the time when the first winds of Western industrial civilization were beginning to blow through Russia, a small group of persons, under the leadership of Baron Horace Günzburg, Samuel Polakoff, Professor Nicholas Bakst, the scientist, Dr. L. Katzenelenson, and the well-known author N. Rabinowitch, formed an organization to develop skilled trades and agriculture among the Jews of Russia. The Jews had formerly been segregated in the "Pale" and, because of restrictive laws, had been able to engage only in petty and other "Luft" trades. It was only during the period of Alexander II's reign that this restrictive legislation was relaxed. The difficulty, however, was that most of the Jews of Europe, because of historical circumstances, were not trained in productive skills. This group of men, including many of the leading intellectuals of the country, saw the pressing need for a reorientation of the economic life of the Jews, and seized the opportunity of bringing retraining to the Jews. They chose the name of ORT, which is an abbreviation of three Russian words meaning "Organization for Rehabilitation and Training."

In 1881 Alexander II was assassinated, and with Alexander III's accession to the throne there was a return to the restrictive laws of the past. For the next fifteen years, therefore, the ORT could function primarily only as an advisory committee and propaganda group. After the revolution of 1905 the ORT was legalized and reorganized. Its work aroused interest in ever-widening circles. It arranged for teacher training in trade schools, for regular conferences in the field of vocational education, and extended aid to Jewish students in technical schools. By 1914 the ORT had twenty divisions in the important centers of the country.

When the first World War broke out and many Jewish families were evicted from their homes, the ORT immediately expanded its facilities to help these people become economically self-supporting, to provide "help through work." During these War years seventy-two employment bureaus of the ORT were organized and over 25,000 homeless Jewish workers secured employment through these placement agencies. The ORT supported twenty-three divisions for the purchase of tools, machinery, and materials; organized cooperative workshops; set up institutions for apprentices; and established new vocational schools. It established a monthly paper and set up advisory centers in each region so that the Jews, uprooted from their old life, could find a new way of earning a living.

When peace was concluded, the majority of the Jews in all of Eastern and Central Europe found themselves deprived of their usual means of earning a living. In Soviet Russia there had to be an almost complete reorientation because over 80 per cent of the Jews had formerly been engaged in trade and commerce, occupations now outlawed by the Soviet government. These declassed Jews had to be completely converted into a productive element.

In Central and Eastern Europe the Jews found themselves hardly better off than their coreligionists in Soviet Russia. The large-scale economic changes that took place in these countries and the attendant anti-Semitism expressed in restrictive laws in some of these countries made the problem of the Jews throughout this area one of finding absolutely new occupations.

In 1919, therefore, the ORT sent a delegation consisting of Dr. Leon Bramson and Dr. David Lvovitch to the European countries in order to stimulate interest and raise funds for the work that the ORT was doing within Russia proper, and to intensify the work of the ORT in the former Russian territories of Poland, Lithuania, Latvia and Bessarabia. This they succeeded in doing.

In 1921, because of the realization that only an international organization could undertake the task of helping Eastern European Jewry, the Russian ORT authorized the European delegation to call a convention of all ORT committees and ORT friends. As a result of this convention, held in Berlin that year, the World ORT Union was formed, and the Central Board was elected, representing not only every country in which the ORT created institutions, but every country where interest was found and where funds were raised to support the ORT program in the countries of Continental Europe.

With the formation of the World ORT, the work in each of the several countries was able to proceed under uniform direction. In the Central and Eastern European countries, ORT organizations now affiliated to the World ORT pursued a policy of many-sided training and constructive help. Trade schools were set up for children and for adults, special courses were instituted for apprentices and for artisans who needed additional training in order to meet the new levels of competency. Farm schools, cooperative agricultural colonies, truck gardening and subsistence food farms were organized; cooperative workshops, where Jews could earn as they learned, were created; and tools, machinery and textiles were distributed to thousands upon thousands of Jews.

In 1933, with the Nazis' ascension to power in Germany, the ORT again had to meet the sudden need of additional thousands deprived of their normal occupations. There had been an ORT Committee in Germany prior to Hitler's coming to power. The ORT Committee there, up to that time an educational and fund-raising agency, immediately launched a program of constructive relief.

At the same time, the World ORT Union, realizing that there would be a mass wandering of Jews who would be in need of productive skills, immediately began to organize ORT training schools in industry and agriculture, not only in Germany, but in many of the transit countries to which these who could get out fled.

The work of ORT from 1933 on may be described in two phases; one, the phase of training natives of a country, who had no opportunity to leave it—the work which had been carried on for some fifty-three years—and the other, the task of bringing short-term training suitable to the refugees from Nazism, who were segregated in a number of European countries. During the period up to the time of the beginning of the second World War the ORT strengthened its training apparatus for the native Jews in Eastern and Central Europe. In each of the countries where it worked in training the native Jewish population it was recognized by the government as an organization which met the highest standards for vocational education.

The policy of training refugees was extended. New courses of short-term training based on refugee needs were instituted. In cases where the refugees were interned or otherwise cut off from institutions in the countries to which they had fled, the ORT came to them and set up training institutions right in the camps. In country after country, refugee retraining was instituted, and in 1942 it was being carried on in England, France, Switzerland, China, Canada and Argentina.

When the influence of Nazi domination began to spread over the map of Europe, with more and more restrictive occupational laws directed against the Jews, the ORT was prepared to meet the new emergency for the Jews in these countries, Hungary, Roumania, Poland and what were formerly Lithuania and Latvia.

The local ORT organizations in all of these countries worked under the supervision of the World ORT Union. The Central Board of the ORT Union was headed until his death by Dr. Leon Bramson, an outstanding figure in Jewish social service. Serving as vice-presidents under him were Dr. A. Syngalovski and Dr. David Lvovitch. Professor William Oualid of France in 1942 occupied the post of president, and Dr. A. Syngalovski assumed the task of directing the work of the ORT Union from Marseille, France, where the Central Board was (1942) temporarily located. New projects, budgets and policy are passed on by the Central Board of the World ORT Union. Part of the funds to support ORT institutions the local ORT Committees raise themselves. The balance is guaranteed by the Central Board of the ORT which, prior to the entry of the United States into the War, received the full funds collected in the Americas, Australia and South Africa.

Of these the most important source in 1942 was the United States. United States participation in the World ORT Union dates back to 1922, when Bramson and Syngalovski visited that country. From 1922 to 1925 Judge Jacob Panken, president, and Dr. Henry Moskowitz, chairman of the board of directors, who had founded the American ORT, popularized its ideas and aims.

In 1925 the American ORT Federation organized the American branch of the ORT Reconstruction Fund, a fund for the extension of credit to Jewish farmers and artisans.

In 1928 the Central Board of the World ORT came to an agreement with the Soviet government in which the ORT was granted the right to send machinery and implements totalling $1,500,000 in value to Russia, duty free, for the declassed Jews. The World ORT, to further its part of the agreement, had organized the World ORT Tool Supply Company, which permitted relatives and friends to contribute to the fund on the installment plan, so that the regular small amounts of money which they usually sent as relief to their families in Soviet Russia could be used for the purpose of establishing their relatives and friends as productive workers. The American ORT Tool Supply Company, a parallel organization, was set up here for the same purpose. In order to enlarge the scope of help to the declassed Jews, the People's Tool Campaign was organized at a conference called by Nathan Chanin and B. Charney Vladeck. This organization was run independently of the American ORT, but the funds collected were turned over to the ORT for the one purpose: to found cooperative factories for the declassed Jews of Russia, and to supply them with machinery and tools.

Refugees receive training at an ORT farm colony

In May, 1932, there was an amalgamation of these two organizations—The People's Tool Campaign, and the American ORT. Vladeck was elected president of the new organization, an office he held until his death in 1938. In 1939 George Backer became president. Louis B. Boudin served as chairman of the board of directors after Moskowitz's death.

From 1932 on the American ORT Federation, with its broader base, was able to spread the goal and aims of ORT throughout the country. The Women's American ORT was organized in 1927, the Junior American ORT in 1934, and the Labor and People's Committee in 1938, and these organizations, forming together in the American ORT Federation, carried out the work of ORT in the United States through membership and fund-raising activities.

Anticipating the fact that the American ORT Federation might be cut off from financing local ORT Committees in Europe, the local Committees were authorized to borrow funds upon the guarantee that the debts would be repaid as soon as possible. A reserve was, in 1942, being built up in America to meet the obligations of the ORT institutions in Hungary, Roumania, Poland and Shanghai, and to provide a start toward the huge work of reconstruction which will be so vital when the peace is signed.

Since the entry of the United States into the second World War, the American ORT Federation increased its support to ORT in the allied and friendly nations, helping the local Committees to expand their aid to refugees seeking a skill in their new homelands. The ORT program in South America was, in 1942, being extended to Uruguay and Bolivia. A school within an internment camp for Jewish refugees in Canada was opened. The work in England, France and Switzerland was being extended as much as possible so that the many refugees in these countries might learn a skill with which they could become independent no matter where they might later go. In June, 1942, the first vocational training school for refugees in the United States was opened by the ORT in New York city, with an initial enrollment of 160 students, with classes in radio and power machine operation and in machine shop work.

The ORT's publications in 1942 included: ORT Economic Review, a scientific journal, published bi-monthly in the United States by the World ORT Union; and the American ORT Journal, published quarterly by the American ORT Federation.

PHILIP BLOCK.

ORTEGA, MANUEL L., author, b. Jerez de la Frontera, Spain, 1888. While still young he became director of the newspaper El diario de Jerez. In Africa Ortega edited several periodicals, including Heraldo de Marruecos (Tangier). His books include: Frivolidades; El amor y la vicaria; La vida que pasa; Los Hebreos en Marruecos; El Raisuni; El doctor pulido. Los Hebreos en Marruecos, a history of the Jews of Morocco, was highly praised by Spanish critics.

ORTHODOX JUDAISM, see JUDAISM.

ORVIETO, ANGELO (Base del Marzocco), author, b. Florence, Italy, 1869. With his brother, Adolfo Orvieto, he founded the periodicals Vita Nuova, Nazione Letteraria and Marzocco. Orvieto was the author of several volumes of poetry, including La sposa mistica (1893); Il velo di Maya (1898); Verso l'oriente (1902); Le sette legende (1912); Primavera della Cornamusa (1925); and the Zionist poem, Il vento di Sion (1928). He wrote two opera libretti, Chopin (1901) and Mosè (1905).

ORZESZKO (ORZESZKOWA), ELISA, Polish non-Jewish author, b. 1842; d. 1910. She was considered the most important Polish prose writer of the 1870's. Prompted by an interest in Judaism, she made a thorough study of Jewish history, read the Bible in the original and acquainted herself with the Talmud. Her most important work, the Haskalah novel Meir Ezofowicz, describes the struggle of a Jewish youth striving for knowledge against backward Orthodoxy. Her Jewish novels, of which Gedali, Mogitchi Samson and Mirtala are the most distinguished, were sympathetic portrayals of the Jewish character, and were translated into English, German, Russian and Hebrew. Orzeszko felt that the solution of the Jewish problem would be the complete assimilation of the Jews.

Lit.: Feldman, W., Pismennictwo Polskie, vol. 1 (1902); Orgelbrand, in Wielka Enzyklopedia; Yevreiskaya Entzyklopedia, vol. 12, p. 131.

OSBORN, MAX, art historian, b. Cologne, Germany, 1870. In 1893 he received his Ph.D. degree from the University of Berlin; in the following year, in collaboration with famous experts, he started publication of Jahresberichte für deutsche Literaturgeschichte, which appeared until 1914. From 1900 to 1933 Osborn was an art critic of the Vossische Zeitung, Berlin. He was, moreover, a member of the art commission of the city of Berlin, an expert on questions of modern art at the Berlin courts, and president of the Association of German Art Critics. When his general literary activities came to an end, due to the establishment of the Nazi regime, in 1933, Osborn devoted himself exclusively to Jewish cultural work. He was one of the founders of the Jüdischer Kulturbund in Germany. Osborn emigrated to Paris in 1938; in 1942 he was living in New York city.

Best known of his numerous books is his Geschichte der Kunst, published in 1910, of which seventy editions were issued in German; the standard work was translated into Spanish, Russian and Croatian. Other works of his include Die Teufelliteratur des sechzehnten Jahrhunderts (1893); Die Kunst im Leben des Kindes (1901); Albrecht Dürer's schriftliches Vermächtnis (1905); Von 1800 bis zur Gegenwart (1906); Berlin (1908). He wrote several monographs, among them a treatise on Joshua Reynolds (1908), the only German biography of the English artist, and numerous essays on Jewish artists, such as Max Liebermann, Lesser Ury, Emil Orlik and Leonid Pasternak.

In 1942 Osborn was made a contributing editor in art of the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia.

OSE (World Union for the Protection of the Health of the Jews), a society organized in 1912 in St. Petersburg, Russia, to combat the high morbidity and mortality rate among the Russian Jews and to raise their physical and mental level through various preventive measures and through the spread of information on hygiene. The need for special Jewish institutions arose from the oppressive conditions of Jewish life under the yoke of legislative restrictions and grave discriminations in various spheres of their activity. In addition to the capital, branches of the OSE were organized in a number of larger centers such as Moscow, Vilna, Kiev, Kharkov and Odessa.

The systematic work begun in 1912 was interrupted by the first World War (1914), which called for special relief measures on behalf of the War victims and the hundreds of thousands of refugees and exiles from Poland and western Russia. At that time the OSE created a whole network of aid-stations for refugees under way and at the points of exile in eastern and southern Russia.

By the end of the War, in 1917, thirty-four branches of the OSE were in operation in many cities of Russia. The branches maintained sixty clinics treating over 500,000 patients yearly; twelve hospitals with 450 beds; 125 nurseries for 12,000 children; eleven milk distribution stations known as the "Drop of Milk," serving over 1,850 babies; thirteen summer camps for 2,500 children; four tuberculosis sanatoria with 210 beds; forty feeding stations for school children. The number of physicians, nurses, technicians, teachers and the like in the exclusive employment of the OSE reached the figure of 700, besides a great number of volunteer workers. The yearly budget of all OSE institutions for the year 1917 reached $1,034,000, of which 35 per cent was contributed by the government.

Following the Bolshevik revolution the OSE branches continued their work up to 1925, especially in the south of Russia and in the Ukraine, where the Jewish population had suffered most from the pogroms and famine. The OSE branch organized in Berlin sent large shipments of drugs, medical supplies and surgical instruments with the aid of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the war relief agencies. Forty-four children's homes, four large disinfecting stations, seven mobile sanitary units and a number of children's nurseries and feeding stations were built.

After the Versailles Treaty, branches of the OSE arose in all the new states: Poland, Lithuania, Latvia and Roumania. In 1922 the Central Committee of the OSE was transferred to Berlin. Local committees of the OSE were also organized in 1922 in Berlin and in London. All these branches developed a considerable activity, aroused the interest of the Jewish population in questions of hygiene and preventive medicines, and built up a wide network of institutions.

In Poland, the former OSE branches which existed in western Russia (Vilna, Bialystok, Grodno) as well as a number of newly organized sections in Poland and Galicia, united into the TOZ Union (Towarzystwo Ochrony Zdrowia). In 1939, just before the outbreak of the second World War, the TOZ had seventy branches and 368 medical-hygienic institutions, including thirty-four general polyclinics, forty-one dental clinics, eighteen tuberculosis clinics, eight X-ray clinics, thirty summer camps for school children and fifteen day nurseries. The activities of the TOZ were supported by its 15,443 members from all walks of life. The work of the TOZ was concentrated on the dissemination of public health information, medical supervision over children, eradication of social diseases, general medical help and scientific research.

At the start of the second World War in 1939 the OSE branches in various countries and the TOZ branches in Poland had in all the major cities of Poland, Lithuania, Latvia and Bessarabia a number of dispensaries, hospitals, organizations for medical school supervision and summer camps. Children's mortality was reduced considerably in these centers, favus was eradicated, the spread of trachoma arrested, general health improved and information on hygiene was spread by means of brochures, pamphlets and lectures. The following is the total number of children served by the OSE and TOZ:

	OSE	TOZ
Milk Stations	3,050	4,250
School Hygiene Stations	22,700	41,700
Children's Camps	3,350	14,250
Total Number of Clinic Attendances	190,000	222,500

The budget of all hygienic institutions was covered, on the average, as follows: 75 per cent from local funds, and 25 per cent through subsidies of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

The OSE Central Committee had to be transferred to Paris in 1934, and to Montpellier, France, in 1940. Beginning with 1938 the OSE opened near Paris a number of homes for children from Germany and Austria and for children of interned refugees.

Before the fall of Paris (June, 1940) not only all these children but a great number of homeless Jewish children were placed in the eleven homes of the OSE in various departments of unoccupied France. The OSE succeeded in evacuating about 300 of these children to the United States, and obtained the release of 700 children from detention camps. In addition, the OSE organized medical aid and set up feeding stations and day nurseries for children in many cities of unoccupied France and in Paris. From the very start of the War the OSE worked in the detention camps, where tens of thousands of German, Austrian, Belgian and Polish Jews were confined.

Throughout the War the TOZ continued its activities in Warsaw and in thirty-two other localities of Poland. It maintained clinics, rendered aid to refugees, combatted infectious diseases, and supplied medicaments, drugs and serums. The OSE branch in Geneva shipped drugs through the International Red Cross to the TOZ branches in Warsaw and Cracow.

To aid the work of the OSE in France and that of the TOZ in Poland, as well as that of the other national branches of the OSE (England, Argentine, Mexico, Cuba), the American Committee of the OSE was organized in 1939; in 1942 it headed all OSE activities. JULIUS BRUTZKUS.

Lit.: Ose-Rundschau (1925-33); the revue OSE (1933-39); Sotziale Medizin (1927-39); Folksgesund (1932-41); Gourvitch, L., Twenty-Five Years OSE (1937); Wulman, L., Fifteen Years of Jewish Health Activities in Poland (1937).

OSER, see PHRASES, POPULAR.

OSER, BARUCH BEN MEIR, rabbi, b. Prague, 1743; d. Hamburg, 1823. In 1784 he became rabbinical assessor and later rabbi in Hamburg. A leader in the struggle against the Hamburg Tempel-Verband, he collected opinions against the Reform movement in Judaism from the most outstanding rabbis of his time, including Moses Sofer of Pressburg, Abraham Tiktin of Breslau, Eleazar Fleckeles of Prague, and Akiba Eger of Posen; these opinions, together with a preface by Oser, were published under the title of Eleh Dibre Haberith (Hamburg-Altona, 1819).

Lit.: Duckesz, Ivvah Lemoshab (1905) 93-102; Jost, Geschichte des Judentums und seiner Sekten, vol. 8, p. 337.

OSER, LEOPOLD, physician and pharmacologist, b. Nikolsburg, Moravia, 1839; d. 1910. In 1872 he became a lecturer in internal medicine at the University of Vienna; in 1885, assistant professor. He was also chief of the general dispensary and physician at the Rothschild Hospital in Vienna.

Oser wrote for Eulenburg's Enzyklopädie der gesammten Heilkunde. Among his works are Über Darmsyphilis; Die Ursachen der Magenerweiterung; Zur Pathologie der Darmstenosen; and Experimentelle Studien über die Innervation des Pylorus.

OSIANDER, ANDREAS (originally Heiligmann or Hosemann), Protestant theologian and defender of the Jews, b. Günzenhausen, near Nuremberg, Germany, 1498; d. Königsberg, Germany, 1552. In 1520 he was appointed Hebrew tutor in the Augustinian convent at Nuremberg, and two years later he became the first Protestant preacher there; from 1549 until his death he served as professor in Königsberg. In his writing, Ob es war und glaublich sey, dass die Juden der Christen Kindt heymlich erwürgen und ihr Blut gebrauchen (1540), Osiander took a stand against the ritual murder accusation. The work was rediscovered by M. Stern and reprinted under the title Andreas Osianders Schrift über die Blutbeschuldigung (1903).

OSIRIS, DANIEL, philanthropist, b. Bordeaux, France, 1825; d. Paris, 1908. The son of a merchant, he began his financial career in Paris at the age of fourteen. He presented his noted art collection to the Louvre Museum, built several synagogues, including that in the Rue Briffault in Paris, dedicated in 1877, and spent large sums on monuments and art galleries. Osiris, who was an officer of the French Legion of Honor, gave three large prizes for scientific achievement: 100,000 francs for the most noteworthy contribution to art, science and industry at the Exposition Universelle of 1889; 100,000 francs at the Exposition of 1900, which was divided between Madame Curie for her work on radium and M. Branly for his work in connection with wireless telegraphy; 100,000 francs to be awarded as a prize every three years by the Institut de France; in 1903 this prize was awarded to Dr. Roux of the Pasteur Institute.

OSSUARIES, small limestone boxes, about twenty-four inches in length and twelve in depth, used to hold the bones that remain after the body has been interred for some time in graves made in the rocks. Apparently the procedure in ancient times was to bury the body in a cave until enough time had elapsed for all the flesh to be consumed, and then to gather what was left in an ossuary for reburial. A number of ossuaries have been excavated, especially in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. Most of them have simple ornamentation or raised lines on the sides, and many bear the names of the departed. The Jerusalem ossuaries are almost all from the time of the Temple (before 70 C.E.); many of those in other places are of a later period. The use of ossuaries persisted as late as the Gaonic period (6th to 11th centuries).

Lit.: Klein, Samuel, Jüdisch-palästinisches Corpus Inscriptionum (1920); reports of the organizations conducting excavations in Palestine.

ÖSTERREICHER, LUDWIG TOBIAS FREIHERR VON (according to his birth certificate, Tobias Jacob), naval chief, b. Schaffa, Moravia, 1831; d. Vienna, 1893. He was the son of a poor village schoolmaster. After his conversion (1856) Österreicher became ship lieutenant and gradually rose to rear admiral. He was knighted in 1872 and made a baronet in 1879. From 1867 to 1873 he was in charge of the coast fortifications on the Adriatic Sea. Later he became chief of a department of the war ministry. He wrote Aus fernem Osten und Westen (1879).

ÖSTERREICHISCH-ISRAELITISCHE UNION, see UNION ÖSTERREICHISCHER JUDEN.

OSTRACA, smooth sherds from broken clay vases, often used instead of expensive papyrus or leather in the ancient Near East, especially in Egypt. Ostraca were usually employed for recording simple business transactions or for memoranda, letters, lists of names, and the like. Following are the most important finds of ostraca for Biblical and early Jewish history. The earliest group of Hebrew ostraca is formed by about seventy inscribed sherds from the 18th cent. B.C.E. found in Samaria during the excavations there in 1910 and 1931 to 1933. Some sixty-three of these ostraca form a homogeneous lot of dockets attached to shipments of wine and oil from different localities in western Manasseh to the palace of the Israelite king. These ostraca were at first dated in the reign of Ahab, but a date in the ninth to the seventeenth year of Jeroboam II (early 8th cent. B.C.E.) is now certain. Later in date but still more significant is a lot of some twenty-one ostraca discovered at Lachish in 1935 and 1938, and published by Torczyner. Half a dozen of these documents are well preserved and can be read throughout or almost throughout; five of them are letters from about the year 589 B.C.E. Their language is almost identical with that of the prose sections of Jeremiah, to which they form a valuable supplement, filling out details of background.

A number of Aramaic ostraca from the post-Exilic age (5th to 4th centuries B.C.E.) have been found in Palestine, mainly at Samaria, but most of them come from Egypt, where they extend over four centuries, from the 7th to the 3rd centuries B.C.E. Nearly all these ostraca belong to Jewish colonies at Yeb-Elephantine (5th cent. B.C.E.) and Tbo-Edfu (3rd cent. B.C.E.). In 1939 and 1940 Nelson Glueck discovered half a dozen Edomite and Aramaic ostraca at Ezion-geber (Elath) on the Gulf of Aqabah; all date from between 600 and 350 B.C.E., and contain little but lists of names, which are historically significant in themselves.

WILLIAM F. ALBRIGHT.

Lit.: Reisner, Fisher and Lyon, Harvard Excavations at Samaria, vol. 1 (1924) 227-48; Diringer, Le iscrizioni antico-ebraiche palestinesi (1934) 21-74; Torczyner, The Lachish Letters (1938); Teudoth Lakhish (1940); Albright, W. F., in Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 82 (1941) 18 et seq., with summary of all significant previous research; idem, in Journal of Biblical Literature (1936) 150 et seq., with summary of the different groups of Aramaic ostraca now known and chronological discussion; Sachau, Aramäische Papyrus und Ostraka aus Elephantine (1911).

OSTROG, city in Volhynia; in 1941 it had about 14,000 inhabitants, approximately half of whom were Jews. The Jewish community dates probably from the 15th cent. The earliest reference to them is in the record of customs in 1532; in 1536 a number of Jews were tried before King Sigismund I of Poland for violations of the customs laws. The community was almost completely destroyed by the Chmielnicki uprising in the middle of the 17th cent.; before that it had about 1,500 householders. For some time there were only a few Jews in the city.

The community gradually grew toward the end of the 17th and in the 18th cent. There were two Kahals which engaged in such bitter dissension as to evoke a protest from nearby rabbis in 1758. The town and the community suffered from the political misfortunes of Poland; poverty spread among the Jews, and Hasidism gained many adherents. During the siege of the city by the Russian armies (1792) the Jews gathered in the synagogue, which was struck by cannon-balls but not destroyed; the escape of the community was regarded as miraculous and its anniversary (Tammuz 6 and 7) was annually commemorated. The city passed to Russia in the second partition of Poland, became Polish again in 1919, and Russian again in 1939. Ostrog was in the path of the German invasion of Russia in 1941 and the Jewish community suffered severely.

During the period of Polish independence Ostrog was one of the chief Jewish communities of Volhynia. Its leaders and rabbis included such men as Solomon Luria, Isaiah Horovitz, Samuel Edels, David ben Samuel Halevi and Joel Heilprin.

Lit.: Biber, Maskereth Ligedole Otroha (1907); Regesti i nadpisi, vols. 1-3; Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, pp. 442-44.

OSTROLENK, BERNHARD, economist and editor, b. Warsaw, Poland, 1887. He was brought to the United States (1899) and, after preparatory schooling at the National Farm School, he received a B.Sc. degree from the Massachusetts State College (1911), an A.B. degree from Boston University the same year, an A.M. degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1918, and a Ph.D. degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1922. Entering the educational field as director of agriculture for the Canby, Minn., State High School (1913), Ostrolenk later became director of the National Farm School in Pennsylvania (1916-27), and was also a lecturer on agricultural finance at the University of Pennsylvania (1923-1926). In 1930 he was made professor of economics at the School of Business and Civic Administration of the College of the City of New York, and in 1942 still held this post. He became chairman of the department in 1932. In 1936 he was given the honorary academic award of the Massachusetts State College.

In addition to writing on economic analysis for various magazines in the United States, Ostrolenk was from 1929 to 1931 a member of the editorial board of The Annalist and in 1933 to 1934 economist for The Business Week. He was the sponsor and editor of the Works Project Administration project on bibliography and cooperation. Among his books were: Harvey Baum: A Study of the Agricultural Revolution (1928); Voluntary Allotment (1932); Surplus Farmer (1932); Economics of Branch Banking (1932); Electricity for Use or for Profit (1936); How Banks Buy Bonds (1933); Economic Geography of the United States (1941).

OSTROPOLER, HERSHELE, "court jester" at the "court" of the Hasidic rabbi Baruch Tulczyner (1770-1810). He lived in the second half of the 18th cent. Besides his sparkling wit and sarcasm, which he exercised for the amusement of the weary rabbi, he is said to have played curiously mischievous tricks upon ignorant Jews and simple-minded peasants. He is supposed also to have played his practical jokes on the "fools of Chelm." His birthplace, Balta, has been changed to Baltimore in American story-telling, but this, of course, is pure fiction. Due to his singular humor and keen sarcasm he became very popular in Hasidic circles. His practical jokes and tricks appeared in print even up to the present in most parts of Poland and Russia. A successful comedy, Hershele Ostropoler, was produced by the Jewish Vilner Truppe (Vilner Theatrical Company).

Lit.: Bloch, H. Ostropoler (1921); Loewe, H., Schelme und Narren (1920) 29-40; Sherman, Eliezer, Hirschele Ostropoler (Hebrew; 1931).

OSTROPOLI, SAMSON BEN PESACH, 17th cent. Polish Cabalist and Maggid. He came from Polonnoye, near Zhitomir. During the Cossack uprising under Hetman Chmielnicki in 1648 Ostropoli and 300 other Jews were killed in the synagogue of Polnoy—a death he is said to have predicted.

Ostropoli wrote numerous mystical commentaries, and had a considerable following. He was the author of Dar Yadin, a mystical commentary on Sefer Hakarnayim; Likkute Shoshanim (1765); Dine Vehanhagoth Haadam (1795), a collection of Cabalistic liturgical regulations which includes works of other Cabalists; Maamar Haittim Im Hiddushim (1695); Sefer Likkutim (1794); Cabalistic exegetics and elucidations of many passages from the Zohar, Midrash, Peliah and other works; and Niflaoth Hadashoth (1797), an explanation of the Pentateuch and the five Megilloth.

OSTROWSKI, ALEXANDER, mathematician, b. Kiev, Russia, 1893. He became an instructor at the Universities of Hamburg (1922) and Göttingen (1923), and full professor of higher mathematics at the University of Basel, Switzerland, in 1927. He did work in the fields of the theory of number, function, and higher algebra, and published papers on the power and Dirichlet series, gamma function, discriminants, determinants, invariants, and the Galois theory.

OSTROWSKY, ABBO, artist and art educator, b. Yelisavetgrad (Kirovo), Russia, 1889. He began his education in art in Odessa, Russia, and in 1906 directed the People's Traveling Exhibit in several Russian provinces. Emigrating to the United States in 1908, he studied in New York's National Academy of Design until 1911. In 1914, the year he became a naturalized citizen, he founded the art school of the Education Alliance, and became its director, a post he still filled in 1942. In 1936 he was appointed chairman of the visual arts committee of the National Federation of Settlements.

Both painter and etcher, Ostrowsky exhibited in numerous galleries throughout the United States, in Italy, France, England, and Norway. In 1931 he had a one-man show of etchings and drawings at the National Museum of Washington, D. C. In 1937, exhibiting with the Society of American Etchers, he won the Kate W. Arms award for the most meritorious work. Examples of his work were selected for the permanent collections of the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, the Gregg Collection of Lincoln University in Nebraska, the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C., the New York Public Library, the Tel-Aviv Museum in Palestine, and the Museum of Western Art in Moscow.

OSVÁT, ERNŐ, critic and editor, b. 1877 (place of birth unknown); d. Budapest, 1929. Early in his career he associated himself with the endeavor of various reviews to champion a new and more differentiated literature in the Hungarian language. He was one of the founders and editors of the review Nyugat (West; 1908-42), and his unerring judgment of esthetic values stimulated the flowering of a literature on a par with the best of French writing. A jubilee volume was issued in his honor on the occasion of the twentieth anniversary of Nyugat. Osvát committed suicide at the grave of his daughter in 1929.

OSVÁT, KÁLMÁN, author and editor, b. Nagyvárad, Hungary, 1880. He was a brother of Ernő Osvát. After graduating from medical school, he settled at Targul Mureš, Transylvania, where, after 1919, he published a review, Zord idők (Bleak Times). It was Osvát's aim to derive from the pressure of foreign (Roumanian) occupation the incentive on the part of the Hungaro-Jewish minority toward self-assertion in setting for itself high aims in cultural and public life.

He contributed to the Zionist daily newspaper published at Kolozsvár, Keleti Ujság (Oriental News). He published: Levelek a fiamhoz (Letters to My Son; 1923); Feljegyzések múló és nem múló dolgokról (Record of Things Ephemeral and Lasting; 1923); Románia felfedezése (The Discovery of Roumania; 1923); Erdélyi levelek (Letters from Transylvania). He edited and wrote in a large part the Erdélyi lexikon (Transylvanian Lexicon).

OSZTERN, SALAMON PÁL, orientalist, b. Budapest, 1879. After receiving the Ph.D. degree from the University of Budapest, he studied oriental manuscripts in the Universities of Leyden, Munich and Paris. Osztern wrote on the state doctrine, religious philosophy and dogmatics of Islam, as well as on Mohammedan law and the politics of the Orient. In addition to essays published in the periodicals Huszadik Század and Etnographia as well as in the daily newspaper Pester Lloyd, he published: A Korán ethikája (Ethics of the Koran); Volkssouveränität und Khalifat; Muhammedanisches Staatsrecht (part 1, Kriegsrecht).

Lipót Osztern (b. Budapest, 1872), a brother of Salamon Pál Osztern, was national president and, subsequently, co-president of the Hungarian Zionist Organization. In 1942 he was a member of the assembly of the Jewish Community of Pest.

OTHER WORLD, see Olam Hazeh and Olam Haba.

OTHIOTH DE RABBI AKIBA, see Akiba, Alphabet of.

OTHNIEL, first of the judges; he was the son of Kenaz and a member of the tribe of Judah. According to Judges 3:7-11, he delivered Israel from the oppressions of Cushan-rishathaim of Aram (perhaps Edom). He was the brother of Caleb, who is mentioned prominently in Numbers, and is reported to have received from the latter his daughter Achsah as wife, as a reward for capturing the Canaanite town of Kiriath-sepher (Josh. 15:16-19; Judges 1:12-15).

OTRANTO, city in southern Italy, where, according to tradition, the Jewish community originated in the 1st cent., when Titus is said to have brought many Jewish prisoners thither. That a Jewish community existed in Otranto in the 10th cent. is, however, certain. In 925, when Oria was taken by the Saracens, many Jewish refugees from that city found shelter in Otranto. Even before 940 a violent persecution occurred and three rabbis were slain, while other Jews escaped. At that time, and perhaps even earlier, Otranto was the seat of Jewish learning and of a flourishing Talmudic academy. This school was so famous that a paraphrase of the Biblical saying became popular: "From Bari shall go forth the law and from Otranto the Word of God." Salomon Yeshua (about 920) and Yefet (about 953) were famous Karaite teachers in Otranto.

According to Benjamin of Tudela, there were about 500 Jewish families in Otranto in the 12th cent. Its reputation as a seat of Jewish learning was maintained into the 13th cent., to judge by Isaiah di Trani's praise of the Otranto scholars. In 1261 there was a new persecution and many Jews left Otranto for Bari and other neighboring towns. In 1469 there were only fifty Jewish families in Otranto. With the banishment of the Jews from the kingdom of Naples in 1541 the Otranto Jewish community ceased to exist.

Lit.: Zunz, L., Zur Geschichte und Literatur, p. 514; idem, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge, 2nd ed., pp. 376, 446; Neubauer, Adolf, in Jewish Quarterly Review, vol. 4, pp. 606-25; Bacher, W., in Revue des études juives, vol. 33, p. 43; Kaufmann, Gesammelte Schriften, vol. 3, pp. 30-31; Cassuto, V., in Giornale della società Asiatica Italiana; vol. 29, pp. 97-100; Adler, E. N., The Travels of Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela (1907); Diehl, C., L'art byzantin dans l'Italie méridionale (1894) 170.

OTTAWA, federal capital of the Dominion of Canada, situated in the Province of Ontario. The population of Greater Ottawa was 185,778 (1931), which included about 3,482 Jews. The Jewish population is the fifth largest ethnic group in Ottawa, exceeded only by the English, Scotch, Irish and French.

Moses Bilsky, in 1857, was the first Jew known to have settled in Ottawa. Except for a few years spent at Mattawa, he lived in Ottawa until his death in 1923. In 1879 Adolph Rosenthal opened a jewelry store, and Moses Vechsler arrived in 1882. By 1891 there were 46 Jews in Ottawa, increasing to 398 in 1901, to 1,781 in 1911, to 3,041 in 1921, and to 3,482 in 1931.

The early settlers worshipped in Moses Bilsky's home for many years until the synagogue of Congregation Adath Jeshurun was constructed on Murray Street in 1895. The Reverend J. Mirsky was the first cantor and Shochet of the congregation, which he served for thirty-five years. In 1902 Archibald J. Freiman moved to Ottawa from Kingston, and in partnership with his father founded the Canadian House Furnishing Company which afterwards became the firm of A. J. Freiman Ltd.

There were four congregations in Ottawa in 1942: Adath Jeshurun, Agudath Achim, Machzikey Hadath, and Bnai Jacob. Ottawa had always been a Zionist stronghold, and for more than twenty years Archibald J. Freiman was president of the Zionist Organization of Canada. Lillian Freiman was president of Canadian Hadassah from its founding in 1919 until her death in 1940. In 1942 Ottawa had several Hadassah chapters, a men's Zionist society, a lodge of the Zionist Order Habonim, a branch of the league for Labor Palestine, and a branch of Hapoel Hamizrachi. Almost every major Jewish activity in Ottawa was controlled by the Jewish Community Council, which was composed of representatives from the city's synagogues.

LOUIS ROSENBERG.

Lit.: Sack, B. G., "History of the Jews in Canada," The Jews in Canada (1926); Broker, Henry, Ottawa, Washington of the North (1934); Wolff, Martin, "The Jews of Canada," American Jewish Year Book, vol. 27 (1925) 154-229; Rosenberg, Louis, Canada's Jews (1939); Arnoni, H. M., "The First Jewish Settlers of Ottawa," Canadian Jewish Year Book, vol. 2 (1940) 115-20.

OTTENBERG, REUBEN, physician, b. New York city, 1882. After receiving his medical degree from Columbia University in 1905, he pursued his researches in internal medicine and chemistry over a period of more than twenty-five years. In 1908 he reported the first transfusion in which blood tests for compatibility were done; a year later, with a colleague, he published a paper on serum reactions in which the heredity of blood groups and its consonance with the Mendelian law were first noted. In the following successive years Ottenberg continued to report his researches in blood chemistry; especially noteworthy were his observations of transfusions, and one of his findings became the basis for using the "universal group" blood donors during the first World War. In 1921 to 1922 he published his valuable Medico-Legal Application of Human Blood Grouping; in 1925 he suggested a classification of human races based on geographic distribution of blood groups. A pioneer in immunology research, he reported (1931) on the rate of removal of bacteria from the blood in human disease. He published a paper on painless jaundice (1935).

Including those already noted, Ottenberg contributed to medical journals about seventy-five papers; he published two texts, Chemistry for Nurses (1914) and, in collaboration, Laboratory Course in Serum Study (1916; 2nd ed., 1921).

Ottenberg became associate attending physician at Mount Sinai Hospital in 1921, and in 1930 assistant professor of clinical medicine at Columbia University, posts in which he continued in 1942. He was appointed to the Conference of Jewish Relations.

Lit.: Kagan, Solomon R. Jewish Contributions to Medicine in America (1939) 91-93.

OTTERBOURG, MARCUS, American diplomat and journalist, b. Landau, Germany, 1827; d. New York city, 1893. After studying languages at Paris, and teaching for a while, he went to the United States and settled in Milwaukee, Wis., where he became a journalist. He began at the same time to take part in politics, in which he was to retain an active interest during the remainder of his life. This led to an acquaintance with Abraham Lincoln who, in August, 1861, appointed him consul at Mexico City. In the troubled years of the Maximilian regime Otterbourg played a useful part, keeping the respect of all factions. His letters to the American State Department give a vivid picture of the political and economic life of Mexico during the period (1861-67). He exerted every effort to save the life of Emperor Maximilian, but as consul his powers were too limited. On June 21, 1867, Otterbourg was appointed Minister to Mexico, the first American Jew to be appointed minister to any foreign country. His name was never confirmed by the Senate and he served for only a few months. Forced loans formed one of his greatest problems. When the capital was besieged, he protected foreigners of every nation as well as his own fellow citizens, and saw that the starving were fed. In the final negotiations for the surrender of Mexico City to General Diaz, Otterbourg played a prominent part. In 1873 he was appointed police justice in New York city. After his term had expired, in 1882, he practiced law in New York until his death.

Lit.: Markens, Isaac, The Hebrews in America (1888) 185; Benjamin, Ruth L., in Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 32 (1931) 65-98.

OTTINGER, ALBERT, public official, b. New York city, 1878; d. New York city, 1938. He was the son of Moses Ottinger, prominent New York real estate operator and philanthropist, and traced his ancestry back to Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg. Admitted to the bar in 1900, he practised law until his death.

In 1912 his career in politics began when he became Republican leader of Manhattan's fifteenth assembly district; by 1916 his party position was firmly entrenched, and he won a seat in the state senate. Here he distinguished himself by his oratorial prowess and by his sponsorship of social legislation in housing, public health and child care.

As President Warren G. Harding's assistant United States attorney general in 1921, Ottinger further enhanced his reputation for public service by his firm enforcement of laws designed to protect the public, and in 1924 he was rewarded by being elected attorney general of New York state. Two years later, the only Republican to win state office, he was reelected. His incumbency was remarkable for its vigorous reform actions: he fought food profiteering, stock swindling, and frauds in weights and measures. He successfully championed the law for the use of voting machines in New York city. His warfare against loan sharks was sensational, and he helped devise a plan for making small loans available through the banks. For his work in behalf of labor he received the commendation of the State Federation of Labor.

On that record he climaxed his career by running for governor in 1928. He lost out to Franklin D. Roosevelt by the narrow margin of less than 25,000 votes. Defeated, but still active, and a challenging opponent of Tammany Hall, he was one of the first to urge what later came to be the Seabury investigation into the city's politics. However, Ottinger did not support Fusion candidate Fiorello H. La Guardia for mayor. Although a strong Landon promoter, Ottinger approved of President Roosevelt's economic measures in 1933.

In Jewish affairs Ottinger was prominent in the work of several organizations, notably the Hebrew Orphan Asylum, the Young Men's Hebrew Association, Mt. Sinai Hospital, the Sanitarium for Hebrew Children and the Hebrew Technical School for Girls. In 1931, in the nation-wide Joint Distribution Committee drive, he was chairman of the New York city section, with its quota of one million dollars. Ottinger was interested in the arts, especially in drawings and etchings; his private collection of these, by old and modern masters, was famous.

Lit.: American Hebrew, Oct. 5, 1928, p. 719; Oct. 19, 1928, p. 772; New York Times, Jan. 14, 1938.

OTTINGER, NATHAN, judge, b. New York city, 1874; d. New York city, 1940. Graduated from Columbia University Law School at nineteen, he became a noted trial lawyer. After having been twice defeated as Republican candidate for New York State Supreme Court justice, he was finally appointed to that bench in 1918 by Governor Charles S. Whitman to fill a retirement vacancy. At that time his younger brother, Albert, was a state senator. As state justice Ottinger handed down rulings that remained precedents.

After the first World War he was counsel to the Alien Property Custodian, making a four-month tour of Europe to investigate claims against the custodian. Ottinger was partner in the firm of Whitman, Ottinger and Ransom.

Lit.: New York Times, Nov. 18, 1940.

OTTOLENGHI, DONATO, author and philanthropist, b. Acqui, Italy, 1820; d. Alessandria, Piedmont, Italy, 1883. He devoted his time and income, as well as his literary work, to the improvement of the poorer classes. Some of his most important works are: La causa dei poveri deferta al sesso gentile (1860); Si pensi al povero, considerazioni e proposte (1860); Progetto per la fondazione di un comitato centrale e permanente di beneficenza in Alessandria (1862); Della povertà e della beneficenza in Alessandria (1808). Ottolenghi was instrumental in bringing about an improvement of the condition of the Jews in Piedmont.

OTTOLENGHI, EMILIO (Meir, Count Ottolenghi di Vallepiana), philanthropist, b. Acqui, Piedmont, Italy, 1830; d. Alessandria, Piedmont, Italy, 1908. He was ennobled by King Humbert I because of his generosity to the Maurisiano hospital of Turin. Ottolenghi founded many benevolent institutions, and was a director of the Bank of Italy. The family is inscribed in the golden book of Italian nobility, and the motto of their house is "Pro caritate."

Lit.: Encyclopedia storico-nobiliare italiana, vol. 4, p. 953.

OTTOLENGHI, GIUSEPPE, Italian general and war minister, b. Sabbionetta, Italy, 1838; d. Turin, Italy, 1904. After studying law, he entered the military academy of Turin. In 1859 Ottolenghi took part in the campaign against Austria as a volunteer; in the campaigns of 1860 and 1861 he was appointed to the general staff—the first Jew to attain this post. During the war against Austria, in 1866, he distinguished himself on several occasions, winning the Cross of Savoy. Ottolenghi then became professor of military history at the military academy of Modena and later, in the Franco-Prussian war, military attaché with the French army. He was made a brigadier general in command of the Turin division in 1888, and of the fourth army corps in 1902. From 1902 to 1903 Ottolenghi was war minister in the Italian cabinet, and at the same time a senator. He was true to Judaism all his life.

Giuseppe Ottolenghi

OTTOLENGHI, LAZZARO, rabbi, b. Acqui, Italy, 1820; d. Rome, 1890. He was rabbi in Turin, Moncalvo and Acqui. Ottolenghi was the author of Hebrew poems, and of plays and pedagogical studies in Italian. Kol Kore was a book of instruction for Hebrew; among his works in Italian were Matrimonio misto, a comedy, and Dialoghi religioso-morali.

Albert Ottinger

OTTOLENGHI, LEONETTO (Count Abramo Leone Ottolenghi), philanthropist, b. Asti, Italy, 1845; d. Pisa, Italy, 1904. He presented the Alfieri palace, a library and museum to Asti, for which he was ennobled (1899). Ottolenghi also rebuilt the synagogue of Asti in 1889. He promoted the exposition of Turin (1898), and presented a statue of Humbert I to Asti (1903).

OTTOLENGHI, RAFFAELE, lawyer and author, d. Acqui, Italy, 1917. He was a passionate defender of Jewish ideals and wrote Voci d'Oriente (1905-08) a two-volume study covering oriental influences in literature, Hebrew proselytism in Roman society and Christian origins. Ottolenghi was also the author of minor historical and apologetic studies.

OTTOLENGHI, SALVATORE, physician and criminologist, b. Asti, Italy, 1861; d. Rome, 1934. He studied medicine in Turin, and from 1886 to 1892 was the assistant of Caesar Lombroso, the criminologist. In 1893 he became professor at the University of Sienna, and in 1902 was made professor of legal medicine at the University of Rome. Ottolenghi was a pioneer in certain approaches to applied criminology; his doctrines were taught in the Italian Scientific Police School, which originated in 1895, when Ottolenghi inaugurated a series of special lectures for police officials. Subsequently the formal school was established, of which he was the director. Ottolenghi taught that the criminal should be understood, and he modified the biological explanations of criminality as expressed by Lombroso; at the same time he supplemented the physical phenomena of criminality, as expounded by Bertillon, with psychological approaches. This emphasis on the background, the environment, producing a criminal contained the nucleus of 20th cent. treatment of the problem.

Ottolenghi wrote widely on many aspects of his specialty. Among his works were: Polizia scientifica (1907); Trattato di policia scientifica (2 vols., 1910 and 1931); Trattato pratico di psichopatologia forense (1920).

OTTOLENGO (today generally spelled Ottolenghi) name of a Jewish family of northern Italy, the origin of which is traced back by some authorities to Ettlingen (or Öttlingen), a town in Baden, Germany, and by others to the town of Ottolengo, Italy. The family is probably of Ashkenazic descent. The name occurs in various spellings, such as Ottling, Oetling, Otolengo, Ettling, and Otelingo.

OTTOLENGO, SAMUEL DAVID BEN JEHIEL, Italian rabbi and Cabalist of the 17th and 18th centuries, b. Casale-Monferrato, Italy; d. Venice, Italy, 1718. He wrote Kiryah Neemanah (1701); Meil Shemuel (1705); and Tikkun Shobabim (1719), as well as responsa, Piyutim and elegies.

OTZAR HASEFARIM, see BENJAKOB, ISAAC.

OTZAR HASHORASHIM, see DICTIONARIES, HEBREW.

OTZAR YISRAEL, see ENCYCLOPEDIAS.

OULIF, CHARLES NARCISSE, jurist and communal leader, b. Metz, France, 1794; d. Paris, 1867. He was the first Jew to receive a degree in law from the University of Strasbourg and to be admitted to the bar of Metz. Deeply impressed with the ideas of the French revolution, Oulif made strenuous efforts to propagate these among his coreligionists and to educate the Jews of Alsace and Lorraine to citizenship. He agitated for the participation of the Jews in military service, for their education in handicraft and industry, and for religious reform.

In 1817 Oulif became officer in the national guard. He founded a school of Jewish youth at Metz, and was successful in his endeavor to abolish the Jewish oath. Opposed to the regime of King Charles X, Oulif took an active part in the revolution of 1830. Related by marriage to a Belgian Jewish family, Oulif went to Brussels and became one of the founders of the new University of Brussels. In 1834 he was appointed professor of law at that university.

He published numerous volumes on juridical problems and facts, especially contributions to forensic procedure, and in various articles and pamphlets he dealt with the political relations between France and Belgium. He was elected member of the consistory of the Jews of Belgium, and continued in this position to defend Jewish rights as well as to reform the Jewish cult.

OUMANSKY, CONSTANTIN ALEXANDROVITCH, Russian diplomat and journalist, b. Nikolaev, Ukraine, Russia, 1902. He attended school in his native city until 1917, when the revolution interrupted his studies; he was then in high school (Gymnasium). After the revolution, in 1918, he was able to continue his education in Moscow at Moscow University. At the same time, without leaving the university, he entered journalism, working on Moscow newspapers and with TASS (the telegraph agency of the Soviet Union—the official Soviet news agency). For TASS he worked as foreign editor from 1922 to 1926. Later he was the TASS foreign correspondent in Rome. From 1926 to 1930 Oumansky was manager of the Paris bureau of the agency, and was at the same time its special correspondent in Geneva and elsewhere in Western Europe.

In 1930 Oumansky returned to Moscow, where he worked as chief of the press division of the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs, serving in that capacity until 1936. During that period he was frequently a member of Soviet delegations to international conferences in Geneva and elsewhere. In November, 1933, he accompanied Maxim Litvinov to Washington, D. C., for the Litvinov-Roosevelt negotiations which resulted in the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. Oumansky came to the United States again in 1936 to serve as chargé d'affaires under Ambassador Troyanovsky. In 1939 Oumansky was named Soviet Ambassador to the United States to succeed Troyanovsky.

Oumansky held his post during the difficult early years of the second World War, through the Nazi-Soviet pact of non-aggression and the Finno-Soviet war, which were considered aids to a hated enemy and injurious to the democracies. When a new and easier phase in the United States-Soviet Union relations was inaugurated as the result of the Nazi attack on the Soviet Union and the Soviets' amazing resistance, Oumansky's association with the period of diplomatic confusion made it seem desirable that he be replaced.

Three months after the attack on Russia, Oumansky accompanied the W. Averill Harriman delegation to Moscow, where it was to discuss United States war aid to the Soviet Union. In Moscow Oumansky helped serve as host and interpreter at the session with Stalin.

Late in 1941 Litvinov was appointed Ambassador from the Soviet Union to the United States, and Oumansky rejoined TASS as a member of its managing staff in the capacity of director general. At about the same time he was also appointed to the collegium of the governing board of the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. In 1942 he still held both these posts.

Lit.: American Russian Institute files; Soviet Russia Today, Nov. 19, 1937; June, 1939; American Quarterly on the Soviet Union, July-Oct., 1939; Current Biography, Feb., 1941.

OUNGRE, LOUIS, colonization expert, b. Arlon, Belgium, 1880. He received his doctorate from the University of Ghent; then went to Paris. His Jewish heritage—he was of rabbinical descent—prompted his interest in Jewish affairs. Although he began his career by participation in banking and finance, he became affiliated with the Jewish Colonization Association in 1910. After a trip to the Argentine on behalf of the Association, Oungre returned to Paris in 1911 and became co-director, with Emil Meyerson, of the ICA offices there. Subsequently he became director-general of the ICA organization.

During the reconstruction period that followed the first World War, Oungre helped found the Joint-ICA Foundation, a combination of the Jewish Colonization Association and the Joint Distribution Committee. Later he cooperated in the formation of HICEM, which combined the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society with the Jewish Colonization Association and Emigdirekt of Berlin. Oungre was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honor. After the surrender of France to Germany in 1940, he came to the United States.

OVADIA, NISSIM JOSEPH, rabbi, b. Adrianople, Turkey, 1890; d. Peekskill, N. Y., 1942. He studied in Adrianople, later in Jerusalem, where he received his rabbinical degree from the Beth Midrash Larabbanim in 1913. Subsequently he received the Ph.D. degree from the University of Vienna (1927).

Ovadia's first rabbinical post was that of assistant rabbi to the Sephardic community of Vienna, in which capacity he served from 1913 to 1918. Appointed chief rabbi of the community in 1918, Ovadia remained in the position until 1929, when he was called to Paris to serve as chief rabbi of the Sephardic community there. During his residence in France Ovadia organized the Sephardic community of the country and founded L'Union Universelle des Communautés Sepharadites, which held its first conference in London in 1935. He was the founder and one of the editors of Le judaïsme sepharadi, a monthly periodical published by the Union.

In 1940 Ovadia left Paris, with his family, a day before the German occupation of the city. After being sheltered for four months in a convent, and aided in finally escaping by the priests and nuns of the hospice, Ovadia and his wife came to the United States in March, 1941. A short time after his arrival he was made chief of the Central Sephardic Jewish Community of America, an organization including the Levantine Jews resident in the United States. Ovadia was the author of Tefillath Emanuel, a Sephardic prayerbook, and of Tehilloth Abraham, a Mahzor with translations into Ladino.

ÓVÁRY, LIPÓT, historian, b. Veszprém, Hungary, 1833; d. Budapest, 1919. He took part in the Hungarian and Italian struggles for national independence, and devoted the rest of his life to historical research in Italy and Hungary. A member of the Hungarian Academy and of several Italian scientific societies, he became (1904) director-in-chief of the Hungarian State Archive. He was knighted and accepted Christianity.

Óváry published several historical works, chiefly in Hungarian, on Italo-Hungarian relations. La questione dacoromana e lo stato ungherese (1894), originally written in Italian, was published also in French and German as the authoritative study of a minority problem.

OVERREACHING ('ona'ah). Although Jewish law generally gives complete freedom to the will of the individual in the conclusion of a contract, it contains regulations in cases of overreaching in the purchase or sale of articles, in order to prevent trickery or taking advantage on the part of either party in the transaction. The basis for this division of law is in Lev. 25:14, 17 and 19:13, which prohibit wronging or oppressing one's fellowmen. The Mishnah (B.M. 4:3 et seq.) defines such wrongdoing as either making or offering a price on an article which is too far from its proper value. This excess or diminution of price is defined as overreaching.

The Talmud (B.M. 49b et seq.) makes a distinction between the following cases:

1. If the "overreaching" is less than one-sixth of the value of the article, the sale is valid and neither party can demand a return of the article and the money.

2. If the "overreaching" is exactly one-sixth of the value of the article, the sale is valid, but the party who has been overcharged or underpaid has a right to restitution.

3. If the "overreaching" is more than one-sixth of the value of the article, the one who has been overcharged or underpaid has the choice of voiding the sale or receiving restitution.

In money-changing the margin of overreaching is made much smaller; according to some it can not exceed one-twelfth or even one twenty-fourth of the value of the coins in question (B.M. 4:5).

The Mishnah provides for a statute of limitations in regard to complaints of overreaching. The claim must be raised at once, or within time for the party to have consulted another merchant or a kinsman. In the case of money-changing in a city, the party who thinks he has received too little must be given time enough to show the money to another money-changer; in villages he is given until Friday, the customary market day when he makes his purchases.

It appears from the Mishnah (B.M. 5:7) that the authorities of the Talmudic period fixed the prices for certain articles at certain seasons, especially that of produce. In such cases the deviations permitted from such prices were too small to give rise to a charge of overreaching. Some teachers do not regard the law of overreaching as applying to storekeepers; it referred especially to food and chattels and was not applied in cases of the sale of such objects as real estate and slaves, or of the transfer of obligations, or of barter. On the other hand such necessities as oil, meal and wine were required by the Talmud (B.B. 91a) to be sold directly, without the intervention of a middleman, in order to keep down their price.

The Jewish teachers also speak of another kind of overreaching which does not refer to price but to deception by words. Thus one should not ask a seller the price of an article if he has no intention of buying it. Another example of such wrongdoing is instanced by the Mishnah: one should not remind a penitent or a proselyte of his past. The Talmud (B.M. 58a) regards wrongdoing by words as worse than wrongdoing in prices and counts it among the sins that can not be forgiven. MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Mechirah 12 to 15; Shulhan Aruch, Hoshen Mishpat 227 and 228; Dickstein, P., in Hamishpat Haibri, vol. 1, pp. 15 et. seq., 150 et seq.

OWNERLESS PROPERTY, see HEFKER.

OXFORD, a city in Oxfordshire, England. In the pre-Expulsion period it was one of the chief centers of Jewish settlement and one of the communities in which an Exchequer was set up (12th cent.). It is supposed that when Jews arrived in England with and after William the Conqueror, Oxford was one of the cities to which Jews came. During the wars between Stephen and Matilda in the middle of the 12th cent., when Oxford fell first to one and then to the other combatant, the Jews were taxed by both sides. A Jewish burial ground was established in 1177.

In the 13th cent. there were several incidents to indicate the familiar pattern of toleration interspersed with persecution. A deacon who had married a Jewess and himself become a convert to Judaism (1222) was burned. Henry III permitted the Black Friars, in 1221, and the Franciscans, in 1224, to acquire residences in Oxford Jewry for the purpose of attempting to convert the Jews. A synagogue was established in 1227. Many Jews found refuge in Oxford during the Montfort rebellion, but were ordered back to their homes (1264-65). At the same time, the Jews of Oxford were stubborn in their own interpretation of Judaism, sometimes fanatically so. An ex-Jew who came into the Jewish section as a tax-collector was attacked by the Jews (1290). A few years earlier (1268) a more disastrous incident had taken place, when a fanatical Jew seized the crucifix in a religious procession on Ascension Day and trampled on it. As punishment the Jews were required to make a crucifix for the church processions and to erect another in front of their own synagogue. Later they were permitted to move the second crucifix elsewhere.

It was during the 13th cent., too, that the growth of Oxford as a center of learning provided another source of antipathy against the Jews. Students were forced to turn to the Jews for loans, and to pawn their books in exchange. This sometimes left the students without books. The Jewish quarters were several times pillaged, and finally the rate of interest for loans to scholars was set at 43 per cent. Moysey's, Lombard's and Jacob's Hall are landmarks showing probable Jewish ownership during the early days of Oxford.

Just prior to the Expulsion (1290), the Jews of Oxford seem to have been engaged largely in the wool and corn trades; the value of these commodities confiscated by the king amounted to about £435 (the equivalent of £13,050 in modern exchange). There is a tradition, unproved, that because of the right of the universities to grant asylum, a Jewish settlement existed in Pembroke Street, Oxford, throughout the entire period of the Expulsion, and disappeared only in 1840.

With the gradual return of Jews to England after the Cromwell era (from 1657 on), Jewish scholars began to make their appearance in Oxford. James Wolfgang, a convert to Christianity, and James Levita were allowed to read in the Bodleian Library in 1608. At the same time Jacob Barnett, a friend of Isaac Casaubon, fled from Oxford because he was threatened with baptism, and was banished from England. Alexander Arniedi, a convert, taught at Oxford before the 17th cent., and Isaac Abendana taught Hebrew at Magdalen in 1691. Abendana also edited the Oxford Almanack and Jewish Calendar from 1692 to 1700. Jacob, a Jew, opened the first coffee house in Oxford in 1650, and is supposed to have introduced coffee into England.

In the 1940's there was a permanent Jewish population of only forty in Oxford, out of a general population of 90,000. The student body at the university increased that number. There were a congregation, weekly Hebrew classes, and a Zionist society. Among the university organizations was the Oxford University Jewish Society. NATHAN RICARDO.

Lit.: Roth, Cecil, History of the Jews in England (1941); Neubauer, A., Notes on the Jews of Oxford (1890).

OYVED, MOYSHE, see GOOD, EDWARD.

OZET (Russian title, Vsesoyuznoe Obshchestvo po Zemelnomu Ustroistvu Trudyashchikhsya Yevreyev v SSSR; "All-Union Society for the Settlement of Toiling Jews on the Land in the Soviet Union), known also, in Yiddish, as Gezerd, a voluntary association which acted as a semi-private auxiliary to the official Komzet. It was incorporated under Soviet laws on December 24, 1924, and held its first meeting on January 17, 1925. The association had a Central Council, of eighty-six members, a Central Board, of forty-nine members, with a presidium, and at long intervals there were conventions of delegates from local branches. On January 1, 1936, it had 600 branches and a membership of 500,000, of which some were non-Jews. Its chief function was to enlist public support, both at home and abroad, for the cause of turning part of the declassé and pauperized Jewish masses into farmers. To this end an intensive campaign of propaganda was conducted, by means of meetings, lectures, exhibitions and suitable printed matter. In addition to issuing popular literature on the economic position of the Jews, on Biro-Bidjan, as well as on various land projects, the Society brought out, in the years 1927 to 1937, under the editorship of S. Dimanstein, a review entitled Tribuna (The Tribune). One of the purposes of this publication was to combat anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. The OZET used the funds which it raised by various means, including lotteries, to contribute toward the expenses of colonization. It also offered the settlers credit facilities, provided technical instruction and guidance for them, extended legal and medical aid, and cared for their cultural needs. Furthermore, it assisted the Komzet in locating and investigating tracts of land suitable for Jewish colonization, and had a hand in the selection and preliminary training of the prospective farmers for the new way of life which awaited them. In 1938 the society was liquidated, and some of its officers are said to have suffered arrest and deportation. ABRAHAM YARMOLINSKY.

P

PACHT, ISAAC, lawyer, b. Millie, Austria, 1890. He moved to California from Brooklyn, New York, in 1912, and the following year was admitted to the California bar. He practiced in Los Angeles until 1931. In that year he was appointed superior court judge by Governor Rolph and was successful candidate in the subsequent judicial elections of 1932; he was then named justice of the District Court of Appeal. In 1935 he reentered private practice. Pacht's judicial career was marked by his prosecution of the abuses in "ambulance chasing" in California. He was a member of the Judiciary Campaign Committee of the Los Angeles Bar Association.

Interested in both secular and religious affairs, Pacht was president of the Jewish Institute of Religion of Los Angeles, the Jewish Committee for Personal Service, and the United Jewish Welfare Fund; and vice-president of the Nathan Straus Palestine Society. He served also as director in the Jewish Orphans' Home of Southern California, and the Federation of Jewish Welfare Organizations. He was one of the heads of the California Division of the Committee's nationwide drive in 1936. In 1940 Pacht was appointed by Governor Culbert L. Olson a member of the State Prison Board, of which he became chairman.

Lit.: American Hebrew, Feb. 17, 1933.

PACIFICO, DAVID, consul, merchant and public official, b. Gibraltar, 1784; d. London, 1854. In 1812 he went to Portugal, and, although he remained a British subject, took an active part in the political struggle between the liberal and the reactionary parties of Portugal. When the reactionary party came into power, Pacifico's property was confiscated; after the victory of the liberal party he was appointed (1835) Portuguese consul in Morocco, and from 1837 to 1842 he was consul general in Athens. Then he entered into a grave conflict with the Portuguese government, and was removed from office.

From 1843 to 1847 Pacifico was engaged in business at Athens, and carried on a lawsuit against the Portuguese government. At Easter, 1847, the Greek government prohibited at Athens an old custom of carrying the caricature of a Jew representing Judas Iscariot in the Easter procession, because an agent of the Rothschilds was staying at Athens in order to negotiate a loan. The crowd, losing its vulgar amusement, took revenge by demolishing Pacifico's house and burning his papers. Supported by Sir Edmund Lyons, British minister to Greece, Pacifico claimed damages amounting to 886,736 drachmas from the Greek government. But his charge was constantly postponed; moreover, the Greek government expropriated Pacifico's real estate. After repeated reports by Lyons, Palmerston, the British foreign secretary, ordered Admiral Parker to blockade the Piraeus. The British fleet arrived on January 15, 1850, and on April 26, 1850, the Greek government capitulated. Pacifico, however, received only 150,000 drachmas.

The fact that the British fleet was ordered to support the lawsuit of a Jew against a Christian government created a great sensation in Europe. Not only Russia, France, and Prussia boiled over with rage, but also a strong coalition in England (embracing Gladstone, Disraeli, Cobden and the prince consort) attempted to overthrow Palmerston. On June 17, 1850, the House of Lords accepted a vote of censure against the Foreign Secretary. Palmerston defended his measure on June 25, 1850, in the House of Commons, stating that "a British subject, in whatever land he may be, shall feel that the strong arm of England will protect him against injustice and wrong," and that he would not tolerate the practice according to which "because a man is of the Jewish persuasion, he is fair game for any outrage.

This speech made Palmerston "the most popular man in the country." Of course, he had a bone to pick with the Greek government and was eager, for other reasons, to humiliate the Bavarian dynasty whose members ruled Greece, but nevertheless the mere fact that he mobilized the armed force of England and did not fear international conflicts in order to punish injustice was a memorable event.

Pacifico left Greece for England. He outlived his triumph by only a few years. HUGO BIEBER.

Lit.: Revue d'histoire diplomatique, vol. 40 (1926); Bell, Herbert F. C., Lord Palmerston, vol. 2 (1936).

PACIFISM. Although the dictionary defines pacifism as "the belief that war and preparedness for war are wrong," the actual phenomenon of pacifism involves a varying complex of factors. The most commonly recurrent of these are:

1. Objection not to any one war but to all wars.
2. Objection on humanitarian or religio-humanitarian grounds.
3. The conviction that one's country can be safeguarded by means other than that of war and at a price less than that of war.
4. The tendency, in debate with opponents, to stress the cost, the sufferings, and the dismal aftermath of war for victor and vanquished alike.

When pacifism is professed by someone subject to military service, that pacifist becomes a conscientious objector. Considering that the American Jewish Year Book for 1941-1942 offers statistics according to which the Jewish population of the United States is 218.8 times that of Cincinnati; and then, considering that, in 1942, eight of the Jewish residents of Cincinnati were known to the writer of this article as conscientious objectors; it would follow, assuming that the ratio for Cincinnati applies to the country as a whole, that the number of Jewish conscientious objectors in the United States in 1942 exceeded 1,750. In 1941 the Central Conference of American Rabbis created a committee to cooperate with the National Service Board for Religious Objectors. Sixteen of the Jewish denizens of the Civilian Public Service camps were, in July, 1942, known to this committee as needing assistance to pay the camp charges.

The sacred literature of Judaism arose in eras antedating the conscious formulation of any pacifistic philosophy. Elements of pacifism appear, nonetheless, in that literature, and a spirit of pacifism colors various Biblical, Talmudic, Midrashic, and cognate utterances. Significant are passages such as these:

"Be of the persecuted rather than of the persecutors" (B.K. 93a).

"Be gentle and yielding as a reed, not hard and proud as a cedar" (Taan. 20a).

"Who is the hero of heroes? He who transmuteth a foe into a friend" (Aboth de Rabbi Nathan 23).

Isaac's non-resistance to Philistine vandalism (Gen. 26:18-22) is an obvious instance of pacifism in practice, while the happy sequel of Isaac's concessiveness comports with familiar pacifist expectations. Almost like a sentence from the modern advocacy of non-resistance are the words which Josephus puts into the mouth of King Agrippa:

"Nothing so damps the force of strokes as bearing them with patience; and the quietness of those who are injured diverts the injurious person from afflicting" (Jewish War, book 2, chap. 16, section 4).

Of the numerous encomiums on peace cited in the article PEACE, some may be compatible with the view that, while peace is a glorious ideal, war is, at times, a necessity and a duty—a distinctly non-pacifistic view. Still, the complete detachment of some of these utterances from any intimation that war may be a necessity ranges them nearer to the pacifistic than to the non-pacifistic attitude.

See particularly Finkelstein, Louis, The Pharisees (Philadelphia, 1938). Finkelstein regards the prophets in general as pacifists (II, 560) but refers particularly to Samuel (I, 364, 365, 369), to Isaiah (I, 422, 427), and to Zechariah (II, 504, 506, 534). He also regards the patriarchs as pacifists (I, 354) and discerns pacifistic doctrines in the story of Cain and Abel (I, 351) and in the account of the Exodus (I, 355). Further remarks on Hebrew pacifism are to be found in The Pharisees I, 287, 345, 347, 350, 358, 361, and II, 571, 594, 598, 615, as well as in Finkelstein's "The Ten Martyrs," in Essays and Studies in Memory of Linda R. Miller (New York, 1938), p. 54. Consult also Max Weber, Das antike Judenthum (Tübingen, 1921), regarding the pacifism of the patriarchs (pp. 54, 58), and of the Essenes (p. 428).

A religious organization of Jewish pacifists was formed at Atlantic City, N. J., on June 26, 1941. This group subsequently adopted the name of Jewish Peace Fellowship. Consisting originally of seven rabbis and a layman it increased, by additions and by amalgamation with a New York city group of Jewish conscientious objectors, to a membership of approximately forty individuals in 1942.

See also PEACE. ABRAHAM CRONBACH.

PACK (family of printers), see BAK.

PACRADOUNIS (also Bagratuni and Bagradites), Armeno-Jewish sect living in the cities of Eghin, Anatolia, and Rodosto, on the European coast of the Sea of Marmora. The Armenian historian Moses of Chorene traces their origin back to a certain Shampat (the Shaphat of I Chron. 3:22), a captive of Nebuchadrezzar who was handed over to the Armenian king Hratchia. King Vagharachag (2nd cent. B.C.E.) is said to have given them their name, after a considerable satrapy in ancient Armenia; he also accorded them various privileges, the chief of which was that of placing the crown upon the royal head. Moses of Chorene furthermore devotes considerable space to an account of the resistance of this Jewish group to the attempts of the Armenian kings to convert them.

Some historians have questioned the Jewish origin of the Pacradounis, holding that it is hardly likely that a Jewish family would be given such privileges. However, there seems no reason to doubt the tale, and in fact the Pacradounis to this very day observe customs resembling those of Oriental Jews. Chief among these are the practices observed at the time of mourning: the water in the house at the time of the death is not to be used, and no work is to be done for seven days. Certain families in this group are forbidden to eat pork, observe Saturday as well as Sunday as a day of rest, drink only wine which they themselves have made, and marry only within their own group. Certain striking resemblances have also been pointed out between Hebrew and Armenian words pertaining to religion, as well as between the melodies of many Armenian hymns and those sung in Oriental synagogues. The sect is known to be expert in business affairs and to have made important contributions to the best in contemporary Armenian art, poetry and science. Their physical appearance tends to resemble the ordinary conception of the "Jewish type."

Lit.: Galanté, Abraham, Les Pacradounis ou une secte arméno-juive (1933).

PADDAN-ARAM, see ARAM.

PADOA, ALLESSANDRO, philosopher and mathematician, b. Venice, 1868; d. Rome, 1938. He studied engineering at Padua and Turin, graduating in 1895. Padoa was distinguished in mathematical logic which he taught at the Instituto Tecnico di Genova from 1908 to 1923. He was active in many organizations, Jewish as well as non-Jewish, and member of several scientific academies.

Among more than one hundred publications are his famous Logica Matematica (1905), La Logica Deductiva (1912; French trans. La Logique déductive dans sa dernière phase de développement, Methodology and Didactic, Un duplica sistema indeterminato (1928); the article on Logique in the Enciclopedia di matematiche elementari (Milan, 1929). He was also contributor to La Révue de Métaphysique et de Morale in Paris.

Lit.: Nannei, Enrico, in Bolletino di matematica, March, 1938, pp. 30-32.

PADOVER, SAUL K., historian and public official, b. Rozwadow, Austria, 1905. He came to the United States in 1920 and studied at several universities, including Yale and the University of Chicago where he was awarded his doctorate in 1932. He was professor of history in West Virginia Teachers' College in 1930 and 1931; from 1933 to 1936 he was a research associate and instructor at the University of California.

In 1938 Padover was appointed assistant to Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes, being the first Jew to hold this office. He left that post in 1942 to become consultant to the Office of Facts and Figures under Archibald MacLeish.

Padover's writings include the novel Let The Day Perish (1932); The Revolutionary Emperor: Joseph II (1934; French trans., 1935); Secret Diplomacy (1937; French trans., 1938); Life and Death of Louis XVI (1939); Jefferson (1942). For The Revolutionary Emperor Padover was awarded the California Commonwealth Silver Medal in 1935 as the best book of the year; and his Louis XVI was called "the best biography of Louis XVI available in any language."

PADUA, city in northern Italy, with 500 Jews in a total population of 131,000 (1938). Although information as to the presence of a limited number of Jews in Padua dates from the 13th cent., it was not until the latter part of the 14th cent., that the number of immigrating Jews, who came from Rome, Bologna and other parts of Italy, considerably increased. Some Jews were engaged in the money trade and in the manufacture of fine metals and jewelry, while other were peddlers; still others owned property and real estate. A Jewish physician, Jacob Bonacosa, who translated one of the works of Averroes, is mentioned in the second half of the 13th cent.; another Jewish physician, Gentile da Foligno, taught at the University of Padua from 1340 to 1348. He was only one of the numerous Jews who studied or taught medicine in Padua during the following centuries.

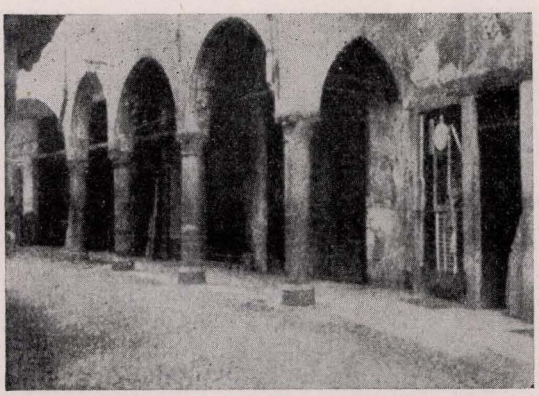
Under the protection of the house of Da Carrera, the Jews lived quietly and undisturbed, although the masses were less well-disposed toward them. However, not until 1405, when Padua came under the rule of Venice, did the conditions of the Jews change for the worse. The magistrate of Padua suggested to the senate of Venice to expel the Jews, which the latter declined to do. The preaching activities of the monks, who carried on agitation against the Jews, were instrumental in furthering aversion toward the latter, whose number had meanwhile increased through immigration from German countries. In 1455, the Jews, who were engaged in money lending, were driven from the city, but were readmitted after less than twenty years. In 1475, after the ritual murder trial of Trent, Jew-baiting in Padua increased until at last the Venetian senate put an end to these excesses. In order to provide the Jews with better protection, it was decided (1482) that they should not be subjected to the local authorities, but subordinated solely to the Venetian senate. In 1497 a public loan institute was established in Padua, but this in no way impaired the Jewish-owned banks, which steadily grew in number. Two Jewish scholars in Padua at that time were Rabbi Judah Münz and the philosopher and physician, Elijah Delmedigo. The expulsion of the Jews from Spain (1492) resulted in an influx of Spanish Jews into Padua, where three Jewish communities, Italian, German and Spanish, were founded.

In 1541 the citizenry of Padua requested the Venetian senate to establish a ghetto, but this was denied. One of the outstanding Jewish savants of that period was Meir Katzenellenbogen. In 1551, when the Jews were prohibited from engaging in the loan business, they turned chiefly to trading; however, before long the Christian merchants interfered, and succeeded in limiting their trade to old clothing.

In the 16th cent. the "Jew-races" customary in Rome were held also in Padua during the carnival. In 1603 the Jews were confined to a ghetto. In the 17th and 18th centuries they carried on mainly in the silk industry. In 1684, mobs attacked the Jewish quarter of Padua, as in other Italian cities, aroused by reports of the aid given the Turks by the Jews in the siege of Ofen (Buda) by the Christian army. However, due to the strict measures of the city magistrate who ordered armed soldiers to patrol the ghetto and distributed some money to the voters, the mob withdrew after burning several Jews in effigy. As a result, the custom arose among the Jews of Padua of celebrating the Purim of Buda on the 10th of Elul.

When the French occupied Padua (1797) the Jews for a short time obtained all civil liberties. Austria, too, granted her Jews far-reaching rights when it acquired the district of Venetia under the terms of the Treaty of Campoformio (1797). During the reign of Napoleon (1805-14) the Jews of Padua enjoyed full civil freedom; Isaac Raphael Finzi, their delegate, was vice-president of the Sanhedrin in Paris. When Venetia again fell into the hands of the Austrians (1814) the Jews of Padua continued to keep their rights, with the exception of holding public office.

Not until 1866 did the Jews obtain full equality, when Venetia was united to the kingdom of Italy. From 1829 to 1871 the rabbinical college had its seat in Padua. The anti-Jewish legislation of the Italian Fascist government, from 1938 on, affected the Jewish community of Padua. UMBERTO CASSUTO.



The ancient ghetto in Padua

Lit.: Giscato, Gli Ebrei in Padova (1901); Cessi, in Bollettino del Museo Civico di Padova, vol. 10, p. 201, vol. 11, p. 8; idem, La Libertà, Sept. 10, 1908; Gini, Nuove ricerche demografiche sugl' Israeliti in Padova (1916); Morpurgo, in Corriere Israelita, vol. 47, pp. 161, 193, 229, 257; idem, in Vessillo Israelitao, vol. 56, p. 573; vol. 57, p. 5; Della Torre, Scritti sparsi, vol. 2, p. 300 et seq.; Cassuto, Umberto, Gli Ebrei a Firenze, 33, 154, 160, 282, 351 et seq.; idem, in Rivista Israelitica, vol. 8, pp. 54, 93; Porges, in Revue des études juives, vol. 77, p. 20; vol. 88, p. 19; vol. 70, p. 28; Friedenwald, Harry, "Jewish Physicians in Italy," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 28 (1922) 200-3.

PADWAY, JOSEPH ARTHUR, labor lawyer, b. Leeds, Yorkshire, England, 1891. He received his legal education in the United States, to which he came in 1905, and in 1912 was admitted to the Wisconsin bar. After a short period of private practice in Milwaukee, Wis., he became active in public affairs; he was a member of the Progressive Party. In 1915 he was made general counsel of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor. Padway was elected to the state senate in 1925, and won distinction as author of much labor legislation. The same year Wisconsin's governor appointed him a civil court judge in Milwaukee county. To this post he was elected again in 1926, for a full term, but he resigned the following year.

Padway also served as regent of the state teachers' colleges of Wisconsin from 1933 to 1938. He became general counsel of the American Federation of Labor in 1937. He was added to the staff of Columbus University in Washington, D. C., as professor of labor law.

PAEFF, BASHKA, sculptor, b. Minsk, Russia, 1893. She was brought to the United States in infancy. Her parents settled in Boston, Mass., and there she studied art under Bela Pratt in the Museum School of Fine Arts. She went to Paris to further her studies.

Winner of a competitive commission, she executed a bronze war memorial for the state of Maine, which was erected in Kittery, Me., at the head of the Kittery Bridge. The Massachusetts War Memorial in the Hall of Fame of the Boston State House is also her work. Her well known pieces of garden sculpture include the Boy and Bird fountain in the Boston Public Gardens, the Julius Rosenwald bronze fountain in Ravinia Park, Illinois, and the John E. Warren Memorial bronze fountain in Westbrook, Maine.

Bashka Paeff's bronze plaque of the mother of Julius Rosenwald

Famous for her statues of dogs, she modelled a life size figure of President Warren G. Harding's Laddie Boy, which was presented by newsboys to the President's widow; and a portrait statue of Phantom, cocker spaniel belonging to Harvard's one-time president A. Lawrence Lowell, which was a gift of the class of 1933 to the president.

Bashka Paeff also executed a life-size marble bust of the oil engineer F. Julius Fohs, a bronze bust of Dr. Juan M. Munez of the University of Buenos Aires, a bronze bas relief of Dr. Elmer E. Southard of the Boston Psychopathic Hospital, bronzes of Oliver Wendell Holmes in Washington, D. C., and Jane Addams at the Hull House in Chicago, Ill., and a bas relief portrait of the mother of Julius Rosenwald, called "Grandma." In 1933 Miss Paeff was awarded the bronze medal of the Tercentenary Exposition of Art in Boston.

Lit.: American Hebrew, March 16, 1928, p. 650 and 697.

PAGANISM, general term for idolatrous religion, or the worship of national gods, in contrast to monotheism; it is particularly applied to the Greco-Roman paganism which persisted in the countryside (Latin, pagus) long after it had been driven out of the cities. Judaism draws a strict line between the pagans themselves and paganism as a religion. It could be on terms of amity with the individual pagans, but it could not compromise with polytheistic religions or idolatry. Hence the pages of the Bible and post-Biblical literature contain numerous injunctions against idol-worship and against those heathen customs (hukkoth hagoyim) which contributed to idolatrous practices.

The bitterness engendered by the defeat of the Bar Kochba uprising (132-35 C.E.) and the persecutions which the Jews of Palestine suffered at the hands of the pagans led them to intensify the restrictions against paganism. To the previous commandments to avoid idol-worship and the immoral practices of the heathen, and not to participate in their drinking parties or to intermarry, they added a general precept to avoid all customs of the heathen that in any way are connected with idolatry or represent moral depravity (Sifra to Lev. 19; Sab. 67a; Sanh. 101a; Tos. Sab. 7 and 8; Maimonides, Hilchoth Akkum 2:1-2; Shulhan Aruch, Yoreh Deah 178:1-2). It should be noted, however, that there was no objection to the adoption of other, reasonable customs (Sanh. 39b; Sifra, Ahare Moth; Isserles on Yoreh Deah 178). The rabbinical opposition to attendance at the gladiatorial exhibitions was based as much on the cruelty of the spectacle as on the fact that it was connected with pagan rites (Sifra to Lev. 18:3; Yer. A.Z. i, 40a). A Jew was expected to prefer death to participating in idolatrous worship, and in times of persecution this was extended even to the very smallest ceremony. This was the view also of the Christian church as regards its own followers.

The modern attempts on the part of some of the Nazis to return to paganism by reviving the worship of the ancient Teuton gods are, of course, of no special concern to Jews.

See also: AKKUM; HEATHENS; IDOLATRY.

Lit.: Bertholet, Die Stellung der Israeliten und der Juden zu den Fremden (1896); Hamburger, J., "Heiden," Realencyclopedie für Bibel und Talmud, vol. 1; idem, "Heidnische Bräuche, Sitte und Satzungen," ibid., vol. 2.

PAGAY, HANS, actor, b. Vienna, 1845; d. Berlin, 1915. After a long and varied career, twenty years of which (from 1887 on) he spent as a comedian at the Residenztheater of Berlin, Pagay was discovered by Max Reinhardt. Almost toothless, whispering in a hoarse voice, with stooping carriage and wrinkled face, he created unforgettable roles as the friar in Lessing's Nathan der Weise, Father Lorenzo in Romeo and Juliet. His physical defects were eclipsed by the mellow wisdom and kindness of old age. His imaginative portrayals of roles in the modern dramas of Ibsen, Maeterlinck and Wedekind were highlights of these presentations.

PAGEL, JULIUS LEOPOLD, historian of medicine, b. Pollnow, Pomerania, Germany, 1851; d. Berlin, 1912. He served as professor in 1898 and taught history of medicine from 1902 on. He wrote Einführung in die Geschichte der Medizin (1908; 2nd ed. 1917); Gebet des Maimonides and Doctor Esra. He published (with Neuburger) the Handbuch der Geschichte der Medizin (1901-1905, 3 vols.) and was contributor to many medical and encyclopedic publications.

Pagel edited the Biographisches Lexikon hervorragender Ärzte des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts (1901), the Deutsche Ärzte Zeitung (from 1902 to 1905), and contributed to the Jahresbericht über Leistungen und Fortschritte in der Gesamten Medizin, and the Biographisches Lexikon der Ärzte aller Zeiten und Volker.

PAHAD YITZHAK, see LAMPRONTI, ISAAC BEN SAMUEL.

PAINTERS, see ARTISTS.

PAINTING IN THE SYNAGOGUE, see FRESCOES and MURALS.

Juda Lion Palache

PAIRS, THE FIVE, see ZUGOTH.

PAIVA, JACQUES (or James), founder of the Jewish community of Madras and diamond merchant, d. Madras, India, 1687. He belonged to a family of Portuguese Jews, and was probably among the first Jewish settlers in England after their readmission. But he became eager to exploit the diamond mines of Golconda, and went to India, where he established a business, associated with his relatives who remained in London and sent him corals for which there was great demand in Madras. Paiva, for his part, sent diamonds to London.

In 1683 Paiva pleaded the cause of the Jews with the East Indian Company, and obtained permission for them to live at Madras. In 1685 he went to London, and returned to Madras the following year. During his absence from Madras, the governor realized Paiva's suggestion to establish a European militia, which from the outset comprised a number of Jews. Paiva personally kept a horse and arms at his own expense as a member of that militia. A few days before he died he was nominated alderman of Madras for life, but could not enter upon his duties because his nomination was published after his death. During his stay at London he made his last will in favor of his wife Hieronima. The widow, however, caused some scandal by taking up her residence with Governor Elihu Yale. She lies buried at the Cape of Good Hope beside her child Charles Yale.

Lit.: Love, Henry Davison, Vestiges of Old Madras, vol. I (1913); Roth, Cecil, Anglo-Jewish Letters (1930); idem, A History of the Jews in England (1941).

PALACHE, JUDA LION, educator, b. Amsterdam, Holland, 1886. He was the son of Isaac Palache (b. 1858; d. 1926), erstwhile chief rabbi of the Portuguese Jewish Community.

After preliminary courses at the Portuguese Jewish seminary and after passing the required state examinations, Palache became a student of classical literature and pursued special studies in Semitic literature at Leyden University where he obtained his degree (1920) on a thesis entitled: Het heiligdom in de voorstelling der Semietische volken.

From 1910 to 1920 Palache was teacher of Hebrew and classical literature at the Portuguese Jewish seminary and the municipal Gymnasium of Amsterdam, and at the municipal grammar school of The Hague (1920-24). He was appointed professor (1925) in the language and literature of Semitic peoples, of Israelite antiquity and exegesis of the Old Testament at the University of Amsterdam.

Until the time of the German invasion, Palache occupied a number of important posts in the Portuguese Jewish community of Amsterdam. He was president of the chief committee looking after the interests of the Portuguese Jewish community of the Netherlands; president of the central Jewish orphanage of Leyden, and regent of the Portuguese Jewish Seminary. He wrote numerous articles in many Dutch and foreign periodicals and also published a number of books, the most important of which are: Introduction to the Talmud (1922); The Ebed Jahveh Enigma (1934; written in English); The Hebrew Literature of Post-Talmudic Times (1935).

In the winter of 1934 to 1935 Palache made a lengthy trip to Palestine and Egypt. In 1942 it was not known whether two years of German occupation had resulted in any harm to him.

PALÁGYI, LAJOS, poet, b. Óbecse, Hungary, 1866; d. Budapest, 1933. On his father's side he was a direct descendant of Rabbi Eleazar Löw, surnamed Shemen Rokeach, and his mother was a foster-daughter of Rabbi Jeremiah Löw, a grandson of Eleazar.

Palágyi was a member, and the last to survive, of a small but distinguished group of Weltschmerz poets who, at the end of the 19th cent., received their inspiration from the pessimistic philosophy of Schopenhauer. His tendency of responsiveness to the pessimistic resulted from the hardships of his early life. He was the first in Hungary to write a poem on the working man's May Day. Later Palágyi won recognition, especially in academic circles, for his poetry. His play A rabszolgák (Slaves) and his epic poem Az anyaföld (Mother Earth) were awarded prizes by the Hungarian Academy. He was also made a member of the Petőfi Literary Society but was, late in his life, removed from membership for being a Jew.

His poetry, of classical beauty and searching philosophical thought, had little appeal for the public at large. He tried his hand at every poetical genre and among his eighteen published works (he left as many unpublished manuscripts), were satires on contemporary society: Hangyák (Ants) and Utazás a Gellérthegy alatt (Journey under Mount St. Gerard). The volume Bibliai emlékek was dedicated to Biblical themes. He translated into Hungarian Goethe's Faust.

In his youth, Palágyi, together with Vilmos Vázsonyi, headed a successful literary and political movement for making the Jewish religion equal with the Christian denominations. Together with his brother Menyhért he edited the review Jelenkor (The Present).

PALÁGYI, MENYHÉRT (MELCHIOR), philosopher, b. Paks, Hungary, 1859; d. Darmstadt, Germany, 1925. He was an elder brother of Lajos Palágyi. Educated at the University of Budapest, he became assistant professor (Privatdozent) of natural philosophy at the University of Kolozsvár in 1905. In 1919, after Kolozsvár was seized by Roumania, he retired, and, at the invitation of Hermann Kayserling, removed to Darmstadt where he lived to the end of his life. His Neue Theorie des Raumes und der Zeit (1901) anticipated Minkovski and Einstein; in Der Streit der Psychologisten und Formalisten in der modernen Logik (1902), as well as in Die Logik auf dem Scheidewege (1903) he combatted the psychologistic trend in philosophy. His Kant und Bolzano (1902) rediscovered and interpreted a forgotten philosopher, Bolzano.

Palágyi made original contributions to the theory of knowledge in Az ismerettan alapvetése (Foundations of the Theory of Knowledge; 1904); to esthetics in Theorie der Phantasie (1908) and especially to natural philosophy: Naturphilosophische Vorlesungen (1907). In 1914 he published Die Relativitätstheorie in der modernen Physik. He conceived the outlines of a mechanics of the universe. German philosophy paid its tribute to the thought of Melchior Palágyi by arranging for a posthumous edition of his scattered works in three volumes: Melchior Palágyi's gesammelte Schriften (1925-26).

PALDI, ISRAEL, artist, b. Berdiansk, Russia, 1893. He spent part of his childhood in Switzerland and at the age of fourteen was sent to live with relatives in Palestine. Here he studied at the Bezalel Art School, then became a manual laborer, working as a mason. In 1911 he went to Vienna to study painting. During the first World War he was a Turkish prisoner, and he did not return to Palestine until 1920. The period from 1920 to 1930 was one of bold creativeness for Paldi. His paintings of that decade were colorful and dynamic.

In 1930 Paldi went to Europe again, and, while in Paris, came under the influence of painters who worked in darker tones. This produced a revolutionary change in his own painting and he did not immediately find his new form amidst the welter of conflicting tendencies. Paldi also did some work as a stage designer and was responsible for the sets in the Ohel Theatre production of Herman Hejerman's Lost Hope. He taught art at the Herzliah Gymnasium.

Lit.: Newman, Elias, Art in Palestine (1939).

PALE OF SETTLEMENT, a designation for certain provinces in imperial Russia where the Jews had the right of permanent residence. The gravest of all the disabilities which hemmed in the existence of the Jewish population in pre-revolutionary Russia, it dates back to Empress Catherine's ukase (decree) of December 21, 1791 (Old Style), although the phrase originated only under Nicholas I. In the three decades which preceded the end of the empire (1887-1917), the Pale of Settlement contained, beside the ten provinces of the so-called kingdom of Poland (Warsaw, Kalisz, Kielce, Lomza, Lublin, Piotrków, Plock, Radom, Suwalki and Siedlce), the following fifteen provinces: Vilna, Kovno, Grodno, Minsk, Vitebsk and Mogilev, in the northwest; Volhynia, Podolia, Kiev, Chernigov and Poltava, in the southwest; Bessarabia, Kherson, Ekaterinoslav and Tauris, in the south. Within this area the Jews were permitted to live in the cities and towns only; in addition, a few of these cities and towns were either entirely barred to Jews or were open only to privileged groups. The rural districts were forbidden ground, particularly after the set of rules known as the Provisory Regulations of May 3, 1882 (Old Style), had been carried into effect. The rest of the country was either completely closed to the Jews or else was open for settlement to certain classes only, such as physicians, and merchants of the first guild. Some categories of Jewish subjects were allowed to visit the forbidden area under specified conditions.

At the end of the 19th cent. the Pale, which comprised 4 per cent of the territory of the empire, held 94 per cent of the Jewish population. During the first year of the first World War this residential disability remained in force. The great multitude of Jewish war refugees and deportees were not allowed into the interior of the country. This state of affairs was terminated by an order which the minister of the interior issued in August, 1915, allowing Jews to settle in all the cities of the empire, except the two capitals and the territory under the control of the ministry of war and the ministry of the imperial court. This was merely a provisional measure, and the Pale was not formally abrogated thereby. It remained for the provisional government created by the triumphant March Revolution to abrogate the Pale, along with all other measures directed against Jews. This it did in its manifesto of March 16, 1917 (New Style). One of the first acts of the Soviet government, set up in November, 1917, was to confirm the abolition of all discriminatory measures. AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY.

Lit.: Bikerman, Cherta Yevreiskoi Osedlosti (1911); Yarmolinsky, Avrahm, The Jews and Other Minor Nationalities Under the Soviets (1928), chaps. 2 to 5.

PALEOGRAPHY, the study of ancient writing, with special reference to the question of its chronology. In the widest possible sense of the term, paleography may include even the study of ancient inscriptions on stone, wood or similar hard materials, and on coins and seals, but the term "epigraphy" is usually applied to the study of such writing. In the usual restricted sense, paleography is limited to writings on such less enduring materials as papyrus, parchment, paper and the like. Paleography is not concerned with the content of such writings, but studies the materials with which they were written, the shape and style of the letters, spelling, and similar external characteristics. It deals with books, letters, public and private documents.

Hebrew and Aramaic paleography of the pre-Christian period is mainly dependent upon ostraca; papyri begin in the 6th cent. B.C.E. There is an abundance of material, on the other hand, for Hebrew paleography of the post-Christian period, but this has been much neglected.

See also: EPIGRAPHY; INSCRIPTIONS; NUMISMATICS; OSTRACA; SEALS.

Lit.: Löw, L., Graphische Requisiten und Erzeugnisse bei den Juden (1870); Steinschneider, M., Vorlesungen über die Kunde hebräischer Handschriften (1897). Other than these two older works, there was no comprehensive work on Hebrew paleography until the third decade of the 20th cent., when a larger work was issued: Bernheimer, Carlo, Paleografia ebraica (1924). S. Birnbaum's important work, Outline of Hebrew Paleography, was announced as forthcoming by the British publisher in 1939, but had not yet appeared by 1942. The following are special works on the subject: Harkavy, Abraham, altjüdische Denkmäler aus der Krim (1876); Chwolson, Daniel, Corpus Inscriptionum Hebraicarum (1882); Günzburg and Stassow, L'ornement hébreux (1903). Facsimiles which are unobjectionable from the artistic point of view are found in the following de luxe works: Silvestre-Champollion, Paléographie universelle (1839); Wright, Facsimiles of Manuscripts, Oriental Series (1875-78). Others are found in the following modern writings: Hoerning, British Museum, Karaite Manuscripts (1889); Gaster, Moses, Hebrew Illuminated Bibles (1901); Bernheimer, Carlo, Facsimiles de manuscrits hébraïques du Talmud-Tora de Livourne (1915).

PALERMO, see SICILY.

PALESTINE. Table of Contents:

I. Names.
II. Natural Characteristics.
1. Physical Geography. 2. Geology.
a. Location. 3. Climate.
b. Surface Features.
c. Water Supply.
III. History.
1. Ancient Times.
a. Aborigines.
b. From the Invasion of the Israelites to the Beginning of the Middle Ages.
2. Middle Ages.
3. Modern Period.
a. From 1500 to 1840. b. From 1840 to 1919.
IV. The Period Between the Two World Wars (1919 to 1942).
1. The British Administration.
a. Interpretations of the Mandate.
b. Partition Proposal.
2. Government.
a. Administration.
b. Jewish Self-Government.
c. Government Income.
3. Population and Immigration.
a. Population Growth. b. Immigration Restrictions.
4. The Arabs.
a. Economic Status. d. Arab Parties.
b. Living Conditions. e. Unrest and Riots.
c. Arab Nationalism. f. Friendly Relations.
5. Agriculture and Colonies.
a. Scientific Improvement.
b. The Citrus Crop.
c. Food Production.
6. Cooperatives.
7. Industry.
a. Major Industries. b. Maritime Industries.
c. Transportation and Communications.
d. Finance. e. Law.
8. Cultural Life.
a. Education.
b. Music and Art.
c. Literature.
d. Architecture and Town Planning.
9. Religion.
10. Health and Sanitation.
11. The Second World War.

I. Names. Palestine has had many names from the earliest times to the present. The Egyptian name for the land was Kharu in the south and Retenu in the north. The first mention of the designation Kinahi or Kinahna (Hebrew ḳena'an) appears in the Tell el-Amarna letters (15th cent. B.C.E.); the term always refers to that part which lies west of the Jordan, but also includes Syria. It was only after the Israelite conquest that the territory received the name "land of Israel" ('eretz yisra'el; I Sam. 13:19 and elsewhere); however, the country east of the Jordan was titled separately 'eber hayarden, "the other side of the Jordan." Under the divided kingdom (10th to 6th cent. B.C.E.) the northern and southern parts of the land were known, respectively as Israel (sometimes Ephraim or Samaria) and Judah. The Assyrian king Adadnirari IV speaks of the "land of Omri" in referring to the kingdom of Israel, and mentions Palastu, that is, Philistia.

During the Hellenistic period (4th to 2nd cent. B.C.E.) that part of the country which was settled by the Jews was called Judea, and this name was retained by the New Testament and the Roman authorities. The Talmud uses the expression "land of Israel" and generally abbreviates it to ha'aretz, "the land." The name Palestine was officially introduced in the period after 138 C.E.; it originally referred only to the southwestern coast held by the Philistines (called in Hebrew pelesheth), but was gradually extended to cover the entire country. This name was taken up by Christian literature and later by the Arabs, who gave it the form Filastin. In medieval times, as with the British government of modern times, Palestine is considered to designate the country west of the Jordan. The modern official Hebrew term is Paleshtinah, to which the initials of "land of Israel" are added in parentheses.

Palestine is also designated by a number of poetic and symbolic names, such as the Holy Land, the Promised Land, the Land of the Bible, or the Land of the Fathers.

II. Natural Characteristics. 1. Physical Geography. a. Location. Palestine is in the southwestern part of Asia, on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea; it is a strip of fertile land between seashore and wilderness. Its boundaries are therefore geographically defined except to the north, where Syria constitutes an extension of the coastal area. Palestine, taken at its greatest extent, stretches from 29° 30′ to 33° 30′ north latitude and from 34 to 37 degrees east longitude. It must be borne in mind, however, that the political boundaries of Palestine fluctuated constantly and were not always equivalent to these natural boundaries.

b. Surface Features. Palestine is for the most part a plateau, divided into an eastern and a western part by the deep valley of the Jordan, with a narrow coastal plain to the west. It falls into four well-recognized sections running from north to south: the coastal plain, the western plateau, the Jordan valley and the eastern plateau. The prediluvial form of a level surface is still partly retained in the district east of the Jordan, with mountainous sections facing the Jordan valley and in central Gilead. Near the Jordan valley the plateau is somewhat arched upward and is generally higher than the corresponding section west of the Jordan.

The eastern plateau consists of three parts: Bashan (Arabic, Hauran), from the northern boundary to the Yarmuk river; Gilead, from the Yarmuk to the northeast corner of the Dead Sea; Moab, from the northeast to the southeast corner of the Dead Sea. (The Arabs call the country between the Yarmuk and the Jabbok Adjlun, that part from the Jabbok to the Arnon, Belka, and that between the Arnon and Zered, Ard el-Kerak.) South of Moab the mountains of Seir stretch as far as Aqaba, and this area was often a country tributary to Palestine.

The Bashan is almost completely covered over by an ancient layer of lava, which has weathered away into an extremely fertile soil, making the region the granary of Palestine. The western part of Bashan was known as Golan (Gaulanitis). Golan, like the neighboring section of Galilee, is divided into an upper, more elevated half, and a lower, less elevated half; the former is good for pasturage, the latter for crops. There is a long row of extinct volcanic craters running through the section from north to south, marking old rifts in the surface and a short period of volcanic activity; the highest reaches to about 4,200 feet.

To the east of Golan is the Bashan plateau (Arabic, En-Nukra), about 2,000 to 2,500 feet above sea level, with individual volcanic hills which are crowned with ruins. This plateau is the most fertile part of the Bashan, and was once thickly settled. The streams of southern Golan and the southern part of the Bashan plateau drain into the Yarmuk, which is cut so far below them that the lowest part of their course consists of waterfalls.

The Hauran mountains are formed from an accumulation of layers of lava; they reach, in two stages, to a height of about 6,130 feet. Because they are considerably higher than the surrounding country, these mountains enjoy cooling and rain-bearing winds. They constitute an area approximately 50 by 25 miles in size, roughly oval in outline, and difficult of access. Still more inaccessible is the Trachonitis (Arabic, El-Ledja) to the northwest of the Hauran mountains. A four-sided area of about 1,500 square miles, the Trachonitis is covered by a black, congealed sea of lava, unfruitful and impassable. Only rarely was it under the control of a legally constituted authority.

To the south, in Gilead, sandstone appears in the deep wadis and in the cliffs overlooking the Jordan valley. The highest part of Gilead is on both sides of the Jabbok; the greatest height is about 4,200 feet, somewhat to the north of the Jabbok. The Jabbok, flowing through an elevated region, has a small drainage area; Gilead slopes away from it to the Yarmuk at the north and the Arnon at the south. The subsidiary streams are longer in this section than in any other part of the Transjordan. Since Gilead has both north and south and east and west anticlines, its central section resembles a mountain range; since it is partly covered by a thick oak wood, it is similar in appearance to Central European landscapes. Only a small part of Gilead is a plateau; it is characterized by long streams running north and south.

In Moab the mountains are limited to the slope down to the Dead Sea to the west. To the north is Mount Nebo (2,680 feet), from which the land can be seen for a great distance. The region is split into northern and southern sections by the deep valley of the Arnon, to which the land on both sides slopes. The elevated plateau is further dissected by numerous tributaries. The old settlements of Moab lay on a small level area between the valleys. The chief roads of the country are the Hedjaz road and the old pilgrim road; both run to the east of these settlements, in order to avoid the deep valleys. In contrast to Gilead, Moab is rather treeless; however, there is a rank wild growth of trees, including palms, along some of the streams.

The mountains of Seir reach a height of about 5,500 feet and slope away both to the west and the east. Although Seir is situated further south than Moab, its northern part has numerous springs because of its notable high level and its impermeable soil. The ancient area of settlement lay to the north of the divide; the southern part always was and still is sparsely populated.

The Jordan cleft is separated from the Lebanon Bika by a divide about 450 feet in height. The Iyun plain is morphologically and historically a part of Palestine. The Jordan springs from Mount Hermon (9,200 feet). Three springs produce the brooks called Nahr el-Hasbani, Nahr el-Leddan and Nahr el-Banias; the first rises from the western slope of Hermon, the others from the southern slope. These unite at a point about 17 feet above sea level. Starting from this point the Jordan flows through the Huleh swamps into Lake Huleh, which is 8 feet above sea level, about four miles long, three miles wide, and from seventeen to twenty feet deep. The Jordan then descends about nine miles further to flow through the Sea of Gennesaret (or Sea of Tiberias), which lies 682 feet below sea level; it is about 12 miles long, five miles wide, about 150 feet deep and has a surface area of about 60 square miles. The shores of the sea consist for the most part of small beaches; certain sections are very steep, but to the east and west of the entrance of the Jordan and at the northwest corner there are small stretches of alluvial land. The latter of these was called the Gennesaret plain, and was praised immoderately by Josephus and the Talmudic literature for its fertility. From the Lake of Tiberias to the Dead Sea the air line distance is about 650 miles; the length of the Jordan between these two bodies of water, however, is nearly three times this distance, in consequence of its continuous meanders in the soft sediment of the diluvial sea. The width of the Jordan cleft varies from 3 to 13 miles; the widest parts are near Beth-shean and Jericho.

Beginning east of Beth-shean, the Jordan begins to cut deep into the floor of the cleft (Arabic, Ghor); the valley proper (Arabic, Zor) lies about 135 to 165 feet lower than the cleft itself. The floor of the cleft is full of dried up areas which can not be irrigated from the Jordan. Hence the region is barren except along the river itself, where there is a jungle growth similar to that of Africa. There were formerly rich oases around the springs at the foot of the mountains; the fertile Jezreel plain produces in abundance without the need of irrigation. The Jordan itself is a small river, but has a rapid descent.

The Dead Sea (Hebrew, yam hamelah, "salt sea," or yam ha'arabah, "sea of the steppe") lies 1,300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean Sea. It is about 50 miles long and its greatest width is about 9 miles. It is divided by the Lisan peninsula into a deeper northern and a shallower southern half. The waters of the Dead Sea contain 26 per cent of solid elements, mostly chlorides (sodium chloride, magnesium chloride and calcium chloride). So heavy is the water that a human body will not sink in it. Storms arise suddenly there and are dangerous to navigation. With the exception of bacteria, there is no life whatsoever in the Dead Sea. Its coasts to the east are very steep, due to vertical splitting of the sandstone, and for the most part to the west, with a few beaches. The Arabah extends from the Dead Sea to Aqaba and reaches a height of about 800 feet; it is a wilderness and is habitable only near the few springs on its eastern border.

The western plateau consists of four natural and historical divisions: Galilee, Samaria, Judea and the Negeb. Galilee extends from the northern border to the Plain of Jezreel inclusive. A line from Acco to the entrance of the Jordan into the Sea of Tiberias divides it into Upper and Lower Galilee. Upper Galilee attains a height of almost 4,000 feet (Mount Jermak), while Lower Galilee is never higher than 1,800 feet. The ascent from Lower to Upper Galilee is short and steep; hence traffic avoids the hills and takes a roundabout way through the coast or the valley of the Jordan. In Lower Galilee the hills are separated by low valleys, set in such a way as to make travel difficult from north to south, but easy from east to west. Upper Galilee is unfavorable for travel in either direction. The Plain of Jezreel is in the form of a triangle, with its base at the foot of the Carmel ridge and its vertex at Tabor (1,800 feet).

Samaria (or Ephraim) consists of two parts: a northern, lower section reaching as far as Mount Ebal, and a southern, higher section as far as Tell el-Asur (3,470 feet). Northern Samaria has the same sort of deep valleys as Lower Galilee but is easily accessible from every direction. Two smaller, independent mountainous sections, Carmel and Gilboa, are attached to Samaria in the north. Both are about 1,800 feet high and both have a precipitous descent toward the northeast. Carmel was once heavily wooded, and still bears traces of this, but Gilboa was always bare and barren. Like Gilboa in structure and lack of fertility are the two highest mountains of Ephraim, Ebal (3,125 feet) and Gerizim (2,900 feet). In the valley between lay Shechem, principal city of Samaria.

Judea, which extends as far as the plain of Beer-sheba, has a strip of plateau along the divide which is the location of the chief settlements and the principal roads through the mountains. The lowest point of the divide is at Jerusalem; from here there is a division into three parts, the mountains of Benjamin (3,370 feet), the mountains of Jerusalem (2,980 feet) and the mountains of Hebron (3,420 feet). South of Halhul the hills are divided by a valley north and south, with Hebron at the head and Beer-sheba at the foot. The Negeb, to the south of Beer-sheba, is a mountainous region which rises to 4,020 feet near the southern boundary of Palestine. It is deeply cut by valleys, very irregular in conformation, and extremely difficult for travel.

The coastal plain, in contrast to the plateaus, is composed of diluvial and alluvial belts. The bare stone is but seldom seen, since it is covered by a thick layer of loam, or of loess and sand near the Negeb. Near the coast the soil is covered by dunes and level sand. There is but little black earth in Palestine; it appears only in swamps or as the result of former or present settlements near by. The coastal plain is twice interrupted by mountain spurs, once by the Ladder of Tyre, and once at Carmel, southwest of Haifa, where both the railroad and the highway slip through between the mountain and the sea. North of the Ladder of Tyre the coastal plain is not more than 1½ to 2 miles wide, and to the south as far as Acco it is not much wider. It only increases in size beyond the Gulf of Acco, and it then becomes very sandy or else swampy due to the Belus river. From 1925 on Jews have drained most of this area. The plain is not more than 3 miles wide along Carmel; at Benjamina it expands to about 7 miles, and from there it increases, reaching about 12 miles at Gaza and 25 at El-Arish, the historical boundary of the country.

The plain is called Sharon from Carmel to Jaffa, Shefelah from there to the brook of Gaza; the part south of that is regarded as the coast of the Negeb. Sharon is swampy near the sea, and therefore unsuitable for traffic and settlement. The old northern and southern road between Egypt and Mesopotamia was located about six miles away from the Mediterranean sea. A broad and deep furrow between the hilly country to the east and the ridges and hills to the west facilitates travel here. In the Shefelah, on the other hand, the coastal hills are close to the lower slopes of the mountains; accordingly, both traffic and settlements are close to the sea. Ludd and Ramleh are situated at the point where the north and south road passes over from the Shefelah to the Sharon and is intersected by the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem. Both the Sharon and the Shefelah are fruitful and are of far greater economic importance than the mountainous regions.

The coastal land of the Negeb is sandy and barren and is but little cultivated; near Gaza and Beer-sheba, however, barley is raised abundantly. In ancient times this region was much more thickly settled and intensively cultivated.

c. Water Supply. In consequence of the unfavorable division of rainfall and other precipitation and the permeability of the calcareous stone, there is a lack of water in most sections of Palestine, particularly in the highlands. The greater part of the precipitation reaches the sea subterraneously and never comes to the surface. Palestine is comparatively poor in springs; the Jordan is the river that contains the most water. However, although it pours 700,000,000 gallons of water into the Dead Sea annually, it is so deeply entrenched in the Ghor that it can be made useful only by extensive dam-building. The streams which flow into the Jordan from the east, especially the Yarmuk, Jabbok, Arnon and Zered, contain much water; those from the west are insignificant. Only a few of the streams which flow into the Mediterranean contain an appreciable amount of water at all seasons of the year: the Belus at Acco, the Kishon at Haifa, the Nahr Iskanderune at Hedera, the Yarkon at Petach Tikvah, and the Nahr Rubin at Jabneh. Water can be secured by boring wells in the coastal plain, and a good flow can be easily obtained; in the hills this method is difficult and costly, and in the mountainous regions, impossible. The natives draw water from wells, which sometimes reach a considerable depth (up to 400 feet), by means of primitive machinery set into motion by animal power. The mountainous regions have been served since the time of the Canaanites by cisterns lined with impermeable material, and by open pools. In Jerusalem the British army rebuilt the watercourse (presumably from the time of Solomon) from Ain el Arub. However, it was not sufficient for the needs of the city, and in 1926 new construction was opened up at Ain Fara.

2. Geology. Archaic granite, gneiss, porphyry and diorite do not appear in Palestine proper, although they are to be found in the western slopes of the mountains of Seir, in the latitude from Bosra to Aqaba. Precambrian eruptive rocks (porphyry and tufa) indicate that north and south lines of cleavage ran through this region. Precambrian sedimentary rocks (conglomerates) appear at Jebel Harun (reputed to be Mount Hor), in the mountains of Seir and southeast of the Dead Sea. The Paleozoic Age is represented only by Cambrian sandstone and chalk on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, at the mouth of the Zered and that of the Wadi Zerka Main. The later paleozoic formations, which contain the richest deposits of metal and coal, are completely absent in Palestine and the surrounding countries. The Mesozoic Age is scantily represented in Trias, Jura and Lower Cretacean. Trias was first discovered after the first World War between Wadi Zerka Main and Wadi Hesban, under a layer of Cretacean sandstone, by an expedition seeking for petroleum. Jura chalks containing the decorative fossils known as "Jews' stones" (Cidaris glandaria) were previously known to occur on Mount Hermon. Later Jurassic chalks were discovered also in the Wadi Hadire southwest of the Dead Sea and in the central part of the Jabbok valley near the road from Amman to Jerash.

The true period of the origin of the soil of Palestine was the Upper Cretacean. The lowest layer is red trigonial sandstone, also called Nubian sandstone; its age can not be exactly determined. It appears in the country west of the Jordan in small areas in the Iyun valley between the Jordan and the Litani, together with Jurassic chalks in the Wadi Hadire, southwest of the Dead Sea. It is very frequent in the country east of the Jordan, on the slopes of the mountains into the Jordan valley, south of the Jabbok and in the deeply cut valleys. Since it is impermeable, in contrast to the more frequent calcareous rock, its presence indicates abundance of wells and fertility of the soil. Cenomanic and Turonic chalks overlay the sandstone; it is difficult to distinguish between them in Palestine. In the former, streaks of marl are found; in the latter, lumps of fire-stone and horn-stone. It is from these calcareous rocks that the best marbles and building stones of Palestine come, such as those in the city wall of Jerusalem and the Wailing Wall. Senonite, the uppermost formation of the Mesozoic Age, has still a greater variety: white chalks, gray chalks and marls, dark asphalt chalks and fire-stones, reddish and greenish phosphates. The Tertiary Period is sparsely represented by Eocene Nummulith chalks in the southeast of Lower Galilee, on Mount Gilboa, and on Ebal and Gerizim in Samaria.

Toward the end of the Tertiary Period very active tectonic movements began to occur in the soil of Palestine. First there arose rifts and sinkings in a southwest-northeast direction; these produced the plains of Dothan, Jezreel and Zebulun. New rifts, in a north and south line, followed at the beginning of the Tertiary Period. The Jordan rift, a part of the great rift extending from Syria down through the Red Sea and the whole length of Africa, sank to a depth of from 5,000 to 6,000 feet between two lines of fracture, while on either side to the east and west the rocks remained in their positions. To the west step-like formations were produced, partly by fractures and partly by folding; similar fractures produced step-like formations on the side of the plateau toward the Mediterranean. The sinking of the Jordan valley altered the courses of the streams in Palestine, which had previously flowed mainly from east to west. Most of them were cut in two; the upper halves fell into the Jordan; the lower halves became independent streams. Thus the Kishon is the original lower course of the Tertiary Jabbok. During the Glacial Period a cooler and more rainy climate prevailed in Palestine. The trench of the Jordan valley filled up and formed a lake all the way from the Sea of Tiberias to the Dead Sea; but this lake had no outlet to the sea. Both the Glacial and the Pluvial Periods, as in Europe, were interrupted in Palestine by warmer and drier intervals, during which the lake shrank. The salt of the Sodom mountain to the southwest of the Dead Sea and the great layers of calcareous and gypseous marl were laid down at that time. After the first interval a still more rainy period occurred and the sea enlarged again. A drier climate followed, the sea shrank until only the Lake of Tiberias and the Dead Sea remained, and the Jordan came into existence.

As the Jordan started to flow it began digging further and further into the soft marl. The tributaries, which had formerly emptied into the lake near the edges of the mountains, had to extend their courses in order to reach the Jordan. The ancient deltas of the tributaries at the original mouths can be plainly observed, and it can be deduced that they formerly brought down a much larger volume of water. Two distinct gravel terraces mark the former course of the side valleys. The Jordan has cut its bed to from 135 to 165 feet below the level of the lake's original bed.

During the Diluvial Period the coastal plain was covered by the sea, but it was then raised up. Diluvial and marine deposits are to be found everywhere in the coastal plain in the red earth, the loam, the loess and the sand. A further result of the fractures of the rocks was the pouring forth of lava, which repeatedly flooded the regions east of the Jordan north of the Yarmuk and the southeastern part of Lower Galilee. The last eruptions certainly occurred at a time when prehistoric men were able to observe them; bones of domestic animals have been discovered beneath the lava.

As a result of its geological structure, Palestine has few useful minerals. Copper ore was formerly obtained, up to the Byzantine period, near Phunon, one of the stations in the wilderness wanderings of the Israelites; it was associated with Cambrian sandstone. There is an old iron smelter in a cave north of the Jabbok near the village of Radjib. The salt of Mount Sodom to the southwest of the Dead Sea is crystalline and chemically pure and is exported despite the difficulties in transportation. Phosphates (up to 83 per cent tricalciumphosphate) appear in many places in the Wilderness of Judea; for instance, at the Chanel Achmar inn on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho.

The locality east of es-Salt is richest in minerals. Asphalt and asphalt chalks are especially frequent in the region of the Dead Sea. Clumps of asphalt float on the surface of the Sea after stormy days or earthquakes. Asphalt chalks from the region of the Yarmuk river were used during the first World War as fuel. Gypsum appears as a deposit of the Jordan lake of the diluvial period and has been worked to some extent by the Jewish colony Menahamiya. Clumps of sulphur appear in the marls of the Jordan valley in the neighborhood of existing or extinct thermal springs, and are sometimes used by the Bedouins to make gunpowder. The presence of petroleum has been suspected because of the bituminous chalks and marls in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, but so far no definite discoveries by expeditions for that purpose have been reported.

The region along the shores of the Mediterranean Sea has long been recognized as a line of weakness in the earth's surface, and the earth forces are still in motion there. No actual volcanic eruption in historic times is known to have taken place in Palestine, but evidence of former volcanic catastrophes is plainly visible. The mountains of the country east of the Jordan are a calcareous plateau; the same plateau to the west of the Jordan is full of folds and fractures. Such fractures produced the plain of Jezreel and the Jordan cleft. The Dead Sea is the lowest part of the earth's surface, and on its southern shore lay the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, destroyed by the last catastrophe.

In the country east of the Jordan, especially in the Hauran, there are numerous craters which were extinct by the Diluvial Period, and large areas covered with lava and basalt. Parts of central and northern Palestine, especially the Plain of Jezreel, are rich in the products of the decomposition of volcanic materials. Tabor and Hattin are pillars of basalt. Earthquakes produced hot springs, the waters of which usually contain sulphur (as in Hauran and at Tiberias) at the edge of the earthquake area.

Earthquakes have been frequently reported in Palestine, usually at the less stable areas of the Jordan valley and the coastal plain; in the former region the areas near Tiberias and the Dead Sea are the most susceptible. The Bible has a number of descriptions of earthquakes (Isa. 13:13; 24:18; Ps. 18:8; 114; Zech. 14:5; Amos 1:1). Blanckenhorn assembled reports of fifty such catastrophes. The number of the victims depends less on the force of the earthquakes than on whether it strikes a thickly populated region. The most destructive in this respect were those at the time of Herod (30,000 were killed, according to Josephus), that of 1759, and that of January 1, 1837, which destroyed the cities of Tiberias and Safed and killed 4,000 to 5,000 persons, mostly Jews. The earthquakes are heavier in Syria and comparatively light in the vicinity of Jerusalem. A comparatively severe earthquake occurred in Palestine on July 11, 1927, followed by other tremors on the 17th and 22nd of the same month. It affected Jerusalem (a very rare occurrence; 25 were killed), Tiberias, Ramleh, Shechem, Jericho and other places, as well as Transjordan, and caused

Nos. 4 and 4a

JUDAH AFTER THE EXILE AND HER NEIGHBORS
Territory of Judah
Territory occupied mainly by Jews (approximate)
KINGDOMS OF ISRAEL AND JUDAH AND THEIR NEIGHBORS
Territory of Israel
Territory of Judah
Tributary to Israel
Tributary to Judah
SCALE OF MILES
0 10 20 30 40 50
Copyright American Bible Society
Samaritans
Shechem
Mt. Ebal
Mt. Gerizim
River Jordan
Joppa
Ono
Lod
Beth-el
Mizpah?
Gibeon?
Michmash
Ramah
Jericho
Kirjath-jearim
Ashdod
Zorah
Jerusalem
Zanoah
Beth-lehem
JUDAH
Keilah
Beth-zur
Netophah?
Tekoa
Gaza
Hebron
Gerar
EDOM
Beer-sheba
Rehoboth
Riblah
Zedad
Chun?
ARAM-ZOBAH
Berothah?
ARAM
SYRIA
Helbon
Damascus
Sidon
Zarephath
PHENICIA
Lebanon Mts.
Mt. Hermon
Tyre
Abel-beth-maachah
Dan
Kedesh
Hazor
BASHAN
Accho
Chinnereth
Cabul
Sea of Chinnereth
Aphek
GALILEE
Mt. Tabor
En-dor
Mt. Carmel
Plain of Jezreel
Dor
Megiddo
Jezreel
Taanach
Mt. Gilboa
Ibleam
Dothan
Bezek
Thebez
Abel-meholah
Beth-shan
Edrei
Beth-arbel?
Ramoth-gilead?
HAURAN
SHARON SAMARIA
Samaria
Mt. Ebal
Shechem
Mt. Gerizim
Succoth
Penuel?
R. Jabbok
GILEAD
Joppa
Ramah, Ramathaim?
Zereda?
Shiloh
Jeshanah
Gilgal??
Baal-hazor?
Gimzo
Gezer
Beth-el
Ephraim?
Ai
Mizpah?
Geba
Gilgal?
Jericho Rabbah
Jabneh
Ekron?
Gibeah
Heshbon
Ashdod
Eltekeh?
Zorah
Jerusalem
Azekah
Etam
Beth-lehem
Medeba
Mt. Nebo
Ammon
Ashkelon
Libnah?
JUDAH
Gath
Keilah
Beth-zur
Kiriathaim
Gaza
Eglon?
Lachish
Mareshah
Hebron
Ziph
Carmel
Salt Sea
Aroer
Arnon
Gerar
Beer-sheba
MOAB
Kir of Moab
Waters of Nimrim?
Akrabbim
Amalekites
Bozrah
EDOM SEIR
Sela?
Petra ARABIA
Ezion-geber
Elath

considerable damage. The number of dead was reported at from 250 to 400, and of those seriously injured at 500 or above.

3. Climate. The four areas into which the country is divided are basically different in climate. The coastal plane has a moderate, sub-tropical climate, similar to that of Algiers and Sicily; the heat is moderated daily by refreshing sea breezes. The mountainous area has a rawer but more healthy climate, more of a continental nature, that is, there are great differences of temperature between summer and winter and betwen day and night. The mean annual temperature of Jaffa is 68 degrees; of Jerusalem, 63. The valley of the Jordan, particularly toward the south, has a tropical climate, since it is so deep and the mountains to the west of it so steep in comparison that the cooling and rain-bringing western winds are shut out. The plateau to the east of the Jordan has the greatest variation in temperature; in March, for instance, it will be below freezing at night, and forty-five degrees higher at noon.

January is the coolest month in Palestine, while August is the hottest. The fall temperatures are notably higher than those of the spring. There are really only two seasons, which succeed each other with almost no transition: a rainy, hot season, during which the ground dries up, plants wither and only the night-dew brings moisture; the cooler period of the rains. The rainy season begins with the early rains in November, reaches its climax with the heavy winter rains of December and January, and ends with the latter rains which are never later than April. The average annual precipitation in the coastal regions is 20 inches at Jaffa, 24 to 28 inches at Haifa; in the mountains it is from about 24 to 26 inches; in the valley of the Jordan the figure sinks to about 18 inches, and in the region near Jericho it is as low as from 8 to 12 inches. Due to the rapid evaporation and the permeability of its rocks, Palestine appears quite dry a few days after the rains. Because of this aridity the atmosphere is without clouds and very clear.

The winds are of great importance. The most frequent of these are the refreshing and fructifying winds from the west and southwest, which bring the rain from the sea. There are regularly recurring land and sea breezes. The sea breeze arises in the morning over the coastal area and reaches the hills about noon, bringing a refreshing coolness. These sea breezes, together with the general lack of humidity, make the summer heat bearable. The east winds, on the other hand, are dry. Much dreaded is the sirocco (hamsin), which comes from the southeast and brings the heat of the Arabian desert to the country. The north winds are cool; in summer they are refreshing, but in winter they are bitter.

For the flora and fauna of Palestine, see the articles: FAUNA OF PALESTINE; FLORA OF PALESTINE.

III. History. 1. Ancient Times. a. Aborigines. Excavations made in Palestine have revealed the fact that the country had a population in the very earliest period of human existence. The skeleton of a man, who apparently lived in the same time as that of the Neanderthal Man, has been found in the vicinity of the Sea of Gennesaret.

Numerous remains of settlements of the Paleolithic and Neolithic Age have been found in the lowermost stratum in several centers of cultivation (Gezer, Megiddo, Taanach, Beth-shean, Jerusalem, Beth-el and Beth-shemesh). Axes, spearheads, arrowheads, knives, saws and sickles have been preserved from the Paleolithic Age. Utensils of the Neolithic Age were used in Palestine up to the period of the Israelites, because of the scarcity of metals. The use of metals in the Bronze Age was not very common. Up to the beginning of the Iron Age metals played only a minor role; metal utensils were for the most part imported, and were hence only in the possession of a small upper class (cf. I Sam. 13:19).

Settlements in that period were preferably located on the tops of the hills, wherever possible near a spring, like the Arab villages of today. They were fortified by cyclopean walls, constructed out of massive stone blocks (Gezer, Jerusalem). There are splendid tunnels at Gezer and Jerusalem (at the Gihon spring), which were driven through the rock in order to provide a safe access to a spring at the foot of the hill. Caves, often artificially enlarged (Gezer), were frequently used as residences. The first buildings, such as appear in Megiddo, were constructed in imitation of these caves, from clay bricks that had been dried by the wind. A large palace of such construction has been excavated at Megiddo. It is uncertain whether the numerous bodies of children in clay urns, which are often found by excavators in the masonry of the houses, are the so-called "foundation sacrifices," or whether this was a type of burial for children.

Caves served also originally as sepulchres; from these the later pit-grave of the Canaanites developed (a grave in Gezer shows the transition). From the same period come the immense stone graves, which are found in great numbers in the country: rectangular stone chambers (dolmens), or the same provided with a passageway; there are also stone circles, perhaps originally intended as burial places. Vessels have often been found near the dolmens; apparently they were to hold food for the dead, a custom that was widespread throughout the world. Sacred "high places" with pillars, such as were later prohibited in Deuteronomy, have been found at Tell es-Safi and Gezer. Pre-Israelite shrines have been excavated at Shechem, Gezer and Beth-shean.

It is noteworthy that the inhabitants of the oldest layer at Gezer did not bury their dead, but cremated them. The latter practice is never found elsewhere with the Semites; and since these inhabitants were usually about 5 feet 5 inches tall and never more than 5 feet 8 inches, it has been suggested that these aborigines were not of Semitic stock. A further argument for this is the presence of a number of local and tribal names that are non-Semitic.

The oldest literary reports about Palestine and Syria come from Egypt. As early as the Old Kingdom the Egyptians had imported cedars from Lebanon for their shipbuilding. Under the Fifth Dynasty (about 2680-2540 B.C.E.) the Egyptians captured the city of Netia in Syria. The first more detailed account comes from the period of transition from the Old to the Middle Kingdom (about 2500 B.C.E.). Una, governor of the southern district under Pepi I, reports in his tomb inscription that the Egyptians waged a war lasting many years against the Semites who lived in southern Palestine, and that this war necessitated a general levy of the Egyptian manpower. The land of the Semites was devastated in five campaigns, but final victory was obtained only by use of the Egyptian fleet, which landed troops in the rear of the enemy at the "gazelle's nose" (probably a spur of Mount Carmel) and thus inflicted a heavy defeat upon the Semites. It is probable that the conquest achieved at that time was of short duration.

After the time of Sargon I of Assyria (about 2750) northern Syria was definitely in the area of Babylonian cultural influence. Palestine shows very clearly the influence of both Babylonian and Egyptian civilizations. During the period when the political influence of Egypt sank to a low level, Palestine adopted the Babylonian langauge and writing as its means of communication and the Babylonian clay tablets as its writing material. Babylonian weights and measures became the standards, Babylonian stories became part of the folklore, and Babylonian laws served as patterns for the Palestinian legislation. Hammurabi's code, for instance, shows a relationship to the Israelitic codes. From this period come the numerous Babylonian cylinder seals that have been found in Palestine. In the same period the inhabitants learned the Babylonian method of fortification: a base of broken stone formed the foundation for a wall made of dried clay bricks, the wall being of considerable thickness (10 to 27 feet) and height (more than 30 feet), and provided with towers (Lachish, Taanach, Megiddo, Jerusalem, Gezer). The Egyptian reports of Sinuhe describing his flight through Palestine and Syria (about 1970) gives a good picture of conditions during this period.

The next report is that of an expedition of Sesostris III of Egypt, about 1880, which reached as far as Shechem. Similar expeditions are reported by Ahmose I (about 1580-1557), Thutmose I (about 1530) and Thutmose II (about 1490). The extensive culture of the country is shown by the lists of plunder: bronze weapons, wagons overlaid with gold, gold and silver vessels, gems and statues; these accounts are confirmed by scarabs from the Middle Kingdom found at Gezer and Megiddo. About 2000 the potters of Palestine were using the potter's wheel and were able to imitate the Egyptians in producing elegant jugs and vases that tapered to a point.

About 1400 these occasional reports are replaced by an unusual source, an actual Egyptian state archive. This is the political correspondence of Amenophis IV, excavated at Tell el-Amarna (1887-88). It contains numerous letters of Egyptian officials and officers in Syria and Palestine, as well as those of Asiatic rulers and writings from the Egyptian chancellery itself. It is noteworthy that they are all written upon clay tablets in the Babylonian language and writing, which served as the language of diplomacy in the Near East. Sometimes the writers add glosses in their native languages as explanations of difficult Babylonian words; these glosses are the oldest Canaanite words preserved.

During the years 1478 to 1447 B.C.E. Thutmose III had undertaken no less than seventeen expeditions into Palestine and Syria, where the number of small states was almost unlimited at the beginning of his reign. When he recorded his conquests in the Temple of Ammon at Thebes, Palestine was a definite part of his empire. He mentions two places in Palestine, Jacob-el and Joseph-el, and some scholars would derive these names from Babylonian personal names. However, this conquest was also of short duration, for Amenophis II and Thutmose IV again report expeditions into Palestine and Phoenicia. Under Amenophis III (about 1419-1383) the petty rivalries of the native tributary princes became stronger, and in the time of Amenophis IV there is the record of the Habiri invasion which resulted in the loss of the entire country. These Bedouin tribes conquered Shechem and the mountains of Ephraim and could not be expelled from the country. Most scholars identify the Habiri with the Hebrews, a term which includes not only the Israelites but also the related peoples of Ammonites, Edomites and Moabites. Hence these reports from Tell el-Amarna are the first non-Israelite accounts of the entrance of the Israelites into Palestine.

Letters of the same period and in the same writing have been found at Lachish and Taanach. The next report is that contained in an inscription of Seti I (about 1313-1292), who waged several wars in Palestine for the purpose of recovering the territory lost under Amenophis IV; an inscription of his has been discovered in the Egyptian fortress of Beth-shean. A little later the Hittites, who had formed a strong kingdom to the north, began to invade Palestine. Rameses II of Egypt fought against them for twenty years; eventually a treaty was signed between the warring powers, dividing Syria between them. A statue of Rameses II has been found in the Egyptian fortress at Beth-shean. It is characteristic of the mixture of cultures that this fortress is built on the foundation of a Hittite temple to Astarte. The image of the goddess that was worshipped there, a naked woman with two snakes, is similar to that customary in Babylonia. Rameses II is presumably the Pharaoh of the Oppression (Ex. 1), though no accounts of this have been preserved in Egyptian sources.

There are a number of instances, both in this and the preceding periods, when Semitic tribes of the Sinai peninsula, for whom their home land was too narrow, sought pasture lands for their herds in Egypt. Thus there is a report of 1901 B.C.E. that thirty-seven Amu (Semites) were received by Sesostris II into Egypt. There are also instances where individual Semites were appointed to high offices in the Egyptian public service; thus a part of the Amarna correspondence is addressed to a minister named Dudu (David), who was evidently the Egyptian "foreign secretary" for that period. About 1200, in the period of disorder after the death of Seti II, a Semite was the ruler of Egypt during a period of famine.

The successor of Rameses II was Merneptah, who in the fifth year of his reign set up a pillar (the so-called Israel Stele) recounting his victories. The name of Israel had appeared as a personal name in Babylonia about 2800-2600; here it is used for the first time as a tribal name. Several scholars, basing their argument on the determinatives used in this inscription, hold that at the time of Merneptah Israel was no longer merely a Bedouin tribe, but already settled in Palestine. It is not certain what relation there is between Israel and the Habiri of the Amarna Age. The place name Me Nephtoah (Josh. 15:9; 18:15) recalls that of Merneptah.

In addition to the Babylonian and Egyptian cultures, the Aegean culture had also an influence upon Palestine. The original bearers of this culture were the Philistines, who are frequently mentioned in Egyptian reports among the "sea peoples" and who finally established themselves (12th cent. B.C.E.) on the coastland of Palestine.

The Bible mentions a number of names of peoples of the pre-Israelite period: the gigantic Anakim or Rephaim, the Emim ("terrors"), the Zuzim and the Zamzummim (in the country east of the Jordan); cf. Gen. 14:5; Deut. 2:10-12, 20. The Horim ("troglodytes") lived in caves in the southern part of the country west of the Jordan, while the Avvim lived in farmsteads (Deut. 2:23). All these small groups were subdued by the more powerful Amorites (cf. Amos 2:9), with whom the Moabites, Ammonites and Edomites (all Semitic tribes and speaking a language very similar to Hebrew), and later the Canaanites and the Philistines were in alliance. Moab and Ammon settled in the country east of the Jordan, while Edom was to the south. Hittites lived in the north (in the Lebanon region); according to Gen. 23, they were also at Hebron.

CANAAN AT THE TIME OF THE CONQUEST
SCALE OF MILES
0 10 20 30 40
Copyright American Bible Society
(A) (35°)
(B)
(36°)
(C) Gebal
Aphek
Baalbek
Beirut
Lebanon Mts.
PHENICIA
AMANA Mearah?
Sidon
Damascus
Mt. Hermon
Tyre
Dan
Abel-beth-maachah
Dan, Laish
Kedesh
Misrephoth-maim
Achzib
Hazor
HAN
Merom
Asher
Naphtali
Accho
Chinnereth
Cabul
Sea of Chinnereth
Karnaim
Ashtaroth
Zebulun
Madon
Golan?
Kenath
Mt. Carmel
Plain of Jezreel
R. Kishon
Shimron?
Mt. Tabor
Issachar
Manasseh, Machir
Jokneam
En-dor
Shunem
Megiddo
Dor
Camon?
Edrei
Taanach
Mt. Gilboa
Beth-shan
Ham
Salcah
Ibleam
Abel-meholah
Dothan
Jordan
Manasseh
Thebez
Sharon
Mt. Ebal
Shechem
Mt. Gerizim
Shalem
Penuel?
Succoth
Jabbok R.
Joppa
Aphek
Ephraim
Adam Shiloh
Reuben
Jogbehah
Lod
Gibbethon?
Ophrah?
Rabbah
Beth-el, Luz
Ai
Jabneel
Gezer
Mizpah?
Geba
Gilgal?
Abel-shittim
Ekron?
Aijalon
Gibeon
Jericho Shittim
Peor?
Heshbon
Kirjath-jearim
Benjamin
Ashdod
Timnath
Beth-shemesh
Jerusalem
Mt. Nebo or Pisgah
Medeba
Ashkelon
Libnah?
Azekah
Beth-lehem
Jarmuth
Timnath?
Baal-meon
Adullam
Keilah
Tekoa
Judah
Kiriathaim
Gath
Eglon?
Mareshah
Lachish
Hebron
Gaza
Dibon
En-gedi
Aroer
Debir
R. Arnon
Gerar
Salt (Dead) Sea
Beer-sheba
Simeon
Iim
Akrabbim
Rehoboth
ARABIA

b. From the Invasion of the Israelites to the Beginning of the Middle Ages. POLITICAL HISTORY AND HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY. The account of the invasion of Palestine by the Israelites is contained in the Biblical book of Joshua (cf. also Judges 1; Num. 10:33). This event took place, in all probability, about 1220 B.C.E. The conquest was not complete; even after many years of warfare, the Israelites did not succeed in expelling all the native tribes, while others were left unmolested in their habitations. This accounts for the rise of the Moabite, Ammonite and Edomite kingdoms; they were generally independent, but were occasionally tributary to Israelite or Judean kings. They were overrun by the Arabs during the period of the Second Temple; the Edomite kingdom, with its capital at Petra, had the longest period of existence.

Many of the original inhabitants fused with the Israelites, including the Hivites of Gibeon in the time of Joshua (Josh. 9), the Jebusites in the time of David, and the Edomites, later in the Hasmonean period, who were compelled by John Hyrcanus to adopt Judaism. After the deportation of the northern tribes, the Assyrians brought the Cutheans, or Samaritans, into central Palestine to take their place. A number of foreign peoples came into the country during the Persian, Greek and Roman periods, so that during the time of the second Jewish commonwealth the population of Palestine was a mixed one.

According to the Bible, the invading Israelites were divided into twelve tribes, of which two and one-half (Reuben, Gad and half of Manasseh) settled east of the Jordan, the others west of it. The most important tribe in the west was Judah, which later, after the division of the kingdom of Solomon, gave to the southern half the name of Judah, finally Grecized into Judea. In the north the largest tribe was Ephraim, and for this reason the Northern Kingdom of Israel is frequently also known as Ephraim. The division into tribes was continued, if not politically, at least ethnographically, even after the institution of the kingship (about 1025 B.C.E.) Solomon is reported to have instituted an administrative division of the nation totally different from the division by tribes (I Kings 4; 933 B.C.E.). After the return from the Babylonian Exile (536 B.C.E.) only the neighborhood of Jerusalem was Jewish at first. Gradually the settlement was built up by immigration from Babylonia and probably from Egypt (where there had been a Jewish Diaspora since the end of the first Jewish commonwealth) until it occupied all the southern part of the country, Judea. Later Galilee and Perea (on the east side of the Jordan) were "Judaized."

Various figures are given as to the population of Palestine in ancient times. According to II Sam. 24:9, David's census counted 800,000 Israelites and 500,000 Judeans of military age. Sennacherib, in an inscription, boasted that he had taken 200,150 captives from the kingdom of Hezekiah (Judah); this means, exclusive of Jerusalem, which remained unbesieged. At the end of the period of the Second Temple the greater part of the inhabitants of Palestine fell victims to the bloody war with Rome, to famine and to exile. Yet a considerable population remained, especially in Judea and Galilee, as is shown by the revolts under Trajan and Hadrian. Even after the suppression of the Bar Kochba revolt (135 C.E.) Galilee was still thickly populated and there were several fairly large communities in Judea (for example, Lydda) and on the coast (for example, Caesarea). Jews lived in the cities together with Hellenes, Arameans and Nabateans. The poor economic conditions in the 2nd cent. C.E., and the later persecutions, especially under the Byzantine Empire after Christianity had become the official religion, compelled many Jews in Palestine to emigrate. The number of the Jews in the country was probably not large when the rule of the land passed from the Byzantines to the Arabs (7th cent.).

The area of Israelite Palestine was never constant. The question of the boundaries of the country is often treated in the Bible and Talmudic literature. According to the Mishnah and the Talmud, there were, theoretically, three boundaries: 1. the land promised to the Patriarchs; 2. the area of the first consecration by Joshua; 3. the area of the second consecration by Ezra and Nehemiah. According to Gen. 15:18, the first of these boundaries extended from the "river of Egypt" to the Euphrates, and from the Mediterranean to the wilderness (see also Ex. 23:31; Deut. 1:7; 11:24; Josh. 1:4; I Kings 5:4; Ps. 72:8; Tos. Ter. 2:12; Hal. 2:11). This area was always considered as the destined land of Israel in the Messianic period; with the exception of the part comprised in the second boundary, it was entirely exempt from the portions given to the priests and the Levites and the other regulations of the religious law that were held to apply only to Palestine.

The area of the consecration by Joshua extended to the Litani and the southern slopes of Hermon to the north, and to the brook of Egypt to the south. It was about equivalent to the expression "from Dan to Beer-sheba." The Mishnah defines the "land of Israel" in its proper sense and with all the attributes of holiness as the region south of the Ladder of Tyre, marked by the town of Kezib (the modern Ez-Zib) on the coast to the north of Acco. In this area, however, there were numerous pagan enclaves, which were regarded as foreign soil. A list of about forty boundary places is given in the Tosefta (Shebi. 4:11) and the Sifre (Ekeb, at the end).

The area of the first consecration formed the greater part of the kingdom of David and Solomon; but this contained many small groups of non-Israelites in compact settlements, especially along the coast. The Davidic boundaries were again attained under Alexander Jannaeus and again under Herod the Great, but in this period they also contained non-Israelite enclaves, although these were different from those in the time of David and Solomon.

During the Israelite period the land was divided into various districts. The following are the districts during the Biblical period, running from south to north: In the country east of the Jordan, the land (or "field") of Moab, the land of the children of Ammon, Gilead, Bashan, the district of Argob, the "valley" along the Jordan, the Aramean tribes of Geshur, Maacah and Aram Zobah, and the land of Tob to the east of the Sea of Chinnereth (Gennesaret).

The country west of the Jordan was similarly divided into: the Negeb, the mountains of Judah, the hilly Shefelah to the west of the latter, and the shore of the sea to the south; the mountains of Ephraim, and the plain of Sharon to the west of it, in the center; the plain of Jezreel a little further north; furthest north, Chinnereth, the area around the lake of the same name, and the land of Cabul in the southwestern part of Galilee.

In the post-Biblical period the country to the east of the Jordan was generally called Perea. The separate districts, in addition to Moab, Ammon and Gilead, included Batanea (Bashan), Trachonitis (Argob) and Gaulanitis, east of the Sea of Gennesaret. The country west of the Jordan was divided into Judea, Samaria and Galilee. Judea included Idumea (Edom), and Galilee was divided into Upper and Lower Galilee.

After the end of the Jewish state the Romans divided the country as follows: Palestina Prima (Judea and Samaria); Palestina Secunda (Jezreel and Galilee); Palestine Tertia (Idumea). Perea was joined to the district of Arabia.

For the general history of the period, see: ISRAEL; JUDAH; JUDEA.

CIVILIZATION AND CULTURE. The history of the cultural development in Palestine in the Israelite period is revealed in the Bible and other literary sources, enlarged by additional illumination from excavation. The Israelites took over the culture of the Canaanites and expanded it. Their cities were strongly influenced by Canaanite modes of building. Excavations have revealed the sites of fortresses (Azekah, Gezer, Gibeah, Jericho, Beth-shean).

Jerusalem has naturally been the chief place of interest for scholars and archeologists. In 1923 to 1924 Macalister succeeded in uncovering the remains of the ancient Jebusite fortress. On the same site David built the City of David and surrounded it by a strong wall. A breach in this wall was later filled by another wall erected for that purpose, and this was crowned by a massive tower. Macalister identified this breach with the breach which Solomon filled in the wall of David by constructing the "Millo." In time of war these fortifications were made even stronger; thus Hezekiah strengthened the defences of the city against the Assyrian invasion with bastions that were also uncovered by Macalister. Another example is furnished by Tell Beit-Mirsim in southern Palestine, where Kyle and Albright discovered a wall over fifty feet high, a gateway, a Canaanite temple, and a system of passages and chambers for the storage of supplies. It is probable that most of the cities of Palestine were similarly fortified during the period of the kings. The water supply was an especial problem and received particular attention. Even in modern times use is made of cisterns and of large underground caves which serve as reservoirs. Open ponds were also used for the same purpose; one of the best-known of these is the Pool of Siloam, to which spring water was conducted in two channels. The one, laid above ground, has been for the most part destroyed; the latter, which was underground, is still a tunnel through the southeastern hill of Jerusalem. This tunnel was probably constructed by Hezekiah (cf. II Kings 20:20): he set two gangs to drive through the hill in directions facing one another, as the inscription discovered in 1880 reports. The latter is the oldest Israelite inscription preserved.

The cities were small, and so were the buildings and the rooms within them. At the same time excavators have discovered rather large palaces, carefully constructed of stone (Taanach, Megiddo, Shechem, Samaria). The palaces of Omri, Ahab and Jeroboam II have been discovered in Samaria. The buildings plainly show Phoenician influence; in fact the Bible reports that Solomon hired Phoenician workers for the building of the Temple (I Kings 5:32). Warren found Phoenician workmen's marks on certain ancient ruins in Jerusalem which, he concluded, were remains of the Temple of Solomon. It appears that the Israelites learned from the Phoenicians how to erect buildings of hewn stone.

During the Israelite period the pit-graves were replaced by rock graves in natural or artificial caves. Parker discovered such royal graves, dating as far back as the Jebusite period, in the Ophel hill at Jerusalem. Not far from the same spot, in the vicinity of the Pool of Siloam, Weill, in 1914, discovered two vaults cut in the living rock which had been completely emptied by robbers; it is not impossible that these are the tombs of the kings of the house of David from which John Hyrcanus and later Herod are said to have extracted considerable treasure. One of these vaults is divided into earlier and later stories; the other consists of a single chamber. Not far away are the ruins of an ancient synagogue, probably originally erected there because of the sanctity of the spot.

The continuous struggle against the Canaanite gods is well-known from the Bible. It is accordingly not surprising that a number of the cult objects and shrines forbidden in Deuteronomy should have been discovered by excavation, such as the high place at Taanach with its pillars (Matzeboth) and altar of incense. Numerous images of Astarte have been found in every part of the country (Gezer, Megiddo, Jericho, Tell Beit-Mirsim and elsewhere); in these, Babylonian, Cyprian, Phoenician and Egyptian influence can be observed. An especially noteworthy Astarte is the horned image found at Gezer. In addition, numerous bull heads have been found, many of which must have represented deities (cf. Ps. 106:19-20). Numerous small figures of animals (cows, oxen, horses, sheep, doves and geese), found everywhere, reveal foreign (Phoenician) religious and cultural influence. Next to this the influence of Babylonia appears, and gradually grows stronger. It is plainly visible in the seal of Shema, "the servant of Jeroboam" (probably the second of that name).

During the same period ceramic art succeeded in imitating the clay vessels of the Aegean civilization, though it did not succeed in equalling them. The symbols of the swastika and the spiral found their way into Palestine through the Philistines. The earliest Israelite vessels are rather clumsy, but the later ones attain a greater fineness of material and form. In addition to the Philistines, the Canaanites and Egyptians also influenced Israelite ceramics. There is an interesting collection of jug-handles from the 7th cent. B.C.E., which are stamped either with the name of the potter (and that of his father) or of the royal pottery. From the same period come the first vessels of glass to be found in Palestine; but these are probably all imported from Egypt.

The most important ancient Semitic inscription is that of Mesha of Moab (about 850 B.C.E.). The Bible (II Kings 3:4-27) tells of Mesha's revolt against Israel after the death of Ahab and of the joint expedition of the kings of Israel, Judah and Edom against Moab. Mesha's inscription adds further details to this account by supplying an exact enumeration of the cities recaptured by him and accounts of his building of roads and temples. The inscription is written in the old Hebrew character, which was also used by the Israelites until it was replaced by the Syriac character. The same script is used in the Siloam Inscription, the ostraca found at Samaria, the various seals and stamps and the "farmer's calendar" found at Gezer. The oldest inscriptions in it are those on the sarcophagi of Phoenician kings, found in Byblos and dated as coming from about 1200 B.C.E. Since this script is fully developed at that time, its remote ancestor, the Sinai script, must have arisen in a much earlier period.

Excavations have revealed but few objects of the Persian period. Bliss excavated a section of the wall of Nehemiah around Jerusalem. Otherwise the excavations show principally the gradual entrance of Greek culture, even before the time of Alexander the Great. Thus the seventh and eighth layers at Lachish contain fragments of Greek ceramic which were made, according to their style, between 550 and 330 B.C.E.

Because of the lack of information about the Persian period, the Elephantine (near Assuan) papyri constitute an important source for the history of the Jewish Diaspora. They come from a Jewish military colony, the founding of which probably goes back to the time of Psamtik (Psammetichus) I (664-609 B.C.E.), and they furnish light on the relations between the Diaspora and Palestine in that period.

The excavations in Palestine reveal that building began to flourish in the country in the time of Herod. Earlier than this are the remains of the city of Samaria, destroyed by John Hyrcanus, which resembled a Hellenistic city. Unfortunately but little has remained of the many buildings erected by the Hasmoneans; but there is all the more of the buildings of Herod, such as the fortifications in Ascalon and the remains of basilicas, especially in the cities founded or rebuilt by him. Thus in Samaria, rebuilt by Herod under the name of Sebaste, there are rows of columns, flights of stairs, temples to Augustus and Zeus, an altar and a basilica; Caesarea has a Herodian amphitheatre and a part of the fortifications which now lies beneath the surface of the water. Other such buildings are found at Herodeion, Masada and Hebron.

The city of Decapolis was laid out by Herod in a completely Greek style: a broad square in the center, surrounded by columned halls; into the square run the main streets which are decorated with rows of columns on both sides. A theatre, a circus and a temple give this place an entirely Hellenistic stamp. But Herod did most of his building in Jerusalem. Of his Temple but little remains except the Wailing Wall, which formed a part of the wall around the Temple area. Traces remain of the old passages to the Temple area. An example of the warning tablets which were put up to tell the Gentiles that they might not enter further into the Temple, under penalty of death, has been preserved; it is written in Greek (see vol. 1, p. 463). The tower of Phasael, mistakenly called the Tower of David, and still in existence today, is part of the ancient palace of Herod. The theatre discovered by Schick shows that Herod built in a distinctly Hellenistic style even in Jerusalem.

The laying out of the so-called Pools of Solomon probably also comes from the time of Herod. The water for these was brought by him to Jerusalem in two conduits, the older of which was probably constructed at the same time as the pools, while the latter, in its present form, is of the Roman period. There are other remains of Herodian waterworks in the neighborhood of Jericho as well as in the large Hellenistic cities of the period (Caesarea, Scythopolis, the former Beth-shean, Gadara, Petra, Herodeion and others).

During this period burial in rock graves was universally practised. The entrance of the tomb led into an antechamber, from which a door led to the individual graves. Beginning with the Seleucidean period, the tombs become larger; the original chambers are enlarged by a number of galleries (as at Gezer). It is in this period that the earliest inscriptions appear: they are at first of a general nature, but later mention the name of the deceased. One of these is the grave of the Bene Hazir, near Jerusalem, which was laid out in the Herodian period. Especially noteworthy are the richly painted graves at Maresa (the Biblical Mareshath-gath) of about 200 B.C.E. The graves have several inscriptions which show that the city was preponderatingly Greek before it was captured by John Hyrcanus. Next to the Greeks there lived there a colony of Hellenizing Sidonians. During the Herodian period it was customary for the rich to build the entrance to the tomb in the form of a house or temple façade. Of such a nature are the so-called Tombs of the Judges, the tomb of Queen Helena of Adiabene and her family (the so-called Tombs of the Kings; see illustration in vol. 1, p. 294). Sarcophagi are found most frequently in Galilee, where they indicate Phoenician influence, as the Phoenicians used them as early as about 1200 B.C.E. Later they became the rule in the Hellenistic cities. They are often adorned with sculptures which show a definitely Hellenistic origin.

Moldings and friezes of a similar type adorn the houses and the synagogues, such as the lion frieze of Arak el-Emir; they gradually show a preference for certain definite ornaments, including eagles, lions, bull heads, vines, clusters of grapes, stars and palm-branches. There are but few statues and these seem to have been imported or else sculptured by foreigners, as they for the most part depict Greek gods and heroes (Artemis in Shechem, Zeus Serapis in Gaza, Nike in Ascalon, and the statue of Augustus at Sebaste). The Astarte of this period is sculptured in a more refined style; the Semitic goddess of lust has become the Greek goddess of love. There are many portrayals of Eros.

The Greek gods appear on numerous seals, which are often very well cut. The ceramics of the period show a similar strong western influence. Large numbers of amphorae for wine (remains of more than 300 have been discovered at Maresa) were imported from Rhodes and other Greek cities. The preferred shapes are long and slender, with black and red glazing and with relief decorations around the neck. This model had its influence on native pottery, except that pictorial ornamentation is very rare. The clay vessels of this period are made very delicately and regularly.

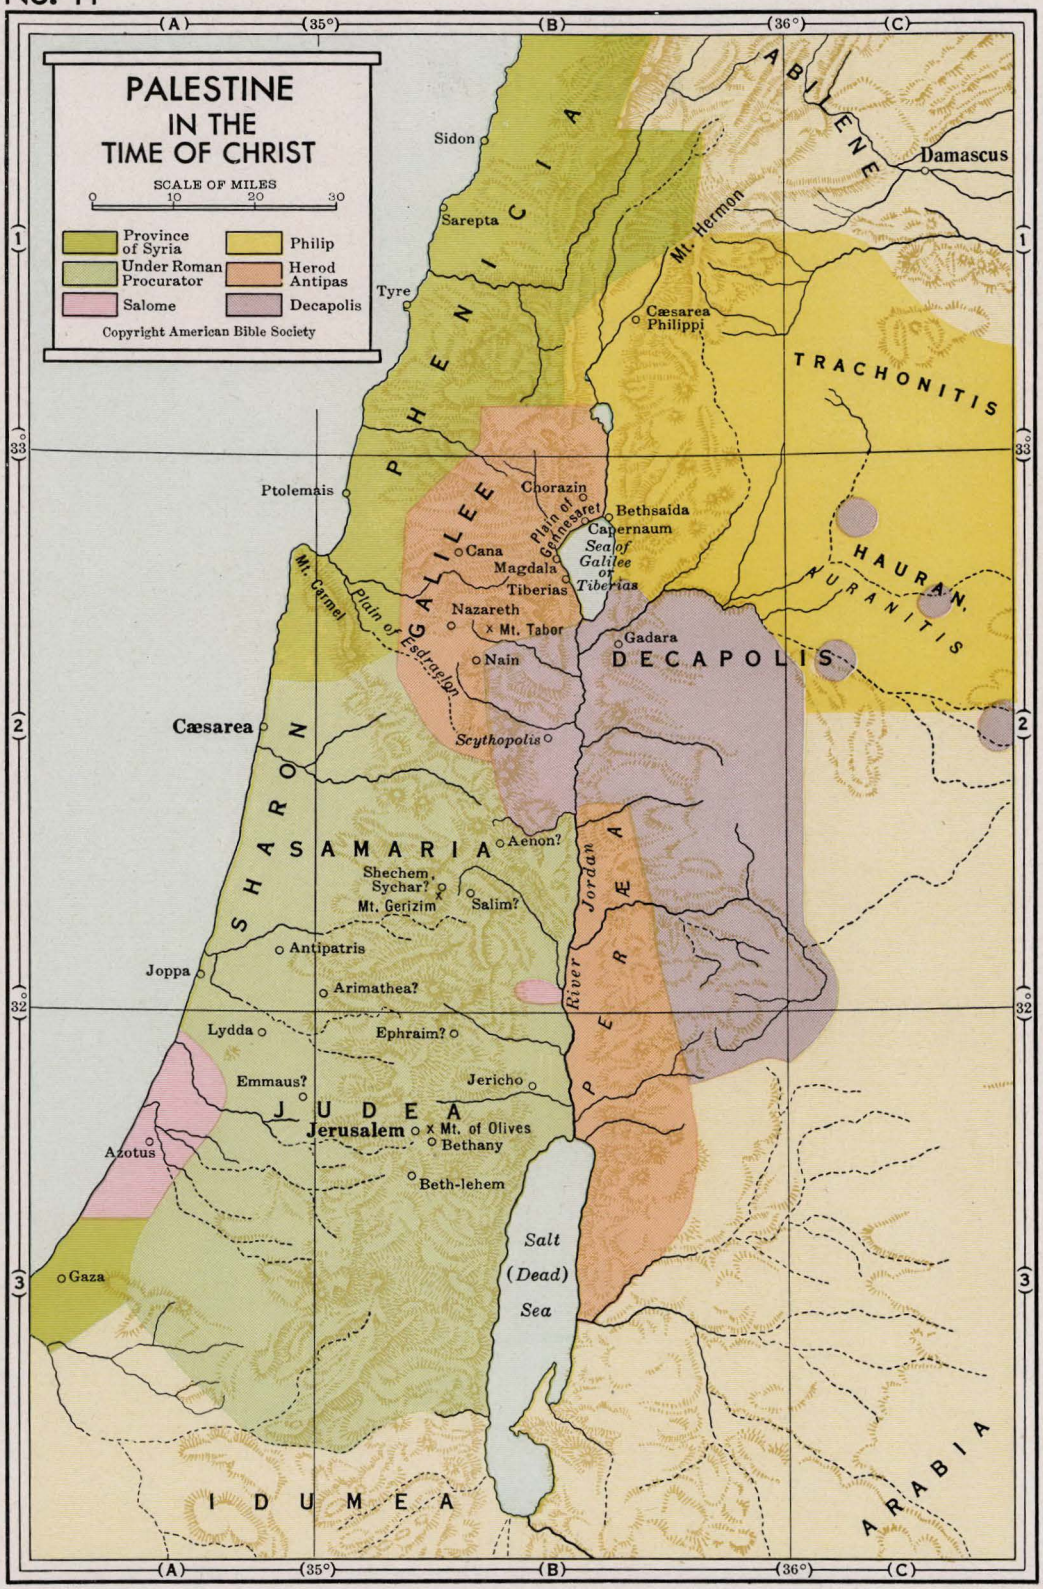
The transition to the rule of Rome made no abrupt changes in the culture of Palestine; Hellenism still prevailed there. The Roman influence began to be felt gradually and in the forms in which the Romans themselves worked.

The Romans were great builders in Palestine as elsewhere in their empire. A villa of a Roman official, built in the Roman style, has been excavated at Tell ed-Djudeide. The remains of a synagogue have been found near Ophel in Jerusalem; it bears a Greek inscription to the effect that a certain Theodotos has renovated the synagogue which was founded by his ancestors. The walls of El Ledjun in Judea (the name is taken from the Roman legion) are of Roman construction. Agrippa I (41-44 C.E.) began to construct a third wall around Jerusalem, but the Roman emperor ordered him to cease the work. However, it was hurriedly completed at the beginning of the Great War against Rome (66 to 73 C.E.).

The more recent of the two channels which connect the Pools of Solomon with the city is from the Roman period, and is perhaps that very aqueduct which was laid by Pontius Pilate out of the Temple funds, as recorded by Josephus. The names of the centurions who directed the work are written on the pipes which form a part of it. Roman baths have been found on the slopes of Ophel.

It is probable that the Romans built the first real roads in Palestine; in the most traveled stretches they have a breadth of about 24 feet. Wherever the nature of the soil required it, they were strengthened by a paving of broad stones, which permitted the rainwater to flow off to the sides. Milestones were set up at regular intervals; native calcareous rock was used for this purpose. The stones give the name of the emperor under whom the road was built or repaired, the provincial officials, and the distances from the nearest large settlement in Roman miles; the language is some-

No. 11



PALESTINE
IN THE TIME OF CHRIST
SCALE OF MILES
0 10 20 30
Province of Syria
Under Roman Procurator
Salome
Philip
Herod Antipas
Decapolis
Copyright American Bible Society
(A) (35°) (B) (36°) (C)
1 2 3
33° 32°
PHENICIA
ABILENE
Damascus
Sidon
Sarepta
Tyre
Mt. Hermon
Cæsarea Philippi
TRACHONITIS
Ptolemais
Chorazin
Plain of Gennesaret
Bethsaida
Capernaum
Sea of Galilee or Tiberias
GALILEE
Cana
Magdala
Tiberias
Mt. Carmel
Plain of Esdraelon
Nazareth
Mt. Tabor
Nain
HAURAN
AURANITIS
Gadara
DECAPOLIS
Cæsarea
Scythopolis
SHARON
SAMARIA
Aenon?
Shechem, Sychar?
Mt. Gerizim
Salim?
Jordan River
PERÆA
Antipatris
Joppa
Arimathea?
Lydda
Ephraim?
Jericho Emmaus?
JUDEA
Jerusalem
Mt. of Olives
Bethany
Azotus
Beth-lehem
Salt (Dead) Sea
Gaza
IDUMEA
ARABIA

times in Greek, for the convenience of the inhabitants, sometimes in Latin. Since these stones have been found in large numbers, it is possible to reconstruct, almost in its entirety, the Roman road system. As a rule the roads ran along the heights in order to guard against landslides. Long stretches are protected by castles, of which numerous ruins remain. In the Transjordan, from the time of Trajan, there ran a boundary wall (limes), similar to that of the Rhine boundary; this wall protected the cultivated land from inroads of the desert tribes. Paved roads first appear in the 1st cent. C.E.; remnants of street paving have been discovered in Jerusalem.

The tombs of the Roman period are not essentially different from those of the period immediately preceding. The most noteworthy of these are the so-called Tomb of Absalom at Jerusalem (see illustrations in vol. 1, pp. 56-57), which is influenced by Phoenician models, and the tombs at Petra, the capital of the Nabatean kingdom. Individual tub-shaped sarcophagi are certainly of Roman origin. At the same time the use of ossuaries (stone-chests) increased. At an earlier period the bones of the deceased had been removed from the grave some time subsequent to burial in order to make way for another body, and then placed in clay jars. Perhaps this "gathering of the bones" had a symbolic meaning. In this period ossuaries were used for that purpose, and there was a special artisans guild that made them. A list of such ossuary workers has been found in Jerusalem. The ossuaries were generally ornamentally decorated with flowers, stars, rosettes and the like; frequently the name of the dead, in Hebrew or in Greek, was added.

Roman style appears in some statuettes of Aphrodite, masculine heads, a feminine head from Ascalon, and a lion's head at Amman in the Transjordan.

Products of Roman ceramic art, such as vases, jugs, platters and plates, were imported into Palestine in large numbers. They are generally made of fine red clay, often plastically decorated.

Roman lamps, such as are found at Jericho and other places, are generally circular and provided with a long, curved handle which is often lacking in lamps of native manufacture. They have two apertures, one in the center for pouring in the oil, and one at the rim for the insertion of the wick. They are often provided with figured decorations; in addition to the motives previously found there are others, which appear at the end of the Roman period, and consist of allegorical designs which have reference to death.

The earliest mosaics discovered in Jerusalem come from the Roman period. They are of an unpretentious sort and have only a few simple colors (black, white, yellow and red).

A large number of metal utensils of this period have been preserved. These include several bronze pots with handles decorated with figures, finger, ear and nose rings, bronze chains and medallions. Flat plates of gold with various motives and inscriptions have been found in graves; these were originally placed on the lips of the deceased. The carvings on the Arch of Titus at Rome depict the most valuable pieces of booty from the Temple: the seven-branched candlestick (Menorah), the table of the showbread with the bowl for the drink offering, and the trumpet (Shofar). In addition, there is a bronze shovel for coals, which was discovered in Palestine and is probably of the kind used in the service of the altar.

The art of glass work reached a high point during the Roman period, as is proved by numerous discoveries (for instance, at Jericho and Gezer). A characteristic feature of the period is the slender form, which is wrought as carefully in glass as in pottery. Numerous cups and goblets have been found in graves. The beginning of the imperial period is marked by the appearance of the so-called Sidonian relief glasses; these are based on Greek tradition, but are six-sided and have a type of their own. The favorite decorations on glass dishes are the citron (Ethrog) and the cluster of grapes.

There are numerous cameos, especially after the beginning of the imperial period, and they are often framed in gold; they were worn as ornaments. Finger rings frequently bear cut stones.

Despite the loss of political independence with the defeat of Bar Kochba, building continued to flourish in the following centuries, the time in which the Mishnah and the Talmud were compiled. Although Israelite art had previously freed itself with difficulty from the imitation of the art of other peoples, only to fall before the onslaught of Hellenistic culture, it now had a few centuries of quiet growth. One proof of Jewish capabilities is seen in the numerous synagogue ruins, especially in Upper and Lower Galilee. They show a uniform groundplan: a ground-floor with many naves, with a gallery, supported on columns, running around three sides; this gallery was probably intended for the women. The outer wall is separated into parts by columns, and the building is adorned with numerous sculptures within and without. These consist of the animals which were favorite ornaments during the Hellenistic period, such as lions and eagles, as well as clusters of grapes, palm-branches, citrons, a trumpet, and above all the seven-branched candlestick (Menorah), which can almost be regarded as a national symbol. The Shield of David (Magen David) is almost never present. These synagogues often contain an inscription giving the name of its founder. Such synagogue ruins have been found at Hamath, Capernaum, Kfar-Birim and Meron, and since 1920 at Beth Alpha in the Jezreel valley and at Geresh.

Another such synagogue was discovered at Ain Duk, near Jericho; during the first World War as the result of the explosion of a hand grenade. It contains a mosaic pavement which depicts Daniel in the lions' den and other Biblical scenes, the signs of the zodiac, plants, fantastic animals and geometrical figures. This last independent period of Jewish art was brought to an end by the persecutions which the Jews suffered under the Byzantine Empire.

The story of the intellectual and spiritual development in Palestine is treated extensively in separate articles. During this period the foundations of Judaism were laid and it took its permanent form. Just as the Israelites had to overcome foreign influence in their life and civilization, so they had to overcome it in their religious thought. In the course of the centuries in which they lived in Palestine they witnessed the struggle between monotheism and polytheism; saw the rise of the prophets and the transformation of the religion of Israel from a cult to an ethical law; saw the many shrines of the country concentrated into the Temple at Jerusalem; saw the Temple in turn replaced by the synagogue and the house of study. It was in this era that the Jews produced great literary works: the poetry and epic narrative, the history and legislation, the oratory, ethics and religious teachings that go to make up the Bible and the Apocrypha; the Mishnah as the new code of laws; the Palestinian Talmud and the beginnings of the Midrash literature. Palestine, during this period, was also the scene of the birth of Christianity.

For details, see: APOCRYPHA; BIBLE; CHRISTIANITY; LITERATURE; RELIGION; TALMUD.

2. Middle Ages. The closing years of the ancient period and the beginning of the Middle Ages was a time of peace and growth for Palestine. The Palestinian area of settlement never reached so great an extent toward the south and the east as in the two centuries before the invasion of the Islamic Arabs (7th cent.). A lively trade grew up with the swelling stream of pilgrims. There were notable controversies between various Christian sects. Hermits settled in many wild ravines in the Negeb, the wilderness of Judah and on Mount Carmel, whither they came from all parts of the Roman empire to build their eyries and thus create the original form of the Christian monastic system; Greek churches replaced them in the same cites (Mar Saba in the Kidron valley, the monasteries in the Wadi Kelt, in the hills of the Quaran valley and on the lower Jordan). Byzantine emperors and nobles built many Christian churches patterned after the ancient basilica. Pious Christian zeal often turned into blind fanaticism, which burst forth in bloody persecutions or expressed itself in legal restrictions against heretics and unbelievers, the latter including in particular Samaritans and Jews. The Samaritans, who were still in considerable numbers, revolted for the last time in 529; they were bloodily suppressed with the aid of the Ghassanides, Arab vassals of the Byzantine emperor in the Hauran area; their land was plundered and they were forcibly baptized. After that only a small group of them remained.

The period of peace in Syria was now and then interrupted by wars between the Byzantines and the Persians of the Sassanian empire. When Chosroes II of Persia conquered Syria and Palestine in 614, the Jews joyfully joined him, and they and the Persians took a bloody revenge upon the Christians. But the fanatic fire-worshippers were no milder than the Byzantine Christians; so the Jews again declared for the emperor Heraclius when he promised them amnesty (628). The victorious emperor, however, broke his word under pressure of the clergy, and permitted the Jews to be slaughtered or forced to accept baptism. To atone for this perjury the church instituted a fast day (the day of Heraclius) which was annually observed in the Orient for a long time.

The conquest of the country by the Arabs saved the Jews of Palestine from complete destruction. The decisive battle between the Christians and Mohammedans took place in 636 on the banks of the Yarmuk. In 638 Jerusalem surrendered to the caliph Omar. Palestine became an Arab country, not only because of the Mohammedan conquest, but also because Arabs had come to the country by immigration for centuries back; nomads, veterans' colonies and merchants. Their rather heterodox Christianity was not very deep and was easily replaced by Islam.

The Jews never recovered completely from the 300-year rule of the Christians (320-635), but their more favorable situation under the dynasties of the Omaiyads (640-750), Abbasides (750-975) and Fatimids (976-1070) led to an increased number of pilgrims and a small return of Jews from other countries. Jerusalem, barred to the Jews since 135 C.E., was opened to them soon after the Mohammedan conquest, although, according to a Christian source, one of the terms of the capitulation was that Jews should be excluded from the city. The Omaiyad caliph Abd el Malik (691) built the Dome of the Rock (Mosque of Omar) on the site of the Temple. He is said to have trusted the Jews with important functions in the service of the shrine, but these were later revoked by Omar II (717-20).

The improved social and economic condition of the Jews of Palestine led to a revival of the intellectual and spiritual life. The achievements of the Yeshiva, headed by the dynasty of Mar Zutra, which had migrated from Babylonia about 520, were but small, to be sure, but Palestine took the lead in the field of the Haggadah, which attained a second period of flowering. Synagogal poetry, which arose in Palestine, drew freely from this Haggadah; its earliest known composers were Jannai and Eleazar Hakalir. Six generations of scholars (700-900) worked on Palestinian soil to accomplish the final determination of the Bible text (Masorah), the system of Hebrew vocalization (Nikkud) and the accents (Teamim). The rich materials of the Cairo Genizah, which are still not completely explored, were the first to shed light upon the accomplishments of this little known period.

When Karaite refugees from Babylonia settled in the country (about 860), their presence led to strife and conflict, sometimes even bloodshed, but at the same time occasioned a revival of scholarship. The strengthening of the Rabbinite community of Jerusalem after 900 and the increased and improved study of the Talmud under the direction of the revived patriarchate were probably the potent defences against the Karaite threat. Ben Meir, the most important of these Hillelides (about 920), assumed the title of Gaon, and claimed for his academy the rights that had been taken away from the Palestinian Sanhedrin in 425. The most important of these rights was the determination of the calendar; but Ben Meir failed to make good his claim over the opposition of the Gaon Saadia at Baghdad. In the 11th cent. Palestinian academies were governed by Gaons of a priestly dynasty (descendants of Ezra?), who challenged the authority of the Egyptian Gaons and later of the Egyptian Nagids. After the capture of Jerusalem and Ramleh by the Seljuk Turks (1070) the Palestinian Gaonate removed to Tyre, where there was an important Jewish community which supported itself by trade, manufacture of silk goods and glassware, and by shipping. After the First Crusade the Palestinian Yeshiva was transferred to Damascus, where Benjamin of Tudela (about 1170) found it.

The Jews of Palestine gradually became poorer and poorer because of the various wars and plunderings. Only a few still practised farming and cattle-raising, and most of them, as in other countries, were traders or artisans. Support from the countries outside of Palestine was required for the academies and for many poor people who had come to Palestine for religious reasons. Great Jewish leaders (Paltiel in Cairo, Manasseh, vizier of Syria, at Damascus, and his son Adaya, 975-96) took a warm interest in the welfare of the Palestinian Jews.

The Crusaders (1098-99) found Syria divided and weakened; shortly before their appearance the Fatimids had wrested Palestine from the rule of the Seljuks. The Jews of the time, small in numbers and of but little economic and military importance, naturally took the side of the Mohammedan rulers; but it is only at Haifa that there is any account of a strong resistance on the part of Jews. It is likely that most of the Jews fled to Damascus and Egypt; the Karaites and Rabbinites who remained in Jerusalem were all massacred when the city was taken by the Crusaders (July, 1099). Palestine became a feudal state after the Frank pattern; clericalism and militarism were predominant, but provision was made for the interests of commerce. During this period Judaism reached its nadir in its homeland, and in 1170 Benjamin of Tudela found scarcely 1,500 Jews in the entire country.

The Crusaders degenerated rapidly in Palestine, despite the institution of various knightly orders. After eighty-eight years, the decaying kingdom was overthrown by Saladin on the field of Hattin, and the victor now united Palestine to his dominions of Egypt and Damascus. The efforts of the Third Crusade (1191) succeeded in wresting from the Mohammedans a few coastal places. Acco remained in Christian hands until 1291 and became one of the most important harbors and centers of commerce in the Levant. Jews were permitted to live there, and they participated considerably in the lucrative trade with Europe. The Western European Diaspora, hard pressed since the beginning of the Crusades, now began to turn its attention to Palestine. In 1211, 300 rabbis of England and France made a pilgrimage to the country, and many stayed there, especially in Acco. Saladin welcomed the return of the Jews, but his weak successors permitted conditions in Palestine to fall into such a state of decay that the country became an easy prey for the Chwaresmians (1244) and the Mongols (1259-60).

When the Mamelukes came to power in Egypt and produced a line of able sultans, conditions for Jewish immigration improved. Sultan Kotuz defeated the Mongols at En Harod (1260) and freed the land from this armed plague which had very heavily afflicted Palestinian Jewry; the community of Jerusalem had been one of the victims of the Mongols. This community was reorganized by Nahmanides, who came to the country in 1267, and since that time it has had an uninterrupted existence. During the last years of his life Nahmanides worked at Acco, where there were a considerable number of Talmudists and Cabalists. When Acco was captured and destroyed by the Mameluks in 1291, most of the Jews there migrated to Safed. The 14th cent., the most tragic of all the Middle Ages for the Jews of Western Europe, was a time of comparative peace in Palestine; the Mamelukes made commerce secure and were active in building. The Jews were free to follow any occupation—a freedom that was unknown in Europe at that time. Since many Jews were expelled from cities and countries in Europe in this century, a strong stream of migration flowed toward Palestine. A scholar who had migrated from Provence, the physician Estori Hafarhi, settled in Bethshean; he visited all parts of the country in the course of seven years and wrote the first Hebrew work on the topography of Palestine (1325).

The devastation of the country under the Mongols led by Tamerlane (Timur the Lame) was the beginning of a period of deterioration, while the growing burden of taxation led to the impoverishment of the population in general and of the Jews in particular. The Jewish elders, almost all rough and unscrupulous men, were entrusted with the collection of the taxes, and used this power to their own advantage. They did not hesitate to sell scrolls of the Torah to Christians. When Obadiah of Bertinoro visited the country in 1488, the community of Jerusalem was at the point of dissolution. He succeeded in reorganizing the community through the reputation of his name, his adroitness and his connections with Egypt; thus he prepared the way for the Sephardim.

3. Modern Period. a. From 1500 to 1840. The opening of the 16th cent. was the beginning of a new era for Palestine. As a result of the discovery of sea routes from Europe to India, the travel routes and centers of Asia Minor became desolate; Palestine lost the last remnant of its geographical importance for commerce which remained to it after the destruction of Acco and the other coastal cities. After the decay of the Mameluke rule in the last decades of the 15th cent., the change in rulership resulting from the conquest of Palestine by the Ottoman Turks (1517), was at first a blessing to the country. During the "Golden Age" of Turkey under the victorious sultans Selim I and Suleiman II it was not yet the Porte's policy to suck the provinces dry for the benefit of Turkey proper.

The great Suleiman reared an immortal monument to himself in the building of the city wall of Jerusalem (1536-39) and the beautification of the Dome of the Rock. But only a few decades after his death (1566) a steady decline in Palestine became perceptible. Palestine, one of the outlying provinces, then entered the tragic age of the dominion of the pashas, marked by bloody feuds of the governors with one another and with the native potentates. The Porte had but one interest in the provinces: taxes.

The period of the prosperity of Turkey was favorable for the Jews who had found a refuge there. Because of the decline of its commerce and trade, Palestine could receive but few of the Spanish exiles, mostly artisans, traders, and Talmudists of reputation. It was of great importance that Palestine was in active relations with the Jews of the entire Ottoman Empire. Up to the end of the 18th cent. Turkey was the most important, and sometimes the only, source of financial support of the Jews of Palestine; this support extended both to the aid of immigration and to the maintenance of the academies. Egyptian Jewry became poor and ceased to play an important role in Palestine. The last Nagid, Isaac Hakohen Shuleil, migrated to Palestine after he had been deprived of his office by the Turks. There he assumed leadership of the community and direction of the academies; he was able to expand the houses of study and aid the poor by use of his own means and the support of Jews in other countries.

The rabbis of Palestine took up Cabala as well as the study of the Talmud. Longing for the redemption of Israel often led to fantastic dreaming. The appearance of David Reubeni and Solomon Molcho so intensified the belief of the Jews in the speedy coming of the redemption that they even acted insolently toward the authorities. Only the coolheadedness of Levi ben Habib, head of the Jerusalem community after the death of Shuleil (1525), was able to hold it in check (1530). He also gave evidence of his sense of reality in another case. In Safed a larger community had grown up than in Jerusalem, and this community had more rabbis of fame and importance. At their head was Jacob Berab. He decided to revive the Sanhedrin and the ordination of rabbis (Semichah) as preliminary steps for the appearance of the Messiah. Without consulting the rabbis of the rest of the world, or even his colleagues in Jerusalem, the rabbis of Safed appointed Jacob Berab as head of the Sanhedrin with the right of conferring Semichah (1538). Jacob Berab hastened to confer ordination upon Levi ben Habib in writing, but the latter took a decided stand against the proposed step, and a lively controversy ensued between him and Berab. The Sanhedrin in Safed never came into being.

Despite this setback, Safed was the residence of the most important rabbis of the century: Joseph Caro, compiler of the Shulhan Aruch, and Isaac Luria, founder of a Cabalistic system which soon became almost universally recognized in Judaism. There were also important Jewish groups in Hebron, Shechem and some smaller places. The attempt of Joseph Nasi to settle Jews in and around Tiberias (1571) was unsuccessful. The situation of the Jews in Jerusalem became worse very rapidly in the latter half of the 16th cent. and their calls for help to the Diaspora more frequent and more pressing. In order to satisfy the inordinate greed of the Turkish officials, the Jewish community of Jerusalem had to borrow money from rich effendis at a high rate of interest. If the debts were not paid in time, the Arabs would attack the Jewish quarter.

The worst period was during the two-year reign of Ibn Faruch and his brother-in-law Osman (1625-27), who imprisoned prominent Jews without any excuse in order to extort money from them. One of these prisoners was the former chief rabbi of Prague, Isaiah Horovitz, who had migrated to Palestine in 1621. The Jews obtained their freedom on the payment of a high ransom, but no man felt safe in the city, and most of the Jews fled to Tiberias or Safed. The Ashkenazic community, which had flourished for a time side by side with the Sephardic community, completely disappeared with Isaiah Horovitz.

Safed enjoyed a period of peace and well-being under the Druse prince Fahr ed-Din, ruler of the southern Lebanon and Upper Galilee (1584-1635, with interruptions). When Fahr ed-Din was defeated by the Turkish pashas, this peace changed to insecurity and disorder. Despite these tragic occurrences and the impossibility of finding a means of livelihood or even living quietly on support from the outside, Palestine still attracted Jews from the Diaspora. After the fearful massacres of the Cossack revolt in the Ukraine under Chmielnicki (1648-49) many families came to Palestine. The Ashkenazim always showed less skill in adapting themselves to conditions in Palestine than did the Sephardim. The Ashkenazic rabbis had no share in the Halukkah money which the Sephardim received from the Ashkenazim in foreign lands.

Sabbatai Zevi, despite his active Messianic pretensions, at first found but little support in Palestine. It was only after he had gained general recognition in Egypt, and returned to Jerusalem supplied with ample means, that all hearts turned toward him (1665). Messianic dreaming had its tragic afterpiece in the migration of Judah Hasid of Siedlce at the head of a few hundred persons (at the end of 1700). Many were overcome by the hardships of the trip, while others fell victims to hunger and pestilence in Jerusalem; Judah Hasid himself was one of the first to die. In the few days of his life in Jerusalem he purchased a group of houses for his community, and this neighborhood still bears his name. Only a few of the immigrating visionaries remained in Palestine; most of them emigrated or perished.

The next important immigration was that of the Hasidim from Poland, Russia and Galicia in the 1750's; these settled mainly in Safed and Tiberias. In Omar ed-Din (1740-75) Galilee again had a native prince who was capable. He rebuilt Tiberias and invited Jews to settle there; Acco, his residence, also flourished. In the war between Russia and Turkey, Russian warships aided him against the Turkish pashas. After the conclusion of peace, however, the Russians left him in the lurch; he was defeated in unequal encounters and was finally murdered by a traitor. Ahmed el Jezzar, an adventurer from Bosnia, succeeded him, but kept on good terms with the Porte by paying the taxes. He ruled with much cruelty, but preserved order and security. During his rule occurred the immigration of 300 Russian Hasidim under the leadership of Menahem Mendel of Vitebsk, Abraham ben Alexander Kalisker and Israel Polotzker; they settled in Safed, and later on at Tiberias and Pekiin. During the same period many Jews from Tunis and the Atlas Mountains migrated to Palestine.

The long period of peace in the Levant was destroyed by the appearance of Napoleon. In his expedition from Egypt through the coastal plain as far as Acco (1799) he captured Jaffa and summoned Jews and Christians to throw off the Turkish yoke. The Jews demonstrated their fidelity to the sultan by taking an active part in the work of fortifying the city; Acco resisted the siege successfully and Palestine remained Turkish. During the Napoleonic Wars the Jews of Palestine suffered because of the interruption of their support from the Jews of Poland and Russia. The immigration of the Hasidim to Palestine encouraged their opponents, the Mithnaggedim (called Perushim in Palestine), to follow their example. A community of Perushim was formed in Safed in 1810, headed by Israel Shklover, a disciple of Elijah Vilna. Despite their poverty and sufferings, the number of Jews in Safed grew; a printing-shop was established there in 1831.

In Acco the rule was in the hands of almost independent pashas. Hayim Farhi, member of an influential Damascene family, was finance minister and state secretary there. The cruel Jezzar had him mutilated, but retained him in office. The pasha Abdallah was the pupil of Farhi and owed his elevation to him; however, he proved to be ungrateful, causing Farhi to be murdered and confiscating his property (1820). The brothers of the murdered man took revenge by succeeding in having Abdallah placed under the ban at Constantinople; they besieged Acco with the aid of other Syrian pashas (1821-22), but without success. Abdallah bribed the pashas to withdraw and took revenge on the Jews of Acco, Safed and Tiberias by the imposition of new burdens upon them. In 1832 Abdallah was expelled by Mehmet Ali, the pasha of Egypt, who also defeated the Turks.

The Egyptians ruled over Palestine for eight years. They sought to effect reforms of European pattern, and above all to disarm the population, but met with a compact resistance on the part of the Arabs. The burden of taxation and the compulsory levy was as severe under the Egyptians as under the Turks. There was an uprising as early as 1833; Jerusalem was captured by the insurgents and Safed was in their hands for a long time. The Jews were mercilessly plundered, and many were even deprived of their undergarments. On this occasion the Druses in the Lebanon ranged themselves on the side of Ibrahim Pasha (son of Mehmet Pasha) and suppressed the revolt in Galilee.

In the winter of 1837 Safed was destroyed by an earthquake and almost 2,000 Jews lost their lives. Of those who remained, the Perushim left Safed and settled in Jerusalem, where the Ashkenazic community began steadily to increase. The Habad Hasidim, by the order of their rabbi, went to Hebron. The earthquake was less severe in Tiberias, but there were many victims; Jerusalem was spared. In 1838 the Druses revolted against Ibrahim Pasha, and others joined them; Safed was again plundered. The disorders in Syria led to the intervention of the European Powers in the conflict between Sultan Abdul Medjid and the pasha of Egypt. England, Russia and Austria favored the former, France the latter. Projects were advanced at that time to restore Palestine to the Jews in order to create a buffer state between Turkey and its insubordinate Egyptian pasha. However, in 1840 Turkey again received all of Syria and Palestine through the influence of the European Powers, after it had promised to effect reforms on the European pattern and to grant equality to all its subjects. With 1840 begins the period in which European influence becomes important in Palestine.

b. From 1840 to 1919. Once the intervention of the European Powers had begun, a great rivalry commenced for influence in Palestine. An unarmed crusade of the clergy of all the Christian nations poured into the country and covered it with a network of churches, convents, schools, hospitals, hospices, asylums and other missionary institutions. Besides the Europeans, whose political interests were only too plainly evident, American Protestants came, and made their headquarters at Beyrouth. In 1841 England and Prussia jointly founded an evangelical episcopate at Jerusalem; from the beginning it represented almost exclusively British interests, and in 1882 the Prussian government withdrew. France appointed a consul at Jerusalem and effectively took over the protection of the Roman Catholic Church in Palestine. The renewal of the Latin patriarchate in 1847 was due to France. The Greek Catholic Church, aided by Russia, became very active, at times even aggressive. The dispute about the holy places in Palestine gave Russia a pretext for making humiliating demands on Turkey, which led to the Crimean War (1853-55).

At the end of this war Russia resumed its activities in Palestine, erecting churches, hospices and missions similar to those of France and England. In the last decades before the first World War from 10,000 to 20,000 Russian pilgrims visited Palestine every year. Austria and Prussia established consulates in Jerusalem in the middle of the 19th cent. The Württemberg Templars settled in Palestine in 1868. Despite all the unfavorable features of the climate and the surroundings they succeeded in maintaining themselves in the country. After the visit of Emperor William II in 1898 the Germans began active building in Palestine (the Empress Auguste Victoria hospice on the Mount of Olives, the Marienkirche on Mount Zion, and the Paulus hospice at the Damascus Gate).

The creation of these European consulates proved advantageous to the Jews, who could place themselves under their protection, and the consulates welcomed the Jews in order to increase their own influence. Thus the Jews, formerly outlaws, acquired a special protection. This and the greater ease of travel caused a larger Jewish migration to Palestine. Most of the Jewish immigrants settled in Jerusalem and Safed, a smaller number in Tiberias and Hebron, since their settlement on the open country, away from the influence of the consulates, was exposed to danger. As a result of this, indescribable misery ruled in the holy places. The development of the Halukkah and the activities of Moses Montefiore and other philanthropists could only partly moderate the need.

Plans for agricultural settlement first appeared among the Jews of Palestine themselves. Montefiore brought such a plan to Europe and warmly advocated it all his life, but without success. It was not until the pogroms in Russia (1881-82) and under the influence of nationalism that a great movement arose for resettling Palestine with Jewish agriculturists. The colonization begun in 1882 would probably have failed without the assistance of Baron Edmond de Rothschild of Paris. However, more of the Jewish immigrants settled in the cities, and side by side with the old Yishub ("settlement"), dependent on the Halukkah, there arose a new Yishub which depended on productive work.

The desire to return to Palestine was remarkably strong among the Jews of Yemen, Persia, Caucasia, Turania and northern Africa. The number of Jews rose from 12,000 in 1850 to 35,000 in 1882 and 85,000 in 1914. Palestine became again a Jewish spiritual center, with its greatest accomplishment the rebirth of the Hebrew language. The presence of Jews from so many countries made any other language an impossibility. In 1913, when the Haifa Technikum wanted to give German the preference, a strike of pupils and teachers and a violent conflict resulted, which did not cease until the outbreak of the first World War.

The War involved Palestine in great suffering. Unable to take care of itself, it had to support a great army of occupation; in addition, there was a plague of locusts in 1915. Hunger and epidemics decimated the population, especially the Jews in the cities. At the outbreak of the War the Jews who were citizens of the Entente Powers were compelled to leave the country or become Turkish subjects; most of them preferred the former alternative. The Jews were exposed to the arbitrary acts of the Turkish authorities. Jemal Pasha, commander of the Turkish forces, cruelly persecuted the Jewish and Arab nationalists. Up to 1917 the fighting was chiefly at the Egyptian frontier, and Palestine was merely a military arsenal.

The great British offensive began in October, 1917, and shortly afterwards (November 2nd) the Balfour Declaration was issued. In December the bravely defended Gaza line was broken, and the Turks retreated, taking with them many prominent Jews. On December 8th (Hanukah) Allenby entered Jerusalem, and was received with joy by the Jewish population. Jewish youths hastened to enroll in the Jewish Legion, although the British army command had shown little sympathy for the Jewish cause. Palestine remained divided, with the British controlling the south and the Turks the north, until September, 1918, when a new offensive, centering in the valley of Jezreel, threw back the Turkish armies and drove them out of Palestine and Syria. Turkey laid down her arms at the end of October, and the conquest was ratified in the following year by the complete cession of Palestine, which then became an English mandate of the League of Nations.

(This first section of the article has been compiled on the basis of contributions by the following authors: Abraham Jakob Brawer, Simon Cohen, Samuel Klein, Hans Lichtenstein, Aron Sandler and Robert Weltsch.)

IV. The Period between the Two World Wars (1919 to 1942). 1. The British Administration. The period immediately following the first World War found the entire Near and Middle East in a complex political situation. The area taken from Turkey was under the military control of Allied armies, and conflicts in claims were already arising between the various powers, due to agreements entered into hastily and prematurely during the War. Palestine proper, on both sides of the Jordan, was under British military government, while Syria, to the north, was in the hands of French troops. Disagreement between England and France over the exact establishment of the boundary between Palestine and Syria was not slow in arising, and Arabs and Bedouins participated freely in the boundary dispute.

In April, 1920, the Principal Allied Powers, meeting at San Remo, confirmed the plan to establish a British Mandate over Palestine. The terms of the Mandate were approved by the Council of the League of Nations in 1922, and a year later the Mandate was put into effect. In 1924 the United States became a party to the agreement through the joint American-British Convention, which incorporates the terms of the Mandate, and provides that no changes may be made in the document in derogation of American rights or interests, without the consent of the United States. Earlier, the United States government had expressed its approval "of the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people," through a Joint Congressional Resolution signed by President Warren G. Harding (September 21, 1922).

a. Interpretations of the Mandate. From the beginning questions were raised as to interpretation of the terms of the Mandate. Following Arab riots in 1920 and 1921, the Churchill White Paper was issued by the British government in July, 1922, setting forth official policy in a manner designed to limit the interpretations which had previously been placed on the Balfour Declaration. It set up the principle of economic absorptive capacity for the regulation of immigration, whereby quotas were to be established on the basis of the ability of Palestine's economy to absorb additional population. It declared that what had been promised under the terms of the Balfour Declaration was the "further development of the existing Jewish community (in Palestine) with the assistance of Jews in other parts of the world." It reaffirmed the Balfour Declaration, declared that Cis-Jordan had not been promised to the Arabs, assured the Jews of their right to enter Palestine, and asserted that the Jewish people were in Palestine "as of right and not on sufferance." Shortly thereafter Transjordan was freed from application of the Jewish national home clauses of the Palestine Mandate, despite the objections of many Zionists.

Following the 1929 riots the Shaw Commission appointed to inquire into the immediate causes of the riots conducted an investigation and went further in its recommendations, advocating curtailment of immigration and regulation of land purchase by Jews. The strained relations which by now existed between the Jews and the British government were not eased by the ensuing report, in August, 1930, by Sir John Hope Simpson, who had been named by the British government to investigate land and immigration conditions. He found that the capacity of the land was strictly limited, and urged additional restrictions on immigration. Reports of later commissions, however, were at variance with the Hope Simpson prognosis. Simultaneously came the Passfield White Paper, which sought, in effect, to repudiate the provisions in the Balfour Declaration and in the Mandate guaranteeing the establishment of a Jewish National Home. The reaction to these statements was so overwhelming, however, that in 1931 Ramsay MacDonald, prime minister, addressed to Chaim Weizmann a public letter which sought to modify some of the extreme statements of the previous documents and to mollify the critics of the government. The letter recognized that the Mandate involved an obligation to the whole Jewish people, and not merely to the resident in Palestine.

b. Partition Proposal. The prolonged series of Arab disturbances which began in 1936 provoked a new flurry of commissions and statements, however. Late in 1936 the British government appointed a Royal Commission, headed by Lord Peel, to investigate causes of the unrest. The Peel Commission went to Palestine, and after many months of hearings issued its report in July, 1937. The Commission found that the Arabs had gained materially and substantially from the presence of the Jews in the country, and further declared that "unquestionably . . . the primary purpose of the Mandate, as expressed in its preamble and its articles, is to promote the establishment of the Jewish National Home." However, because of the lack of cooperation from the Arabs, the Commission came to the conclusion that the Mandate was unworkable and recommended alternatively a complicated Partition Plan, which envisioned the division of Palestine into an Arab State, comprising about two-thirds of the area of the land, a small Jewish State, and neutral corridors to remain under British rule. It further suggested the substitution of political rather than economic factors in determining the absorptive capacity of the country.

In November, 1938, the Woodhead Commission, which had been appointed as a technical body to draw up specific boundary lines, further complicated matters by reporting on three alternative partition plans, though advising that partition in any form was impractical. Early in 1939 the British summoned Arab and Jewish leaders to a conference in London, convened for the purpose of ironing out the political difficulties in Palestine. No solution or compromise was reached. In 1939 the MacDonald White Paper was issued, providing for the limitation of immigration on purely political grounds. It called for the admission of 10,000 Jews a year for the ensuing five years, and permitted a "bonus" immigration of 25,000 additional, within the discretion of the high commissioner, because of the serious plight of Jewish refugees from Europe. The total of 75,000 with complete cessation of Jewish immigration thereafter was calculated to raise the Jewish population to about one-third of the total, at which figure, the White Paper stated, it was advisable to hold the Jewish population. The White Paper forbade further purchase of land or settlement by Jews in much of the country, and provided for establishment of an independent government by the majority at the end of the ten-year period.

The vigorous opposition which this White Paper stimulated was not halted even by the outbreak of the second World War in September, 1939. Inasmuch as the plan envisaged constituted a decided change in the terms of the Mandate, the approval of the Mandates Commission of the League was sought. The Commission, however, came to the decision that curtailment of Jewish immigration and land purchase was not in accordance with the Mandate as it had always been interpreted by the League and by the British government itself. In August, 1942, the MacDonald White Paper was still in effect, and immigration to Palestine was strictly limited in accordance with its provisions.

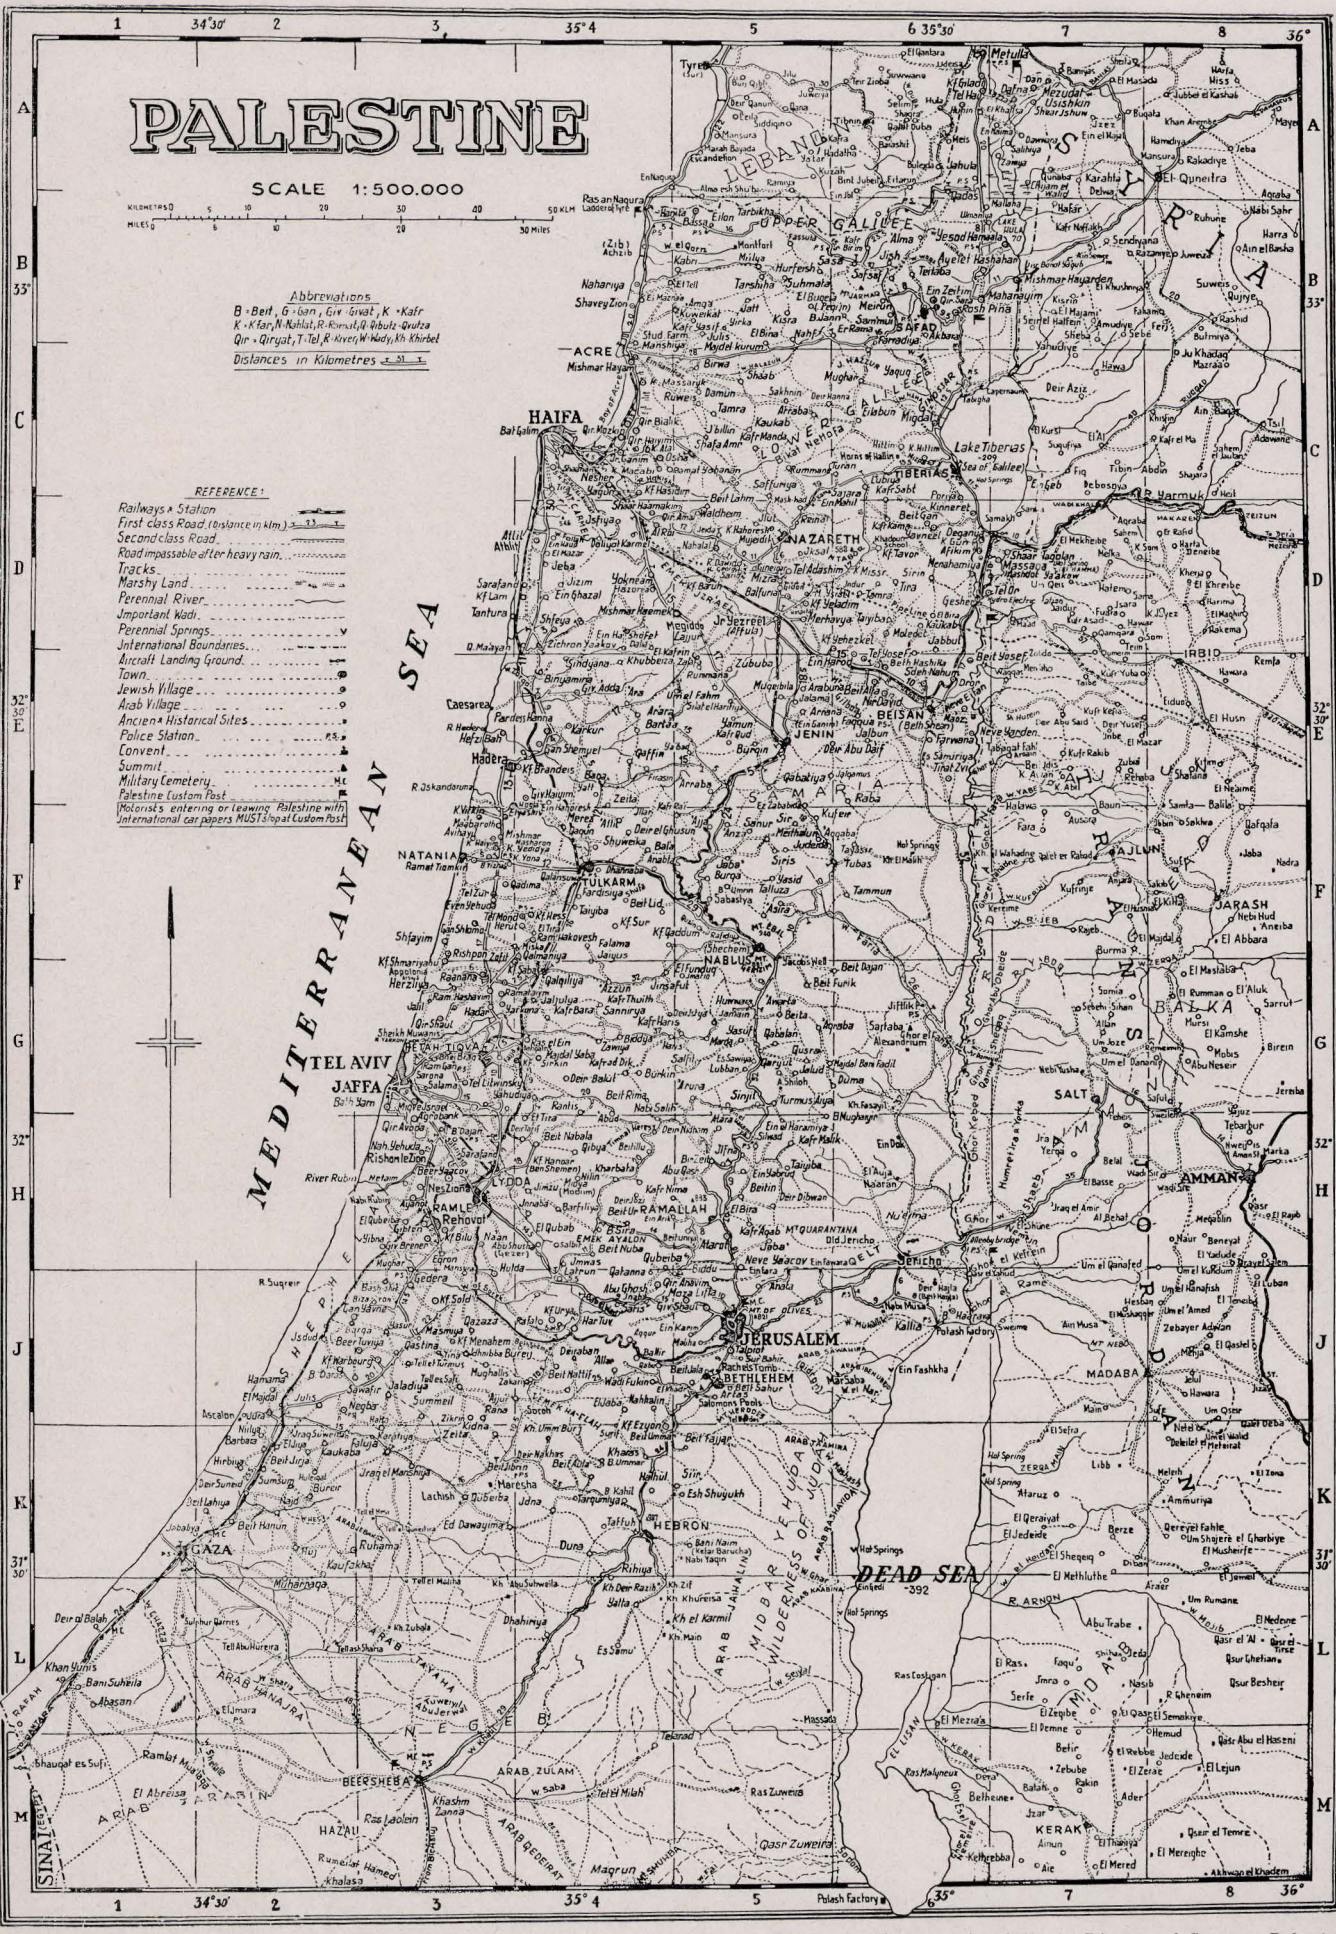
During the period in which the Balfour Declaration and the Mandate were undergoing a process of reinterpretation, plans other than those enumerated were, from time to time, suggested for the political administration of the country. Among these were proposals to establish a Jewish state on both sides of the Jordan, to set up a Jewish commonwealth with Jewish self-responsibility for immigration, and the like, to constitute Palestine a crown colony of the British Empire, to establish it as a dominion, to promote a federal union with adjacent Transjordan, and, more latterly, to include it as a member of a Pan-Semitic Middle East federation of states, in which Palestine would be either a Jewish or a binational member.

Great Britain never sought to disguise or hide its interest in Palestine as an area of strategic importance to the empire. The country proved a valuable base of military operations in the protection of the Suez Canal to the south, and the port of Haifa, terminus of the Mosul oil pipe line, was one of the principal British ports in the eastern Mediterranean, second only to Alexandria.

See also: BALFOUR DECLARATION; PALESTINE MANDATE; TRANSJORDAN.

2. Government. a. Administration. The military occupation of the country came to an end with the appointment of Sir Herbert Samuel as first high commissioner. He assumed his post on July 1, 1920. Three years later the final ratification of the Mandate provided the terms of administration, although Great Britain had already proceeded to set up the civil government. Successive high commissioners have been: Lord Plumer, appointed in 1925; Sir John Chancellor, appointed in 1928; Sir Arthur Wauchope, appointed in 1931; Sir Harold MacMichael, appointed in 1937.

Head of the Palestine administration was the high commissioner, appointed by the crown, and under the immediate direction of the British Colonial Office. The commissioner was assisted by an advisory council of government officials and an executive council. He was the supreme head of the country, and had complete legislative and executive power, subject only to control from London. For administrative purposes the country was divided into six government



PALESTINE
SCALE 1:500.000
KILOMETERS 0 5 10 20 30 40 50 KLM
MILES 0 5 10 20 30 Miles
Abbreviations
B = Beit, G = Gan, Giv = Givat, K = Kafr
K = Kfar, N = Nahlat, R = Ramat, Q = Kibutz - Qvutza
Qir = Qiryat, T = Tel, R = River, W = Wady, Kh = Khirbet Distances in Kilometres
REFERENCE:
Railways * Station
First class Road (Distance in Km.)
Second class Road
Road impassable after heavy rain Tracks
Marshy Land
Perennial River
Important Wadi
Perennial Springs
International Boundaries
Aircraft Landing Ground Town
Jewish Village
Arab Village
Ancient & Historical Sites
Police Station
Convent Summit
Military Cemetery
Palestine Custom Post
Motorists entering or leaving Palestine with International car papers MUST stop at Custom Post
MEDITERRANEAN SEA
DEAD SEA
-392
ACRE HAIFA
NAZARETH
TIBERIAS
Lake Tiberias
Sea of Galilee
BEISAN
JENIN
HADERA NATANIA
TULKARM
NABLUS
TEL AVIV
JAFFA
PETAH TIQVA
RAMLE
LYDDA
Rehovot
RAMALLAH
JERUSALEM
BETHLEHEM
HEBRON
GAZA BEERSHEBA
SALT
AMMAN
JERICHO MADABA
KERAK
JARASH
IRBID
SYRIA
LEBANON
JORDAN
SINAI
Approved (1941) by the Director of Surveys, Palestine districts, Jerusalem, Haifa, Samaria, Galilee-Acre, Lydda (including Tel-Aviv and Jaffa), and Gaza-Beer-sheba, each with an appointed district commissioner, assisted by a number of appointed assistants. The British Government was expected to report annually to the Mandates Commission of the League of Nations. Under Article IV of the Mandate the Jewish Agency was "recognized as a public body for the purpose of advising and cooperating with the Administration of Palestine in such economic, social and other matters as may affect the establishment of the Jewish national home and the interests of the Jewish population in Palestine. . . ."

Under the Palestine Naturalization Ordinance of 1925, about 650,000 inhabitants were automatically granted Palestinian citizenship, thus clarifying a tangled post-War situation. New immigrants were privileged to become citizens after two years of residence, and upon declaration of their intentions to reside in the country permanently.

b. Jewish Self Government. Every Jew in Palestine automatically became a member of the organized Jewish community, Kneseth Israel, unless he made a declaration expressing his desire to remain apart. Members of the Agudath Israel, the extreme Orthodox element, constituting an insignificant percentage of the population, were the only ones who took advantage of this clause in the law. Internal Jewish self-government was provided for in a government ordinance published in 1928 and recognizing the establishment of the Asefath Hanibharim (Jewish Elective Assembly), the supreme governing body of the Jewish community. Membership of the Assembly was first chosen by popular elections in 1931. The Vaad Leumi (Jewish National Council), a small executive body functioning within the Assembly, centralized the administrative function. The extent of its duties may be gauged from its various departments, which included social welfare, education, culture, religious affairs, health, organization, and enlistment and war effort. The Vaad Leumi had legal authority to tax all members of the community for education, social welfare and maintenance of the rabbinical courts. The tax could be enforced in the civil courts against all who accepted membership in the community. The budget of the Vaad Leumi had to be approved by the high commissioner. During the emergency created by Arab disturbances in the years following 1936, and later, during the War, the Vaad Leumi established special funds for purposes beyond its usual scope, and called for voluntary taxation. Among these funds were the Kofer Hayishub, for community defense against marauders, and the Mas Herum, for social welfare and other problems arising out of the War. The income of the Vaad Leumi from communal taxation in 1939 amounted to 300,000 pounds, and the Mas Herum yielded 120,000 pounds in the first two years of the War. The Vaad supervised the activity of the Kehilloth, the local Jewish community organizations, and conducted and supervised the Jewish educational system. The various municipalities and local city and town councils enjoyed additional independent powers of a political and secular nature, although in each instance their budgets were subject to the approval of the high commissioner. Local municipal councils in Jewish towns also constituted the Kehillah, the Jewish community, and were affiliated with the Kneseth Israel.

c. Government Income. The government income figures for the years 1938 to 1942 are revealed in the following table, which also indicates the proportion of the income raised in the country (all figures are in thousands of pounds):

Year	Local Income	British Subsidy	Total
1938-39	4,235	1,702	5,937
1939-40	4,735	2,133	6,868
1940-41	5,178	3,264	8,442
1941-42	6,282	2,183	8,465

The extent of Jewish participation in public and national economy may be seen from the fact that in the fiscal year 1941 to 1942 Palestine Jews contributed 4,250,000 pounds to the local government income and contributed an additional 1,500,000 pounds to the Vaad Leumi, Tel-Aviv municipality, the emergency funds, and the various Jewish community councils and local councils of Jewish villages. In the five major towns of mixed Arab and Jewish population the Jews shared in the public administration of Palestine.

Among the leaders of the Palestine Jewish community have been Menachem Mendel Ussishkin, until his death in 1941 president of the Jewish National Fund; Meier Dizengoff, mayor of Tel-Aviv (1921-25 and 1935-36); Israel Rokach, mayor of Tel-Aviv (1936-); David Ben Gurion, chairman, Eliezer Kaplan, treasurer, and Moshe Shertok, political head, of the Jewish Agency; Isaac Ben Zvi, president of the Vaad Leumi; Daniel Auster, deputy mayor of Jerusalem; Henrietta Szold, founder of Hadassah; and Pinchas Rutenberg, industrialist and founder of the Palestine Electric Corporation.

See also Jewish Agency for Palestine.

3. Population and Immigration. At the close of the first World War there were 55,000 Jews in Palestine. Increased immigration sent this figure upward steadily, so that in 1922 there were 84,000 Jews; in 1931, 175,000; in 1936, 410,000; and in 1942 the number was estimated to be in the vicinity of 550,000. The Jewish percentage of the total population increased during this period from 9 per cent to approximately 35 per cent.

The Arab population likewise increased, the natural increase being largely augmented by immigration from neighboring countries. In 1919 there were 457,000 Moslems; in 1922, 591,000; in 1931, 760,000; in 1936, 790,000; in 1940, 941,000. There were also about 100,000 Christians in the country, almost half of whom were members of the Greek Orthodox Church. Other Christian groups included the United Eastern Churches, among whom were Syrian and Armenian Catholics, Chaldeans, Melkites and Maronites; and the Anglican, Gregorian and Lutheran Churches. Numerous Roman Catholic orders also maintained themselves there.

The major municipalities were Tel-Aviv, with a population of 160,000 Jews; Jerusalem, with a population of 133,850, of whom the Jews constituted 66 per cent; Haifa, with 110,000, of whom 60,000 were Jews; Jaffa, with 70,000, mostly Arabs; Tiberias, with 7,000 Jews; Petach Tikvah, with 18,000; Rehovoth, with 8,000; Rishon Le Zion, with 6,000; Hedera, with 6,277; Nathanyah, with 6,200, Ramath Gan, with 5,200; Herzlia, with 5,300, the latter seven all-Jewish communities; other Arab communities listed below.

a. Population Growth. The statistics on Jewish immigration to Palestine show that the period between 1920 and 1926, known as the time of the Third and Fourth Aliyoth (immigrations), saw as many as 33,801 Jews entering in one year (1925). The next great wave of immigration came during the Fifth Aliyah (1930-36), reaching its height with the entry of 61,854 Jews in 1935. The successive British restrictions against immigration thereafter diminished the number of annual entries. In 1940 but 4,547 were legally recorded as entering the country, while 3,448 non-certificated Jewish refugees came in; in 1941 the figure for certificated immigrants was 4,113, with an additional 1,187 refugees without certificates. A special program providing for the immigration of children from Europe, known as Youth Aliyah, was carried on. In America it was sponsored by Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization.

In the period between 1935 and 1939 a total of 204,077 Jews entered the country. The countries of origin of those entering Palestine were as follows: between 1919 and 1940, 44 per cent of the Jewish immigrants came from Poland, 13 per cent from Germany, 10 per cent from Russia, 5 per cent from Roumania, 3 per cent from Lithuania and Yemen, and 2 per cent each from Greece, the United States, Austria and Czechoslovakia.

b. Immigration Restrictions. Adopting the policy of economic absorptive capacity set during the administration of Herbert Samuel, the authorities issued a limited number of immigration certificates annually. These were granted to the Jewish Agency for distribution to immigrants in the labor class. Most of those entering the country on labor certificates had previously undergone a process of preparatory training (Hachsharah) in the Diaspora, fitting them for agriculture or such other pursuits as they would be called upon to follow. During the early period there was no restriction on the entry of "capitalist" immigrants possessing capital of $5,000 or more. The limitation of immigration to Palestine, however, at a time when an increasing number of European refugees were compelled to seek homes, led to numerous attempts to enter the country without official certificates, particularly from 1937 on. From time to time numbers of uncertificated immigrants were apprehended by the British authorities and interned in Palestine, or, on one occasion, turned back to sea.

In 1940 the refugee ship Patria, loaded with 1,771 persons, exploded in Haifa harbor, as the unfortunate passengers were about to be deported to a British colony for the duration of the War. Several hundred men, women and children were drowned, and the remainder were interned for more than a year. At about the same time another vessel, the Atlantic, brought some 1,800 refugees to Palestine. They were interned for a short while and then removed to Mauritius. In March, 1940, another ship, the Darien, brought 800 refugees to Palestine, including the survivors of the Salvador, which had sunk in the Sea of Marmora, with a loss of over 200 lives. All were placed in internment camps. In 1942 the Struma, with 760 refugees aboard, foundered in the Black Sea, after being refused admission to Palestine. All but two were lost.

The futility of immigration restriction from an economic point of view was best pointed out by the Royal Commission, which declared in its report in 1937: "Far from reducing the economic absorptive capacity, immigration increased it. The more immigrants came in, the more work they created for local industries to meet their needs, especially in building; and more work meant more room for immigrants under the labor schedule. Unless, therefore, the Government adopted a more restrictive policy or unless there were some economic or financial setback, there seemed no reason why the rate of immigration should not go on climbing up and up."

4. The Arabs. a. Economic Status. For generations the native Palestinian Arabs lived under the semi-feudal economy in which a few wealthy families owned the land, and hence controlled the lives and destinies of a majority of the population. The estates of the effendis covered vast areas, as much as one-quarter of the area of the country, and one-third of its cultivable land. These enormous land holdings were gradually expanding as the effendis took over the small properties of the insolvent Arab peasants.

Jewish immigration and the large amounts of capital which entered the country simultaneously stimulated improvement in local economic conditions. Selling portions of their land holdings to the Jews, the effendis utilized their newly found wealth in the new economy which was developing, and began to emerge as a modern capitalist class. The fellaheen, the Arab peasants, sought to benefit from the generally improved conditions in the land, and learning from their Jewish neighbors, introduced better methods of intensive cultivation. The rapprochement between Jews and Arabs on the land was paralleled by closer relationship between the people in the towns, as Arab clerks and workers in several fields joined with the Jews in their joint interest in labor conditions. The result generally was to upset the feudal system, promote Arab desire for a higher standard of living and generate a community of interests between Jews and Arabs. It was due only to the machinations of certain Arab leaders, under the influence of Nazi-Fascist activity, that this trend was interrupted.

b. Living Conditions. One-quarter of the Arabs lived in the cities. Their principal centers were the old city of Jerusalem, Jaffa, Haifa, Nablus, Nazareth, Gaza, Tulkarem, Ramleh, Jenin, Acre, Hebron and Beersheba. The majority were farm peasants, living in almost 1,000 villages, and in abject poverty. Following the increase of Jewish population, however, there followed a steady amelioration of Arab conditions. There was a sharp reduction in the death rate, an increase in the birth rate, and a general improvement in health and living conditions. The Arabs published several newspapers, best known of which was Falastin.

In addition to the native Arab population, there were about 60,000 Bedouins, largely nomadic in Palestine.

Following the report of the Shaw Commission (1930), a Resettlement Department was established to provide for cultivators who had been displaced as a result of land purchase. This department was set up principally because it was claimed that Jewish immigration and land purchase were creating a "landless" Arab class. Retroactive claims were permitted as far back as 1920, yet the annual report of the government to the League of Nations in 1935 revealed that only 644 claims had been admitted, of which only 347 actually sought government assistance. Between 1919 and 1938 the Arab population increased by some 400,000 while the Arab population of neighboring states remained static. Various statistics indicating the phenomenal growth in Arab population of Palestine, their increased prosperity, the larger areas they were cultivating, the increase in wages, the improvement in health conditions, all evidenced the material improvements which the Arabs had received as a result of the Jewish settlement in the country; practically the whole of the Arab population increase was in the vicinity of Jewish development. The Jewish population met most of its own budgetary requirements for education, hospitals and other public and quasi-public institutions out of funds provided by Jews; accordingly, the greater part of the government's budget for these items was spent for benefits conferred directly on the Arabs, although the Jews contributed some 70 per cent of the government's income, 4,250,000 pounds for the fiscal year 1941 to 1942.

c. Arab Nationalism. Prior to the first World War there were no political groups or nationalist organizations among the Arabs, almost all of whom acquiesced in Turkish rule. In 1919 the first Conference of Christian Moslem Societies met in Jerusalem, constituting the first National Congress of Palestine Arabs. In the early stages of Arab nationalism, directly after the first World War, the disturbances were little more than mob riots, without defined philosophy or aim. The social interests of the wealthier classes later promoted the development of Palestine Arab nationalism, aided by Arab nationalist forces in surrounding countries, who hoped for the establishment of a pan-Arab federation throughout the Near East. There was never labor or mass Arab participation in this movement in Palestine, however, indicating that it was artificially created and stimulated by special interests.

d. Arab Parties. The leading Arab parties were the National group, under the leadership of the Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini; the more moderate National Defense party, led by the Nashashibi family; the Reform Party, under the leadership of Hussein Khaldi, who at one time joined political hands with the Mufti; and the Istiklal, extremist pan-Arab group, which advocated complete opposition to the British and the Jews.

Chief fomenter of Arab unrest was Haj Amin al-Husseini, who was appointed by Sir Herbert Samuel as Mufti, religious head of the Arabs of Jerusalem, in 1921. Within a few months he was also named president of the Supreme Moslem Council, which gave him leadership of both principal Arab religious and secular bodies, and control of the Waqf, the Moslem religious funds. He held these posts until 1937, utilizing his influence to foster discontent and unrest, until he was deposed from the presidency of the Council by the British authorities. Testifying before the Peel Royal Commission in 1937, he stated that Arabs demanded immediate and complete cessation of all Jewish immigration and the immediate establishment of an independent Arab state in Palestine.

Leading opponent of the Mufti and the Husseini family was the Nashashibi family; its leader, Fakhri Bey Nashashibi, was assassinated in 1942 by a Mufti agent. Openly avowing loyalty to the Axis powers, the Mufti helped to create revolution in Iraq, and when this was put down by the British in 1941, he fled to Berlin, where he found welcome. Other Arab parties and families from time to time battled among themselves for leadership.

e. Unrest and Riots. The first Arab assaults occurred early in 1920. They were confined to Jerusalem, where six Jews were killed, and to the northern boundary adjacent to Syria, where Tel Hai was the object of attack. It was here that Joseph Trumpeldor fell. In May, 1921, more extensive rioting took place in Jaffa and several of the colonies.

Arising out of an immediate dispute regarding the Wailing Wall, major attacks began in Jerusalem and Hebron on August 23, 1929, and spread throughout the country, raging unchecked for several days. When the riots were finally brought under control, 132 Jews were dead. The final series of prolonged disturbances began on April 19, 1936, and continued intermittently for several years. Criticism of the British civil authorities was constant for their failure to halt the lawlessness. In October, 1937, several Arab leaders were arrested and exiled, although the Mufti fled the country and continued his anti-British agitation from Iraq, and then from Germany. Throughout the period of unrest the Jewish colonists defended themselves bravely and successfully against the marauders, but maintained a rigid policy of self-restraint and forbade acts of vengeance and reprisal.

f. Friendly Relations. The disappearance of the Mufti from the Palestine scene and the ultimate stern British repression of the agitators resulted in gradual cessation of disturbances. Italy's entry into the War in 1940, with the consequent closing of Italian institutions which had rendered aid to Arab nationalist leaders, likewise helped pacify the situation. During the second World War there were many instances of Arab-Jewish friendship and cooperation. A special program of Arab relations was pursued by the Histadruth, which published an Arabic weekly, Haqiqat al-Amr, to promote Jewish-Arab friendship.

Jewish leaders constantly stated that there was no desire to dominate the Arabs, and that full civil, legal and religious rights for Arabs would be preserved under a Jewish State. The urgency of the problem of Jewish-Arab friendship and the need for promoting friendly relationship with the Arab masses were perhaps not appreciated during the earlier years of Jewish colonization. Practically all Jewish parties in Palestine soon adopted a program designed to maintain harmonious relationships with the Arabs. The Brith Shalom, however, organized in 1927 to further better understanding with the Arabs, has been criticized on the ground that it is willing to compromise on Zionist principles and accept a Jewish minority status for the sake of such understanding.

Prior to the assumption of power by the Mufti and the stimulation of discontent, Arab leaders had not been hostile to Jewish development of Palestine. Emir Feisal, official spokesman of the Arab peoples at the Paris Peace Conference in 1919, had approved Zionist aspirations in a historic letter which he had addressed to Felix Frankfurter. "Our deputation here in Paris is fully acquainted with the proposals submitted yesterday by the Zionist Organization to the Peace Conference, and we regard them as moderate and proper," he wrote. "We will do our best, insofar as we are concerned, to help their attainment; we will offer the Jews a hearty welcome home." On numerous other occasions Arabs had manifested their goodwill and friendship for the Jews. The Hebrew University was attended by Arab students, and had an Oriental Institute devoted to Arabic scholarship and the teaching of Arabic.

See also: ARABS; HUSSEINI, HAJ AMIN AL-; WAILING WALL.

5. Agriculture and Colonies. The growth of modern Jewish colonization in Palestine is indicated in the following table (a dunam equals 1,000 square metres, or a little less than one-fourth of an acre):

Year	Number of Settlements	Land in Dunams	Population Engaged in Agriculture	General Jewish Population in Agricultural Settlements
1882	6	25,000	400	480
1907	30	320,000	5,000	7,500
1919	45	727,000	7,500	11,900
1931	124	1,058,000	24,723	41,350
1941	263	1,607,000	72,500	145,500

This development was due to the transformation of desert wastes and the vocational restratification of Jews as farmers.

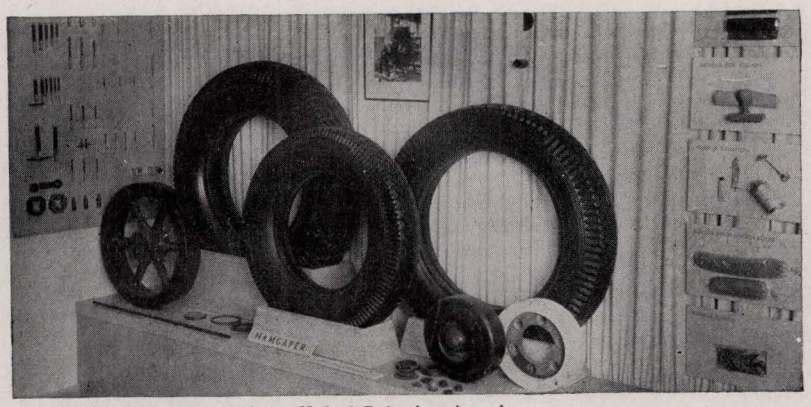
Most of the collective agricultural colonies were organized in three over-all bodies: Hakibbutz Hameuhad, composed of the Labor Party settlements; Kibbutz Artzi, composed of Hashomer Hatzair settlements; and Heber Hakvutzoth. Of the total of 263 settlements in 1941, cooperative and collective settlements accounted for 141; fifty-nine were small-holders' villages, and sixty-three private colonies, mostly interested in citrus.

An outstanding agricultural achievement was the reclamation of the Emek Jezreel (Valley of Jezreel) running from Emek Zebulun, near Haifa, southeasterly across the country. In 1920 it was a deserted and desolate waste, for the most part unfit for human habitation. Through the heroic and self-sacrificing efforts of the Halutzim (pioneers) the area was developed so that it became the garden spot of Palestine. In 1942 there were thirty-six Jewish villages in the Emek, which provided 42 per cent of the Jewish production of cereal crops, 23 per cent of the Jewish egg production, 29 per cent of the milk and 22 per cent of the vegetables, as well as fodder crops and deciduous fruits. The story of the Emek Jezreel is typical of the agricultural development of other sections of the country, Sharon, Judea, Emek Hefer and Emek Zebulun.

Equally important was the effect upon the Jews themselves. Men and women from the cities of the Diaspora, many of them college graduates and professionally trained, undertook the practical agricultural work of Palestine, motivated by an unusual fervor and zeal. Many of them went through a process of Hachsharah (preparation) in the Diaspora to school them for their tasks on the soil, and to steel them for the rigors of a new way of life. The conviction that the restoration of a normal Jewish life required the creation of a Jewish peasantry led these Halutzim to undertake selflessly the most hazardous tasks.

(Left) Water tower in a Keren Hayesod settlement and (inset) night view of a workers' camp; (below) woman apprentice in a carpentry shop in Palestine

(Above) Striped Jersey cloth produced in Palestine with funds for machinery loaned by the Jewish Agency; (right) products of Palestine's industrialization included retread tires for American equipment on the Middle East front in 1942



Illustrations by courtesy of the United Palestine Appeal

a. Scientific Improvement. Though the agricultural beginnings were primitive, in imitation of their Arab neighbors, the Jewish pioneers were not slow to introduce a scientific approach. Leaching of salty soil, adapting strains of crops and trees to native conditions, cross-fertilization for cultivation of hardy native stock, afforestation, all were made part of the agricultural development of the country. Modern agricultural equipment and the latest machinery were introduced. Technical problems were studied at the Agricultural Experiment Station maintained by the Jewish Agency at Rehoboth, as well as in the laboratories of the Hebrew University and the Sieff Research Institute, headed by Chaim Weizmann. Extensive use was also made of systems of irrigation. The lack of sufficient water supply was at first the principal deterrent to agriculture on a large scale. It was believed that only the Maritime Plain, along the seacoast, contained large underground water resources, but borings finally revealed large quantities of water in the western foothills as well as in the eastern part of the country, and elsewhere. Tapping these resources, the pioneers succeeded in promoting fertility in sections which had not seen green growth perhaps since Biblical days. Skillful soil conservation and terracing of the hills also drew the commendation of United States soil experts who visited the country.

b. The Citrus Crop. The major agricultural crop of the country was citrus fruits, oranges, grapefruits and lemons. In the 1913 to 1914 season 910,000 cases of citrus were exported; in 1931 to 1932, 2,470,000 cases; and in 1938 to 1939, prior to the outbreak of the War, more than 15,000,000 cases were exported, to a value of almost 4,500,000 pounds (about $18,000,000).

War conditions, however, the cessation of commercial shipping, and the disappearance of the European market placed the citrus growers in a precarious position, so that by 1940 they were accepting loans from the government to help keep their groves in condition until normal times returned. The full effect of the crisis in the citrus industry may be gauged from the fact that prior to the War the citrus industry accounted for one-third of the value of Palestine's exports. There followed intensive experimentation to utilize the orange crop for other purposes. Some success was met with to the extent that oranges were converted into necessary chemicals, fertilizer, vitamin tablets, marmalades, oils, pectine, alcohol and other products.

c. Food Production. Utilization of scientific methods increased the yield of wheat from 600 to 1,200 pounds per acre. Other important agricultural commodities were barley, bananas, lentils, durrah, tomatoes, sesame, watermelon, grapes and a wide variety of vegetables. Orchards of plums, peaches and apricots were planted. Figs and olives were cultivated mainly by the Arabs. Prior to 1930 the Arabs had more land under citrus cultivation than the Jews, but the large amounts of Jewish capital invested in this field soon brought Jewish citrus acreage above the Arab total. By 1942, however, because of the War, some 15 per cent of the citrus area in Jewish hands was destroyed.

The second World War spurred the cultivation of vegetables and the production of dairy and poultry products, both for the troops as well as for home consumption, and to replace the food stocks which previously had been imported. The year 1942 also saw the first commercial production of beet sugar for home use.

The food production program of the Yishub (the entire Jewish settlement in Palestine) steadily mounted. The vegetable output, which in 1939 amounted to 13,000 tons, had in 1941 attained a total of 30,000 tons, or more than double. Progress in poultry farming is indicated by the fact that in 1940 over 63,000,000 eggs were produced, 3,000,000 more than in the preceding year. In 1941 there were 12,000 dunams of Jewish-owned land under vegetable culture, as compared with 1,200 in 1936. There were more than half a million laying hens in Jewish villages. Milk production rose from 2,000,000 quarts in 1922 to over 41,000,000 quarts in 1941.

Between the two wars Jewish land holdings were also extensively increased, both by the Jewish National Fund and by the PICA (Palestine Jewish Colonization Association), founded by Baron Edmond de Rothschild, as well as by purchase by private individuals.

See also: AGRICULTURE; COLONIES, AGRICULTURAL; JEWISH NATIONAL FUND; PALESTINE FOUNDATION FUND.

6. Cooperatives. Hand in hand with the physical pioneering on the soil there proceeded a program of pioneering in human relationships and social forms which brought Palestine to the forefront in this field. The collective form of settlement, the Kvutza, and the cooperative settlement, the Moshav Ovdim, have been highly developed with a considerable degree of success.

The philosophy of Jewish agricultural settlement is based primarily on the writings of Aaron David Gordon, who expounded the doctrine of the dignity of labor, on the socialist writings of Ber Borochov and Nachman Syrkin, and on the early experimentation in new colonization forms by Franz Oppenheimer. Labor Zionist ideology calls for the establishment of a new form of life, free from the evils of exploitation and unlimited competition.

While the collective and cooperative settlements were the most widely publicized aspects of the new economic system, there was application of these principles to cooperatives in many other fields, with a marked degree of success. The oldest of the cooperatives is Vigneronne, founded in 1896, and engaged in marketing the wines produced by Jewish farmers. Pardess is the oldest and largest citrus-marketing cooperative. Among the cooperative institutions under the direction of the Histadruth Haobedim, the General Federation of Jewish Labor, in 1942 were Solel Boneh, the cooperative building and contracting society, actually the largest building contractor in the country; Shikkun, the cooperative housing authority, which built more than $7,000,000 worth of dwellings for workers; Nachshon, the cooperative engaged in the development of Jewish shipping; Tnuva, the agricultural and dairy marketing cooperative; Hamashbir, a consumers' cooperative; Kupath Holim, a cooperative medical system serving 200,000 persons; Yakhin, an agricultural contracting cooperative; eighty-seven credit cooperatives; and numerous water-supplying groups.

Cooperatives were also to be found in industry, in the field of transportation, and, in short, throughout the economy of the country, with a consequent stabilizing effect on prices and general economic conditions. The cooperatives were regulated by laws passed in 1920 and in 1933, requiring registration and limiting share dividends. There were about 1,000 registered cooperatives in Palestine in 1942, of which 85 per cent were Jewish. The majority of the Arab cooperatives were credit associations.

See also: COLONIES; HISTADRUTH HAOBEDIM.

7. Industry. The peacetime occupational distribution of the Jewish population of Palestine is indicated by the following table, according to estimates of 1939:

OCCUPATION	PERCENTAGE OF JEWS ENGAGED
Agriculture	18.5
Manufacture	18.0
Transport	4.5
Building Construction	7.0
Commerce	11.5
Clerical and Government Service	9.5
Liberal Professions	10.0
Finance	5.0
Domestic Service and the like	7.0
Miscellaneous	5.0
Unproductive and Unemployed	4.0
TOTAL	100.0

Industry first began to flourish about 1933, and received further impetus with the outbreak of the second World War in 1939, and with the consequent burden placed upon the Middle East for the production of materials needed by the large numbers of troops. In 1921 there were but 1,850 industrial establishments in the country, employing a personnel of only 4,750. In 1930 the number had grown only to 2,475, with a personnel of 10,968. By 1933 there were 3,388 plants employing 19,595 persons, and in 1937 a total of 5,606 plants, employing 30,040. In 1941 the value of the output was in excess of $80,000,000, with an invested capital of close to $100,000,000.

Emphasis in Palestine had always been placed on agriculture, and it was no easy task, at first, to encourage the investment of large amounts of capital for the industrial expansion of a country which appeared to have no major industrial possibilities. The lack of vital raw materials appeared to be an insurmountable obstacle, and the insufficient tariff protection afforded local industry proved a further obstacle. The lack of credit, skilled workers and cheap power added to the difficulties. During the period under survey Palestine's unfavorable trade balance was in the ratio of approximately four to one, although it is true that a considerable part of the imports consisted of capital goods, machinery, equipment and the like. In 1935, for example, there were imports of about $90,000,000 as against exports of a little over $20,000,000. In 1936 the figures were $70,000,000 and $18,000,000, respectively. By 1939 the proportion of exports had increased considerably, but the War soon disrupted all foreign commerce.

a. Major Industries. The early industries developed from utilization of agricultural products, or were dependent upon the building boom in the country. Thus two of the best-known plants were the Shemen oil factory and the Nesher cement works. A necessity for industrial expansion of any kind, cheap power, was made available with the founding of the Palestine Electric Corporation, Ltd., which became the largest industrial firm in Palestine. Concessions for operating power plants along the Jordan were granted by the government to Pinchas Rutenberg in 1921, and two years later the company was chartered. It maintained several power stations and furnished electricity not only for industry but also for home consumption and for irrigation and other agricultural uses. In addition to its original hydro-electric development on the Jordan River, the company operated four Diesel-powered stations, two at Haifa and two at Tel-Aviv. In 1941 the company sold more than 100,000,000 kilowatt hours of electricity.

Second in industrial importance was the Palestine Potash Company, organized in 1930 to exploit the chemical resources of the Dead Sea. It has been estimated that this body of water, covering an area of about 400 square miles, contains two billion tons of potassium chloride (metric tons), twenty-two billion tons of magnesium chloride, 980 million tons of magnesium bromide, six billion tons of calcium chloride, and eleven billion tons of sodium chloride. Two large plants were erected on the shores of the Sea, and the industry has proved economically sound. The pioneering process was evolved and developed by M. Novomeysky, who was granted the concession at the Dead Sea and served as managing director of the company. In 1939 the company exported 63,520 tons of potash, an increase of 75 per cent over the exports of the previous year. Because of military requirements the production of potash increased in the following years; the exact export figures, however, remained a military secret. The diamond-cutting industry, transferred to Palestine by refugees from Holland and Belgium, employed about 3,000 workers, and in 1941 processed about $4,000,000 worth of diamonds for both jewelry and industrial purposes, mostly for export to the United States.

b. Maritime Industries. The construction of the port of Tel-Aviv following the Arab strike in Jaffa in 1936 turned the attention of the population seaward, and a Palestine Maritime League was founded, to train men for sea pursuits, and to encourage the establishment of a merchant marine managed and manned by Jews. At Haifa, as well as at Tel-Aviv, large numbers of Jewish dock workers were employed. Of the eleven ships in the Palestine Jewish merchant marine in 1942, nine were requisitioned for service with the British Navy to transport war supplies. Many of the ships, including the Har Zion, flagship of the fleet, were victims of enemy action, but some were replaced by confiscated Italian vessels. In 1938 the Haifa Nautical School was founded to create a body of trained seafaring men. Many of the graduates of the school were called into British naval duty during the War.

The need for making the country self-sustaining in food supplies during the War encouraged fishing not only in the Mediterranean but in artificial pools as well. Twelve colonies were, in 1942, engaged in carp-breeding. Additional assistance to settlements engaged in fish-breeding or lake-fishing was granted by Nachshon, the maritime enterprise. The Jewish Agency Maritime Department likewise aided in the development of this industry, so that in 1940 nearly fifty-six tons of fish were secured, as against thirty-six and a half tons in 1939.

The Jewish Agency established a Raw Materials Institute to explore the potential natural resources of the country. Many of the wild plants of Palestine are of industrial value in connection with the pharmaceutical industry, tanning, oils, perfumery and the like. The possibility of the mining of copper, which was one of Palestine's ancient industries, was under investigation in the Negeb in 1942. Gypsum, asphalt, sulphur and calum were also present in large quantities.

c. Transportation and Communication. Palestine had a direct railroad line running from Kantara in Egypt to Haifa. From the latter point the line ran eastward to Transjordan, and thence north to Damascus. It had connecting links at Lydda, west to Tel-Aviv and Jaffa, and east to Jerusalem. Under the pressure of war needs a 175-mile line was built to Tripoli in the north, thus for the first time connecting Palestine by rail with the standard gauge of Syrian and Turkish lines. In 1939 the railroads carried 746,621 passengers and transported 912,458 tons of freight. There were, in 1940, 234 bus routes in the country, with a total of 1,126 vehicles. The largest concerns were Hamaavir, operating in Tel-Aviv, and Egged, both cooperatives. A number of taxi services operated on interurban routes.

The major airport of the country was at Lydda. Prior to the War it was used by British, Dutch and Egyptian lines for commercial purposes. Under war conditions civil aviation in the country was reduced, and came largely under the control of the military. The Aviron Company, a Jewish concern, was founded in 1936 and maintained several local air routes. In connection with the company an Aeronautics Club was formed, and several gliding groups were organized.

The Palestine Broadcasting Service, operated by the government, was created in 1936. The time on the air was allocated for Hebrew, Arabic and English programs. Broadcasting was under the jurisdiction of the post office department, and all radio set holders were licensed. There were over 50,000 receiving sets in the country in 1942, and about 90 per cent of them were owned by Jews.

Between the time of its establishment in 1920, and 1942, the telephone service set up fifty-five exchanges and in the latter year listed some 20,000 subscribers.

d. Finance. Two large private bodies were engaged in assisting the development of industry in Palestine: the Palestine Corporation, Ltd., an English company, and the Palestine Economic Corporation, of New York city. The funds made available from these and other private sources played a particularly important role in urban commercial and industrial development. The most important banks in the country previous to the War were the Anglo-Palestine Bank, Barclay's Bank, the Ottoman Bank, and the Banco di Roma. The former, a Jewish institution, held about half of all the country's deposits. The largest of the local banks was the Workers' Bank, established by the Histadruth in 1921. In June, 1942, Palestine banks and credit unions held in deposits the record sum of more than 20,000,000 pounds. Local insurance companies, Hassneh, Migdal and Judea, collected about three-quarters of a million dollars a year in premiums, although the bulk of the country's insurance business was placed abroad.

Organized stock exchange dealings first began in 1935, not at a formal exchange, but through the medium of a Securities Clearing House, established with the cooperation of local banks. It dealt mainly in local municipal, industrial and national securities.

Since November 1, 1927, Palestine has had its own currency, the Palestine pound, worth 1,000 mils, and equal to the British pound. Prior to 1927 the Egyptian pound was in use. The currency, like the postage, was inscribed in the three languages, English, Hebrew and Arabic. The Gregorian, Jewish and Mohammedan calendars were likewise all three officially recognized.

e. Law. The legal system of the country was subject to many complications, multiple jurisdictions and intricacies. The basis of the civil law was the Mejelle, the Ottoman Civil Code, which proved to a large degree inadequate for the needs of the growing country. Various orders in council were issued in an attempt to adjust the law of the country to the demands made upon it. A draft Penal Code, a draft dealing with mercantile and company law, and a draft of Civil Wrongs were all based on English law.

The magistrates' courts had jurisdiction over small civil cases and light penal cases. The courts of second instance were the district courts, which took jurisdiction over criminal cases in which the death penalty was not involved, and in larger civil cases. They also served as appeal courts from the magistrates' courts. The highest court was the supreme court of seven judges which heard appeals and took jurisdiction over disputes involving the constitution or the administration of the country. In certain civil cases there was an appeal from the supreme court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London. The presiding judge in each court was British, while the other judges were British, Arab or Jewish. The judges were appointed by the British colonial secretary on nomination and recommendation of the high commissioner or the attorney-general of the land.

In addition to the civil and criminal courts, the religious courts, Moslem, Christian and rabbinical, also had jurisdiction in matters of personal status and enjoyed legal validity. Marriages, for example, required religious validation, and Jewish Palestinians could be legally married or divorced only by the rabbinical courts. The Bedouins were permitted to maintain separate tribal courts of their own.

8. Cultural Life. a. Education. The school network of the Vaad Leumi consisted of 437 educational institutions with a total enrollment of 62,807 pupils in 1942. Other private schools and secondary schools accounted for another 25,000 pupils. About 75 per cent of the education costs were met by the Jews of Palestine, and the remainder came from government grant and from contributions from outside the country. The schools maintained directly by the government were largely attended by Arabs.

The outstanding educational institutions of the country were the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus and the Hebrew Institute of Technology in Haifa. There was a network of elementary schools, both public and private, and of secondary schools, general and specialized. The Herzliah Gymnasium of Tel-Aviv, the Kadoorie Agricultural School, the Beth Sefer Reali and the Mikveh Israel Agricultural School, which was founded in 1869, stand out because of their historic importance. There were numerous Orthodox Yeshivas, particularly in Jerusalem. A number of well-known rabbinic scholars from Poland took up their home in Palestine following the invasion of Poland by the Nazis in 1939, and in many instances brought with them both faculties and students from the famous Polish Yeshivas.

There were a number of libraries in the country, the largest being the Hebrew University Library, with more than 400,000 volumes, the Central Library of the Cultural Department of the Jewish Labor Federation in Tel-Aviv, the library of the École Biblique Archéologique, of the Armenian Patriarchate, and many other small, specialized collections.

b. Music and Art. The Palestine Symphony Orchestra was founded on the initiative of Bronislaw Huberman in December, 1936, with Arturo Toscanini as guest conductor at the opening concert. The Orchestra made many tours in Egypt and Palestine. Many eminent refugee musicians were placed with the Orchestra, which enjoyed a high reputation in musical circles. In Palestine it annually played a complete winter season, and presented additional summer concerts in various communities. Among its guest conductors were Dr. Malcolm Sargent, Pierre Monteux, Eugene Ormandy, Eugene Szenkar, Issay Dobrowen, Hans Steinberg, Georg Szell and Michael Taube.

The Palestine Conservatory of Music annually instructed close to 400 pupils with a staff of almost fifty teachers. Associated with the institution was an Academy of Music for professional musicians. The cooperative Palestine Folk Opera, composed of many refugee musicians and performers, in 1941 entertained before some 70,000 persons. A native Jewish folk music was also in the process of being developed, with its roots in European Hasidic and eastern Arabic tunes. Folk composers from among the Halutzim included such names as Zehera, Sambursky, Shertok and Pugachov. Folk dances were usually adaptations or variations of Russian, Polish, Hungarian, Roumanian and other European folk dances. The Hora was the favorite dance.

Modern Palestine art was inaugurated with the establishment of the Bezalel Art School by Boris Schatz in 1906. The school specialized in craftsmanship and applied arts, published a magazine devoted to arts and crafts, and also maintained an art museum.

Tel-Aviv's modern art museum was founded in 1932 by Meier Dizengoff. The Palestine Art Association, organized in 1928, held frequent exhibitions of the work of local artists. Best-known among these were Hermann Struck, Jakob Steinhardt, Rubin, J. Zaritzki, Paldi, Schmidt, N. Gutman, Elias Newman, Ardon-Bronstein, M. Mokady, Isaak Frankel, S. Obadyohu, Arieh El-Hanam, S. Sebba, Zeev Ben Zvi and Moshe Ziffer, the latter two sculptors. Practically all of Palestine's artists studied art abroad, many of them in Paris, and were largely under the influence of the French school. C. Neiman and Zionah Tager, both native-born women, and graduates of the Bezalel School, likewise studied in Paris.

The theatre in Palestine was virile and creative. The three outstanding groups were: Habimah, originally from Russia, the oldest Hebrew theatre, which came to Palestine in 1928, and presented mostly a general repertoire of serious drama; Ohel, the cooperative workers' theatre, which was founded in 1928 and developed into a genuine product of native creativity, presenting plays of social significance; and Matateh, specializing in satire, presenting witty, topical revues, usually of local authorship.

c. Literature. Book-publishing was a major industry in the country. With names like Bialik, Tchernichowsky and Jacob Cohen on publishers' lists, Palestine Hebrew literature flourished.

Others who contributed to this field included David Shimonovitz, Rachel Blowstein, Jacob Steinberg, Jacob Fichman, Joseph Klausner, Avigdor Hameiri, Judah Burla, Samuel J. Agnon, A. A. Kabak, Uri Zevi Greenberg, Ezekiel Kaufman, Asher Barash, Dov Kimchi, Isaac Lamdan, Simon Halkin, S. Shalom, Abraham Shlunsky, Yaakov Rabinowitz, and Moshe Smilansky. Among the large publishing concerns were Dvir, Stiebel, Mizpah, Am Oved, Omonuth, Schocken, Massadah and Lewin-Epstein. During the second World War, due to shortage of paper and other publication difficulties in Palestine, manuscripts were sent to the United States and published there by the Hebrew Publication Society of Palestine and America. Between the first World War and 1942 about 10,000 titles (including books, brochures, monographs, pamphlets and the like) were published, and exports went to more than fifty countries. Palestine thus assumed a position of primary importance in the world production of Hebrew literature, a place previously held by several countries in Europe. Classics in many tongues were translated into Hebrew and published in Palestine.

There were five Hebrew dailies in Palestine: Davar, a Labor paper; Haaretz, representing a central or liberal point of view; Haboker, organ of the General Zionists Group B (industrialists and plantation owners); Hatzofeh, of the Mizrachi; Hamashkif, a Revisionist paper. The Palestine Post, edited by Gershon Agronsky, was a daily published in English. There were more than fifty weeklies and monthlies. The oldest of the political weeklies was Hapoel Hatzair, founded in 1905, and the organ of the Mapai, the Labor Party. Haolam, founded in 1906, was the official paper of the Zionist Organization. Publications were issued also by independent political and trade organizations, scientific societies, and agricultural and literary groups. Moznayim was a literary monthly, published by the Hebrew Writers' Association of Palestine.

All major world news agencies maintained offices and special correspondents in Palestine. The major sources of news from Palestine were the Jewish Telegraphic Agency and the Palcor News Agency, the latter conducted by the Jewish Agency.

d. Architecture and Town Planning. The new architecture of the country generally followed the modern European style, although there were many buildings which combined the oriental and the modern. Because of the lack of lumber, structural terra cotta, stone and concrete were used; there was a marked tendency to add exterior balconies to buildings. Among the better known examples of modern Palestinian architecture were the Rothschild-Hadassah-Hebrew University Hospital, the Hebrew University buildings, the Jewish Agency Building in Jerusalem, the Rutenberg Power Stations, the Rockefeller Museum of Archaeology, the high commissioner's residence, and various beautiful private dwellings, apartment houses, hospitals and institutions.

In 1920 a Central Town-Planning Commission was established, and local commissions were set up in the various towns. This resulted in a more or less careful control of the expansion of the country. In Tel-Aviv town-planning early lagged behind the rapid growth of the city, although a plan for further development was ultimately adopted and implemented; in Haifa wise zoning laws were responsible for protecting residential areas and for setting aside industrial areas. The colonies developed according to agricultural or defense requirements, many of them adopting the so-called European style, with the homes located in a large circle and the cultivated territory extending out in spoke-wise fashion from the center of the circle. Others adopted the American style, according to which each farm home is located on and surrounded by its own land.

See also: BEZALEL SCHOOL; BIALIK, HAYIM NAHMAN; LITERATURE, HEBREW; SCHATZ, BORIS; TSCHERNICHOWSKY, SAUL.

9. Religion. As the Holy Land for three religious faiths, Palestine occupies a unique position. For Christians all over the world the country is hallowed because Bethlehem was the birthplace of Jesus, and other communities in the land were the scenes of his life, activities and crucifixion. Besides Bethlehem, leading Christian holy spots are the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the Gardens of Gethsemane in Jerusalem. Moslem interest is centered in the Mosque of Omar, located on the site of Solomon's Temple, in Jerusalem. The historic and religious association of the Jewish people with Palestine has been kept fresh in the memory of the Jews throughout the many centuries since the destruction of the Temple. The Wailing Wall in Jerusalem, the only remains of the Temple, continues to be the scene of intense religious devotion, and a revered spot in Jewish tradition. Numerous locations have either religious or historic attraction for Jews more than for others, inasmuch as the whole of the country is bound up with Jewish memories. Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias and Safed are considered the four "holy cities," and particular value is placed on the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem, the Cave of Machpelah, in Hebron, where the Patriarchs were buried, Rachel's Tomb, outside Bethlehem, and the tomb of Rabbi Meir.

Jewish religious traditions are subjected to some extent to modern influences in Palestine which are in many instances reviving the religious forms, or infusing the traditional customs and ceremonies with new meaning, drawn from the pioneering life of the country. This reintegration of ancient Palestinian celebrations into the modern life of the country is most marked in the celebration of the festivals. Purim, traditionally a gay and festive day, has in Palestine taken on once again the characteristics which marked its observance in the Middle Ages. It has all the features of a carnival, with masquerading, processions and colorful public celebration. On Pesach, Shabuoth and Sukkoth, which were of old occasions of pilgrimage to Jerusalem from all over the country, many again take the opportunity to go up to the Holy City. The ancient Palestinian tradition of bringing Bikkurim, or first-fruits, to the Temple on the festival of Shabuoth has likewise revived its meaning in a land where Jews are once more engaged in agriculture, and first-fruits are again available at the time of year when Shabuoth occurs. Public processions and ceremonies are held, and the proceeds of the agricultural "offerings" are contributed to the Jewish National Fund. Hamishah Asar Bishebat, the New Year for Trees, which for centuries was observed as a remote memory, has in Palestine become endowed with renewed meaning as a day of tree-planting. Hanukah, the Feast of Lights, likewise lends itself to appropriate celebration in the very land where the Maccabees made their stand. In many colonies and villages huge electric Menorahs are erected atop the water towers, and the modern lights gleam forth in memory of the exploits of Judah Maccabee and his band of warriors. Lag Beomer is celebrated as an outdoor festival. Even the more radical agricultural communes observe the traditional days in the Jewish religious calendar, although they may have changed the form of their celebration. The traditional Oneg Shabbath on Saturday afternoons has in Palestine become a religious and cultural institution. Revived in communal form by the poet, Hayim Nahman Bialik, it is celebrated in complete harmony with the traditional spirit of the Sabbath. In the Jewish municipalities Saturday is recognized as the official day of rest, and the Jewish festivals and holy days are given official recognition.

In the schools operated by the Vaad Leumi, the Hebrew Bible and Jewish history and literature are basic in the curriculum. The Mizrachi group, exponent of religious Zionism, maintains an autonomous school system in which more intensive Talmudic studies are pursued in consonance with Orthodox tradition. The Agudath Israel, extreme Orthodox body, aloof from the Zionist institutions, emphasizes primarily Orthodox practices. Tiny remnants of the colorful Karaite sect still existed in Jerusalem in 1942.

Conservative Judaism, in the American sense of the

George Wolf

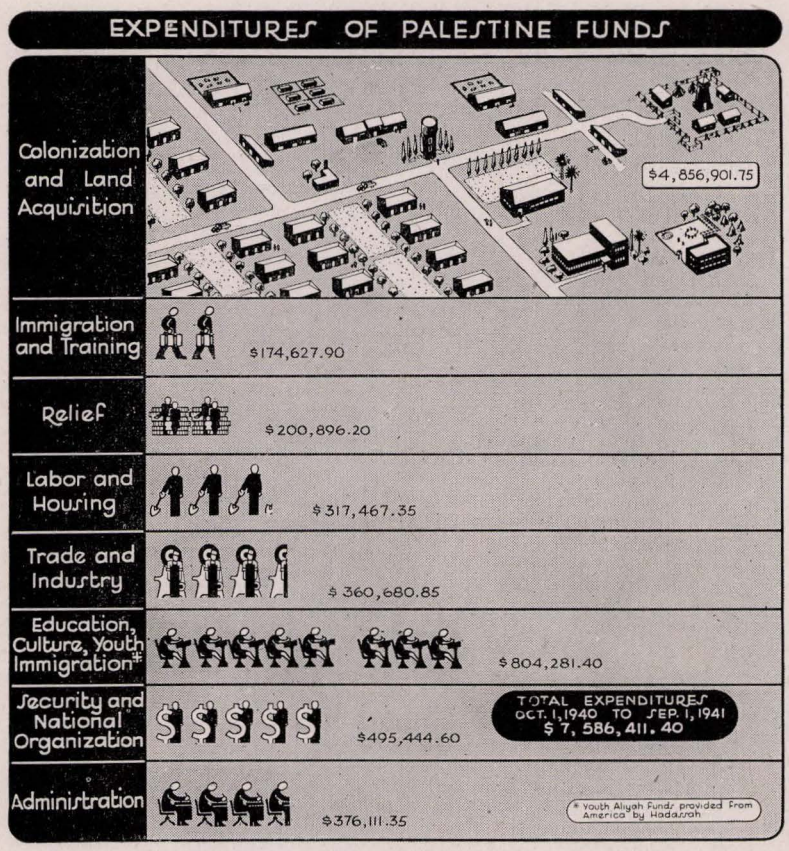

Chart showing the disposition of Palestine funds, as reported in November, 1941

For further illustrations of Palestine see maps and photographs elsewhere in this article, as well as articles listed at the end of this survey (p. 373) word, did not exist. The Jeshurun Synagogue in Jerusalem was housed in the Synagogue Center established by the United Synagogue of America, a Conservative body. Three Liberal Congregations were established in Jerusalem, Haifa and Tel-Aviv respectively, under auspices of the World Union for Progressive Judaism.

Palestinian Jewry is divided into two major historic religious communities, the Ashkenazic and the Sephardic communities, each with its own chief rabbi and religious organizations and institutions. Abraham Isaac Kook was for many years chief rabbi of the Ashkenazic community, and was succeeded in 1936 by Isaac Halevi Herzog. The chief rabbi of the Sephardic community in 1942 was Ben Zion Meier Uziel.

10. Health and Sanitation. The greatest share of the credit for the improvement in Palestine's sanitary and health conditions is due to Hadassah, the women's Zionist Organization of America, which pioneered in this field, and operated a network of hospitals, welfare stations and similar institutions. The health program of more than 70,000 children was under Hadassah supervision. As a result of Hadassah activity, as well as of the Malaria Research Unit founded in 1922 by American Jews and attached to the Palestine Department of Health, malaria was all but eradicated by 1942. In 1921 some 20 per cent of the population of Jerusalem were afflicted; in other parts of the country the proportion ran as high as 50 per cent; but the disease was completely checked. Trachoma, dread eye disease, was likewise brought under control. In 1918 some 40 per cent of the school children of the country suffered from trachoma; in 1942 cases were rare.

In addition to the Hadassah hospitals and to the institutions maintained by the government, the Kupath Holim, the workers' sick fund of the Histadruth, operated its own hospitals and clinics. In 1940 the Kupath Holim spent $1,500,000 on its program, and under its expanded wartime program it made available a reserve of 1,000 extra beds. The Red Magen David, founded in 1930, operated a first aid and emergency ambulance service which rendered effective aid not only in time of emergency, but also for the normal accident demands of the busy metropolitan centers.

Tiberias saw considerable development as a health resort. The mineral springs there were analyzed and found to contain medicinal properties equal to some of the finest spas of Europe. The spot was rapidly developing as a health and vacation resort for many Palestinians, and plans were made for the development of Tiberias as a health center for the entire Near and Middle East area after the War.

See also HADASSAH.

11. The Second World War. Immediately following the outbreak of the second World War in 1939, the Jewish Agency conducted a registration of all Jewish adults in Palestine who were willing to participate in the war effort. A total of 136,000 Jewish men and women signified their intention of serving, and the list was handed to the British authorities. There were delay and procrastination in accepting Jewish volunteers in the armed forces, but finally a limited number were taken, in accordance with a principle whereby an equal number of Arabs would be accepted. Arab enlistments were slow, and the parity principle was eventually dropped. By mid-1942 some 16,000 Palestinian Jews were serving as pioneers, infantrymen, in the Navy, R.A.F., Women's Auxiliary Territorial Service, and in other branches of the service. They participated in operations in France, Ethiopia, Greece, Crete, Syria, and to a large extent in North Africa and Egypt, and were cited for bravery by General Archibald Wavell and others in command. Another 7,000 Jews were in the police and Home Guard, and 17,000 were trained members of A.R.P. squads. Numerous enemy air raids took place, particularly on Haifa and Tel-Aviv.

Repeated requests were made by the Palestine Jewish community, endorsed by Jews and non-Jews in all parts of the world, that Palestine's Jewish manpower be mobilized in a Jewish military force to fight under the high command of the United Nations, and under its own flag and insignia. Negotiations to this effect were conducted with the British Government by Chaim Weizmann, and an agreement in principle was obtained, but permission for the formation of the Jewish fighting force was not forthcoming. Among the reasons advanced were lack of available supplies, fear of antagonizing the Arabs, and technical obstacles.

Palestine Jewry's contribution to the war effort was substantial in other fields as well. Under the impetus of war needs a significant list of industrial commodities which previously had to be transported long distances was produced, including such items as agricultural machinery, oil-burners, steam-boilers, armored cars, automobile accessories, fire extinguishing apparatus, steel helmets, khaki-drill, blankets, uniforms and shoes. Fine precision instruments such as periscopes, gun sights, optical apparatus and machine tools were produced for war needs. During 1941 $16,000,000 worth of products were purchased by the British military forces in Palestine, and in 1942 production in Palestinian war industries nearly doubled.

The pharmaceutical industry received great stimulus as a result of the War, and a number of essential medicines and medicinal preparations were produced in large quantities, including ether, sulfanilamide, histidine, benzoic acid, various vitamin concentrates, insulin, alkaloids and a number of other important natural and synthetic products.

The laboratories of the Hebrew University, of the Daniel Sieff Research Institute at Rehovoth, and other institutions engaged in research on problems vitally affecting the conduct of the War. In short, every element of the Palestine Jewish community, in agriculture and industry, in the schools and in the army camps, furthered the cause of the United Nations.

In a message sent to a mass demonstration in Madison Square Garden in New York city on July 21, 1942, Prime Minister Winston Churchill wrote in part: "The Jews were Hitler's first victims and ever since they have been in the forefront of resistance to Nazi aggression. All over the world Jewish communities have made their contribution to the United Nations cause, and on behalf of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom I welcome your determination to help as gladly as I acknowledge the eager support which the Jews of Palestine above all are already giving." He paid tribute to the Palestinian Jews serving with the British Army and in the various police formations as well as to the "great numbers employed in that front line constituted by pursuits and industries essential for the prosecution of war industries and in various services for civil defense."

And on May 23, 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt wrote to the American Palestine Committee, in part: "The great physical, economic and educational development which has taken place in Palestine in the last two decades has been a perfect example of what can be accomplished by a free people working in a democracy. We are all looking forward to the day when that type of development may be continued in peace and harmony in the general march of mankind toward the accomplishment of the Four Freedoms everywhere in the world."

See also: ACCO; ARABS; BALFOUR DECLARATION; CANAAN; CHINNERETH; COLONIES, AGRICULTURAL; COOPERATIVES; FAUNA OF PALESTINE; FLORA OF PALESTINE; HADASSAH; HAIFA; HALUKKAH; HEBREW UNIVERSITY; HEBRON; HISTADRUTH HAOBEDIM; JAFFA; JERUSALEM; JEWISH AGENCY FOR PALESTINE; JEWISH COMMUNITY AND COMMUNAL ORGANIZATION; JEWISH NATIONAL FUND; JORDAN; PALESTINE ECONOMIC CORPORATION; PALESTINE FOUNDATION FUND; PALESTINE MANDATE; PERIODICALS AND PRESS (under Palestine); POALE ZION; SAFED; SHECHEM; TEL-AVIV; TIBERIAS; TRANSJORDAN; ZIONISM.

CARL ALPERT.

Lit.: De Haas, Jacob, History of Palestine (1934); Bentwich, Norman de Mattos, Palestine (1934); idem, England in Palestine (1932); Jeffries, Joseph M. N., Palestine: The Reality (1939); Revusky, Abraham, Jews in Palestine (2nd ed., 1936); Ruppin, Arthur, The Agricultural Colonization of the Zionist Organization in Palestine (1926); Sereni, Enzo, and Ashery, R. E., Jews and Arabs in Palestine (1936); Granovsky, Abraham, Land Policy in Palestine (1940); Hanna, Paul L., British Policy in Palestine (1942); Melchett, Lord (Henry Mond), Thy Neighbor (1936); Sampter, Jessie, edit., Modern Palestine (1933); Balfour, Lord, Speeches on Zionism (1928); Horowitz, David, and Hinden, Rita, Economic Survey of Palestine (1938); Hyamson, Albert M., The British Consulate in Jerusalem in Relation to the Jews of Palestine 1838-1914 (2 vols., 1939-41); Mann, Jacob, The Jews in Egypt and in Palestine under the Fatimid Caliphs (2 vols., 1920); Simon, Leon, and Stein, L., edit., Awakening Palestine (1923); Boulton, William H., Palestine (1932); Conder, Claude R., and Kitschner, H. H., The Survey of Western Palestine (3 vols., 1881-83); Olmstead, A. T. E., History of Palestine and Syria to the Macedonian Conquest (1931); Rappoport, Angelo S., History of Palestine (1931); Sidebotham, Herbert, Great Britain and Palestine (1937); Ziff, William, The Rape of Palestine (1938); Albright, William F., The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible (1932); idem, "Palestine in the Earliest Historical Period," Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society, vol. 15 (1935) 193-234; Duncan, John G., Digging Up Biblical History: Recent Archaeology in Palestine and Its Bearings on the Old Testament (2 vols., 1931); Glueck, Nelson, "Explorations in Eastern Palestine," American School of Oriental Research Annual, 1934-35, vol. 14, pp. 1-113; vol. 15, pp. 1-202.

Also bulletins and reports of the Jewish Agency for Palestine; files of the New Palestine, of the Palcor News Agency, and of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency; Palestine Gazette (1919 to 1942); the annual reports of the various departments of the Palestinian government; report of the experts submitted to the Joint Palestine Survey Committee; publications of the American Emergency Committee for Zionist Affairs; bulletins of the Economic Research Institute of the Jewish Agency for Palestine (1937-42); Great Britain Colonial Office, Report on Palestine and Transjordan (1920-); Audit Union of the Workers' Agricultural Cooperative Societies Ltd., The Cooperative Villages of Palestine; Jewish Agency for Palestine, The Establishment in Palestine of the Jewish National Home, memorandum submitted to the League of Nations (1929); Palestine Royal Commission Report 1937 (July, 1937); Palestine Economic Corporation (1928-36); Palestine Statistics Office, general monthly bulletins, 1936-; Palnews, Economic Annual of Palestine (1935); Smilansky, Mosheh, Perakim Betoledoth Hayishub (2 vols., 1939); Klein, Samuel, Toledoth Hayishub Hayehudi Beeretz Yisrael (1935); idem, Eretz Yehudah (1939); Basok, Moses, edit., Sefer Hechalutz (1940); Meisler, B., Toledoth Eretz Yisrael; Belkind, Israel, Eretz Yisrael (1927); Ulitzur, Abraham, Hahon Haleumi Ubinyan Haaretz (1939); League of Nations, Mandat pour la Palestine (1922); Abel, Félix M., Géographie de la Palestine (1933-38); Thomsen, Peter, Die Palästina-Literatur (vols. 1 to 5, 1908 to 1938, contain the literature from 1895 to 1934).

The Palestine literature from 333 B.C.E. to 1878 is collected in Röhricht, Bibliotheca geographica Palaestinae; a yearly résumé of the literature in the Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins brings it down to the year 1894-95; this literature includes books and articles in all European languages and in Hebrew, as well as bibliographies, periodicals, catalogues, reviews and annual reports; Nawratzki, Curt, Die jüdische Kolonisation Palästinas (1914); Zimmels, H. J., Erez Israel in der Responsenliteratur des späteren Mittelalters (on the idea of Palestine in Jewish literature); Watzinger, Carl, Denkmäler Palästinas (2 vols., 1933-35); Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, vol. 74 (1930) 44-64; Dalman, Gustaf, Arbeit und Sitte in Palästina (6 vols., 1928-39).

The American Economic Committee for Palestine, organized in 1932, has devoted itself primarily to directing the forces of private initiative for the upbuilding of Palestine. To this end the Committee, through its offices in Palestine and New York, gathered and made available up-to-date and reliable economic information about Palestine to persons possessing the capital and experience necessary for the establishment of industrial, agricultural and commercial enterprises. In all these activities the Committee's principal interest has been the creation of employment opportunities for new immigrants.

On December 31, 1940, the operations of the Tel-Aviv office were suspended. At its New York office the Committee maintains a library and information files on various phases of Palestine's economy—industrial, agricultural and commercial. The library and information files are available to the public. The Committee's services are rendered gratis.

PALESTINE ECONOMIC CORPORATION (PEC), an organization incorporated in Maine (1926), created to merge and continue the social-economic activities in Palestine of the Palestine Cooperative Company, Inc., and of the Reconstruction Committee of the Joint Distribution Committee.

The Palestine Cooperative Company, Inc., had been organized in 1922 by Zionists of the Brandeis-Mack group. Robert Szold was its president. This company was an instrument for giving effect to the practical social-economic program for Palestine development formulated in 1920 by Justice Louis D. Brandeis in the "Zeeland Memorandum." The objective of the program was, in Brandeis' words, "to populate Palestine within a comparatively short time with a preponderating body of manly, self-supporting Jews who will develop into a homogeneous people with high Jewish ideals; will develop and apply there the Jewish spiritual and intellectual ideals; and will ultimately become a self-governing commonwealth." The objects of the company were to enable Jews who could not settle in Palestine to participate in its practical upbuilding and to inaugurate and carry forward in Palestine a series of social-economic activities financed with private capital and directed by experienced men of affairs in accordance with approved business practice. The company operated through two Palestine subsidiaries, namely, Palestine Mortgage and Credit Bank, Ltd., and the Central Bank of Co-operative Institutions in Palestine, Ltd., and administered the Loan Fund of the Joint Distribution Committee.

The Joint Distribution Committee had begun its constructive work in Palestine during the first World War (1914-18). Its post-War Reconstruction Committee, headed by Herbert H. Lehman, had engaged in Palestine in aiding the man of small means. Through its Loan Fund it provided credit to farmers, artisans, workers, small manufacturers, and small merchants unable to secure loans on a commercial basis. Through the Central Bank it participated in the development of Palestine's cooperative movement.

Brandeis wrote to the conference called to consider the merger of the activities of the two groups: ". . . there rests upon the Jews of America the duty of aiding in the upbuilding [of Palestine] by making careful studies of these [economic] opportunities, by necessary capital outlays and by efficient leadership. . . ." Bernard Flexner brought about the merger and became the president of the resulting Palestine Economic Corporation. He was supported and assisted by Felix M. Warburg, who later was chairman of the board of directors. The initial vice-presidents were Herbert H. Lehman, Louis Marshall and Robert Szold. The organizers and initial members of the board included also Jacob Billikopf, Louis E. Kirstein, Samuel C. Lamport, Walter E. Meyer, Julius Simon, Nathan Straus, Jr., and Samuel Untermyer. The assets received from the predecessor bodies plus new capital secured during organization provided PEC with capital resources of about $1,200,000, which subsequently were increased to about $3,500,000.

There has hardly been a major aspect of Palestine's economic development to which PEC has not made a distinctive contribution since its organization. PEC's activities have been twofold: (a) through subsidiaries it has been assisting the person of limited means, particularly the immigrant, to secure an economic foothold; and (b) through participation in specially organized companies, it has been engaging in developing the country's natural resources and basic industries.

The activities of the subsidiaries have been:

COOPERATIVE MOVEMENT. The Central Bank, organized in 1922 to foster and support utilization of cooperative methods, has aided in establishing hundreds of cooperative societies through a continuous educational program designed to inculcate the use of tested cooperative principles and practice and through financial assistance to societies, particularly the younger and weaker ones. The bank played a major role in developing Palestine's extensive, diversified, strong cooperative movement. It has extended loans aggregating about $20,000,000 with losses of less than one-quarter of 1 per cent of the loans issued. Harry Viteles (Jerusalem) was manager of the bank in 1942.

CREDIT. The Loan Corporation, Ltd. (formerly The Loan Bank, Ltd.) continued the loan activities of the Joint Distribution Committee. It granted small loans totalling over $5,000,000. Because commercial interests later performed the functions in which the company pioneered, it was being liquidated in 1942. Morris Frieden (Tel-Aviv) was manager in that year.

HOUSING. The Palestine Mortgage and Credit Bank, Ltd., organized in 1922 to enable the small man, particularly the worker, to build a good low-cost home within his means. It pioneered in and confines its operations to group and standard buildings. By 1942 it had erected and financed some 1,200 homes, of which about 500 were in urban and suburban districts and 700 in agricultural towns and villages. About 400 of the latter comprised agricultural workers' villages wherein house and yard were supplemented by an auxiliary farm. Morris Frieden (Tel-Aviv) was (1942) manager of the bank.

TOWN PLANNING. The Bayside Land Corporation, Ltd., organized in 1928, acquired jointly with the Jewish National Fund a large area of undeveloped land important for the growth of Haifa, the future industrial and commercial center of Palestine. In order to develop the land to greatest advantage, its use for industrial and residential purposes was carefully planned in advance by experienced town-planners. By drainage and amelioration the two owners made thousands of acres available for use. The company has prevented speculation and assured development within the town plan by permitting use of its land only through long-term leases. In addition to preparing its land for construction purposes, the company has erected low-cost houses for sale and rental by low-income families and factory buildings for rental by small manufacturers. Mark Ettinger (Haifa) was manager of the company in 1942.

WATER. Because agricultural settlement in Palestine can be quadrupled by irrigation, Palestine Water Company, Ltd., was organized in 1932 in order, by precept and practice, to uncover new subsurface water resources, to conserve the known water resources, and to utilize the available water supply rationally by establishing and operating economic water supply plants. It introduced and operated modern American well-boring machinery with the result that the areas which formerly had hardly enough water for domestic purposes later had rich wells. It has engaged in geological, hydrological, and geo-physical investigations. By 1942 it had erected and was operating seventeen water plants. Latterly the company has been devoting itself to the establishment of central regional systems, which free the individual farmer from investing his capital in a small plant of his own. Isaac Vilentchuk (Tel-Aviv) was (1942) manager of the company.

As part of its program of furthering the development of the country, PEC has made substantial investments in other large basic enterprises. Among these are Palestine Potash, Ltd., which operates an exclusive concession for exploitation of the chemicals of the Dead Sea, Palestine's richest mineral resource and the world's richest source of raw materials for potash and magnesium metal; Palestine Electric Corporation, Ltd., holder of the concession to generate and distribute electricity for the whole of Palestine outside of Jerusalem; Palestine Hotels, Ltd., owning and operating the King David Hotel in Jerusalem; and the Agricultural Mortgage Company of Palestine, Ltd., which grants long-term credits to Arab and Jewish farmers.

PEC was (1942) the largest American company in Palestine. Its officers and directors in 1942 were: Bernard Flexner, chairman, board of directors; Robert Szold, vice-chairman, board of directors; Julius Simon, president; Benjamin V. Cohen, vice-president; Edward M. M. Warburg, vice-president; Walter E. Meyer, treasurer; Lawrence H. Marks, assistant treasurer; George Backer, Oscar Berman, Jacob Billikopf, David M. Bressler, Israel B. Brodie, F. Julius Fohs; Alvin S. Johnson, Bernhard Kahn, Louis E. Kirstein, Charles J. Liebman, Edward A. Norman, James N. Rosenberg, Fred M. Stein, Nathan Straus, Jr., Leo Wallerstein, Julius Weiss and Samuel Zemurray. Aaron Baroway was secretary. Bernard Flexner (New York) was chief executive officer in 1942, and Julius Simon (Jerusalem) was chief of operations in Palestine. The offices in America and England were headed by Aaron Baroway (New York) and Paul Singer (London), respectively.

AARON BAROWAY.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND, an English society founded in 1864 and registered in London, 1865, for the purpose of systematic research in Palestine. It was responsible for the geographical survey of Western Palestine in 1872-77, also for researches in Eastern Palestine. Since 1890 there have been archaeological excavations at Tell el-Hesi, Jerusalem, Mareshah, Gezer, Beth-Shemesh, Samaria and other towns. In 1914 archaeological explorations were begun in the south of Palestine by Woolley and Lawrence of Arabia, but had to be discontinued during the war. The society maintains a Palestine museum in London, has published a Quarterly Statement since 1869 (now called Palestine Exploration Quarterly) and an annual since 1904. It has published many volumes on the archeological and geographical research of Clermont-Ganneau, Conder, Kitchener, Petrie, Bliss, Macalister, Peters, Mackenzie, Crowfoot and others.

Lit.: Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund (now replaced by the Palestine Exploration Quarterly) and numerous volumes of archeological reports.

PALESTINE FOUNDATION FUND (Keren Hayesod), an organization founded in the United States in the spring of 1921, the late Samuel Untermyer serving as its first president. The express purpose for which the Palestine Foundation Fund was organized was to solicit and accept contributions and pledges of monies to be utilized in "promoting and furthering the religious, cultural, physical, social, economic, agricultural and general welfare of the Jewish settlers and inhabitants in Palestine, now or hereafter resident therein, and to aid, encourage and promote the Jewish life in Palestine."

In carrying out such purposes, the "Eretz Israel, Palestine Foundation Fund, Keren Hayesod, Ltd.," with its head office in Jerusalem, is designated as the agent in the attainment of these objects, and as a general rule, with funds so collected in the United States which are transmitted to Palestine, where they are expended under the authority of the Jewish Agency, the head office of the Keren Hayesod serving as the treasury for the Jewish Agency.

From its inception up to 1942 the Palestine Foundation Fund in the United States forwarded to Palestine the sum of over 4,325,000 Palestinian pounds, or more than $20,000,000. These funds were used in the general development of the Jewish population and various institutions connected with the Jewish Agency and, in fact, with the exception of land purchase—which is the special province of the Jewish National Fund—the Palestine Foundation Fund has been the main agent in carrying out the practical work of the Zionist movement in Palestine, based upon a public appeal for donations and gifts.

Active in the early days of its organization were the well-known Zionists Louis Lipsky, Emanuel Neumann, Bernard A. Rosenblatt, and Morris Rothenberg, as well as the late Abraham Goldberg, Hermann Conheim and Peter J. Schweiter.

Shortly after its organization, the Palestine Foundation Fund succeeded in forwarding close to $2,000,000 to Palestine, and thereafter it remained the primary public institution for Palestine development.

The Fund adopted the policy of utilizing part of its funds for investment in Palestine enterprises. Thus, in the very early days, the first $50,000 collected by the Fund in the United States was forwarded to Palestine as a special fund, which formed the nucleus of the organization of the General Mortgage Bank of Palestine—in 1942 one of the most important institutions in the upbuilding of the country. This was later increased to 50,000 Palestinian pounds. Some time later, the Fund invested 100,000 Palestinian pounds in the Palestine Electric Corporation, known as the Rutenberg Concession. The Palestine Potash Company (the Dead Sea Concession) received some 10,000 Palestinian pounds; the Palestine Agricultural Settlement Association, 137,000 Palestinian pounds; the Marine Trust (Tel-Aviv Port), 25,000; the Palestine Land Development Company, 27,000; Bizur, 20,000; and the Haifa Bay Company, 250,000, besides a smaller sum in the Tiberias Hot Springs Concession.

From 1935 on the Fund was a constituent body of the United Palestine Appeal, and received one-half of all the money raised by that organization for transmission to Palestine.

In the United States, the Fund rendered substantial aid to the Hechalutz Organization, which maintained Jewish cooperative farming settlements in New Jersey, for the training of young men and women for agricultural life in Palestine. It also (1942) maintained the Zionist Archives and Library for the general use of the Zionist Organization and its membership, and for the general public for research work.

After the organization of the Jewish Agency in 1929, the Palestine Foundation Fund was recognized as a general institution for Palestine upbuilding, to which both Zionists and non-Zionists might contribute. The Fund is the recipient of a number of substantial bequests and in the last will and testament of some well-known philanthropists.

In addition to the investments in Palestine institutions, the Fund gave substantial annual subventions to both The Hebrew University, Jerusalem, and the Hebrew Technical School at Haifa, as well as other educational institutions. The Fund is the mainstay of the Hebrew educational system in Palestine, as a result of the payments made to it by the Jewish Agency. In the early days, by far the larger part of the income necessary for the support of Hebrew education in Palestine came from the Palestine Foundation Fund. Gradually, with the economic development of the country, a larger proportion of the support came from the individual tuition fees and subventions from the Vaad Leumi (Jewish National Council). Even today (1942) the contribution from the Palestine Foundation Fund treasury forms a substantial part in the development of Palestine as a Hebrew-speaking community.

The Fund played an extremely important role in the immigration of Jews to Palestine during the score of years between the two World Wars. Suffice it to say that practically all the funds necessary for fostering that immigration which served to transform a Jewish community from 52,000 in 1919 to nearly 600,000 up to 1942 were the result of expenditures through the Palestine Foundation Fund.

Finally, besides some incidental expenditures in subventions for health service, the extremely significant role which Jewish agricultural colonization played in Palestine—particularly with the development of the Kvutzah as a cooperative farming system—must be attributed to the expenditures and investments of the Palestine Foundation Fund in the sum of 3,180,337 Palestine pounds in the last score of years (1922-42). As a result directly of that effort, 125 Jewish settlements were established with a total population of 30,238 upon the land purchased by the Jewish National Fund and developed under the auspices of the Palestine Foundation Fund.

In 1942 the officers of the Palestine Foundation Fund were: Julian W. Mack, honorary chairman; Bernard A. Rosenblatt, chairman, board of directors; Louis E. Levinthal, national chairman; Leon Gellman, Solomon Goldman, Israel Goldstein, Louis Lipsky, Henry Monsky, Mrs. Tamar de Sola Pool, Morris Rothenberg, Abba Hillel Silver, Elihu D. Stone, Jacob Sincoff, Robert Szold, David Wertheim and Stephen S. Wise, co-chairmen; Abraham Goodman, chairman, Finance Committee; Jacob H. Cohen and Abraham L. Liebovitz, treasurers; Herman L. Weisman, secretary.

BERNARD A. ROSENBLATT.

PALESTINE JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION, see JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION; COLONIES, AGRICULTURAL.

PALESTINE MANDATE. The mandates for Palestine, Syria and Iraq, the Arab countries detached from Turkey during the first World War, were allotted by the principal Allied Powers at a conference at San Remo in April, 1920. The Palestine mandate, which included the country now known as Trans-Jordan, was granted to Great Britain, which had been in military occupation of the country since 1917. By the Treaty of Sèvres between the Allies and Turkey, signed on August 10, 1920, a few months after the conference of San Remo, Turkey renounced her sovereignty over Palestine and recognized the mandatory settlement. That treaty, however, was never ratified, and it was not till the ratification of the Treaty of Lausanne in 1924 that Turkey implicitly accepted the mandate.

The mandate instrument itself, which defines the conditions of the trust conferred by the League of Nations on the mandatory for the government of the mandated territory, was drafted by the mandatory power. It was presented to the Council of the League of Nations for its approval at the meeting held at London on July 24, 1922, and after some discussion it was confirmed; but it did not come into legal force until September 29, 1923, because questions had arisen between France and Italy as regards the mandate for Syria, and it was decided that the mandates for the adjoining territories should enter into operation at the same time.

The government of the United States took no part in the final negotiations over the Palestine Mandate, but it had been consulted by Great Britain in the earlier stages, when the draft was under consideration, and its approval was obtained both for the grant of the mandate to Great Britain and for the primary purpose of the instrument, namely, the establishment of a national home in Palestine for the Jewish people. In 1925 a convention was made between the two governments providing that the United States and its nationals should enjoy all the rights and benefits secured under the terms of the mandate to members of the League and their nationals, and that a duplicate of the report made annually by the mandatory to the League should be furnished to the United States.

The Palestine Mandate is of the class of A mandates in which the mandatory is regarded as the guardian of a people not yet able to stand by itself and which is to be trained to self-government. But the special purpose of establishing the Jewish national home makes the terms of that mandate different from all others.

The preamble to the Mandate recites the Balfour Declaration, made on November 2, 1917, and adopted by the Powers, to the effect that "His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people . . . it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country." It goes on to say that "recognition has thereby been given to the historical connection of the Jewish people with Palestine and the grounds for reconstituting their national home in that country." Then it recites the selection of His Britannic Majesty as the mandatory, the formulation of the terms of the Mandate, the acceptance of the Mandate on behalf of the League of Nations by His Majesty, and the confirmation of the Mandate by the Council of the League.

In the Mandate the trust for the Jewish national home is applied in a number of articles which provide, on the one hand, for action by the mandatory to carry out the policy, and on the other hand for action by a public body, the Jewish Agency, which is to be recognized by the mandatory and to cooperate with it to the same end. The mandatory is responsible for placing the country under such political, administrative and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the national home and the development of self-governing institutions, and also for safeguarding the civil and religious rights of all the inhabitants irrespective of race and religion. Again, the mandatory is to facilitate Jewish immigration under suitable conditions, and to encourage, in cooperation with the Jewish Agency, close settlement by Jews on the land, including state lands and waste lands not required for public purposes, while ensuring that the rights and position of the other sections of the population shall not be prejudiced. The mandatory is to enact a nationality law including provisions framed so as to facilitate the acquisition of citizenship by Jews who take up their permanent residence in Palestine; to introduce a land system appropriate to the needs of the country, having regard to the desirability of promoting the close settlement and intensive cultivation of the land; and may arrange with the Jewish Agency to construct or operate upon fair terms any public works, services, and utilities, and to develop any of the natural resources of the country in so far as those matters are not directly undertaken by the administration.

Other articles which carry out the cultural purpose of the national home lay down that English, Arabic, and Hebrew shall be the official languages of Palestine. "Any statement or inscription in Arabic on stamps or money shall be repeated in Hebrew; and any statement, etc., in Hebrew shall be repeated in Arabic." The administration is directed to recognize the holy days of the respective communities as legal days of rest for the members of their communities.

Article 4 recognizes the Jewish Agency as "a public body for the purpose of advising and cooperating with the Administration of Palestine in such economic, social and other matters as may affect the establishment of the Jewish National Home and the interests of the Jewish population in Palestine, and, subject always to the control of the Administration, to assist and take part in the development of the country." At first the Zionist Organization, and later the enlarged Jewish Agency formed at Zurich in 1929 to secure the cooperation of all Jews who were willing to assist in the establishment of the national home, were recognized by the mandatory as the appropriate Jewish Agency under Article 4.

In June, 1922, immediately prior to the confirmation of the Draft Mandate by the League of Nations, the British government issued the Churchill White Paper which was intended by it as an authoritative interpretation of the Balfour Declaration. Its object, in view of the agitation conducted against the Mandate by the leaders of the Palestine Arab community, was to reassure the Arabs with reference to the implications of the Jewish National Home proposal, and to make the position of His Majesty's Government clear to both parties. The Jewish National Home policy was explicitly reaffirmed, but it was emphasized that the government did not contemplate either the creation of a wholly Jewish Palestine or the disappearance or subordination of the Arab population, language or culture in Palestine. It was further stated, however, that in order that the Jewish community in Palestine "should have the best prospect of free development and provide a full opportunity for the Jewish people to display its capacities, it is essential that it should know that it is in Palestine as of right and not of sufferance." With regard to immigration it was provided that for the fulfillment of the Jewish National Home policy, the Jewish community in Palestine should be able to increase its numbers by immigration, but that such immigration should not exceed what might at the time be the economic absorptive capacity of the country.

The terms of the Churchill White Paper were nominally confirmed by the Passfield White Paper, issued by the British Government in 1930 in consequence of the Arab riots of the previous year. The general tenor of the Passfield White Paper was, however, very restrictive of the Jewish National Home effort, and under its terms the Palestine administration was empowered to limit severely Jewish activities under the Mandate as regards both immigration and land purchase. It was emphasized further that the obligations of the mandatory to the Jews and to the Arabs were of equal importance and were reconcilable. The Palestine Royal Commission of 1937, after an exhaustive survey of the whole question, swept away this theory of equality of mandatory obligations when it said: "Unquestionably the primary purpose of the Mandate as expressed in its preamble and its articles is to promote the establishment of the Jewish National Home." The Royal Commission stated further that the definition of the national home contained in the White Paper of 1922 had sometimes been taken to preclude the establishment of a Jewish state. But though the phraseology was clearly intended to conciliate Arab antagonism to the National Home, there was nothing in it to prohibit the ultimate establishment of a Jewish state. Moreover, Churchill himself had told the Commission in evidence that no such prohibition was intended.

The Commission, however, came to the conclusion that in the face of Arab opposition the Mandate had become unworkable, and should be abrogated. It expressed its conviction that the aims of Jews and Arabs could not be reconciled in a single state and, accordingly, proposed a scheme of partition and the setting up of two independent states. This proposal was considered both by Parliament and by the Permanent Mandates Commission, but neither body committed itself clearly in its favor. After an interval of indecision on the part of the government, the scheme was finally shelved. In the meantime, the Mandate continued to operate, but further restrictions on Jewish immigration and Jewish land settlement on the lines recommended by the Royal Commission in the event of the non-implementation of the partition proposals were put into effect.

Matters stood thus when, in May, 1939, following the London Conferences with Jewish and Arab representatives, the Colonial Secretary, Malcolm MacDonald, issued a further White Paper. The new policy there contained virtually announced that the obligation to foster the creation of a Jewish National Home assumed by the British government in the Balfour Declaration and the Mandate had been fulfilled. Jewish immigration henceforth was to be strictly limited and after five years to cease altogether; the purchase of land by Jews was to be prohibited in a large part of Palestine and severely restricted in most of the rest of the country. Palestine was to be prepared for self-government, although complete independence was to be deferred pending the establishment of "such relations between the Arabs and the Jews as would make good government possible." On May 22, 1939, the House of Commons approved the government's proposals, although by a majority of only eighty-seven as compared with its normal majority of over 200. In the following month the White Paper was considered by the Permanent Mandates Commission but was virtually rejected by that body. The Commission decided unanimously that the policy of curtailing Jewish immigration and land purchase was not in accordance with the interpretation which had always been placed on the Mandate by the Mandates Commission, the Council of the League, and by the British government itself. The majority of the members of the Commission found, further, that the very terms of the Mandate and the fundamental intent of its authors precluded any possibility of reinterpretation along the lines of the MacDonald White Paper. The outbreak of war in September, 1939, prevented the submission of the British government's proposals to the Council of the League, thereby leaving in the air the whole question of the legal status of the White Paper policy and indeed of the Palestine Mandate itself.

An important obligation of the mandatory power is to encourage self-governing institutions. But this is fundamentally affected by the provision for the establishment of the national home. Thus the mandatory receives full powers of legislation and administration, and is not required, as in the other A mandates, to set up representative institutions at once. This is because it was obvious that the majority of the population would not be willing to further the trust in the mandate for the Jews. The mandatory has indeed made several efforts to establish a legislative council with an elected element, but these have failed due in the first case to the attitude of the Arabs, and later to that of both Jews and Arabs. The mandatory is also to encourage local autonomy; to this end elected municipal councils have been established in about twenty towns and larger villages, and local councils in other villages and quarters.

The Palestine Mandate contains special provisions arising out of the character of the country as the Holy Land of three faiths. All responsibility in connection with the Holy Places at Jerusalem and elsewhere and with the religious sites and buildings, including the responsibility of preserving existing rights and of securing free access to such places, is assumed, in terms of the Mandate, by the mandatory, with responsibility to the League.

Other articles of the Mandate, which are common to the mandates system generally, provide for complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship, and for no discrimination between the inhabitants on the ground of race, religion and language. It was held by the court in Palestine that this article rendered null a local by-law of Tel-Aviv requiring Jewish shops to be closed on the Sabbath, while allowing non-Jewish shops to be opened. The mandatory may exercise such supervision over religious and charitable bodies as is required for the maintenance of public order; but, subject to that, may not interfere with the enterprises of such bodies or discriminate against any representative on the ground of religion or nationality.

In accordance with another general principle of the mandate system, there must be no discrimination against the nationals of any member of the League, as compared with those of the mandatory, in matters of taxation, commerce, or the exercise of professions or industries. Nor may any preferential tariff be set up, although the administration may conclude a special customs agreement with any state which was part of Asiatic Turkey. The mandatory agrees that any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the mandate which can not be settled by negotiation shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice. In accordance with this provision, the disputes about the concession for the hydro-electric scheme of the Jordan were brought before the Court and decided. The mandatory has also to submit to the Council of the League an annual report as to the measures taken during the year to carry out the directions of the mandate, and to send copies of all laws issued during the year. The report is examined by the Permanent Mandates Commission; and anybody may send to the Commission a petition or memorandum, which is examined at the same time. It is the practice of the Jewish Agency to submit annually a memorandum about the development of the national home.

One other special feature of the Mandate must be mentioned. It concerns the judicial arrangements, and provides that the judicial system shall assure to foreigners as well as to natives a complete guarantee of their rights, and guarantees respect for the personal status of the various peoples and communities and for their religious interests. To this end the mandatory has on the one hand established general courts presided over by British judges whose jurisdiction extends over the whole country and embraces all civil and criminal matters; and has on the other hand provided for special tribunals, of which the religious courts form the most important category. Three groups of religious courts have been provided for, one for each of the main religious communities in Palestine, i.e. Moslem, Christian, and Jewish. The two latter courts have exclusive jurisdiction in matters relating to the personal status of members of their respective communities (i.e. marriages and divorces, alimony, and the confirmation of wills). The Jewish Religious Court has exclusive jurisdiction over the administration and control of charitable endowments constituted according to the religious law of the community.

The Mandate over Palestine includes the territory known as Transjordan, i.e. the country which lies on the eastern side of the Jordan River and the Dead Sea, and includes the Biblical lands of Ammon, Gilead, Moab and Midian. To this territory the Jewish National Home clauses of the Mandate do not apply, and a system of representative government under an Arab emir has been established; but the emir is subject to the advice of representatives of the mandatory in all matters which concern the obligations of the mandate and the principal financial arrangements of the territory. There is at present no Jewish immigration or land settlement in Transjordan.

NORMAN BENTWICH and ARTHUR LOURIE.

Lit.: The Palestine Mandate, No. 3 (1930; published by the League of Nations Association of the United States); Permanent Mandates Commission: Minutes of the Seventeenth Session (1930) and of the Thirty-fifth Session (1938), published by the League of Nations; Bentwich, N., Mandates System (1930); idem, English Legal Yearbook (1929); Margalith, A., The International Mandates (1930); Wright, Phillip, Mandates Under the League of Nations (1930); Andrews, Fannie F., The Holy Land Under Mandate (2 vols., 1931); The Churchill White Paper (1922); The Passfield White Paper (1930); Pic, Paul, Syrie et Palestine (1924); Stoyanovski, J., The Mandate for Palestine (1928); Wedgwood, The Seventh Dominion (1928); Report of the Commission on the Palestine Disturbance of August, 1929 (1930); Bentwich, N., Palestine (1934); Palestine Royal Commission Report (1937); Memorandum submitted by the Jewish Agency for Palestine to the Palestine Royal Commission (1937); The Royal Institute of International Affairs, Great Britain and Palestine 1915-1939 (1939); Akzin, Benjamin, "The Palestine Mandate in Practice," Iowa Law Review, Nov., 1939; Hanna, P. L., British Policy in Palestine (1942).

PALESTINIAN TALMUD, see TALMUD.

PALEY, JOHN (YONAH, JOHANN), Yiddish writer and editor, b. Pleschenitz, province of Minsk, 1871; d. New York city, 1907. He studied in the Yeshiva of Volozhin, later he lived in Libau and Kovno, where he received a secular education. Paley came to New York city in 1888; his first novel, Die Russische Helden, was published in the Folksadvokat, the staff of which Paley joined, and of which he finally became editor. In 1892 he edited the Yiddishe Presse in Philadelphia; in 1894 he was one of the founders and publisher of the Folksvechter in New York. When this paper was sold, Paley joined the staff of the Yiddishes Tageblatt, a post he held until his death by suicide.

Under his direction, the Yiddishes Tageblatt took full advantage of the opportunities for the success of sensational journalism provided by the increase of the Yiddish-reading public in the United States. He guided the newspaper into policies that often verged on the unscrupulous, remaining unchangeable only in his opposition to Socialism. Paley also wrote many novels and some plays; among the novels were Die Schvartze Chevreh, and Yichus un Ferbrechen.

Lit.: Reisen, Z., Lexikon fun der Yiddisher Literatur, Presse un Filologie, vol. 2 (1930), cols. 859-62.

PALEY, JOSEPH MURRAY, law professor, b. New York City, 1892. He was educated at Fordham University Law School. In 1918 he became secretary to the late Benjamin N. Cardozo, who was then judge of the New York State Court of Appeals. Paley remained with Cardozo until 1932, when the latter took his seat on the United States Supreme Court Bench.

Paley was appointed professor of law at St. John's University in Brooklyn, in 1925. He also held a professorship at Brooklyn, N. Y., Law School from 1926 to 1929. He wrote Casebook on the Law of Domestic Relations (1928).

PALEY, WILLIAM SAMUEL, radio executive, b. Chicago, 1901. He was educated at the Universities of Chicago and Pennsylvania, and after his graduation from Pennsylvania in 1922 joined his father, Samuel Paley (b. 1877), in the latter's Congress Cigar Company of Philadelphia, makers of La Palina cigars. Young Paley's business acumen was immediately apparent, and within a brief time, he was made vice-president in charge of advertising and production. When a business trip took him to Europe in 1927, the elder Paley happened to venture into radio advertising for his product, signing a contract with the then infant Columbia Broadcasting Company. The son returned from abroad, observed the effectiveness of radio as a publicity medium, and took the decisive step of buying up the Columbia Broadcasting holdings of the owner, Jerome H. Louchheim of Philadelphia; thus young William Paley became president of Columbia Broadcasting System in 1928. Determinedly he plunged into the venture of building his company up to rival the already well-established National Broadcasting Company. So well did he do that in 1929 Paramount-Publix Corporation bought a half interest in the company from him; three years later Paley repurchased the half interest.

Paley became an innovator in several lines of radio broadcasting. He gave his stations, which increased from a total of nineteen in 1928 to a total of 116 in 1940, free sustaining programs. He emphasized non-profit news programs, presented the School of the Air and the Church of the Air, offered his public choice symphonic music. To discover and train new talent, he set up the Columbia Artists Bureau.

Generally interested in the arts, Paley became director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society and the Museum of Modern Art; he was also elected a director of the New York World's Fair of 1940, and of the Pan-American Airways Corporation.

Lit.: Shumway, Harry Irving, Famous Leaders of Industry, Fourth Series (1936) 265-75.

PALGRAVE (originally COHEN), SIR FRANCIS, historian, b. London, 1788; d. 1861. The son of Meyer Cohen, he was a child prodigy, and at the age of eight translated into French the pseudo-Homeric Battle of the Frogs and Mice, which was printed in 1797. In 1824 he embraced Christianity, assuming his mother-in-law's name, Palgrave, became a lawyer in 1827, but turned to history, and in 1832 published The Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth. In the same year he was knighted, and in 1838 became Deputy Keeper of Her Majesty's Records. In this capacity he published twenty-two historical almanacs, which also contained his most important work, History of Normandy and England (4 vols., 1851-64).

Of his four sons, Francis Turner Palgrave (1824-97), the eldest, professor of poetry at Oxford from 1885 to 1895, achieved fame as the editor of Golden Treasury of English Songs and Lyrics. In 1846 he was assistant private secretary of W. E. Gladstone, then secretary of war and the colonies. Later on, Palgrave served until 1884 in the educational department. William Gifford Palgrave (1826-88) became a Jesuit missionary in India, Syria and Arabia. In 1861 Napoleon III of France sent him to Arabia, where he worked as a Catholic missionary and as a political emissary in favor of France. In 1866, after renouncing Catholicism, he was employed as a diplomat by the British government. He wrote books about his travels, the greatest success among them being Narrative of a Year's Journey Through Central and Eastern Arabia (1865). In 1884, after serving as consul at Trebizond, Manila and Bangkok, he was appointed minister-resident at Montevideo, Uruguay. He finally became a devotee of a polyreligious syncretism. Sir Robert Harry Inglis Palgrave (1827-1919) edited the Dictionary of Political Economy (3 vols., 1894-1914). Sir Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave (1829-1903) was clerk of the House of Commons.

PALITZ, CLARENCE YALE, financier and communal worker, b. Alexandrovsk, Latvia, 1887. Coming to the United States in 1900, he was educated in law and practiced in New York city until 1918. He then became president of the Credit Alliance Corporation; in addition, he was president and vice-president, respectively, of the New Amsterdam Corporation and the Commercial Credit Corporation.

Becoming active in politics, Palitz was elected Democratic member of the New York city Board of Aldermen in 1915. As chairman of the codification committee, he drew up the first Code of Ordinances of New York city in 1917. The establishment of milk stations and play streets for underprivileged children, the designation of one-way streets, the providing of steam heat for tenants from October 15 to April 15 of each year—these were among measures he was instrumental in having the city adopt.

Interested as well in Jewish philanthropy, Palitz helped organize the Jewish Ladies' Day Nursery in 1916. He served as Young Judaea chairman in 1930-31, and was elected a trustee of the Palestine Endowment Fund in 1934. He was also chosen a trustee of the Jewish Social Service Association and, in 1936, of the Lebanon Hospital.

PALLACHE (or PALACHE), SAMUEL, one of the founders of the Amsterdam Jewish community, b.

Morocco, date of birth unknown; d. The Hague, Holland, 1616. As representative of the Sultan of Morocco, at The Hague, in 1591, he actively befriended the Marranos who at that time emigrated in large numbers into Holland, and he sought to induce the municipal council in Middelburg (province of Zeeland) to grant them refuge there and religious freedom; the plan, however, failed, due to the opposition of intolerant reform preachers. Finally, after persistent efforts, he succeeded in having the Marranos accepted into the Netherlands provinces which had won their freedom from the Spanish yoke. After the first Jewish community had been established in Amsterdam by Jacob Tirado in 1596, Pallache undertook its leadership. A personal friend of the governor, Prince Maurice of Orange, he often availed himself of this friendship to the advantage of the Marranos.

Lit.: Koenen, H. J., Geschiedenis der Joden in Nederland (1843) 190; Roth, Cecil, A History of the Marranos (1932) 241-42; Bloom, Herbert I., Economic Activities of the Jews of Amsterdam in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1937) 79-81.

PALLENBERG, MAX, actor, b. Vienna, 1877; d. Karlsbad, Czechoslovakia, 1934. He made his debut in 1897, appearing in small Bohemian theaters. By 1904 he was playing important roles at the Josefstädter theater in Vienna and subsequently at the Kammerspiele in Munich. In 1914 he joined Max Reinhardt and played tragic and comic roles at the Deutsches Theater in Berlin till 1933. He was considered one of the most popular comedians of Germany and at his best in Molière's Miser and The Imaginary Invalid. He was married to the soubrette, Fritzi Massary.

PALLIÈRE, AIMÉ, writer and convert to Judaism, b. Lyon, France, 1875. At times one of the most widely discussed figures in the world of religion, Pallière was born and raised in an atmosphere of intense Catholicism and dedicated to the priesthood. At an early age, however, his attention was drawn to Jewry and Judaism by his visits to the synagogue and by the contemplation of Gustave Doré's illustrations of the Bible. He was twenty when he became a pupil and admirer of Rabbi Elijah Benamozegh of Livorno, with whom he eagerly discussed Judaism. Although, following his teacher's advice ("I want you to know that to be on the side of truth, to be in the grace of our Lord, to belong to the true religion, and—what more should I say?—to be our brother as you wish to be, you need not at all embrace Judaism in a way you intend, that is, to submit to the yoke of our law"), he did not officially renounce Christianity, he devoted himself completely and passionately to Judaism.

He agreed with his master (whose large work, Israel et l'humanité, Étude sur le problème de la religion universelle et sa solution, he edited and furnished with a foreword in 1914) that "mankind can not rise to the essential principles on which society must rest, unless it meets with Israel . . . and Israel can not fathom the deeps of its own national and religious tradition, unless it meet with mankind." In the words of Edmond Fleg, who wrote an introduction to Pallière's autobiographical main work, Le sanctuaire inconnu (1926; English trans., Louise Waterman Wise, The Unknown Sanctuary, 1928), the author "reversed the route by which Catholicism has developed from primitive Christianity and primitive Christianity from Judaism, he became step by step the spiritual contemporary of those great Romans who, at the time of the coming of Christ, were the proselytes of Israel."

Aimé Pallière

While maintaining an appreciative attitude toward the church, Pallière refused to admit that Israel was wrong in continuing its hope of the Messianic advent instead of believing it to have been realized. He discovered Judaism as a true Catholicism which, without excluding the latter, transcends it, insofar as it includes within it, in vital synthesis, all the religious families. Therefore his message is of interest to both Christians and Jews; to the Christians it serves as a reminder of their spiritual origin, and to the Jews it is a call for loyalty to their religious heritage and to their messianic mission.

Pallière propagated his idea in Jewish as well as in Christian circles. He introduced churchmen into Jewish circles to speak under his leadership, and a Catholic publication printed a sermon preached by him in the synagogue. A resident of Paris, he was the founder of a French Jewish periodical, Foi et réveil, and was untiringly active as writer (under the pen-name of Loëtmol) and lecturer for various Jewish communities in France, propagandizing the idea of the Jewish National Home and emphasizing the importance of the Jewish National Fund.

He edited the review Chalom, of Paris. He was the originator and president of the Union Universelle de la Jeunesse Juive and a member of the Central Committee of the Zionist Organization of France. During the first World War he taught at the Paris rabbinical seminary. He was one of the preachers in the synagogue of the French liberal Jewish congregations, known as Le Consistoire Général de France. Pallière lectured in the Free Synagogue and at the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York city.

Besides his autobiography, Le sanctuaire inconnu, in which he described in a stirring manner his inner and external struggles and the different stages in the transformation of his soul which brought him ever closer to Judaism, he published Bergson et le Judaisme (1933), the text of a lecture delivered before the Chema Israel organization on Bergson's book, Les deux sources de la morale et de la religion. Other writings of his include Jerusalem, a Religious Center for Israel and for Humanity (1918); Judaism and Its Distinctive Characteristics (1921); The Jewish Soul and God (1934), a sequel to The Unknown Sanctuary; and The Raised Veil (1937).

After the fall of France (1940) Pallière was reported to have been arrested by the Gestapo. ALFRED WERNER.

Lit.: Prefaces to the various editions of Le sanctuaire inconnu; Lhevinne, Isadore, "The Unknown Sanctuary," American Hebrew, March 23, 1928.

PALM BRANCH, see LULAB.

PALMYRA, Latin name of a city in an oasis of the Syrian desert, situated on the road running north from Damascus. Its Semitic name was Tadmor, and it is now called Tudmur. This fact has led some scholars to identify Palmyra with the Tadmor built by Solomon in the wilderness (II Chron. 8:4). It is more probable, however, that the correct reading is not Tadmor but Tamar, following the consonantal text (Kethib) of I Kings 9:18. This Tamar was a fortress which Solomon built to the south of the Dead Sea in order to protect the southern boundary of Palestine; it is mentioned in Ezek. 47:19; 48:28, and was later called Tamara.

The earliest reference to Palmyra occurs in an inscription of the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser I (about 1100 B.C.E.), who calls it Tadmar. There are references to Palmyrenes in Jerusalem in the last centuries before the destruction of the Temple. Some of them seem to have been proselytes; a certain Miriam of Palmyra is reported as having taken the Nazirite vow (Nazir 6:11), and several ossuaries with Palmyrenian inscriptions and names have been found in the vicinity of Jerusalem. There were many soldiers from Palmyra in the Roman army that captured Jerusalem; hence the Jews most ardently longed for the destruction of Palmyra. The city reached the height of its prosperity in the 3rd cent. C.E. under Odenathus and Zenobia; it was destroyed by Aurelian in 272. Noble ruins still bear witness to the former importance of the city and the advanced state of its culture. Certain inscriptions found there definitely prove that there was a Jewish community in Palmyra.

Lit.: Chabot, Choix des textes de Palmyre (1922); Baedeker, Palestine and Syria; Hastings, James, edit., Dictionary of the Bible, 889, under Tadmor; The New Larned History, vol. 8 (1924) 6426-27; Rosenthal, Franz, Die Sprache der palmyrenischen Inschriften und ihre Stellung innerhalb des Aramäischen (1936); Moss, C., "Jews and Judaism in Palmyra," Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly, vol. 60 (1928) 100-7; Catineau, J., Grammaire du palmyrénien épigraphique (1935).

PÁLYI, EDE, publicist and economist, b. Monostorpályi, Hungary, 1865; in 1942 he was reported to be no longer alive. He studied law and philosophy at the University of Budapest and served as professor at the Commercial Academy of Nagyvárad. In 1900 he founded, in collaboration with baron Dezső Bánffy, a liberal daily newspaper, Magyar Szó (The Magyar Word). Among his philosophical works Metafizika (Metaphysics) and A szabad akaratról (On Free Will) have been translated into German. Pályi embraced Christianity.

He wrote in the German language several works on a Central European federation of states, such as Deutschland und Ungarn and Das mitteleuropäische Weltreichbündniss and after the first World War attempted to outline the foundations of a new moral and economic order in books such as Az új ember erkölcstana (Ethics of the New Man); Magyarország a háború után (Hungary after the War); Az eszményi állam törvénykönyve (Code of Law of an Ideal State); Közgazdaságunk rendezése (Adjustment of our National Economy) and Közgazdaságtan mindenki számára (National Economy for Everybody; 1927).

PAM, HUGO, jurist and Zionist leader, b. Chicago, 1870; d. New York City, 1930. After his admission to the bar in 1893 he joined his elder brother, Max, prominent Chicago lawyer, and they practiced together for many years. In 1911 Hugo Pam was elected to the Superior Court of Cook County; three times re-elected, he served a notable incumbency of two decades, becoming dean of Jewish jurists in Chicago. His decisions on the bench reflected his interest in the philosophy of jurisprudence to which he contributed appreciably. Interested in crime psychology and correction, he was for three years president of the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology. He was also vice-president of the Illinois Society of Mental Hygiene, as well as vice president of the First International Conference on Mental Hygiene. For his general civic and communal work, Pam was recognized and publicly honored by the community of Chicago.

It was, however, to Jewish affairs that Pam was most devoted. He had started his social service early when he joined the workers at the pioneer Maxwell Street Settlement in Chicago; later he was interested in the education program of the Jewish People's Institute of that city. In 1912 he joined the Zionist Organization of America; thereafter, American Zionism became the axis of Pam's activities off the bench.

His reputation grew in local Chicago affairs, and assumed national proportions when he went to the preliminary conference of the American Jewish Congress in Philadelphia, in 1916. He was chosen as permanent chairman of that conference, and showed extraordinary skill in guiding and consolidating the diverse and opposing elements there present. Thenceforth he was a leader in the councils of the Congress.

His directive posts in the Zionist movement were many; he was vice-president of the Zionist Organization of America, and a member of the International Zionist Organization. After the first World War, he went abroad as commissioner for the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society, to study conditions of Jews in Central and Eastern Europe. Pam was Chicago chairman of the First Palestine Restoration Fund, and his talents as a platform speaker brought spectacular results in the various drives and campaigns. He persuaded people to give large sums to the movement, and it was he who prevailed on his brother Max to donate $50,000. He himself contributed generously. With the same oratorical eloquence, he appeared at the Zionist Convention of 1927 to defend the administration of Louis Lipsky.

Pam died on a visit to New York, several months after he had been re-elected to the bench for another six-year term.

Lit.: Meites, Hyman L., History of the Jews in Chicago (1924); Bregstone, Philip P., Chicago and Its Jews (1933) 301-4.

PAM, MAX, lawyer and philanthropist, b. near Carlsbad, Bohemia, 1865; d. New York city, 1925. He was the brother of Hugo Pam, and was educated at Chicago, studying law in a private office. Subsequently, as corporation lawyer, he aided in the organization of such firms as the American Steel and Wire Company (1899); the United States Steel Corporation (1901); the International Harvester Company (1902) and the National Packing Company (1902). During his lifetime, Pam was interested in educational activities; he founded the School of Journalism at Notre Dame University and made substantial contributions to the Catholic University and the Hebrew University.

His will designated the sum of $50,000 for the industrial development of Palestine and also set aside a fund of $350,000 for cultural and welfare work. Of this amount, $150,000 was allocated by the trustees toward the establishment of the Max Pam Metabolism Unit in Michael Reese Hospital in Chicago and $85,000 for the establishment of a chair in comparative law at the University of Chicago.

PAN, TAUBE, German Jewish poetess who lived in Prague at the end of the 16th cent. She composed a poem entitled Ein schönes Lied, neu Gemacht; beloschen Techina ist's worden ausgetracht, which was issued in book form and probably printed in Prague in 1609, by the Gersonides press. In the Judeo-German of the period, the title means: A pretty poem, newly made and put down in the language of the Tehinnah (Supplications).

Lit.: Kayserling, Die Jüdischen Frauen in der Geschichte, Literatur und Kunst (1878) 152; Erik, Max, Geschichte der Jüdischen Literatur (1927).

PANAMA AND CANAL ZONE, a country in Central America, having a population of 467,459 (1930). In 1933 Panama had a Jewish population of about 750, and in 1941 the number of Jews had increased to 1,250.

Jews appear to have settled in Panama, then the department of Panama in the state of Colombia, in about 1850, when the isthmian route to California was in great vogue. Jewish merchants sold provisions and supplies to prospectors and pioneers en route to the west coast of the United States, but the traffic was not sufficiently lucrative to induce them to remain in the unhealthy atmosphere of the isthmus. Panama was also a stopping-off place for Jewish immigrants from Central Europe whose ultimate destination was California. This route was cheaper than the voyage around Cape Horn. However, once the isthmus had been traversed or finances had been replenished by a few weeks' labor, German Jewish immigrants during the second quarter of the 19th cent. were glad to leave the Panama climate behind them.

Yet in 1876 there was a sufficient number of Jews to organize a benevolent society, Kol Shearith Israel, having as its main objectives the maintenance of a burial ground and the care of indigent Jews on the isthmus. When work was begun on the Panama Canal in 1880 by the French, there occurred a large influx of Jews from the West Indies, particularly from the islands of St. Thomas, Jamaica, and Curaçao. These immigrants and a few from the north coast of Africa went into business in Panama and Colon. A brief period of prosperity was followed by depression when the French canal company became bankrupt. At this point many Jewish business men left Panama in search of better trade opportunities; some went to Costa Rica and Salvador, and others to Venezuela and Colombia. When the United States began operations on the construction of the Panama Canal, the Jewish population of Panama again increased.

In 1916 it was estimated that about 300 Jews lived in Panama City, while in the entire republic of Panama the estimated Jewish population was 500. The settlement at Colon numbered about one hundred, while a few Jews had gone inland into Chiriqui province to engage in farming and stockraising. At that date about 25 per cent of the Jewish population were native Panamanians, while Syrian Jews comprised about 15 per cent of the population. The remaining percentage was comprised of English, French, Turkish, American, Prussian, Portuguese, Egyptian, German and Austrian Jews. The native Jews were the most prosperous, owning important commission houses and holdings in the public utilities of the country. Syrian Jews were mainly middle-class dry goods and notions merchants, while Turkish and Egyptian Jews were for the most part peddlers. American and Central European Jews owned hotels, motion picture theatres, furniture stores, haberdasheries and shoe shops. A few Jews had entered the professions.

In 1913 a synagogue was constructed in Colon, while in Panama City there were in 1916 two congregations but no synagogue. In 1942 Kol Shearith Israel was a religious and fraternal society in Panama City, while Sociedad Israelita de Beneficencia was a fraternal society in that community. At Colon, in 1942, Jewish organizations included Kial Kodosh Vanacab, a religious and fraternal group, and Union Israelita. There were refugee committees in these cities. Among the more prominent leaders of the Jewish community were M. D. Cardoze, Joseph Fidanque, Angel DeCastro and J. Julius Sasso.

Bisecting the republic of Panama is the Panama Canal Zone, a strip of land ten miles wide under the control of the United States. In 1940 the Jewish Welfare Board opened a center in Balboa, C. Z., equipped with facilities for religious, educational and athletic activities. There was a refugee committee at Balboa.

EDWARD N. SAVETH.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 22 (1914) 167-68; Ruppin, Arthur, Los Judíos en America del Sur (1938).

PANET, EZEKIEL, chief rabbi of Transylvania, b. Bielitz, Silesia, 1783; d. Gyulafehérvár, Transylvania, 1845. He studied at the Yeshivas of Leipnik and Prague. After his marriage he removed to Poland where he underwent the lasting influence of Hasidism. He was rabbi at Ostrik (from 1807 on), Tarcal, Hungary (from 1813 on) and chief rabbi of the province of Transylvania, with headquarters in Gyulafehérvár, from 1823 on.

It was largely due to Panet that the study of the Talmud became common among the Jews of Transylvania. In addition to his responsa, published under the title Mare Yehezkeel (1875), he wrote commentaries to the Talmud and Shulhan Aruch which are extant in manuscript.

Panet was the ancestor of widespread rabbinic dynasties in Hungary and Roumania. His son HAYIM BEZALEL, rabbi of Tasnád (1803-74), was the author of the Halachic work Derech Yibhor (1894). Another son, MENAHEM MENDEL, rabbi of Dés (Dej), published several volumes of responsa and enjoyed the reputation of a wonder rabbi. His direct descendency was accorded succession rights in the rabbinate of Dés (Dej).

PANIGEL, H. JOSEPH, rabbi, b. Jerusalem, 1882. After studying in various Yeshivas in Palestine, he received his rabbinical diploma in the Seminary at Constantinople, also taking a degree in law at the university in that city. Panigel served first as rabbi in Baghdad, then (1910) he was chosen to represent Palestine Jewry before the Turkish government. In 1919 he was made secretary and councillor of law to the Sephardic Chief Rabbinate in Jerusalem, and subsequently acted as examiner of Hebrew Law at the Hebrew University.

Panigel was in Baghdad for a short time in 1924, establishing Zionist offices there. Later that same year he was made president of the Sephardic Community in Jerusalem. In 1938 he was called to Buenos Aires to head the Sephardic congregation. In Buenos Aires he founded a Talmud Torah which had 500 pupils, and a second Talmud Torah for girls. He also instituted a Beth Din for the Sephardic Jews of Argentina.

PANKEN, JACOB, judge and Socialist leader, b. Kiev, Russia, 1879. He was brought to the United States at the age of eleven, and lived with his family in Connecticut, where his father, who had been a farmer in Russia, tried to establish a Jewish farming colony. Later the family moved to New York, where Jacob Panken worked in pocket-book factories and went to evening school. In 1905 he received his law degree from New York University, and was admitted to the bar the same year. From 1918 to 1928 Panken was a justice of the Municipal Court in New York city; in 1934 he was made a judge of the Domestic Relations Court and in 1942 still held this post.

Socialism and the labor movement attracted Panken early. He organized a leather goods union in 1897; he helped in the establishment of the Workwomen's Trade Union in 1900 and in the formation of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union; in 1902 he was a lecturer for the American Federation of Labor. With his entry into the practice of law, Panken became an even more authoritative figure in the Socialist movement, adherents of which were the objects, not only of political opposition, but of gangster-ruled suppression. Panken was twice wounded by thugs; once he was shot (1904) and once slashed (1906). In the face of these attacks, however, he carried on his organizational work.

Because Socialism remained an opposition movement, Panken was not elected to the many positions for which the Socialists nominated him. He was a candidate for the New York State Assembly (1900), for justice of the New York State Court of Appeals, for United States Senator (1920), for mayor of New York city (1921) and for governor of New York state (1926). Living on and representing the East Side, Panken necessarily was affiliated with the welfare of the foreign-born elements of American citizenry. His association with Jewish movements was almost as long-standing as his work for Socialism.

Panken represented American Socialists at the congresses of the Second International in 1923, 1926, 1928, 1931 and 1933. In the Jewish field he was organizer and vice-president of the People's Relief Committee (1915) and president of the Forward Association (1917-21). He helped create the American ORT and served as its president for many years; he was one of the organizers of the Jewish Conciliation Court in 1920 and its vice-president. In 1925 he made an economic and social survey of the Jews of Europe for the ORT. Panken was the author of Socialism in America (1931) and The Child Speaks (1941).

NATHAN RICARDO.

PANN (originally Pfeffermann), ABEL, painter and draughtsman, b. Kreslavka, Latvia, 1883. The son of a rabbi, he left his native ghetto at the age of eighteen, travelling at great hardship to Odessa, Vienna and subsequently Paris, where, with the financial aid of Baron Günzburg, he studied under Adolphe William Bouguereau and Henry de Toulouse-Lautrec. He became well known as a brilliant cartoonist, but was also awarded the golden Prix National by the French Académie des Beaux Arts for his painting, Paysanne Slave which, like other of his works, was bought by the Luxembourg Museum in Paris. However, a series of tragic drawings, illustrating the sufferings of the Eastern Jews (which he exhibited under the title of History of a Crime—Fifty Specimens of Atrocities Committed in Poland) was suppressed by the French government.

Abel Pann

In 1913 Pann visited Palestine where he taught at the Bezalel Art School and started his life work, the illustration of the Bible. He returned to Paris in 1914 to gather up his belongings and remove permanently to Palestine. Since the outbreak of the first World War frustrated his plan, he accepted an invitation by the American Federation of Museums and went to the United States. Several of his pictures were bought by the Art Institute of Chicago, and the originals of the series that had been banned by the French censor, were acquired by an American art patron and presented to the National Museum in Jerusalem.

Pann returned to Palestine in 1920 to complete his magnum opus, The Bible in Pictures, contemplated to embrace a series of five hundred pictures when finished. This work was the subject of considerable attention when, on occasion of the 14th Zionist Congress (1925), the first part of the series was exhibited in Vienna.

Executing his work, Pann produced the first colored lithographs ever made in Palestine; he personally performed every stage of the work. He approached the Bible not as a religious document, but as an absorbing story which naturally forced itself into pictures. "What I have tried to do," he declared, "is to present the figures of the Bible as simple human beings, men and women as God has fashioned them, with all their sins and virtues, with all their sorrows and joys. I may say that only one who really knows the Bible and the Jewish tradition, a man who comes out of the very heart of the ghetto, is able to give form and substance to the essence of this extremely rich heritage." Art critics, however, disagree as to the value of his illustrations of the Bible; some claim that Pann is greater as a cartoonist and draughtsman than as a painter.

Other works of his are Nod Hademaoth (The Urn of Tears; 1917), a collection of drawings inspired by pogroms, bought by the National Museum in Jerusalem, and another series of pogrom pictures, In the Name of the Czar (1918).

ALFRED WERNER.

Lit.: Fuerst, Francis C., "Abel Pann," The Studio, vol. 91, pp. 443-44 (1926); Thieme-Becker, Künstler-Lexikon, vol. 26 (1932); Schwarz, Karl, Die Juden in der Kunst (1928); Newman, Elias, Art in Palestine (1939) 86.

PANOFSKY, ERWIN, art historian, b. Hannover, Germany, 1892. He studied at the Universities of Berlin and Munich and received his Ph.D. degree from the University of Freiburg in 1914. From 1921 to 1933 Panofsky was professor of the history of art at Hamburg University. Forced to leave Germany in 1933, Panofsky came to the United States, where (since 1931) he had already been a visiting professor at New York University. Panofsky became a visiting lecturer at Princeton University (1934-35). In 1935 he was appointed professor at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, and in 1942 still held this post.

Panofsky was the author of three separate books, in German, on various aspects of Dürer's art (1915; 1922; 1923); of Deutsche Plastik des 11 bis 13 Jahrhunderts (1924); Idea (1924); Hercules am Scheidewege und andere Antike Bildstoffe (1930). In English his works included: Studies in Iconology (1939); The Codex Huygens and Leonardo da Vinci's Art Theory (1940); Albrecht Dürer (1942). Panofsky was awarded an honorary Ph.D. degree at the University of Utrecht, Holland, in 1936.

PANTHEISM. Pantheism is the identification of the physical universe with God. As a metaphysical doctrine it maintains that God is the sole substance of which the material universe and man are only manifestations. In its fundamental conception that natural phenomena in their vast multiplicity are but manifestations of an absolute substance or being, pantheism has assumed many diverse forms. It is sufficient to point to the earlier systems, such as Brahminism, Stoicism, Neo-Platonism and the like. Sometimes it is pure atheism; more often it is theism.

In modern thought Spinoza's pantheistic doctrine is most striking inasmuch as it is altogether realistic. He held that the being of which every material phenomenon is a manifestation is objective; that is to say, physical nature is identifiable with that being. This form of pantheism was developed into a sort of idealism in the speculations of Fichte, Schelling and Hegel. It became pantheistic transcendentalism, to which Immanuel Kant, in teaching that man can know only the appearance of things and not the things themselves, made the most important contribution.

How it differs from Judaism may be seen if an inquiry is made only into the source and scope of morality. In pantheism the individual, himself free, must recognize the existence of other individuals possessing a like freedom. Relations arise between the individual and the group, and there are found personal limits which these relations create, and thus the idea of morality is developed.

All this sharply contrasts with Jewish doctrine. Judaism posits the existence of a personal God by whose will the world was created. This divine creativeness has never ceased and will continue to eternity. Man, like all other creatures, is under the providence of God and must fulfill a certain destiny. To attain this the moral law has been revealed to man. In the observance of this law man obeys the will of God, and takes part in the divine work of creation.

Since this is the Jewish teaching, it is manifest that pantheistic ideas could find no permanent lodgement in it. Philo and the Alexandrian schools of philosophy left no lasting impression on Jewish thought. Nor did the ideas of certain medieval Jewish philosophers, like Solomon Ibn Gabirol, nor the exponents of the Cabala, with their marked tendencies to identify God with nature, produce greater effect. It is easily seen that Judaism and pantheism are irreconcilable.

CHARLES A. RUBENSTEIN.

PAOLI, BETTY (pseudonym), see GLÜCK, BARBARA ELIZABETH.

PAP, GÉZA, authority on social legislation, b. Szeged, Hungary, 1868. From 1907 on he served the Hungarian state in its bureau for social security and in several ministerial posts. From that year on he edited all ordinances and laws pertaining to the social security of labor.

Pap was the author of the following works: The International Aspects of Workmen's Insurance (London, 1908); A külföldiek betegségi és balesetbiztositása Magyarországon (Insurance Against Sickness and Accident of Foreigners in Hungary, 1910; translated into English and German); Módositott munkásbiztositási törvény (The Modified Law of Workmen's Insurance, 1918). Pap, who embraced Christianity, became under-secretary of state in the Ministry for Social Welfare.

PAP, KÁROLY, author, b. Sopron, Hungary, 1899; in 1942 he was reported to be alive in Hungary. He was the son of the chief rabbi of Sopron, Miksa Pollák. During the first World War, although under military age, he volunteered for the army of his homeland. He published, in 1933, Megszabaditottál a haláltól (Thou Hast Liberated Me from Death), a novel of Biblical background.

In 1935 he wrote Zsidó sebek és bűnök (Jewish Wounds and Sins), philosophical essays on the history of the Jewish people, and, in 1938, the first part of Azarel, an autobiography. Pap's literary output was slight in volume but great in power and of distinctive quality. His sincerity and ardor in dealing with his problem as a human being, and as a Jew, revealed him to be a spiritual descendant of the Jewish prophets.

PAPA (often called Rab Papa), Babylonian Amora of the fifth generation, b. about 300; d. 375. He may be identical with Papa bar Hanan (Keth. 40b). His teachers were Abaye and Raba. He came from a family of wealth, which he increased by the brewing of beer from dates and the sale of poppy seeds (Ber. 44a; Git. 73a). His fellow student Huna ben Joshua was such a close friend of Papa that they never parted even for a journey. After the death of Raba, the two friends founded an academy at Naresh, which Papa conducted. Papa's teaching was criticized because he merely presented the opposing views in Halachic disputes, without stating his decision. Accordingly, the former pupils of Raba came to hear the discourses of Papa, they were dissatisfied with them, and Simai bar Ashi frequently discomfited Papa in their discussions. In the field of Haggadah, Papa loved to cite popular sayings, which he compared to passages in the Bible and even used as arguments to prove his points (Ber. 59a; Hul. 58b).

Transcript of a Papal Bull issued (1247) by Pope Innocent IV in refutation of the blood accusation against the Jews

Lit.: Bader, G., The Jewish Spiritual Heroes, vol. 3 (1940) 166-69.

PÁPA, city in Hungary, with 2,700 Jews in a total population of 21,000. Founded in 1749, the Jewish community of Pápa developed under a charter granted by Count Pál Esterházy. The community paid (1790 to 1850) an annual toleration tax to the King of Hungary. Pápa had a number of outstanding rabbis: Wolf Rapoport (1781-1837) was a noted Talmudic authority; Feibel Horowitz, the great orator of his day (d. 1845), submitted to the rabbinical convention at Paks, called by himself in 1844, a plan for the hierarchical organization of the Hungarian Jewish community. His successor, Lipót Löw (1846-50), dedicated a new synagogue. His attempt at reform met with violent opposition from the community and he left Pápa in 1850. Another effort by a progressive-minded group to form a community under the rabbinate of Mór Klein (1876-80), translator into Hungarian of Maimonides' More Nebuchim, succeeded only temporarily. Pápa remained a stronghold of Orthodoxy which, in its famous Yeshiva, educated many a scholar, among them Samuel Klein and Samuel Krausz. Solomon Breuer was called from the rabbinate of Pápa (in 1883) to succeed Samson Raphael Hirsch in the Frankfurter Israelitische Religionsgesellschaft.

Rabbi A. M. Roth of Pápa, at the beginning of the 20th cent., was the first among Orthodox rabbis in Hungary to advocate Zionism. He was also author of the pamphlet: Der Zionismus vom Standpunkte der jüdischen Orthodoxie. Rabbi Samuel Gottlieb, a saintly scholar, died after one year in office at Pápa (1927-28), but his influence on the community was a lasting one. In 1931 his son-in-law, Rabbi Jakab Haberfeld, ws inducted; he was still in office in 1941. A Hasidic group followed the spiritual leadership of Rabbi Jakab Grünwald whose lectures were attended by more than 100 students. The community maintained numerous institutions of charity and Talmudic learning.

PAPACY, see POPES.

PAPAL BULLS, solemn special edicts of the popes (properly, the seal castings or the document covers respectively), cited according to the initial words. The following bulls of importance for the Jews may be mentioned:

1. Sicut Judaeis non, issued by Calixtus II about 1120 and later confirmed by Eugene III, Innocent III, Honorius III, and other popes, with some changes, which forbade every assault on the life and property of the Jews;
2. Etsi Judaeorum, an edict of tolerance issued by Gregory IX for France in 1233, Sufficere detexerat for Germany in the same year, which recommended to the Christians that they treat the Jews exactly as they themselves would like to be treated in other lands;
3. Impia Gens, issued in 1244 by Innocent IV, which commanded that the Talmud be burned;
4. Divina justitia nequaquam, Lacrimabilem Judaeorum Allemaniae, issued by Innocent IV, and other decrees of the year 1247 forbade every kind of blood accusation;
5. Turbato Corde, issued in 1267 by Clement IV, which authorized the Inquisition in Spain to persecute those Jews who were guilty of heresy;
6. Sicut Judaeis, a confirmation of the protective document of 1. above, issued in 1272 by Gregory X, likewise against the blood accusation;
7. Etsi doctoribus gentium, issued in 1415 by Benedict XIII against the Talmud;
8. Quamvis potius, a confirmation of the privileges of the Jews in Germany, Savoy, and Breese (now the French department of Ain), issued by Martin V in 1418;
9. Licet Judaeorum omnium, issued in 1421 by Martin V against the forcible baptism of minors;
10. Quamquam Judaei, a letter of protection issued by Martin V in 1429;
11. Licet Judaei, issued in 1540 by Paul III against the blood accusation;
12. Summi Dei nostri providentiam, issued by the Roman Inquisition by order of Pope Julius III in 1553, which decreed the burning of the Talmud and the confiscation of books;
13. Cum nimis absurdum, issued in 1555 by Paul IV, which prescribed the most stringent measures, and the establishment of the ghetto for the Jews;
14. Hebraeorum Gens, an edict of expulsion issued by Pius V in 1569;
15. Sancta mater ecclesia, issued in 1584 by Gregory XIII, which compelled the Jews to attend church services.
16. Cum superioribus mensibus, issued by Clement VIII in 1593 concerning the commerce and the residential right of the Jews in papal territory;
17. Postremo mense, issued in 1747 by Benedict XIV, which permitted the forcible baptism of Jewish children.

See POPES. JACQUES GOLDBERG.

Lit.: Vogelstein-Rieger, Geschichte der Juden in Rom, vols. 1-2; Stern, Urkundliche Beiträge über die Stellung der Päpste zu den Juden (1893-95).

PAPERNA, ABRAHAM JACOB, educator and Hebrew literary critic, b. Kopyl, province of Minsk, Russia, 1840; d. Odessa, 1918. He studied to be a rabbi and graduated from the rabbinical school at Vilna in 1867, after which he served as teacher in Zakroczyn and as principal of the school for Jewish children at Plotzk. He began to publish Hebrew poems in 1863, but his chief contribution was in the field of literary criticism. His Kankan Hadash Male Yashan (A New Vessel Full of Old Wine; in Hakarmel, 1867, and reprinted Vilna, 1868) is a plea for better Hebrew literature. He criticizes the methods of writing prevalent at the time, such as self-laudation, letters of commendation, redundancy and triteness of style, while at the same time he holds up certain authors for praise because of their brevity and exactness. In the following year his criticism of Abraham Dob Lebensohn brought upon him a storm of condemnation, and this antagonism disgusted Paperna and silenced his criticism for over twenty years, during which period he wrote Hebrew and Russian text-books. In his old age he returned to writing with literary essays and memoirs.

Lit.: Klausner, Yotzerim Ubonim, vol. 1 (1925) 71-79; Waxman, M., A History of Jewish Literature, vol. 3 (1936) 321-23.

PAPPENHEIM, a Jewish family of Pozsony (Pressburg), Hungary, and Vienna, whose members played a prominent part in Jewish communal endeavor. The first WOLF PAPPENHEIM (1776-1846) inherited a large fortune and lavishly supported the Yeshiva of Rabbi Moses Sofer (Hatham Sofer) at Pozsony. KÁLMÁN PAPPENHEIM (1816-1869), one of the leaders of the Orthodox Jewry of Hungary, planned the establishment of an Orthodox rabbinical seminary at Pozsony under the direction of Rabbi Israel Hildesheimer; his plan failed due to the opposition of the Hasidic rabbis. WOLF PAPPENHEIM, second (1848-1938), was head of the Vienna central bureau of the Agudath Israel World Organization. He and his sons contributed considerable funds for the promotion of that organization and its publication, Jüdische Presse. WILHELM PAPPENHEIM, a brother of BERTHA PAPPENHEIM, member of the board of the Jewish community of Vienna, owned one of the most complete social science libraries in Central Europe. ISIDOR PAPPENHEIM, a son of Wolf Pappenheim second, was president of the national organization of the Orthodox Jewish communities of Czechoslovakia.

PAPPENHEIM, BERTHA, feminist leader and writer, b. Vienna, 1859; d. Neu-Isenburg, Germany, 1936. A descendant of Glückel of Hameln, whose memoirs she translated from Yiddish into German, she took part in the social and pedagogic activities of the feminist movement and organized the Jewish feminist movement in Germany. In 1881 she came to Frankfort, where for twelve years she headed an orphan home for girls. While a member of the welfare board of the city she organized (1902) the social work of Jewish women. In connection with the International Women's Congress in Berlin, she founded (1904) the national Jüdischer Frauenbund, whose president she was for twenty years.

Bertha Pappenheim

On various occasions, between 1902 and 1935, she undertook journeys to the Balkans, Palestine, Galicia, Russia and Poland. She participated in efforts to combat the white slave traffic, and in the activities for aid to the Eastern European Jews. Her pamphlets on the situation of the Jews in Galicia (1900 and 1904) and her travel letters, which were edited in two volumes under the title of Sysiphus-Arbeit (Leipzig 1924 and 1929), give an account of these activities.

Her interest in problems of delinquent girls led her (1907) to found a home for unmarried mothers and homeless children, the Heim des Jüdischen Frauenbundes, at Neu-Isenburg, whose director she became. During the first World War (1916) she made an appeal for centralization of Jewish social work in Germany, which led to the establishment of the Zentralwohlfahrtsstelle der Deutschen Juden (1917). In 1922 she founded the Arbeitsgemeinschaft zur Bekämpfung der Tuberkulose unter den Juden in Frankfort, and after 1933 she was active in furthering the emigration of Jewish children from Germany.

Bertha Pappenheim translated both the Maaseh-Buch from Judeo-German into German under the title Allerlei Geschichten (Frankfort, 1929) and the Tzeenah Ureenah (Tzenah Ureenah) by Jacob ben Isaac Ashkenazi, under the title of Frauenbibel (vol. 1, Frankfort, 1934). Her Harte Kämpfe (Frankfort, 1923) reveals impressions of her travels and her religious attitude.

Lit.: Zeitschrift für jüdische Wohlfahrtspflege (published by the Zentralwohlfahrtspflege der Deutschen Juden), vol. 1, No. 2 (1929); Bertha Pappenheim zum 70. Geburtstag; Blätter des Jüdischen Frauenbundes, vol. 12, Nos. 7 and 8, July-Aug., 1936, special issues: Bertha Pappenheim zum Gedächtnis.

PAPPENHEIM, SAMUEL MORITZ, physician, b. Breslau, 1811; d. 1882. He distinguished himself in the field of physiology and anatomy. In 1847 he was awarded the Grand Prize by the Académie des Sciences for a dissertation on the genital organs of the rotifera. In 1849 he went to America, where he remained lost for ten years, finally reappearing in Havana, very ill with yellow fever. He returned to Breslau in 1859 and settled in Berlin in 1861. Here he lived in miserable circumstances until his death.

Pappenheim's books include: Zur Kenntnis der Verdauung in gesundem und krankem Zustande (1839); Die specielle Gewebelehre des Gehörorgans nach Natur, Entwicklung und Krankheit (1840); Die specielle Gewebelehre des Auges mit Rücksicht auf Entwicklungsgeschichte und Augenpraxis (1842). Although Pappenheim suffered for a while from a mental disorder, he recovered in 1845 and went to Paris.

PAPPENHEIM, SOLOMON, German writer and scholar, b. Zulz (Silesia), 1740, d. Breslau, 1814. He was an outstanding personality among the earlier German Haskalah. Pappenheim was the author of a comprehensive work on Hebrew synonyms, Yerioth Shelomoh, in four parts, only the first three of which were published (1784-1811). His elegiac poem, Agadath Arba Kosoth (Breslau, 1790), was written in the style of Edward Young's Night Thoughts.

Pappenheim also wrote numerous works on religious questions, among them three favoring the practice of early burial among the Jews, and one directed against David Friedländer, entitled Freymüthige Erklärung uber die erst jüngste regegewordene Kritik des Gottesdienstes der Juden und deren Erziehung den Jugend (Breslau, 1813). Only the first part of his lexicon, Heshek Shelomoh, was published (Breslau, 1802).

Lit.: Lachower, F., Toledoth Hasafruth Haibrith Hahadashah, vol. 1 (1928) 96-99; Wolfson, Harry Austryn, "Solomon Pappenheim, On Time and Space and his relation to Locke and Kant," Jewish Studies in Memory of Israel Abrahams (1927) 427-40.

PAPPENHEIMER, ALWIN MAX, pathologist, b. New York city, 1878. He received his A.B. degree from Harvard in 1898 and his M.D. degree from Columbia University in 1902. Later he studied in various European cities. From 1905 to 1911 Pappenheimer was a pathologist at Bellevue Hospital. In 1914 Pappenheimer was made assistant professor at Columbia and in 1923 full professor, a post he still held in 1942. Among Pappenheimer's hospital connections were his membership of the medical board of the Presbyterian Hospital.

He made more than 100 contributions to pathological study. During the first World War he served, first as captain, then as major, in the United States Medical Corps; in 1917 and 1918 he was director of the laboratory at a Base Hospital and in 1918 he was a member of the Trench Fever Commission. For his work on the Commission, Pappenheimer was cited by General John J. Pershing.

Lit.: Kagan, Solomon R., Jewish Contributions to Medicine in America (1939) 301, 511, 726.

PAPPENHEIMER, ISRAEL HIRSCH, champion of the emancipation of the Jews in Bavaria, d. Munich, 1837. He was for many years president of the Jewish Munich community and labored diligently to secure civic equality of the Jews. It was he who, in 1827, handed to the king the petition of the Jews in Bavaria asking for emancipation. Pappenheimer favored the consistory movement with congregational self-government for Jewish communities.

Lit.: Henle, Über die Verfassung der Juden in Königreich Bayern; Eckstein, Der Kampf der Juden um ihre Emanzipation in Bayern.

PAPPUS AND JULIANUS, two brothers of Laodicea in Syria who were arrested by the Roman authorities—probably on a charge of sedition—and condemned to death; from this they were saved by the death of Trajan (117 C.E.). The day of their release was accordingly celebrated annually on Adar 12 and called "Trajan's day" (Megillath Taanith 12). According to another report the brothers had attempted to organize Syrian Jewry to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Scholars are of different opinions as to the historicity of these reports.

Lit.: Graetz, H., Geschichte der Juden, vol. 4, note 14; Derenbourg, Histoire de la Palestine, 493.

PAPYRI. Papyrus was a material used in ancient times for writing and other purposes which was manufactured from the Egyptian papyrus reed. The Septuagint uses the word to translate the Hebrew gome (Job 8:11). While it is reasonable to assume that the Hebrews wrote on papyrus, it is only in Egypt that papyri have to any extent been discovered by archeologists. The oldest papyri of Jewish interest are the Aramaic documents found at Assuan, which are the private papers of a local family descended from Jews who fled from Palestine after the Babylonian conquest of Judah in 586 B.C.E. These Aramaic papyri, belonging to the period 470 to 410 B.C.E., throw light on the economic life and customs of the early Jewish community in Egypt and are extremely important for the study of Biblical Aramaic. There is also a related group of papyri found at Elephantine which, among other things, have brought to light the existence of a Jewish sacrificial cult in a local sanctuary destroyed in 410 B.C.E. Among these papyri is found a fragment of the oldest version of the story of Ahikar. The soil of Palestine is unfavorable for the preservation of papyri, and up to 1942 the only one produced by the hand of a Jew in that country which had been discovered was the Papyrus Nash, containing the Hebrew text of the Ten Commandments and the opening of the Shema (Deut. 6:4-5). The importance of this fragment lies in the comparison of its text with the corresponding portion of the Masoretic Bible and in its preservation of the Hebrew alphabet as it was written in the 2nd cent. B.C.E.

Among the Greek papyri discovered in Egypt there are a considerable number which throw light on Jewish life in that country as well as in Palestine during the Ptolemaic and Roman periods. These papyri provide information regarding the vocations of the Jews, their political status and their relations with their neighbors during a period whose literary sources are quite scanty.

See also: ELEPHANTINE.

Lit.: The Adler Papyri, Elkan Nathan Adler, J. G. Tait, F. M. Heichelheimer and others edit. (1939); Cowley, A., Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C. (1923); Albright, W. F., in Journal of Biblical Literature, vol. 56 (1937) 145-76; Deissmann, A., Light from the Ancient East (1927); Roth, J. M., Greek Papyri Lights on Jewish History (1924); Tscherikower, V., in Mizraim, March-June, 1937, p. 9-90; Loewe, H., "The Petrie Hirschfield Papyri," Journal of Theological Studies, vol. 24 (1923) 126-41.

PARABLES, see MASHAL.

PARADISE. The word paradise is a modification of an old Persian word meaning an enclosure, a park. The Greeks incorporated the word in their language in almost the same form; and a similar use of the word is found in the Bible (Neh. 2:8; Eccl. 2:5; Song of Songs 4:13).

The term paradise, as the generally accepted name in literature for the Garden of Eden in Genesis, is accounted for by the fact that the Septuagint used the Greek word to render gan in its translation of the Bible. Since then, among Jewish as well as among Christian religious writers, paradise became a synonym for the Garden of Eden of Adam and Eve.

Because it was the abode of man in his state of innocence paradise naturally became, in religious speculations about the hereafter, the dwelling place of the righteous after death, even to the extent of describing it along the lines of the original as found in Genesis. Enoch maintains that Paradise still exists somewhere hidden on earth, where Enoch, Elijah and other righteous men now dwell. Here we have the origin of the idea of an earthly paradise which early Christians incorporated in their belief (Luke 23:43). According to the New Testament, this paradise, the old Garden of Eden, is in the far East and is the abode of the departed saints, something like Elysium and the Islands of the Blessed in Greek mythology.

Paradise, as conceived by Jan Brueghel, Sr. From a painting in the National Museum, Budapest

There was, however, in the standard Hebrew writings a more ideal conception of the dwelling place of the righteous after death, namely, a heavenly paradise. The heavenly paradise was an idealization of earthly things suggestive of the system of the ideas of Plato in which everything on earth is a counterpart of an idea in heaven. This heavenly paradise is figurative of what Adam lost; it is the sublime type of which the earthly paradise was only a copy. Indeed, the earthly paradise is said, in rabbinic speculation, to have been transported direct to heaven, immediately after Adam's fall. According to the Talmud, it was created long before the earth was formed. It is not the abode of all the righteous but of certain elect, such as Enoch, Elijah, Moses, and Ezra, who enjoy the fellowship of the Messiah, who awaits there the time for his appearance on earth.

In general, early rabbinic literature reveals the belief that after the Last Judgment the wicked are cast into Gehenna while the righteous are received in the heavenly paradise to behold the glory of God.

The whole idea underlying the belief in a paradise among the Jews has been traced to the primitive Hebrew conception of death. Apparently death brought absolute finality to a man's life, barring all intimation of reward for the good on earth and of punishment for the wicked. Out of the necessity of finding a retributive justice there arose ideas of a life after death where the good are rewarded and the wicked punished. Thus came the idea of immortality.

It is noticeable, however, that there is no distinct thought of retributive justice among the Jews until after the exile. Only then is the hope expressed for a manifestation of divine justice. According to this conception of life after death, all who die first descend to Sheol ("Hades" in the Septuagint), a vast subterranean tomb from which the righteous will be delivered and brought to paradise. This paradise, a restored Eden, is filled with all the delights of the senses. There are streams of milk and honey, trees are laden with diverse fruits and mountains are bedecked with lilies and roses (II Esdras 2:19). Rabbinic imagination here scarcely knew any bounds. One Midrash even furnishes a detailed description of this paradise—dimensions and activities, and the like. On the other hand, those whom divine justice did not raise to paradise remain in Sheol. In this rabbinic representation of Sheol there is a foreshadowing of the Christian idea of purgatory.

See also: FUTURE LIFE; GAN EDEN.

CHARLES A. RUBENSTEIN.

Lit.: Frazer, J. G., Folk Lore in the Old Testament, vol. 1, chap. 2; Langdon, S. H., Mythology of All Races, vol. 5, pp. 183-89; Morgenstern, J., Sources of the Paradise Story; Gaster, M., Hebrew Vision of Hell and Paradise; Kohler, K., Heaven and Hell; Ginzberg, L., Legends of the Jews, vols. 1 and 5.

PARAGUAY, an inland country of South America with a population of about 1,000,000 (1940), including about 2,200 Jews. Jews first came to Paraguay about 1900, and in 1917 there were about 600 Jews of Russian, Turkish, German and French origin. Most of these engaged in commerce, but there were a few physicians and lawyers. There were three synagogues in Paraguay in 1917, two Sephardic and one Ashkenazic. Early Jewish settlement of Paraguay was confined mainly to the city of Asuncion, but in 1942 there were Jews living in Concepcion and Villarica.

There was a small Jewish farming settlement, Colonia Franca, established before 1918. As the result of an agreement between HICEM and the Paraguayan government after the rise of Nazism, Jewish agricultural workers were for a time encouraged to settle in Paraguay. In 1936 non-agriculturist Jews were permitted to enter the country provided that they had a small amount of capital. That this order was later rescinded may be attributed to the anti-Jewish campaign waged by certain sections of the Catholic church and the White Russian colony. In 1937 seventeen Jews of long residence were expelled from Paraguay on the charge that they were communists. The Jewish community was alarmed, but the government made it clear that it planned no measures to hinder the activities of refugee organizations. Because the Jews served loyally in the Chaco war with Bolivia, their popularity increased.

Early in 1938 the Paraguayan government was reported to have been interested in enlisting a Jewish foreign legion to fight for Paraguay should the Chaco dispute recur. This was officially denied. Late that year, however, the government issued a retroactive decree cancelling the visas of 500 refugees who were en route to Paraguay. Despite the confusing barrage of decrees and counter decrees governing the subject of immigration into Paraguay, the Joint Distribution Committee reported that between 1933 and the middle of 1941 about 500 refugees were permitted to enter.

Jewish organizations in Paraguay included La Union Hebraica del Paraguay, La Alianza Israelita Paraguaya, Centro Juventud Israelita, La Macabi, and Womens International Zionist Organization.

Lit.: American Jewish Year Book, vol. 19; Conference on Jewish Relations, Information Bulletin, No. 2; Joint Distribution Committee, Aiding Jews Overseas (1941); Ruppin, Arthur, Los judíos en la America del Sur (1938).

PARAH ("the heifer," i.e. the red heifer), fourth tractate of Toharoth, the sixth division of the Mishnah; it contains twelve chapters and gives the laws dealing with the red heifer, the ashes of which, according to Num. 19, were to be mixed with water and used for ritual sprinklings upon individuals in certain cases of uncleanliness. The tractate deals with such subjects as the proper age of the heifer, as well as of the animal sacrifices over the body of a person found slain (Deut. 21), the defects that make a heifer unfit for the purpose, the mode of slaughtering and the manner in which the carcass is burned, the vessels used for holding the ashes and for the sprinkling, the circumstances that may render the ashes, the sprinkling water, or the persons performing the sprinkling unfit for the purpose, the proper types of water to be used, and the prescriptions about the hyssop which is used for the sprinkling. According to one verse (3:5) the Second Temple still had the ashes from nine red heifers: one prepared by Moses, one by Ezra, two each by Simon the Just and Johanan

(John Hyrcanus), and one each by Eliehoenai the son of Hakkof (cf. Ezra 8:4), Hananel the Egyptian, and Ishmael ben Phabi.

The Tosefta contains many supplementary statements on the subject. No Gemara exists to the tractate.

Lit.: Danby, H., The Mishnah (1933) 697-714; Lauterbach, J. Z., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, p. 520.

PARAH ADUMAH ("red heifer"). The Biblical legislation (Num. 19) describes a special rite of purification to be accomplished in the following manner: A red heifer, three years old, which is without blemish and has never borne a yoke, is to be slaughtered out in the open. Part of the blood is to be sprinkled seven times toward the sanctuary; then the carcass is to be burned, together with cedar-wood, hyssop and scarlet cloth. The ashes are to be collected by a layman in a state of ritual purity and stored in a spot "outside of the camp," to be mingled with running water and sprinkled upon those who are ritually unclean by reason of contact or the near presence of the dead. All those who are connected with the preparation of the ashes or the rite of sprinkling are regarded as ritually unclean and must perform a minor rite of purification.

The laws of the Bible are further discussed in the tractate Parah of the Mishnah. The name Parah Adumah, or Parah, is also given to the Torah division (Parashah) which begins with Num. 19; this is read not only in its proper order in the year, but also on the Sabbath after Purim.

For a critical discussion of the Parah Adumah, see RED HEIFER.

PARALLELISM IN HEBREW POETRY, see POETRY, HEBREW.

PARALLELS BETWEEN THE GOSPELS AND JEWISH TEACHINGS. It is well known that there is a considerable amount of likeness between passages in the New Testament, especially those containing the teaching ascribed to Jesus in the first three Gospels, and passages in the earlier or later Jewish literature of the centuries near to the Common Era. The likeness seldom amounts to verbal identity, but the likeness of thought is often very close, and the words used to express the thought are the same in both literatures, the Jewish and the Christian. Apart from the local coloring of the Gospel story with its Jewish background, the likeness between the teaching there recorded and the Jewish teaching is unmistakable. It is beyond question, therefore, that there must be some relationship between the two bodies of teaching. Chance coincidence can not account for a likeness which can be traced in so many instances.

Jewish and Christian scholars have given much attention to the problem presented by the parallels in the two literatures. The study of it began with the great Hebraists of the 17th cent., such as Lightfoot and Schoettgen; its latest representatives are Strack-Billerbeck and Claude G. Montefiore. The thoroughness of the work spent upon the problem makes it now impossible to deal with it adequately in a single article, even one much longer than the present one. The best course for the present purpose seems to be to present the main facts out of which the problem of parallelism has arisen. A list is given below which contains the most striking and important instances in which a saying ascribed to Jesus can be matched either from the Hebrew Scriptures, the Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphal books or rabbinic literature. The list is probably not exhaustive, because opinions will differ as to whether a suggested parallel is really such. Also, the list contains, on the Christian side, only such alleged teachings of Jesus as are found in the Synoptic Gospels. The Gospel of John is not dealt with, because the whole of it is fundamentally alien to the spirit of Jewish teaching, and the Jesus who is there represented is widely different from the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels.

The whole problem of parallels becomes acute only in reference to the teaching of Jesus. Was he original in what he taught? Was his teaching really of a higher order than the Jewish teaching which it appears to resemble? The list given below contains the chief material on which any answer to these questions must be based; but the discussion of them would need a whole volume, as it has already called forth many volumes. Behind these questions lies the further question as to how there came to be this close likeness between the two bodies of teaching. The answer to this question is not fully or satisfactorily given by alleging that one side borrowed from the other; and so far no more conclusive answer has been given, or, if given, generally accepted. The present writer believes that the clue to the right answer is to be found in the Haggadic teaching of the synagogue, which would furnish a common source for the teaching both of Jesus and of the rabbis, and which may have been, and in the case of one book, Sirach, certainly was, influenced by the teaching found in the Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphal literature. This extra-canonical literature is of great importance for the study of parallels, because it is all or nearly all earlier in date than the time of Jesus. It is off the line of the main development of Judaism represented by the rabbis, but it is none the less of great importance as an illustration of other types of Judaism in the centuries immediately before the rise of Christianity, and especially types with which Christianity had more natural affinity than it had with the severe rabbinic type based upon the Halachah.

The reader is here given the material for the study of the parallels, and some indication of the importance of the problem and the most promising line of approach to it. There is no comprehensive work in which it is fully and adequately dealt with. Montefiore's book, in conjunction with the great commentary on the New Testament by Strack-Billerbeck (in German), will give him abundant help such as he will not find elsewhere. But much still remains for the careful and impartial student to do, before the question suggested by the parallels is satisfactorily answered.

List of Parallels between passages in the Synoptic Gospels giving the teaching of Jesus and passages in the Hebrew Scriptures, the Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, and the rabbinical literature:

Matt. 5:3—"Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."	cf. Ps. 34:2, 6, 17-19 and the Psalms generally when the "meek," "lowly," "humble" or "pious" are spoken of.
"kingdom of Heaven" (God).	A familiar Jewish phrase, found in the Old Testament; cf. Ps. 145:13: "Thy kingdom is a kingdom for all ages"; I Chron. 29:12, "Thou art exalted as head over all"; and especially Dan. 7:14, "His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away." The idea corresponds to the "Theocracy" of Josephus, Against Apion, book 2, sect. 7, and is implied in "the most High, the all King" of Sirach 50:15. It is frequently found in the rabbinical literature, e.g. "the yoke of the kingdom of heaven" ('ol malchuth shamayim), and in the liturgy.

verse 4—"Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted."	cf. Isa. 61:2, "To comfort all that mourn."
verse 5—"Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth."	See on verse 3, and cf. Ps. 37:11, "but the humble shall inherit the land."
verse 6—"Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled."	cf. Isa. 55:1, "Ho, every one that thirsteth"; Sanh. 100a, "Everyone who hungers for (or, because of) the words of Torah in this world, the Holy One, Blessed be He, satisfies him in the world to come."
verse 7—"Blessed be the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy."	cf. Prov. 14:21, "But he that is gracious unto the humble, happy is he"; Sifre 93b, "So long as thou hast mercy on men, they show mercy on thee from heaven" (i.e. God has mercy).
verse 8—"Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God."	cf. Ps. 24:4, "He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart"; Mechilta Ex. 3a, "Enough for Israel that once in thirty days they lift their eyes to their Father in heaven."
verse 9—"Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God."	cf. Prov. 12:20, "to the counsellors of peace is joy." Cf. Aboth 1:12, "Hillel said, 'Be of the disciples of Aaron, one that loves peace, that pursues peace, that loves mankind and brings them nigh to the Torah.' "
"children of God."	cf. Wisdom of Solomon 2:16, "The (righteous man) vaunteth that God is his father"; verse 8, "if he is God's son, he will uphold him"; Jubilees 1:24, "I will be their God and they shall be my children. And they shall all be called children of God."
verse 10—"Blessed are they which have been persecuted for righteousness' sake."	cf. Isa. 50:6-7, "I gave my back to the smiter. . . . For the Lord God will help me; therefore have I not been confounded . . . and I know that I shall not be ashamed"; Wisdom of Solomon 3:1, "The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and no torment shall touch them. . . ."; verse 5, "And having borne a little chastening they shall receive great good" (see the whole passage, verses 1-9); Midrash Lev. 27:5, "God ever seeks the persecuted."
verse 12—"Great is your reward in heaven."	Reward is a commonplace of rabbinic theology, and a logical consequence of the interpretation of the Torah on the lines of Halachah. There is nothing to show that Jesus meant by "reward" anything different from what the rabbis meant by it.
verse 13—"If the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted?"	cf. Bech. 8b, the same words. Probably a popular proverb.
verse 14—"Ye are the light of the world."	cf. Prov. 20:27, "The spirit of man is the lamp of the Lord"; and Midrash Lev. 31:4, "The Holy One said, 'If thou lightest thy lamp, I will light thine.' " verse 16—"Your father which is in heaven."	cf. Ps. 103:13, "Like as a father hath compassion upon his children, so hath the Lord compassion upon them that fear him"; Wisdom of Solomon 2:16 (see verse 9 above). It is admitted by all scholars that the term "Father in Heaven" was in Jewish use before the time of Jesus.
verse 22—"Whosoever is angry with his brother . . . shall be in danger of the judgment."	cf. Lev. 19:17, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart"; Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Gad 5:5, "Fearing lest he should offend the Lord, he willeth not to do wrong to any man, even in thought" (and see the whole passage).
verse 28—"Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart."	cf. Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Benjamin 8:2, "He that hath a pure mind in love looketh not on a woman with thought of fornication" (and see the whole passage).
verse 34—"Swear not at all."	cf. Secrets of Enoch 49:1-2, "The Lord said, 'There is no oath in me, nor injustice, but truth.' If there is no truth in men, let them swear by the words 'yea, yea' or else 'nay, nay.' "
verse 42—"Give to him that asketh thee."	cf. Deut. 15:7, "If there be among you a needy man, one of thy brethren . . . thou shalt not harden thy heart, nor shut thy hand from thy needy brother," and verse 10, "Thou shalt surely give him, and thy heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him."
verse 44—"Love your enemies."	cf. Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Joseph 18:2, "If any one seeketh to do evil unto you, do you in well doing pray for him"; Midrash Deut. 6:9, "If thou hast accustomed thy tongue to speak evil of thy brother who does not belong to thy race, in the end thou wilt bring shame on him who does belong to thy race."

verse 45—"That ye may be sons of your Father which is in heaven."	cf. Philo, De Confusione Linguarum, xxviii, "All who have real knowledge of the Creator and Father of all things are rightly called sons of God"; Sirach 4:10, "Be as a father to orphans. . . . Then God will call thee son."
"for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."	cf. Pesikta Rabbathi 195a, "Hast thou ever seen that the rain has fallen on the field of one who is righteous and not on the field of one who is wicked? But the sun rises upon Israel, who are righteous, and upon the wicked. [God] makes the sun to rise upon Israel and upon the nations."
verse 48—"Be therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."	cf. Deut. 18:13, "Thou shalt be wholehearted with the Lord thy God"; Lev. 19:2, "Ye shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy."
Matt. 6:1—"Take heed that ye do not your righteousness before men, to be seen of them."	cf. Hag. 5a (commenting on the word "evil" in Eccl. 12:14), "They of the school of Rabbi Jannai say, 'This is he who giveth alms in public.' "
"Else ye have no reward."	see above on verse 12.
"Father which is in heaven."	see above on verse 15.
verse 4—"that thine alms may be in secret."	cf. Shek. 5:6 (the chamber of the silent in the Temple, where alms were given and received in secret. This was, of course, in existence in the time of Jesus).
verse 6—"But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut the door pray to thy Father which is in secret."	cf. II Kings 4:32-33, "And when Elisha was come into the house. . . . He went in therefore, and shut the door . . . and prayed unto the Lord."
verse 8—"Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him."	cf. Yer. Ber. 8b, "The needs of thy people Israel are many and their knowledge is small. May it be thy will, O Lord our God and God of our fathers, to give to every creature what he needs, and to everybody what is lacking to it."
verse 9—"Hallowed be Thy name."	cf. the Kaddish, "Hallowed be His great name."
"Thy kingdom come."	cf. the Kaddish, "May He establish His kingdom."
verse 10—"Thy will be done, as in heaven so on earth."	cf. Tos. Ber. 3:7, "Do Thy will in heaven above, and give quietness of mind to them that fear Thee on earth, and do that which is good in Thy sight. Blessed [art Thou] that hearest prayer."
verse 11—"Give us this day our daily bread."	cf. Prov. 30:8, "Feed me with mine allotted bread."
verse 12—"Forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors."	cf. Sirach 28:2, "Forgive thy neighbour the injury (done to thee), and then when thou prayest thy sins will be forgiven."
verse 13—"Bring us not into temptation."	cf. Ber. 60b, "Bring me not into the power of sin, iniquity, temptation or contempt."
verses 14-15—"But if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you; but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses."	cf. Yer. B.K. 6c (8:10), "So long as thou art merciful, God (Makom) hath mercy on thee; if thou art not merciful God hath not mercy on thee."
verse 20—"But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven."	cf. Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Levi 13:5, "Work righteousness, my children, upon the earth, that ye may have (it) as a treasure in heaven."
verse 25—"Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on."	cf. Mechilta Beshallah, Vayissa 2, "Every one who has whereof to eat today and says what shall I eat tomorrow, is wanting in faith."
verse 34—"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."	cf. Ber. 9b, "Sufficient is the evil in its time" (perhaps a popular proverb).
Matt. 7:1—"Judge not, that ye be not judged."	cf. Aboth 2:5, "(Hillel said) 'Judge not thy neighbour until thou art come into his place.' "
verse 2—"With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."	cf. Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Zebulon 5:3, "Have therefore compassion in your hearts, my children; because, even as a man doeth to his neighbour, even so will the Lord do to him"; Sotah 1:7, "With the measure with which a man measures, so will it be measured to him" (perhaps a popular proverb).
verse 3—"Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?"	cf. Arach. 16b, "If one says to his fellow, Cast the mote out of thine eye, he will answer, Cast the beam out of thine own eye" (perhaps a popular proverb).
verse 12—"All things therefore whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them."	cf. Lev. 19:18, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (other formulations of the Golden Rule are mostly in the negative form, "Do not unto thy neighbour what is hateful to thee"; Hillel).
Matt. 10:16—"Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."	cf. Midrash Song of Songs 2:14, "God said, of the people of Israel, 'With me they are simple as doves, but amongst the peoples of the world they are crafty as serpents.' " verse 25—"It is enough for the disciple that he be as	cf. Ber. 58b, "It is enough for the servant that he be his master, and the servant as his lord."	as his master" (perhaps a popular proverb).

verse 29—"[Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?] and not one of them shall fall to the ground without your Father."	cf. Yer. Shebi. 9:1, 38b, [the story of Rabbi Simeon ben Yohai, who, after the Hadrianic persecution, came out of his cave and saw a man snaring birds. He said] "If even a bird is not caught without the will of God, how much less a man?"
verse 39—"He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life [for my sake] shall find it."	cf. Tamid 32a, "What shall a man do that he may live? Let him kill himself. And what should he do that he may die? They answered, 'Let him keep himself alive.' "
verse 40—"He that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me."	cf. Ber. 5:5, "A man's deputy is as himself" (a usual legal phrase).
Matt. 11:29—"Take [my] yoke upon you."	cf. Aboth 3:5, "Who takes upon himself the yoke of the kingdom of heaven."
Matt. 12:7—"If ye had known what this meaneth, I desire mercy, and not sacrifice (Hosea 6:6), ye would not have condemned the guiltless."	cf. Aboth de Rabbi Nathan 4, p. 11a, [Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai and Rabbi Joshua ben Hananiah. After the destruction of the Temple, Johanan ben Zakkai said] "My son . . . we have a means of atonement which is like [that of the altar]. And what is that? The doing of kindnesses, as it is written (Hosea 6:6), 'I desire mercy and not sacrifice.' "
verse 29—"Except first he bind the strong man."	cf. Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Levi. 18:12, "And Beliar shall be bound by him, and he shall give power to his children to tread upon the evil spirits."
verse 36—"Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment."	cf. Hag. 5b [on Amos 4:13, "declareth unto man what is his thought"], "Even the superfluous word between a man and his wife they [i.e. God] show it to him in the hour of his death."
Matt. 13:3—"And he spake to them many things in parables."	cf. Midrash Song of Songs 1:1, 8, "Let not the 'parable' (mashal) be light in thine eyes, for by means of the 'parable' a man can stand in the words of the Torah" [the parable form of teaching was used alike by the rabbis and by Jesus].
verse 12—"For whosoever hath, to him shall be given . . . but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that which he hath."	cf. Ber. 40a, "If thou wilt hear once, thou wilt hear again; but if not, thou wilt not hear."
Matt. 15:13—"Every plant, which my heavenly Father planted not, shall be rooted up."	cf. Jubilees 36:6, "That He [God] might . . . establish you on the earth as the plant of righteousness which will not be rooted out unto all the generations for ever."
Matt. 22:37, 39—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, etc."; "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."	cf. Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, Issachar. 5:2, "Love the Lord and your neighbour"; 7:6, "I loved the Lord; also every man with all my heart"; ibid., Dan 5:3, "Love the Lord through all your life, and one another with a true heart" (N.B. for the association of the two commandments).
Matt. 23:12—"Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be humbled, and whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted."	cf. Erub. 13b, "Every one who humbles himself, the Holy One, Blessed be He, exalts him; and every one who exalts himself, the Holy One, Blessed be He, humbles him."
Matt. 24—Apocalyptic sayings.	cf. the common form Apocalyptic teaching.
Matt. 25:21—"Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things."	cf. Midrash Ex. 2:3, "The Holy One, Blessed be He, does not give greatness to a man until He has proved him in a small thing, and after that He exalts him to greatness."
Matt. 26:39—"Not as I will, but as thou wilt."	cf. Aboth de Rabbi Nathan 32, p. 36a, "If thou hast done His will as thy will, thou hast not done His will as His will; and if thou hast done His will as not thy will, thou hast done His will as His will."
Mark 2:27—"The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath."	cf. Yoma 85b, "It [the sabbath] is committed into your hands and you are not committed into its hand."
Mark 3:29—"Hath never forgiveness."	cf. Yer. B.K. 6d, "hath not forgiveness for ever" (this is given to show the use of the same phrase in both cases. The Christian doctrine of the unpardonable sin rests only on a misunderstanding of the phrase).
Luke 4:23—"Physician, heal thyself."	cf. Midrash Gen. 23:4, "Physician, heal thy lameness" (probably a popular proverb).

R. TRAVERS HERFORD.

Lit.: Friedlander, G., Jewish Sources of the Sermon on the Mount; Montefiore, Claude G., Rabbinic Literature and Gospel Teaching.

PARAN, name of a desert and of a mountain on the Sinai peninsula; both are mentioned in the narrative of Israel's wanderings through the wilderness (Num. 10:12 and elsewhere). Their exact location has not yet been ascertained.

PARANOMASIA, see WORDS, PLAY ON.

PARAPET, see SAFETY LEGISLATION.

PARASHAH (plural, Parashiyoth), a term denoting 1. a section or paragraph of the Hebrew Bible; 2. the portion of the Torah read at public services. It is derived from the verb parash, which means "divide" and "interpret." All Jews use the term Parashah to designate the paragraphs in the handwritten scrolls of the Torah; however, the use of the term to mean the Scriptural portion read at the services is common among Sephardic Jews, whereas Ashkenazic Jews employ the name Sidra (plural, Sidroth) as often as Parashah.

The Scroll of the Torah is not divided into chapters, as are English Bibles, but into paragraphs, separated from one another by two types of spaces, called Pethuhoth (singular, Pethuhah) and Sethumoth (singular, Sethumah), respectively. A Pethuhah is a space which begins in the middle of a line and runs to the end, so that the next paragraph begins on the succeeding line. A Sethumah is a space of at least nine letter-widths in the middle of a line, bounded by the closing words of one paragraph and the beginning of the next. In printed texts each Pethuhah and Sethumah is indicated by the letters Pe and Samech, respectively.

The Parashah readings for the synagogue are not noted as such in the Scroll of the Torah, but are exactly delimited in traditional sources. Each Sidra to be read on the Sabbath morning is divided into seven parts, for the seven who are called up to the reading of the Torah at Orthodox Jewish services. Some explain this number with the surmise that originally the seven leading citizens (shib'ah tobe ha'ir) were called, and that gradually the honor was extended to other members of the community. This is mere conjecture, however. A simpler and more satisfying explanation is the great importance of the Sabbath. The smallest number ever called to the Torah is three, so as to include a Cohen (descendant of a priestly family), a Levite and an Israelite. Three are called on Sabbath afternoon, on Monday, Thursday, Hanukah and Purim mornings, and on fast day mornings and evenings. On New Moon (Rosh Hodesh) and the half-holidays (Hol Hamoed), when an additional sacrifice was offered in the Temple and Jerusalem, with a corresponding additional silent prayer in the synagogue service, the number was increased to four. The greater importance of the three festivals (Passover, Shabuoth and Sukkoth) and Rosh Hashanah is indicated by the fact that five are called. Six are called on Yom Kippur, and seven on the Sabbath, the most important of all. The number seven also suggests the seven days of the week, of which the Sabbath is the culmination.

If one of the holidays mentioned above falls on the Sabbath, the regular Sabbath portion is postponed, and a special reading takes its place. On four special Sabbaths, however—Shekalim, Zachor, Parah and Hahodesh—two scrolls are taken from the Ark, the first for the Sabbath portion, the second for the special Parashah. The same is true if the New Moon falls on the Sabbath. In case Sabbath Shekalim or Sabbath Hahodesh or the Sabbath during Hanukah also coincides with the New Moon, three scrolls are used: the first for the weekly portion, the second for the New Moon Parashah, and the third for the reading for the special Sabbath.

The basis of this practice is a passage in Meg. 3:4: "When the New Moon of Adar falls on the Sabbath, they read the section Shekalim; . . . on the second Sabbath they read Zachor; on the third, Parah Adumah; on the fourth, 'This month shall be unto you'; on the fifth, they return to the regular order." The Talmud (Meg. 30b) asks: "The regular order of what?" Ammi answers, "They return to the regular order of the weekly readings." Jeremiah says, "No, they return to the regular order of the prophetic readings (Haftaroth)." In other words, Ammi holds that the special Sabbaths interrupt the regular readings, while Jeremiah is of the opinion that they interrupt only the prophetic readings (and are hence supplementary portions to the regular ones). The law has followed the latter view.

Louis Ginzberg (Commentary on the Palestinian Talmud, 1941, vol. 3, pp. 132-49), however, argues convincingly that the interpretation given by Ammi is the correct one; furthermore, he comes to the startling conclusion that in Palestine, down through the period of the Geonim, Jewish practice followed this interpretation, and the regular weekly reading was omitted on the four special Sabbaths, on the Sabbath which falls on a New Moon, and on the Sabbath in the week of Hanukah, just as it still is on holidays. Thus on Sabbath Shekalim the Shekalim section alone (Ex. 30:11-16) was read; and since each of the seven called up was required to read no less than three verses, this short section of three verses must have been read and reread a number of times. The case was even more striking on Sabbath Zachor, when the special portion (Deut. 25:17-19) consisted of only three verses. These must have been read over no less than eight times—seven for the seven who were called up, and once more for the Maftir (reader of the Haftarah).

According to this view, more than one scroll was never taken from the Ark in Palestine, since only one portion was ever read. The only apparent exception was on the New Moon of Tebeth, which always falls on Hanukah. In this case both the New Moon and the Hanukah portion were read (but not the Sabbath portion) because both are found in the same book of the Torah (Num. 7 and 28) and there was plenty of time for the reader to roll the scroll from the first to the second passage while the Meturgeman was explaining the first passage. In time, however, the Babylonian practice spread even to Palestine and became universally accepted by Jews, so that it is in vogue today.

The entire Torah is read through without omissions in the course of a year. Since seven out of every nineteen years in the Jewish calendar are leap years which have thirteen months instead of twelve, the number of Sabbaths varies from fifty to fifty-five; since at least some of these Sabbaths coincide with holidays (in which case the Sabbath order is interrupted), the number of ordinary Sabbaths is never more than fifty-two and never less than forty-seven. The arrangement of the Sidroth is therefore made elastic by having some double up on occasion. There is one such pair in Exodus (Vayakhel-Pekude), three in Leviticus (Tazria-Metzora, Ahare Moth-Kedoshim, Behar-Behukkothai), two in Numbers (Hukkath-Balak, Mattoth-Masse) and one in Deuteronomy (Nitzabim-Vayelech). When a double Sidra is read, the middle section of the seven, namely the fourth, serves to bridge the two.

The weekly portions are designated either by their first word or two (Bereshith, Lech Lecha, Ki Thetze) or by the first significant word. Thus Kedoshim is named after the fourteenth word from the beginning of the Parashah, the ninth word in the second verse (Lev. 19:1-2). Sometimes the significant word is the name of the principal character in the story (Phinehas, Noah, Jethro, Balak). The last two, by the way, are heathens, and the second of these a wicked king who had engaged a sorcerer to pronounce a curse upon Israel; yet the Biblical portions are named after them—an interesting manifestation of broadmindedness.

The name of the Sidra is given to the week in which it is read; in letters and documents the Sidra name of the week is given as often as that of the month. Sometimes an outstanding passage of the Parashah is chosen instead of its name, as, "With the help of God, the third day of the week, Parashah 'And thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,' in the year 5702." Or else the writer chooses a text from the Parashah that has a bearing on the subject of the letter.

The weekly Parashiyoth, in all cases but one, begin at a paragraph, that is, either at a Pethuhah or a Sethumah. In printed Bibles the division between Sidroth is indicated by triple Pes or triple Samechs; but there is no such distinction in the handwritten scrolls. The one exception is the last Sidra in Genesis, Vayehi, which begins in the middle of a paragraph (47:28). Midrash Gen. 96 (quoted in Rashi to the passage) gives two homiletic explanations of this unusual occurrence.

Originally every one who was called to the Torah read his own part of the Sidra; but as spreading ignorance made it increasingly difficult to find a sufficient number of laymen who were able to read from the scroll, it became customary to engage a professional reader (Baal Kore). Originally the blessing before the reading was recited only by the first one to be called up, and the blessing after the reading was recited only by the last one to be called up; the intervening readers did not make these benedictions. However, when the professional reader took over the task of reading from those who were called up, those in between had nothing to do but stand by. Accordingly it became customary for each one who was called up to pronounce both blessings over the Torah. Another reason which was given for the introduction of this change was that if one entered the synagogue after the reading had begun, or left before it was ended, he might conclude that reading the Torah requires only one benediction.

One must never make a stop less than three sentences before a pause (Pethuhah or Sethumah), lest a person leaving the synagogue at that point come to the erroneous conclusion that the next one called will read less than three sentences. Nor is one to stop less than three sentences after such a pause, lest one coming to the synagogue at that point conclude that the previous one had read only two sentences. Another restriction is that no beginning or stop is made at a place where evil is spoken of Israel. Thus the last Sidra of Genesis does not begin with 48:1, though marked by a Pethuhah, because it speaks of Jacob's illness.

Within the limits of the above restrictions the division of the Parashah into its seven sections is a fairly equal one. A striking exception occurs in Ki Thissa (Ex. 30:11 to 34:35), which includes the story of the Golden Calf. The first part, for the Cohen, consists of forty-five verses; the second, for the Levite, of forty-seven verses; the remaining parts, for the five Israelites, consist of five, seven, nine, seventeen and nine verses, respectively. This inequality in the division was prompted by the ethical precept against shaming a fellow man. All the tribes, except Levi, participated in the worship of the Golden Calf. To invite a descendant of any of the guilty tribes, or even an Aaronide, to read that story in public (or to have it read to him) might prove embarrassing; therefore the reading is so arranged that the entire story falls within the Levite's part.

Two passages in the Torah (Lev. 26:14-45 and Deut. 28:15-68) bear the name of Tochehah ("rebuke") because they contain predictions of evil to come in consequence of disregarding the word of God. After the introduction of the professional reader it became difficult to find a worshipper who would agree to stand by the Torah and have the Baal Kore read the list of curses to him, especially the passage in Deuteronomy, which is couched in the second person singular. In some communities a poor man would be paid for accepting this Aliyah, and he would be known as the "Tochehah Jew"; in other cases it would fall to the sexton (Shamash). In most synagogues the Baal Kore would take this Aliyah himself, in order that no one might be embarrassed. The reader hurries through the Tochehah in a low tone of voice; but when he comes to Lev. 26:42, which has a note of cheer, he raises his voice for the moment to its normal pitch.

When the closing sentence of any of the five books of the Torah is reached, the congregation rises; the reader raises his voice and finishes the verse with a flourish; the congregation then exclaims hazaḳ hazaḳ venithhazaḳ ("Be strong, be strong, let us be strong!"), which the reader repeats.

The present one-year cycle of Torah readings is derived from Babylonia; however, in Palestine a three-year cycle was formerly in vogue (cf. Meg. 29b). J. Theodor discovered that the principal Midrash collections (Midrash Rabbah and Tanhuma), which were probably completed before the close of the Babylonian Talmud, were originally arranged to suit a three-year cycle. Jacob Mann (The Bible as Read and Preached in the Old Synagogue, 1940) proves that these Midrash collections were constructed not only upon the divisions (Sedarim) of the triennial cycle but also on the corresponding Haftaroth, with an ingenious interweaving of texts from the third part of the Bible, the Hagiographa. So highly developed a literary technique presupposes long established usage.

The three-year cycle continued for many centuries. The liturgical poems of Jannai (6th and 7th centuries) are based on the triennial portions and the corresponding Haftaroth. Lists of readings and Haftaroth, discovered by Schechter in the Cairo Genizah, agree essentially with Jannai. As late as 1170 Benjamin of Tudela found Egyptian congregations which still retained the three-year cycle. Maimonides, despite his great influence, did not suceed in inducing the "Palestinian" congregation at Fostat (Cairo) to abandon it for the sake of uniformity with the rest of the Jews of the world. Abraham Maimuni, his son, had to confirm, as Nagid, the ancient ritual in that synagogue (1211), the only concession to Babylonian custom being that the Pentateuch was recited also in the annual cycle from ordinary copies, whereas the official reading from the scroll continued in the triennial cycle (Mann, Texts and Studies, vol. 1, pp. 416-17). Adolf Büchler (Jewish Quarterly Review, Old Series, vol. 5, pp. 420-68; vol. 6, pp. 1-73) advanced the ingenious hypothesis that the triennial cycle began in Nisan rather than after Sukkoth; but this has been refuted by Mann.

The only vestige left of the old triennial cycle is in the statistical notes of the Masorites at the end of each of the five books of the Torah in printed Bibles. These give, in addition to the number of verses in each book, the number of Sidras and the number of chapters, a figure for the Sedarim of the triennial cycle. There are forty-three of these in Genesis, twenty-nine in Exodus, twenty-three in Leviticus, thirty-two in Numbers, and twenty-seven in Deuteronomy, a total of 154, enough for the Sabbaths of three years.

Midrash Esther 1 gives the slightly higher figure of 155, the numerical value of the word ḳoneh ("buy") in Deut. 28:68, "And there ye shall sell yourselves unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you." If the word ḳoneh were spelled in its fullest form (Kof, Vav, Nun, He), its numerical value would equal Menahem Meiri's 161, corresponding to the greatest number of Sabbaths possible in three years. Soferim 16:10 speaks of 175 Sedarim, equivalent to the years of Abraham's life, and this has led some scholars to the conclusion that at one time the reading cycle was three and one-half years. Solomon Luria, in listing differences of practice, states: "The Babylonian Jews celebrate Simhath Torah every year during Sukkoth, while the Palestinians celebrate it only every three and a half years" (Yam Shel Shelomoh, to Baba Kamma). In this case the Talmudic statement that the "people of the west" finish the Torah in three years is only approximate. A three and one-half-year cycle would have fifty Sedarim a year; but in this case it is difficult to explain the 154 of the Masorah.

It has been suggested that there was originally a seven-year cycle, but the only basis for this is the Bible statement (Deut. 31:10-11) that the priests are to read the Law to all Israel every seven years, at Sukkoth. There is no evidence whatever for such a practice.

Reform Jewish congregations, particularly in the United States, have made considerable modifications in the reading of the Parashah, especially in the omission of the calling up of members of the congregation, and the shortening of the portion read at the service. The annual cycle has been retained, but only part of each Parashah is read, and the portions for the special Sabbaths are not read at all. The practice varies among the congregations, some following a cycle in which the entire Torah can be completely read in the course of three to seven years, while in other cases the reader chooses the opening verses of a Parashah or a portion of it that is especially significant. There have also been changes in the traditional Haftarah scheme, with passages from the Hagiographa used as well as those from the Prophets, and selected in such a manner as to fit individual sections in each Parashah.

The traditional Parashahs and Haftarahs are to be found in most printed Hebrew Pentateuchs, and in the English translation of the Bible published by the Jewish Publication Society of America. There is also a list of suggested readings in the Union Prayer Book.

See also: SIDRA; TORAH, READING OF.

LOUIS FEINBERG.

Lit.: The basic sources for the laws governing the public reading of the Torah are: Meg. 3:4-6; Meg. 4; Danby, Herbert, The Mishnah (English trans., 1933) 205-7; Meg. 21a et seq.; 29a-32a; Epstein, I., edit., Seder Moed (1938) 177-92 (English trans. of the Talmud); Massecheth Soferim, chaps. 10 to 14. For the laws in codified form, see: Maimonides, Yad Hahazakah, Hilchoth Tefillah 12 to 13. For the Pethuhoth and Sethumoth, see ibid., Hilchoth Sefer Torah 8. See also Shulhan Aruch, Orah Hayim 135 to 45. For a discussion of the entire subject, see Dembitz, Lewis N., Jewish Services (1898) 247-75; Rapoport, S. J., Halichoth Kedem (1846); Zunz, Leopold, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge (1892), chap. 1; Schürer, E., Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes, vol. 2, pp. 454-59; Büchler, A., "The Reading of the Law and Prophets in a Triennial Cycle," Jewish Quarterly Review, Old Series, vol. 5, pp. 420-68; vol. 6, pp. 1-73; Ginzberg, Louis, Commentary on the Palestinian Talmud, vol. 3 (1941) 132-49.

PARASHAHS, THE FOUR ('arba parshiyyoth), the "four sections," i.e., those sections which are read, according to Meg. 3:4, on four special Sabbaths from a special scroll of the Torah after the usual reading from the Torah; the four Sabbaths in question have received their names on the basis of these special sections, as follows:

1. Parashath Shekalim (Ex. 30:11-16), telling of the special offering of half a shekel brought by each Israelite in the wilderness on the occasion of the numbering of the people. The corresponding Haftarah is II Kings 11:17 to 12:17 or 12:1-17, the subject matter of which is the offerings made for the repairing of the sanctuary. Parashath Shekalim is read on the Sabbath before the beginning of the month of Adar (in leap year on the Sabbath before the beginning of Adar Sheni or the Second Adar), or on the first day of the month of Adar if this falls on a Sabbath. The reading from the Torah formed the introduction to the demand for the payment of the half shekel which was used to cover the communal offering in Jerusalem.

2. Parashath Zachor ("Remember" what Amalek did unto thee; Deut. 25:17-19). The corresponding Haftarah is I Sam. 15:1-34 or 15:2-34, Saul's battle against the Amalekites. Parashath Zachor is read on the Sabbath before Purim, because Haman is believed to have been a descendant of the Amalekite Agag.

3. Parashath Parah (the red "heifer"; Num. 19:1-22). The ashes of the red heifer were mixed with water and used as a means of ritual purification whenever one had become unclean through touching a dead body. The corresponding Haftarah is Ezek. 36:16-36 or 36:16-38, because of verse 25: "And I will sprinkle clean water upon you"; Parashath Parah is read on the next to the last Sabbath in Adar, or on the last Sabbath in Adar if the 1st of Nisan falls on a Sabbath. The reading of this portion was supposed to represent a summons to ritual purification before the pilgrimage made to Jerusalem on the occasion of the festival of Passover.

4. Parashath Hahodesh ("the month"; Ex. 12:1-20). This portion, the Parashah of the month, beginning with the words "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months," contains the laws dealing with the Passover lamb and the festival of the unleavened bread. The Haftarah to this section, according to the Sephardic ritual, is Ezek. 45:18 to 46:15; according to the Ashkenazic ritual, it is Ezek. 45:16 to 46:18; it deals with the festival offerings, including those brought on the festival of Pesach. Parashath Hahodesh is read on the Sabbath before the beginning of the month of Nisan or, if the 1st of Nisan is on a Sabbath, it is read that same day.

The morning services for each of these Sabbaths are augmented by additional poems called Yotzeroth.

Lit.: Dembitz, L., Jewish Services (1898) 257-59; Seligsohn, M., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, pp. 523-24.

PARASHATH HAHODESH, PARASHATH PARAH, PARASHATH SHEKALIM, PARASHATH ZACHOR, see PARASHAHS, THE FOUR.

PARCHI, PARHI, see FARHI.

PARDES, see PARADISE.

PARDES HANNAH, see COLONIES, AGRICULTURAL.

PARDO (also Prado), a noted Sephardic family from Prado in Castile, Spain. The first of the distinguished line was JOSEPH PARDO, rabbi (b. Salonika; d. Amsterdam, 1619). He was called from Venice to be the first Haham of the Amsterdam Portuguese congregation, Beth Jacob—a post which he may have held from 1597 until his death. Later investigations, however, indicate that he remained in Venice until the year 1608. His son, DAVID PARDO, b. Salonika; d. Amsterdam, 1657, was appointed rabbi of the new synagogue Beth Israel which the seceders of the Amsterdam commmunity erected in 1618. After the consolidation of the three congregations (1639), he became the Haham of the united communities in Amsterdam. At the same time he was officially appointed Procurador de Misvot (director of funerals). The charitable institution Honen Dallim was founded by him in 1625. Together with Manasseh ben Israel, Saul Morteira and Isaac Aboab, he formed the first rabbinical college. He published a Spaniolish translation (in Latin type) of Bahya ibn Pakuda's Hoboth Halebaboth (Amsterdam, 1610). His son, JOSEPH PARDO, d. 1677, was a Hazan (cantor) in London. A summary of Caro's Shulhan Aruch entitled Sefer Shulhan Tahor (Amsterdam, 1686) is variously attributed to him and to David Pardo, possibly his son.

JACOB BEN DAVID PARDO, rabbi in Ragusa and Spalato, lived in the second half of the 18th cent. He composed a prayer book and a book of poems for children Marpe Lashon (Venice, 1780). He was also the author of several commentaries, one of which, Mishkenoth Yaakob (Leghorn, 1824) was published by his son, David Samuel Pardo.

DAVID SAMUEL PARDO, Talmudist and liturgical poet (b. Venice, 1719; d. Jerusalem, 1792), was the son of Jacob Pardo of Ragusa. For a number of years, he occupied himself as teacher in Sarajevo and Spalato under the name of Kaufman. Later, he was appointed chief rabbi of Spalato and in 1764 of Sarajevo. In his old age, he settled in Jerusalem. Pardo wrote numerous commentaries on the Mishnah, Tosefta, Rashi and other Talmudic compositions. In addition to his commentaries, he also wrote a number of liturgical works.

JOSIAH PARDO, rabbi, son of David the Haham and son-in-law of Saul Levi Morteira, was an instructor at the Jesiba de los Pintos, a school founded by the Pinto Brothers at Rotterdam. In 1674, he became Haham in Curaçao; in 1683, he removed to Jamaica where he occupied himself in the same capacity. He may have been the father of the David Pardo who was rabbi in Surinam.

Lit.: Zwartz, De Eerste Rabbijenen en Synagogen van Amsterdam (1929) 86-89; da Silva Rosa, J. S., Geschiedenis der Portugeesche Joden te Amsterdam 1593-1925 (1925) 16, 24, 42 et seq.; Mendes Dos Remedios, Os Judeos Portugueses em Amsterdam (1911) 9-14 et seq.; Graetz, History of the Jews, vol. 4, pp. 680-82 et seq.; Kayserling, Sephardim (1859) 169, 201 et seq.; Roth, Menassah Ben Israel (1934) 25-26 et seq.; Seeligman, Siegfried, Bibliographie en Historie (1927) 26.

PARDO, DAVID, early rabbi in Surinam, d. Surinam, 1713 or 1717. There are facts regarding the history of a David Pardo which possibly point to the existence of two men of that name of that period. It was for a time assumed that the David Pardo who was known to have served as rabbi in Surinam and to have died there was born in London, the son of Joseph Pardo, a Hazan.

The Sefer Shulhan Tahor (Amsterdam, 1686) was variously attributed to both Joseph and David Pardo. According to these facts, Pardo reached Surinam late in the 17th cent. Later evidence, however, disclosed the possibility that the Surinam David Pardo was the son of Joshiah Pardo, who was rabbi in Curaçao.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 20 (index volume).

PARDON, see FORGIVENESS.

PARDON (also Bardon), a tax on Jews, which was levied mostly on kosher meat, but also on beverages and various provisions and also upon the completion of business transactions. The tax existed from sometime in the 17th cent. to the 19th cent. in Prussia, Posen, south Germany and Austria. Charges for the use of the ritual bath (Mikveh) were also called Pardon, and the expression was used occasionally in the sense of lease-money. The etymology of the word is dubious, but it has been traced to the middle-Latin "pardona" (tax).

Lit.: Lewin, Geschichte der Juden in Lissa (1904), 89, 103; Wachstein, Urkunden und Akten zur Geschichte der Juden in Eisenstadt (1926), 19, 126.

PARENTAL AUTHORITY. The Jewish conception of parental authority has no parallel in the codes that obtained among other ancient peoples. While the latter gave to parents, especially the father, the absolute right to dispose of their children, Jewish law recognized the inalienable prerogative of children as persons. The patria potestas of Roman law appears in a most limited form in Jewish law and then only in the case of minors. A daughter under twelve years of age may be disposed of by her father in marriage. He may also dissolve her religious vows (Num. 30:4-6). If he is in extreme need he may sell her, but with the provision that she secure her freedom when she reaches the age of puberty, or when her master dies, or if her master or his son takes her as his legitimate wife.

The right of inflicting punishment on children is less an expression of arbitrary authority possessed by parents than a means of the proper training of children. In no case must the sense of honor in children be violated. Parents are strictly forbidden to kill their children, or to offer them as human sacrifices, or to give them over for immoral purposes. Jewish literature, in contradistinction to the records of other ancient peoples, knows nothing of infanticide. Parents, however, have the right to deliver a "stubborn and rebellious" son, not amenable to discipline, to the authorities who after careful investigation may inflict the death penalty on him (Deut. 21:18-21). A curse pronounced against parents or a physical attack on them is punishable with death (Ex. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9); but here, too, death is not inflicted by the parents, but by the authorities. The parents have the right only to prefer the charges.

In Talmudic law parents—and especially the father—have the right to whatever their children may inherit or find; but this right becomes void when the children become of age or become self-sustaining. Such rights must be in accord with the duty of parents to provide for the maintenance of their children.

If parental rights in Jewish law are not particularly stressed it is because greater weight is laid on the implications in the relation between parents and children. This is evident, on the one hand, in the honor and veneration accorded to parents leading to filial piety; and, on the other, in the duty of parents to support and educate their children and in the parental love which Jews conceive as boundless. MARCUS COHN.

PARENTAL BLESSING. The blessing of children by their parents is highly esteemed as far back as the Bible; and the belief in pious Jewish circles that the parents' blessing is of important consequence is still prevalent. Parents are therefore in the habit of pronouncing a blessing over their children on many occasions, of which the following are worthy of mention:

1. Friday evening, after the return from the synagogue. This evening is especially adapted for the blessing of children, for on it man acquired an over-soul (Neshamah Yetherah) and is accompanied home by the angel of peace (Sab. 119b; Aaron Berechiah of Modena, Maabar Yabbok, chap. 43). In many places children are blessed by the father at the close of the Sabbath as well, and on various festival days.

2. The evening preceding Yom Kippur. If grandparents are living and reside in the same city, their grandchildren are gebensht, or blessed, by them. Rabbi Abraham Danzig even prepared a special text for the blessing on this occasion (Hayye Adam, Kelal 144, xix).

3. The time immediately before a wedding, just after the bridal couple have stepped under the Huppah or before the rabbi. Also the grandparents, if they are living, sometimes pronounce the parental blessing on this occasion.

4. Of especial significance is the last blessing of the parents before their death. As early as the Bible the words of blessing before death were regarded as especially important, evidenced, for example, in the cases of Isaac (Gen. 27), Jacob (Gen. 49) and Moses (Deut. 33).

The blessing of a sick person was regarded as especially effective, since the Shekinah, the reflection of the glory of God, rests over his head (Sab. 12b; Ned. 40a). In giving their children their final benediction before death, parents often express specific wishes that their children perform certain religious duties.

During the blessing the father lays both hands on the head of the child, after a custom frequently practised in Bible times (Gen. 48:14). To a boy he says: "May God make thee as Ephraim and Manasseh" (Gen. 48:20); to a girl, "May God make thee as Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel and Leah" (cf. Ruth 4:11). After this he recites the threefold priestly blessing (Num. 6:24-26).

Lit.: Rappaport, Samuel, Der Jude, vol. 7 (1923), Nos. 5 and 6.

PARENTS AND CHILDREN. The recognition and encouragement of the intellectual and spiritual bond between parents and children is characteristic of the Jewish family. The sin of the fathers is visited upon the third and fourth generation of the children, while kindness is shown by God to the thousandth generation of righteous parents (Ex. 20:5-6); in some cases the sins of the children profane the parents (Lev. 21:9).

It is of course true that this close connection between parents and children is that the latter are granted a personality and a responsibility of their own. This is clearly expressed in the often repeated Deuteronomic law that neither parents nor children should be punished for one another's sins through any human agency (Deut. 24:16). The Talmud goes so far as to interpret the statement in Ex. 20:5-6 to mean that the children are punished for the iniquities of their parents only if they persist in them in their own lives. Although parents have no extensive rights of authority over their children, the latter are expressly enjoined to give them love and gratitude, a duty so important that it was made the Fifth Commandment, following immediately after the duties that are owed to God. Cursing one's parents is a capital offense (Ex. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; Deut. 27:16).

Talmudic literature discusses in detail the obligations in regard to love and reverence for parents on the part of the children. A daughter is so obligated until she is married, after which she devotes most of her care to her husband. In the post-Talmudic period the customs arose of saying Kaddish and observing the anniversary of a parent's death (Yahrzeit) as a special mark of respect. Another way of showing such respect was for the children to assume responsibility for the debts which their deceased parents had been unable to pay. This relationship of veneration and affection is repeatedly stressed in Jewish literature, and became the basis for the notable family solidarity in Jewish life.

Next to a long life, children were regarded as one's most valuable possession. Although the ancients, like all agricultural peoples, prized children because they furnished a relatively inexpensive addition to their laborers, they particularly valued them as the perpetuators of the clan and of the family property (Gen. 15:3). They were the spiritual heirs of their personalities, the guarantees of the continuance of the family. According to Biblical law, a childless widow was required to marry the brother of her deceased husband in order that his name might be perpetuated (Levirate marriage). Women regarded children as the consummation of their femininity (Ps. 113:9) and childlessness was regarded as the greatest of misfortunes (1 Sam. 1:5-6, 16). Abundance of children was regarded as the highest gift of God (Ps. 127 and 128).

From ancient to modern times the training and education of children has received especial care and attention even in the poorest Jewish families, who make sacrifices for this purpose to an extent that seldom appears in any non-Jewish group.

There are a number of duties toward children which parents are expected to fulfil. They are to see that they are properly educated, that they are in good health, that they are taught the Jewish laws; they are to furnish them the example of proper conduct. A mother is expected to nurse her child; a widow with a suckling child may not marry before the expiration of twenty-four months. The father is further obligated to see that his son is circumcised, to perform the redemption of the first-born if necessary, and have his children taught Torah and some occupation by which they can support themselves, to provide their food (even in case of divorce) and to see that they are married (Kid. 29a et seq.). He must provide the daughters with an outfit on the occasion of their marriage.

See also: DOWRY; FAMILY AND FAMILY LIFE; MARRIAGE; PARENTAL AUTHORITY; PARENTAL BLESSING; PARRICIDE; WOMAN. MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Jacobson, D., Social Background of the Old Testament; Abrahams, I., Jewish Life in the Middle Ages; Cohen, A., Everyman's Talmud (1932) 179-94; Lazarus, M., Ethics of Judaism; Elbogen, I., in Die Lehren des Judentums, vol. 2, p. 266 et seq.

PARHON, SOLOMON, grammarian and lexicographer, b. Kalaah, Aragon, in the 12th cent. He was a pupil of Judah Halevi and Abraham ibn Ezra. In the preface to his lexicon important references to these two great figures are found, of especial interest as coming from one in personal contact with them.

This lexicon to the Bible is the only work by which Parhon is known. The work resulted from the author's removal to Salerno, in Italy, where he found the Jewish populace entirely ignorant of the philological and exegetical developments of the Arabic-Jewish literary world of Spain. He determined to make it his purpose to further the work of his teacher Ibn Ezra of making available in Hebrew the scientific efforts of the Spanish writers. Parhon's work, completed in 1160, consisted of a grammar and a dictionary, under the title Mahbereth Hearuch which was derived from a combination of the titles of two of his sources. The main part of the work was taken from Ibn Janah's lexicon, the same author's other works and those of Hayyuj being also drawn upon. In addition, the author adds original material, such as interesting explanations of numerous Biblical passages and Hebrew words, and also valuable historical material on the development of the study of Hebrew, as well as discussions of some Jewish problems of the period. For his philological interpretations Parhon utilizes Mishnaic Hebrew and Aramaic, while in general the pure Hebrew language and style sponsored by Ibn Ezra are his medium. Parhon's work was subjected to a bitter criticism ten years after its appearance by Judah ibn Tibbon, who, having himself completed a translation of Ibn Janah's lexicon, considered Mahbereth Hearuch likewise solely a translation of the same work. This did not affect the popularity of Parhon's work, which enjoyed a wide circulation for centuries after. It was again brought before the public in 1844, when a manuscript of the work was edited and published in Pressburg by S. G. Stern.

Lit.: Hirshfeld, H., Hebrew Grammarians and Lexicographers (1926) 76-77; Wiener, M., Parchon als Grammatiker und Lexikograph (1870).

PARIS. 1. From the time of the Merovingians to the Expulsion (1394). The first mention of Jews in Paris occurred at the end of the 6th cent. Gregory of Tours told of the forced conversion of Jews under the Merovingian king Chilperic (561-84), and of a Jew, Priscus, a respected and cultured merchandising agent of the royal court in Paris, who was killed in 582 by Phatir, a converted Jew. An apparently Jewish merchant named Solomon levied tribute for King Dagobert in Paris in 633.

Despite numerous expulsions, there have been Jews in Paris almost without a break since the time of the Merovingians. At that time they lived in the heart of Paris, in one of the important trade centers—on the left bank of the Seine near the Petit Pont, which connected the two banks of the river not far from St. Julien. From this quarter the Jews spread into the lower end of the Rue de la Harpe and the Pont Saint-Michel. Their more important settlement on the right bank of the Seine, mentioned between 1135 and 1143, dates from almost the same period, and was concentrated on the Rue Saint-Bon and the Rue de la Tacherie. They also lived where the Pont au Change spanned the Seine, between Les Halles and the Place des Vosges, and spread into the surrounding streets in the direction of the walls, where there was the Rue des Juifs (now "Ferdinand Duval").

There were known to have been three synagogues before 1394: one in the Rue de la Tacherie (closed after 1306), one in the tower of a private estate, behind the church of Saint-Jean-en Grève, the third in the Rue de Mourière, which paid ten sous rent to the owners in 1253. There were, moreover, two cemeteries: one in the Rue la Galande, near the Rue Saint Jacques, which paid four livres in taxes in 1258, and a cemetery on the Rue Pierre Sarrazin, near the Rue de la Harpe. In 1139 representatives of the Jewish community appeared before Pope Innocent II (1130-43) during his visit to Saint Denis. When, bearing the Torah scrolls, they greeted the pope, they received the unfriendly reply: "May the Almighty lift the veil that surrounds your hearts." They complained also to Louis VII of the crime committed against the Jews of Blois in 1171.

The severe suffering of the French Jews began with the reign of Philip Augustus (1180-1223). After the expulsion of 1182 and the confiscation of Jewish-owned property, Philip Augustus permitted the bishop of Paris (1183 or 1184) to convert a synagogue into a church, and rented several houses which had belonged to Jews to cloth and fur traders. In 1189 the Jews were officially recalled to France. Louis VIII (1223-26) nullified debts due the Jews that were more than five years old. Louis IX (Saint Louis; 1226-70) probably as the result of Dominican influence, which was considerable in the University of Paris, wanted to force the Jews to adopt Christianity. With this end in view, he arranged a religious disputation at his court between the apostate Nicholas Donin and four representative Jews, among whom were Rabbi Jehiel and Moses of Coucy. The result of this disputation was the burning of the Talmud in 1242. Under Philip III (1270-85) the condition of the Jews improved somewhat. But Philip IV, the Fair (1285-1314), brought new suffering to the Jews. In 1290 a Jew and his wife were burned at the stake in Paris, for alleged desecration of the host. In 1292 there were 121 taxpaying Jews in Paris; in 1296 the number dropped to eighty-five. In about 1299 or 1300 the Jews of Paris paid 244 livres, twelve sous tournois in taxes, and fifty livres for the right to discard the Jew-badge—triple the sum paid in 1292. The Jews of France were banished in 1306. Louis X (1314-16) granted them the right to return in 1315, and also restored the synagogues and cemeteries. But in the persecutions of the lepers (gezerath hametzora'im), in 1321, the Jews of France suffered a great deal, apart from the fine imposed by Philip on the Jews, of which the Jews of Paris had to pay 5,300 livres. Many Jews left the country in 1322, but in 1360 the youthful Charles V, deputizing for his father, began negotiations with the representative of the Jews in Paris, the financier Manecier de Vesoul, and finally renewed the right of the Jews to live in the city and throughout the country for a period of twenty years. During the coronation of Charles VIII, in 1380, there were riots and pillaging in the Jewish quarter; after being charged with the pretended murder of the convert Machault, the Jews were banished from the royal lands of France in 1394.

Cultural Life. Paris was the center of Jewish studies, particularly of the Talmud. The scholars of Paris, at the beginning of the 12th cent., were in communication with the scholars of Rome. The rabbis of Paris participated in the synod summoned by Jacob Tam in Troyes in 1150. Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam) lived in Paris for a while. Mattathias ben Moses, a pupil of Rashi, was at the head of the famous Talmudic school in Paris. Among the numerous important scholars, one of the best-known was the Tosafist and Biblical exegete Judah ben Isaac (1166-1224), who was called also Sir Leon. His follower was Jehiel ben Joseph, called Sir Vives, one of his older pupils, and a participant in the disputation of 1240. Jehiel's Talmudic seminary is supposed to have had 300 pupils; Isaac of Corbeil was one of them. In 1259 Jehiel went to Palestine. A century later Mattathias ben Joseph was chief rabbi of Paris; he unified the French Jewish communities. His successor was his son Johanan, whose right to the post was controverted, but the Spanish rabbis Isaac ben Sheshet and Hasdai ibn Crescas decided in his favor. There were also many physicians among the Jews of Paris.

2. From the Expulsion to the French Revolution (1789). Even after 1394 the Jews did not disappear entirely from Paris; frequently, in the guise of Christians or Marranos, they kept up a residence surreptitiously. In 1500 Jacques Jovea, a Marrano, was head of the college Saint Barbe. Francis I (1515-47) founded a chair in Hebrew at the University of Paris, and tried —although in vain—to bestow it on Elijah Levita (1473-1549). Marie de Medici summoned Elijah Montalto to Paris in 1611 as court physician. He was permitted, as an exception, to live as a Jew. The minister of Louis XIII (1601-43), Concini, and Concini's wife, Leonore Galagai, brought Jews from Holland and Portugal to Paris, where they settled in various sections of the city. But in 1615 a royal decree expelled Jews and disguised Jews from France.

Beginning with 1709, Jews once more began to seek the right of domicile in Paris. A list dated 1715, containing the names of Jews, is the oldest mention of Jews in Paris in the 18th cent. Under Louis XV (1721-60) various Jews, including Bernard de Valabrègue, Liefman Calmar, Sara Allegri, Israel Salom, and Jacob Rodriguez Pereire, the famous teacher of the deaf and dumb, received naturalization patents; the Jewish physician Silva was made royal physician in 1724 and ennobled in 1738. But such naturalization patents were favors granted only to a few. Rights of temporary sojourn could be extended by the police. About the middle of the 18th cent. the names of about 150 heads of families were so enumerated. Loeb estimated the number of Jews in Paris in 1780 as between 700 and 800. These Jews were Portuguese from Avignon and Germany. They lived in the vicinity of the old Jewish quarters.

3. From the French Revolution to the Collapse of France (1940). The condition of the Jews in France after the Revolution was based on the granting of equal rights on September 28, 1791, the resolutions of the Assembly of Notables in 1806 and of the Sanhedrin of 1807, and the decrees of Napoleon. Freed of old restraints, the Jews of Paris found their way into the state and into all the professions. An official report of 1808 emphasizes the fact that the Jews of Paris had improved their condition significantly; therefore they were exempted from Napoleon's "infamous decree" of March 17, 1808. Politically they were entirely French. They were officially opposed to the Revolution of 1848, and only a few belonged to the revolutionary circles of the period. There were Jews who were adherents of the Paris Commune of 1871, but there were also Jews who fought against them. The anti-Semitic movement, which reached Paris at the beginning of the 1880's did not shake the foundation of French Jewry. Only the Dreyfus case (1894-1906), which took place in Paris for the most part, had far-reaching effects, but not only on the Jews of Paris. Anti-Semitism did not stop even at insulting the Jewish workers of Paris.

The synagogue on Rue Notre Dame de Nazareth at Paris

The synagogue on Rue des Tournelles at Paris

For the economic and cultural accomplishments of the Paris Jews, see FRANCE.

Paris was also the center of French Jewish religious and cultural life. It was the seat of the Central Consistory, also of the Paris Consistory, established in 1809. The best-known chief rabbis of France were David Sinzheim, Abraham de Cologna, Zadoc Kahn, Israel Lévi, and the incumbent (1942), Isaie Schwartz, who sent a sharp protest to Marshal Henri Pétain against the "Statute of Jews" enacted in October, 1940. The chief rabbis of Paris were Seligman Michel, Marchand Ennery, Lazard Isidor, Zadoc Kahn, J. H. Dreyfus and (from 1933 on) Julian Weill. Even after the separation of church and state in 1905, the Association Consistoriale Israélite de Paris retained its importance.

The new Temple in Paris was dedicated in 1822; the most famous synagogues were those in the Rue de la Victoire, in the Rue des Tournelles, in the Rue Notre Dame de Nazareth, and the Sephardic synagogue in the Rue Buffaut. The Orthodox Beth Midrash, founded in 1845, was independent of the Consistory, as were the Union des Israélites Libérals, founded in 1895, and the various synagogues and Talmud Torahs of the immigrant Jews. In 1859 the rabbinical seminary of Metz was transferred to Paris. The Société Juive was founded in 1880 by Zadoc Kahn, with the aid of the Rothschilds and others.

The earliest modern welfare organizations, the Société d'Encouragement et de Secours, was established in 1809; later it became the Comité de Bienfaisance Israélite de Paris. Subsequently founded institutions were the Rothschild Hospital (1852), the orphan asylum, a house of refuge, public kitchen, a maternity house, and numerous organizations for mutual aid, technical schools, and trade schools for boys and girls. International Jewish organizations which had their headquarters in Paris until 1940 were the Alliance Israélite Universelle, the Jewish Colonization Association, Hicem, and Comité des Délégations Juives. Other international Jewish groups had offices there.

The Alliance Israélite had a library of more than 50,000 volumes, and the rabbinical seminary about 25,000 volumes. There was a large collection of "Hebraica and Judaica" in the Bibliothèque Nationale. In 1817 and 1818 the Israélite français, an annual, appeared. In 1939 there were ten Jewish periodicals in French in Paris, including the Samedi, L'univers israélite and the Revue des études juives.

4. Immigration after 1880 and its Significance. After 1870 many Jews came to Paris from Alsace-Lorraine, and merged with the older settlers. The immigration from Russia, provoked by the pogroms of the 1880's and continued by the events of 1903 to 1905, had a different character. Immigration from Eastern Europe was especially heavy after 1918. This was supplemented after 1933 by the arrival of Jews from Central Europe, particularly from Germany. Made still more variegated by the North African and Turkish Jews living in Paris and its outskirts, the Jewish community of Paris was the most interesting one in Europe.

After 1880 a strong political and social community life developed, and all the political groups of the left were represented. In 1900 the first Jewish socialist organization of Paris, the "Bund," was established. Later, Communism made some inroads among the Jewish working classes; the first Communist Jewish group in Paris was founded in 1922. In 1937 the Central Jewish workers' and people's organization (Zapho) was founded. Various divisions of the Zionist Movement were also represented.

Most of the mutual aid organizations of "Landsmannschaften" for immigrants arose after 1918; in 1924 a federation of these organizations was formed in France. Of the ninety constituent agencies in the federation in 1939, seventy-eight were in Paris. There was also an expansive cultural life of the immigrant Jews. The Yiddish language, into which numerous French words had been absorbed, played a great role. Paris had three Yiddish "Volks-Universitäten," scientific and art societies, libraries, secular Yiddish language schools, Yiddish theatres, and a significant Yiddish press.

In 1939 there were fourteen Yiddish periodicals, including two dailies, the Neie Presse and the Paris Haint, founded in 1926. Efforts to unite the immigrant and French Jews in common activities had no concrete results. The consistorial synagogue had (1936) 6,046 members, the Jewish syndicates 16,083, Landsmmanschaften and Hebrahs for mutual benefit among immigrant Jews 17,000, and youth groups 7,000—a total of 48,000 organized individual Jews in Paris. This did not include women's organizations, philanthropic societies, children's aid groups and party organizations.

5. After 1940. With the rise of the Nazis in Germany, especially with the outbreak of the second World War, an anti-alien, particularly anti-Jewish, feeling was prevalent. Although de Pellepoix, a member of the municipal council and publisher of the anti-Semitic weekly France enchaînée, was sentenced in court according to the 1939 law against racial agitation, anti-Semitism increased as the Nazi German armies approached. Shortly before the Germans entered the city, some 50,000 Jews fled from Paris, and about 300 committed suicide. The majority, however, about 125,000 Jews, had to remain.

The procedure of the Nazi German occupational authorities in Paris followed the German example. Anti-Jewish propaganda, with increasing volume and violence, tried to lay the blame for the collapse of France on the Jews. The German authorities were abetted by the anti-Jewish periodical, France au travail, and by three anti-Semitic propaganda centers, opened in Paris, showing the danger that Jews brought to France. On November 20, 1941, the appearance of an anti-Semitic periodical, Das gelbe Magazin, was announced. In December, 1941, Julius Streicher came to Paris to found a Stürmer in French there.

At the same time, the German authorities took measures which aimed at the complete ousting of Jews from French economic and cultural life. Of 11,000 registered Jewish establishments in Paris, 3,093 were "Aryanized" on June 5, 1941. Establishments owned by Jews had to have an identifying sign painted in large yellow letters (June 10, 1941). Between June 25 and June 30, 1941, Jews had to return all permits for trade to the police. Jewish artists were barred from the exhibition of autumn, 1940. Only 2 per cent of the Jewish physicians and lawyers were allowed to practise; forty-eight Jewish lawyers were granted the right to appear before Paris courts. In July, 1941, all Jewish-owned houses were "Aryanized," and the tenants were told not to pay rents to the Jewish owners. On July 22, 1941, Jews were barred from auctions. In this way practically all means of livelihood was removed; it is no wonder that on July 28, 1941, Jewish women rioted at the offices of the United Jewish Charities in Paris. The Jewish organizations did what they could. Four free kitchens distributed 60,000 meals weekly. The OSE evacuated hundreds of children from Paris.

Finally, the occupational authorities adopted terrorizing tactics against the Jews. At the end of August, 1940, Jewish stores were pillaged, Jewish institutions, including the rabbinical seminary, the teachers' institute of the Jewish normal school, and the offices of the World Jewish Congress, the ORT, OSE, and HICEM were plundered and ruined. The libraries of the Alliance Israélite and the rabbinical seminary were confiscated by the Nazis. Because of anti-Nazi demonstrations in various railway stations, in August, 1941, some 6,000 Jews in the eleventh arrondissement (ward) in Paris were arrested and taken to concentration camps; 5,000 foreign Jews in Paris had previously been sent thither at the end of May. Several days later several hundred leading Jews were taken into custody and held as hostages against disturbances.

After December, 1941, "Jews and Communists" were made particularly responsible for attacks on German soldiers. A fine of a billion francs was laid on the Jews of the occupied territory, and actually raised by the Union Générale des Israélites. Some ninety-five "Jews and Communists" were executed, and a large number (about 6,000) sent to forced labor camps in Eastern Europe. During the night of October 3, 1941, six synagogues in Paris were destroyed by bombs, including the synagogues on the Rue de la Victoire and the Rue Notre Dame de Nazareth. After February 11, 1941, Jews were not allowed to leave their homes after 8 o'clock in the evening.

More executions of "Jews and Communists" took place on March 5, 1942. After the Royal Air Force had bombed Paris, those who were supposedly made homeless were to be reimbursed through the sale of confiscated Jewish property. Beginning with May, 1942, the Nazi authorities were aided in their attacks on the Jews by special anti-Jewish brigades. In the summer of 1942 the transfer of all Jews from the occupied to the unoccupied part of France was seriously considered. Some 68,469 yellow badges were distributed among the Jews of Paris in June, 1942. In July, 1942, Jews were barred from some of the principal streets of Paris. In the same month the Nazis began rounding up some 30,000 Jewish men, women and children, mostly non-French by birth; in August, 1942, their deportation to Poland and western Russia began under the most inhumane conditions. At the same time, all synagogues in Paris and Occupied France were closed by the occupational authorities. According to a Nazi broadcast on the Paris radio on August 11, 1942, a total of 24,914 Jewish-owned firms had been taken over by the Nazis up to that day.

6. Statistics of Jewish Population in Paris:

Year	Jewish Population	General Population
about 1750	150 families
1789	about 500 persons
about 1800	3,000
" 1809	840 families (2,908 persons)
" 1865	30,000
1904	60,000	2,536,834
1925	120,000	2,871,429
1931	175,000	2,829,746 (1936)
1939	about 168,000
1940	110,000 residents (not transients)
1942 (June)	about 70,000

ADOLF KOBER.

Lit.: American Jewish Year Book, vols. 42 and 43 (1940-41 and 1941-42); Anchel, Robert, "The Early History of the Jewish Quarter in Paris," Jewish Social Studies, vol. 2 (1940) 45-60; idem, Napoléon et les juifs (1938); Aronius, Regesten; Contemporary Jewish Record, vols. 3 to 5 (1940, 1941 and 1942); Dubnow, S., Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes, vols. 4 to 10 (1926-29); Gross, Henri, Gallia Judaica (1897) 499-534; Lévy, Louis Germain, in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, pp. 526-39; Tcherikower, E., The Jews in France (Yiddish Scientific Institute—Yivo, 1942); Kahn, Léon, Les juifs à Paris depuis le sixième siècle (1889); Les juifs de Paris au dix-huitième siècle (1894); Les juifs de Paris sous Louis XV (1721-1760) (1892); Les juifs de Paris pendant la Révolution (1898); Histoire des écoles communales et consistoriales israélites de Paris (1809-1884) (1894); Posener, S., "The Immediate Economic and Social Efforts for the Emancipation of the Jews in France," Jewish Social Studies, vol. 1 (1939) 271-326; La question juive (1934) 141-43; Revue des études juives, index, vols. 1 to 50 (1910) 284; ibid., vol. 87 (1929) 137-47; Anchel, Robert, "Les juifs à Paris au XVIIIe siècle," Bulletin de la Société de l'histoire de Paris, vol. 59 (1932) 9-23.

PARKER, DOROTHY ROTHSCHILD, writer, b. West End, N. J., 1893. She was educated in private schools and in a convent. Her first association with literary work was in 1916, when she joined the staff of Vogue. The following year she became affiliated with Vanity Fair, and was its dramatic critic until 1920.

With the rise of a school of sophisticated anti-sentimentalists in American literature, Dorothy Parker's unquestioned talent for the swiftly pathetic and ironical phrase in verse soon made her known for her lyrics. Enough Rope (1926) and Sunset Gun (1928) were her first volumes of verse. Short stories by her also began to appear. In them, as in her witty verse, she recorded her appraisal of the contemporary scene and its heterogeneous cast of men and women. While her barbs of ridicule directed against sentimentality, injustice and hypocrisy were often cruel, back of her mental ruthlessness there undoubtedly was a spiritual vision of the world as it might be if enough decent people lived in it. Her criticisms of society and people, whether in verse or prose, are honest and acutely penetrating. She never points a moral except by indirection. In her way, and in the media of which she became such outstanding a master, she has commented with the skill of a Hogarth on the turbulent twenties and the depressed thirties of the twentieth century. Matching Hogarth's The Harlot's Progress and the famous Marriage a la Mode are her short story revelations in Laments for the Living (1930) and After Such Pleasures, as well as her mordant verse satires in Enough Rope and Sunset Gun.

In the late 1930's Dorothy Parker began to take on a symbolic and legendary character. Anything very clever, especially if possessing a rapier twist, and the author could not be immediately recollected, has been generally ascribed to her. To be sure, she might have said it. Hers has been an infinite capacity for giving pain of the antiseptic kind that points to future cures.

Here Lies, a volume of collected stories, appeared in 1939. Her other books of verse were Death and Taxes (1931); Collected Poems—Not So Deep As A Well (1936) and Sunset Gun (1939). With Elmer Rice, she wrote a play, Close Harmony (1924). ELIAS LIEBERMAN.

PARKES, JAMES WILLIAM, Christian clergyman, champion of the cause of friendly relations between Christianity and Judaism and Christians and Jews, b. England, 1896. He first came into contact with Jewish affairs in connection with his work for the International Students Service for which he visited many universities on the continent. Since 1931 he has actively engaged in searching the records of history of the early relations between Jews and Christians, and has lectured repeatedly against Anti-Semitism. His book, The Jew and His Neighbor, written for the International Students Service in 1931 (New York), was followed by A History of Anti-Semitism, volume I of which was The Conflict of the Church and the Synagogue (1934), and volume 2, The Jew in the Medieval Community (1938). According to Parkes' opinion, Jesus was executed by the Romans. Parkes also published: Jesus, Paul and the Jews (1936); Judaism and Christianity (1937); The Jewish Problem in the Modern World (1939).

PARLAGHY, VILMA, artist, b. Hajdudorog, Hungary, 1864; d. New York city, 1923. She studied painting at the art schools of Budapest and Munich. Living in Berlin, she painted the portraits of the Emperor William II, of the crown prince, and of members of the German aristocracy. She also portrayed Lajos Kossuth in exile (1885). She embraced Christianity and in 1899 married the Russian Prince Lwow. She spent her final years in the United States.

PARLIAMENT, JEWS IN, see PUBLIC OFFICE.

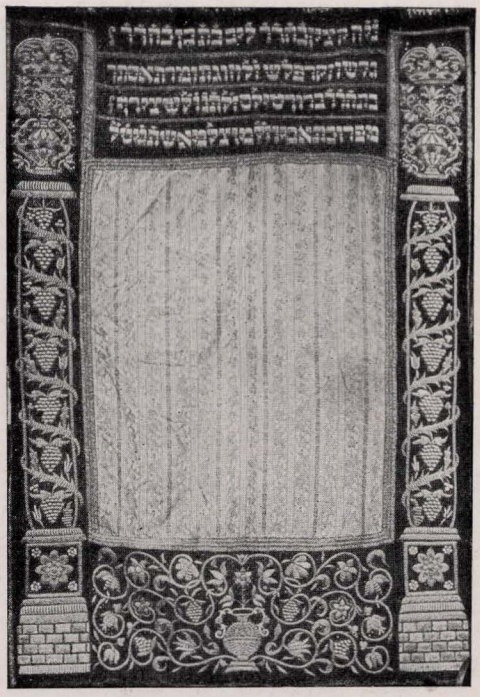
PARMA, city in the Italian province of Emilia, formerly capital of the duchy of Parma, with eighty Jews in a total population of 71,000 (1938). During the Black Death of 1348 many Jews were killed by the infuriated masses, who charged them with having poisoned the wells, although, in the words of a contemporary historian, they were "innocent and inculpable." In the 15th cent., however, the Jews enjoyed the full protection of the rulers; their special privileges were confirmed in 1449 when the city passed from the Viscontis to the Sforzas.

The Parmese Jews were chiefly engaged in the money trade, but there were also a number of outstanding physicians among them. One Elijah, formerly a lecturer in Pavia, is mentioned as a physician to the duke of Parma in 1440; in 1453 the abbess of the St. Quintino Cloister was permitted by Cardinal Bessarione to consult the Jewish physician Giacobbe ("who achieved cures in similar illnesses"); he is perhaps identical with that Giacobbe who cured Ercole I of Ferrara and was highly praised for his skill by the Italian surgeon and anatomist, Jacopo Berengario. Particularly benevolent to the Jews was Galeazzo Maria Sforza who, in 1466, ordered his commissary and lieutenant, Guido Visconti di Battista, to give the Jews every proper favor ("accordar loro ogni onesto favore") and also released them from the duty of wearing the Jew badge (1473); he commanded Visconti to forbid Jew-baiting speeches in the churches, and he allowed the Jews to have their own law courts.

But due to the agitation of Fra Bernardino of Feltre, who achieved the establishment of a municipal pawnshop in order to combat the Jewish money lenders (1488), the condition of the Jews became worse, and many of them retired to neighboring villages. In 1570 they were ordered to wear the Jew badge, and in the same year they were finally expelled from the city. The status of the Jews in the duchy of Parma did not improve until 1803 when, owing to the French occupation, they were granted equal rights with the other citizens. They retained their freedom under the regency of Duchess Maria Louise, wife of Napoleon (1815-47), who even permitted the return of the Jews to the city proper. When Parma was incorporated into the new kingdom of Italy, the Jews were emancipated (1860).

Parma owns the royal Palatinate library which has a priceless collection of Hebrew manuscripts and printed

Parocheth in the Seitenstettengasse synagogue in Vienna



Parocheth (dated 1689) preserved in the Jewish Museum at Prague works, gathered for the greater part by Giovanni Bernardo de Rossi (1742-1831), a non-Jewish Hebraist and professor of oriental languages at the University of Parma.

The Jewish population of Parma shrank from 300 in 1914 to eighty in 1938. In that year the entire province of Parma had only 150 Jews. Their chief rabbi was Enrico della Pergola. The Parmese Jews like the other Italian Jews, were affected by the anti-Jewish legislation which started in Italy in 1938. ALFRED WERNER.

Lit.: Orvieto, A., in Vessillo Israelitico (1895) 323-27, 357-60; Rava, in Educatore Israelita (1870) 169 et seq.; Friedenwald, Harry, "Jewish Physicians in Italy," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 28 (1922) 191.

PARNAS, see FUNCTIONARIES, RELIGIOUS AND COMMUNAL.

PARNAS, JACOB CARL, biochemist and physiologist, b. Tarnopol, Galicia, 1884. He received his Ph.D. degree from the University of Munich, and in 1907 became a lecturer at the University of Strasbourg. Here he remained until 1916, when he became director of the institute of physiology at the University of Warsaw, retaining this post until 1919. In 1921 Parnas was made professor of medical chemistry and head of the department at the University of Lwów.

Parnas wrote many studies and books on various aspects of biochemistry and physiology. Among these were Chemizm Oddychania, in two volumes (1915); Chemja Fizjologiczna (1922) and Kurs practyczny chemji lekarskiej (1923). He also wrote in German and from 1914 on was editor of the Monographien aus dem Gesamtgebiet der Physiologie.

After the outbreak of the German-Russian war in 1941, Parnas was reported from the provisional Russian capital of Kuibyshev to have reached Russian territory safely (1942), although an earlier report had stated that he was executed by the Germans. Parnas had left the Jewish faith.

PARNASAH, PARNOSEH, see PHRASES, POPULAR.

PAROCHETH, a curtain which in many synagogues hangs before the Ark; it is arranged in such a manner than it can be drawn aside or replaced by pulling on ornamental cords. The use of such curtains probably began in the Middle Ages. As a rule they are donated by pious individuals and are richly ornamented with such symbols as the lion of Judah or the crown of the Law, which are wrought in gold embroidery and semi-precious stones. They commonly bear the letters Kaf and Tav, the initials of kether torah, "crown of the Law," as well as inscriptions giving the names of the donors and the occasion of their donation. The favorite color for such curtains is either red or blue; while on the High Holy Days a white Parocheth is sometimes hung in front of the Ark. In modern times the Parocheth is frequently replaced by a metal grill or ornamental doors.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS, see SCHOOLS.

PARODY, see WIT AND HUMOR.

PARRICIDE. Parricide, like infanticide, is unknown as a crime in the Jewish penal code. While in Gen. 4:8 et seq. there is an account of the murder of a brother, nowhere is there an intimation of the murder of a parent or of a child either in the Biblical narrative or in the institutions of the ancient Jewish penal code.

It is characteristic of the Jewish spirit that these crimes which play such a great part in the records of numerous peoples in antiquity remained wholly unknown to Biblical or Talmudic jurisprudence. The reason for it is that the Jewish code is based on the assumption that there is great reverence for parents on the part of children and self-sacrificing love for children on the part of parents. According to the Talmud, the love of a father for his son is so great that a murder is wholly unthinkable (Sanh. 72b). Hence a son who is surprised by his father in a burglarious attempt must not kill him because he must know that his father could not come with murderous intent. On the other hand, in a like situation, with the principals reversed, the father may kill the son, because it is assumed that the latter may have come to commit murder.

PARSHANDATHA, 1. the name of the eldest son of Haman (Esther 9:7); 2. nickname for Rashi.

PARSIISM, the religion of the Parsees, a sect in Persia and India which are descended from the ancient Persians; their religion is in direct line of descent from the ancient Persian religion known as Zoroastrianism or Mazdaism, and therefore can be fairly said to represent the former. Among its main features are the belief in two conflicting powers, Ahura-Mazda, a beneficent and pure deity, and Angro-Mainyus, the god of evil and destruction. Each of these is attended by hundreds of subordinate spirits, the former by the Adityas, Fravashi, and Amesha Spentas, the latter by the Daevas. The two conflicting deities have been at war since the beginning of the world; this conflict is to last through various eras until the expiration of 12,000 years when the evil will be overcome through the agency of a redeemer, the Sayoshiosh, after which the souls of the righteous will be resurrected and inhabit a pure body and enjoy eternal bliss, while those of the wicked will remain in hell. Fire is regarded as sacred, and accordingly the bodies of the dead are not cremated, but exposed to the elements until they fall into dust. The sacred scriptures of Parsiism are the Avesta. The Persian religion, formerly supreme in the Persian empire, and made a state religion under the Sassanides (3rd to 7th cent.), was bitterly persecuted by the Mohammedans and its followers reduced to a comparatively small number.

Scholars have pointed out that Zoroastrianism, or Parsiism, has had an influence upon Judaism from the 5th cent. B.C.E. on. The greatest influence has been in the field of eschatology, angelology and demonology. Although the Bible contains statements about the afterlife and the future hope, these are for the most part derived from the earlier religion of Israel. In the post-Exilic period the old belief in Sheol had died out to such an extent that in Job (about 400 B.C.E.) it is taken for granted that there is no life after death. In the subsequent centuries belief in the resurrection of the dead, an idea derived from the Persians, became an integral part of Pharisaic belief, and from the Pharisees it passed to the people as a whole. Many of the ideas about heaven as expressed in apocalyptic writings are strikingly similar to those in Parsi literature. The transformation of the prophetic picture of the righteous king into the vision of a supernatural Messiah is likewise due to Persian influence, while the division of the world into ages appears to come from the same source, though it is not confined to Persian belief.

The influence of Persian beliefs upon the angelology and demonology of the Jews is not so clearly established, since the Babylonians also believed in angels and demons, and the names of the good and bad spirits mentioned in Jewish literature show no derivations from the Persian. However, it is probable that the fact that both Babylonians and Persians had an angelology and demonology influenced the Jews to create one of their own, which was influenced by both. Thus it is noteworthy that Jewish and Persian beliefs are alike in regarding angels as divine messengers to carry out the will of God, and the demons as the source of all illness and corruption. The character of Satan as depicted in many passages in Jewish literature is very close to that of Angro-Mainyus.

Nevertheless, Judaism did not blindly accept all the teachings of Parsiism. Jews never accepted fire-worship, or accepted the dualism that was so characteristic of the Persian religion. In fact the passage in Deutero-Isaiah (Isa. 45:7): "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil," later incorporated, with one change, into the morning prayers, was deliberately framed as a denial of Persian dualism.

See also: Angels; Avesta; Demons; Dualism; Messiah; Satan. Bernhard Levy.

Lit.: Gaster, M., "Parsiism in Judaism," Hastings, James, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, vol. 9 (1922) 637-40; Jackson, A. V., Zoroaster, the Prophet of Ancient Iran (1896); Kohler, K., Jewish Theology; Kohut, A., Über die jüdische Angelologie und Dämonologie in ihrer Abhängigkeit vom Parsismus (1896); idem, "Was hat die talmudische Eschatologie aus dem Parsismus aufgenommen," Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft (1867) 552 et seq.; Söderblom, in Revue de l'histoire des religions, vol. 48 (1903) 373 et seq.; Scheftelowitz, Isidor, Die altpersische Religion und das Judentum (1920).

PARSONNET, AARON EPHIM, physician, b. Balta, Russia, 1889. After studying in the Gymnasium in Warsaw, Parsonnet came to the United States in 1904. He received his A.B. degree from Loyola University, Chicago, in 1911, and his M.D. and C.M. degrees in 1913. Settling in Newark, N. J., Parsonnet entered the practice of medicine there, subsequently attaining directive posts in the leading hospitals of the vicinity. He was visiting physician and cardiologist-in-chief of Newark Beth Israel Hospital of which his brother Victor Parsonnet (b. Balta, Russia, 1871; d. Newark, N. J., 1920) had been one of the founders and chief-of-staff.

With Albert S. Hyman, Parsonnet was the author of Applied Electrocardiography (1929) and The Failing Heart of Middle Life (1932). In 1933 Parsonnet became a lieutenant-commander in the medical corps of the United States Naval Reserve and he was also instructor in cardiography to flight surgeons of the 3rd Naval District.

PARTHIANS, an Iranic or Iranized people from the region east of the Caspian sea, who founded in the 3rd cent. B.C.E. a powerful empire under the Arsacides, which was expanded to a considerable extent through constant battles with the Seleucidae. By the middle of the 2nd cent. B.C.E. the Parthians were already in possession of all Iranic countries. The victory over Antiochus VII Sidetes (129 B.C.E.) made them the rulers of Babylonia and Mesopotamia with their numerous Jewish population. After 63 the upper and middle Euphrates formed the boundary between the Parthians and Romans with whom they fought for the supremacy of Western Asia.

In 53 B.C.E. the Parthians annihilated the legions of Crassus at Carrhae and in 41 to 40 they defeated Antony and conquered all of Syria and Judea, where they inaugurated Antigonus the Hasmonean as king. Later the Parthians were repelled and then they were fought against by the Romans in their own territories, however, with no lasting result. The Jews in the empire of the Parthians possessed a far reaching self-government with their own state-approved chief (exilarch). About 35 C.E. the brothers Anilai and Asinai succeeded in founding a new free state in the region of the Jewish metropolis Nehardea. The vassals of the Parthians, kings of Adiabene, adopted the Jewish faith about 40 C.E.

Trajan's war with the Parthians (114-17 C.E.) was regarded by the Jews of the Diaspora as the forerunner of national deliverance, and their intensified hopes led to violent rebellions in Cyrene and Cyprus. Trajan, who had advanced to Ctesiphon, the western capital of the Parthians, found himself threatened in the rear by the Jews of Mesopotamia who were faithful to the Parthians. A later war of the Parthians against the Romans (161-65) brought to the former temporary possession of Syria and awoke in the Jews of Palestine new hopes of liberation from Roman rule. However, the Romans were victorious and they drove the Parthians across the Euphrates.

In 198 Emperor Septimus Severus wrested Mesopotamia from the Parthians. Attempts to regain this territory were frustrated. The rule of the Arsacides was tottering. The last Arsacide, Artaban IV, was conquered and overthrown through a rebellion of the New-Persians under their tributary king Ardashir IV (Artaxerxes) of the lineage of the Sassanides. Thus the neo-Persian empire brought the rule of the Parthians to an end.

See also PERSIA.

PARTICULARISM, see UNIVERSALISM AND PARTICULARISM.

PARTNERSHIP (shuttafuth). Partnership is usually defined as the agreement of two or more persons to pursue a definite purpose, usually one of business, on the basis of funds supplied by one or more of them; this is usually on the basis of an oral or written agreement which defines the duties and privileges of each of the partners. This form of association, so familiar in common law, took a long time to become established in Talmudic law because of the primitive economy under which the Jews lived. It was some time before they could extend their law of ownership to cover the idea of an abstract purpose, or to devise an agreement for that purpose. In course of time, the idea of contract in Jewish law was sufficiently extended to permit the creation of a partnership, first to cover definite objects, such as land or chattels, and finally, chiefly through the influence of Maimonides, it reached its fullest extent.

The earliest form of a partnership contract was similar to a labor contract, and took effect only when the parties began to work together. Later came the unrestricted foundation of the company by the "taking hold of a cloak," because, according to the theory of Abraham ben David, the physical capability of one partner became pledged to the other partner. It was, however, customary that artisans intending to carry on their trade jointly agreed that raw materials would be bought by the funds brought in common into the company and that the latter, therefore, was not limited to the division of profit (a kind of productive co-operative). The special document (shetar shuttafuth), often drawn in connection with the partnership, is usually not the basis of the agreement, but serves as a document in evidence in case of differences. The amount of the investment may be fixed in different ways; it also may consist of merchandise. The division of profit and loss, if not provided for otherwise, is made in equal parts (Keth. 93a), without regard to the amount of the capital invested.

Jewish law recognizes a special kind of partnership, in which one party only invests the necessary working capital, while the other party assumes the obligation of managing the business. This is the fictitious partnership ('iska), a half share business, in which the financier ("silent partner") acquires an interest in the business of a merchant to make his capital work profitably under admissible evasion of the prohibition of interest. In this case it is assumed that his investment is given by him to the other party "half as a loan and half into safe-keeping" (B.M. 104b). This legal construction has important consequences in the kind of liability, because the partner, like the taker of the loan, is responsible in case of accident only for that part of the money which had been given to him as a loan, while, like the paid trustee (shomer sachar), he is responsible, in case of minor negligence, for the part of the money which had been given to him for safe-keeping. In this case profit and loss may not be divided equally, because that would be considered a veiled payment of interest on the loan; the investor is entitled rather to only one third of the profit, while the active partner receives two-thirds. The investor must also bear a share of the loss, since without this share in the loss the agreement would be inadmissible on account of the prohibition of interest. When equal participation in profit and loss is desired, this must be provided for by special agreements, in which a compensation of the manager for his activity is stipulated. The document for the establishment of such a partnership contract, shetar 'iska, has therefore obtained great importance in Jewish law, because it is frequently employed on account of the prohibition of interest in Jewish law.

With regard to the mutual obligations of the partners, the kind of management, the prohibition of competition, and the like, the commercial rules of the respective locality are often referred to (minhag hasoherim). The principles of "overreaching" ('ona'ah) have the same application in regard to a partnership as in regard to a purchasing contract. As to the individual provisions of the partnership contract the parties are accorded full freedom, since the principle generally valid for other business transactions is also applied here: "In financial matters an agreement is valid" (Keth. 56a). It is especially emphasized that the partner may not claim the right of Hazakah (presumptive ownership by possession) for himself (B.B. 42a; cf., however, Maimonides, Hilchoth Toen 13:8).

The partnership relation, since it is considered a personal one, is immediately dissolved by the death of a partner, and also as far as the surviving partners are concerned. In the absence of an exact agreement regarding the duration of partnership the dissolution may take place at any time, but may not be demanded inopportunely (B.M. 105a). In case of dissolution the division of the company's assets among the partners takes place according to their number.

A suit for the division of an object owned in partnership according to value is forbidden by Jewish law, but it is admissible only in case of voluntary agreement. A division may take place right away, when each partner obtains a part of the whole corresponding to his share; with different kinds of objects, which can only be divided according to value, the value, which may amount to no less than the sum of its assessment, may be defined by one partner and the other partner is reimbursed accordingly. "You determine (the purchase price), or I shall determine it" (B.B. 13a). Each partner is entitled to commit (obligate) the company; he acts as its representative. Therefore the company can also be considered as a permanent bestowal of mutual power of attorney. This conception was especially familiar to Jewish law, in which the idea of representation is strongly emphasized; this idea also received expression in Maimonides' discussion of the principles of representation and company in his Hilchoth Shelu-hin Veshuttafin.

From the legal point of view a partnership, or rather a community of ownership (communio), consists, as regards the property, of real estate and buildings, either extending into or rising above one another. This legal relation of ownership, since it evidently often occurred at that time, is discussed with the greatest minuteness (B.B. 2a et seq.) because the common ownership of the land may have been the chief cause of the earliest secular formation of a company, which was not extended until later to trade. According to the provisions of the Jewish law of inheritance the co-heirs are considered from the legal point of view as a partnership until the division of the inheritance (B.K. 11b; B.M. 143b). MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Sheluhin Veshuttafin 4 to 10; Auerbach, L., Das jüdische Obligationenrecht, section 50 et seq.; Fuchs, S., "Talmudische Rechtsurkunden," Zeitschrift für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft, vol. 30, p. 274 et seq.

PARUSH, see PHARISEES.

PARVE, see DIETARY LAWS.

PARVUS, see ALEXANDER HELPHAND.

PASADENA, a city in Los Angeles County, California. Its population, according to the 1940 census, was 81,864, of whom approximately 1,500 were Jews. Although Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services were held in Pasadena as early as 1907, it was not until 1923 that the first synagogue, Temple B'nai Israel, was built. The Temple, which adheres to the Conservative ritual, moved into a new building in 1942. David Cohen was made rabbi in 1940. His predecessor was Jacob Halevi, who served from 1933 to 1940.

Among the additional Jewish organizations in Pasadena in 1942 were a school community center and library, the Temple B'nai Israel religious school, and the Jewish Community Center. There was a chapter of the Hadassah in the city, and a B'nai B'rith lodge. Because of the universities in Pasadena, there was also a transient Jewish population of students.

Among the Jews affiliated with the universities were Dorothy Walter Baruch, assistant professor of education at Whittier College; Paul Sophus Epstein, professor of mathematics at the California Institute of Technology; and Beno Gutenberg, professor of geophysics and meteorology at the California Institute of Technology.

PASCAL, ERNEST, author, b. London, 1896. He was educated in London, then came to the United States. Pascal was the author of many short stories and of several novels, among which were The Dark Swan, The Virgin Flame, Cynthia Codentry and The Marriage Bed. Early in the 1930's Pascal went to Hollywood, where he became affiliated with the motion picture industry. Among the film scripts on which he collaborated were Lloyds of London (1936); Kidnapped (1938); Hound of the Baskervilles (1939) and The Blue Bird (1940).

PASCAL, JOSEPH IRVING, opthalmologist, b. Shakee, province of Kovno, Lithuania, 1890. He was brought to the United States in 1901. Pascal graduated in optometry (1914) from the Rochester School of Optometry. He continued his studies, however, and prepared for a medical career at the Columbia College of Physicians and Surgeons. He received an M.D. at the University of Vienna in 1930.

Pascal founded the American Institute of Optometry in 1914, and remained its director until 1928. After receiving his medical degree, he established practice as an opthalmologist. He was the inventor of the Pascal photoscope, the Turville-Pascal dynascope, the Pascal balance charts, and several other instruments used in ophthalmology. He was the author of Modern Retinoscopy (1930) and Visual Exercises in Ametropia (1933).

Lit.: Kagan, S. R., Jewish Contributions to Medicine in America (1939) 708.

PASCH, MORITZ, mathematician, b. Breslau, Germany, 1843; d. Giessen, Germany, 1930. He became full professor (1875) at the University of Giessen. In 1911 Pasch retired from active work at the university but continued to write. Among his important works are: Vorlesungen über neuere Geometrie (1882, with a supplement by H. Dehn, 1926); Grundlagen der Analysis: Veränderliche und Funktion (1914); Mathematik und Logik (1919) and Mathematik in Ursprung.

Lit.: Poggendorff, Biographisch-Literarisches Handwörterbuch zur Geschichte der Exakten Wissenschaften.

PASCHAL LAMB, the offering which, according to Ex. 12, was slaughtered by the Israelites at the time of the Exodus from Egypt. According to the story the sacrificial animal, a young male sheep or goat, was ordered by Moses to be set aside on the 10th of Nisan and slaughtered and eaten on the 14th, about evening. The blood of the sacrifice was smeared upon the side posts and upper doorpost, in order that when the destroying angel came to slay the first-born of the Egyptians, he would "pass over" and spare the houses of the Israelites. The lamb was to be roasted, and then eaten with leavened bread (Matzoth) and bitter herbs by family groups. The partakers of this meal were to be prepared for a journey, with loins girded, staff in hand, and shoes on their feet (verse 11). Care was to be taken that no bone of the animal was broken, and that not a bit of the meat was left by morning.

This story of the first paschal lamb, as related in the Bible, became the pattern for the observance of Passover during the period of the Temple, but with a few modifications. Thus the sacrifice took place in the sanctuary and the blood was sprinkled upon the altar. The Pharisees and Sadducees had a dispute as to the time when the slaughtering should take place; the former held it should be in the last three hours before sunset, the latter, between sunset and nightfall. While the sacrifices were being made, the Levites sang Hallel Psalms; these psalms were later sung by the participants in the paschal meal, and many of them glorified the Exodus and the significance of the festival. With the destruction of the Second Temple the Jews ceased to sacrifice the paschal lamb, and only the lamb-bone on the Seder table recalls it; the Samaritans have retained the ancient rite to the present day.

Bible scholars regard the offering of the paschal lamb as probably being the recasting of an ancient feast of the first-born. Christianity made use of the idea, making Jesus the paschal lamb of the world. It is perhaps for this reason that the three Synoptic Gospels describe the Last Supper as being a Passover meal (Matt. 26:17-20 and parallels).

Lit.: The Biblical dictionaries and encyclopedias, and the commentaries on Exodus.

PASCHELES, WOLF, author and publisher, b. Prague, 1814; d. Prague, 1857. In 1828 he published a small prayerbook, Deutsche Gebete für Frauen, which brought him sufficient money to open a small Hebrew book store. His project (1846) of collecting Jewish legends and publishing them together with biographies of famous Jews and with Jewish short stories was so successful that a new edition of these Sippurim had to be printed. Among the contributors to this work, which appeared in numerous volumes, were such writers and scholars as Salomon Kohn, Isaac Marcus Jost, Raphael J. Fürstenthal, and Saul Isaac Kaempf. A new abridged and revised edition of the Sippurim was published in 1937 under the title, Die goldene Gasse (edit. Heinz Politzer).

In 1849 Pascheles issued a textbook of the Hebrew language in German which was in great demand, and in 1852 he founded Pascheles' Illustrierter Jüdischer Volkskalender, a year-book which was published posthumously by his son until 1869. Pascheles' miniature edition of the Pentateuch, with German translation by Heymann Arnheim, rabbi of Glogau, became very popular.

PASCIN, JULES, (originally JULIUS PINCAS) artist, b. Vidin, Bulgaria, 1885; d. Paris, 1930. He spent his youth in Vienna where he received his first powerfully stimulating artistic impulse from an exhibition of French impressionists. Afterwards he spent some time at Bucharest with his father, a grain merchant, and he was always grateful for that business experience, claiming that it liberated him from the influence of schools and brought him into contact with everyday life. His witty drawings came to the notice of the German magazine Simplicissimus and his success as an illustrator enabled him to go to Paris in 1905. There he became a member of a group of young artists, all foreigners in France, whose plan for a collective exhibit, under the group name the "Dôme," was shattered by the outbreak of the first World War. Pascin then began to make periodic visits to America down to the time of his death by suicide. He became a citizen of the United States, where he visited the Southern states. He also traveled in the West Indies, where he discovered the peculiar beauties of ebon-hued Americans, and in Havana where he had a studio for a time. He called into existence a hitherto unexpressed type of woman, and tropical America revealed that he had a rare original feeling for warm color.

Pascin's work offers a stumbling block to the layman and by the choice of its subjects—many of which are never mentioned in polite society—encourages the raising of moral issues which should not enter into an attempt to analyse artistic values. The wings of his blasé cupids are stained with the mud of the gutter and his insolent chauffeurs, monstrous women, deformed criminals, vicious, emaciated children, uncanny animals, and careless inmates of the harem all call to mind Kraft-Ebing's or Otto Weininger's unpleasant theories. Pascin's works should be judged as the creations of a piercing observer who gave intense vitality to everything he touched. Like so much of the work of Forain, Beardsley, Tolouse and Rops, the drawings of Pascin are superficially perverse, but really they are powerful social satires. They have also a Gallic charm, traceable to Watteau. He made many studies from life which may be recognized by their rapturous, violent color, but his finished compositions were only rarely transcripts from nature. Some of the expressive sketches by the greatest masters strike the same note as the works of Pascin, and that accounts for the enthusiasm which art collectors evinced for his work. Exhibitions of his paintings were held at New York city in 1929 and in 1931. MARTIN BIRNBAUM.

Lit.: Fels, Propos d'Artistes (Paris, 1925); Scheffler in Kunst und Künstler (1914) 585; New York Times, June 6, 1930; Charensol, Jules Pascin (Paris, 1928).

PASHTA, see CANTILLATION.

PASMANEK, DANIEL. writer, b. Gediatch, province of Poltava, Russia, 1869; d. Paris, France, 1930. From 1887 to 1892 he studied medicine in Zurich, then he went to Bulgaria, where he finished his medical course and began his literary work. Pasmanek's first writing was in anti-Socialist newspapers. While in Bulgaria, Pasmanek also wrote for Die Zeit in Vienna and was the author of Die synthetische Geschichtsauffassung.

Returning to Switzerland in 1899, Pasmanek settled in Geneva, where he became an instructor in medicine at the university. At this time, too, he joined the Zionist movement, and wrote a great deal for it. In 1905 he went to Russia, and was admitted to the practice of medicine. Prior to the outbreak of the first World War Pasmanek's pro-Zionist writings appeared in many Yiddish publications in Russia, although he wrote mostly in Russian and German.

During the war he was in the army, and at its end he was in Crimea, recovering from a serious illness. Here he joined the anti-Bolshevist movement, and in 1919 went to Paris where, from 1920 to 1922 he was co-editor of Obschay Dyelo, an anti-Communist paper. His articles had appeared in Yevraiski Zhizn and Rassvyet; many of his books were translated into Yiddish from his original manuscripts in German and Russian; Die Seele Israels: zur Psychologie des Diasporajudentums (Cologne, 1911) was translated into several other languages, including Hebrew. His Qu'est-ce le Judaisme? was published at Paris in 1930.

Lit.: Reisen, Z., Lexikon fun der Yiddisher Literatur, Presse un Filologie, vol. 2 (1930), cols. 866-8.

PASSAIC, a city in the northern part of New Jersey, about twelve and one half miles from New York city. Its population in 1941 was 61,394, of whom about 13,000 were Jews. As early as the year 1893 Congregation B'nai Jacob was founded, and shortly afterward the first philanthropic group, the Passaic Hebrew Benevolent Society.

Despite its proximity to New York city, Passaic is not a suburban community, but an independent industrial city, containing many textile mills. The Jewish inhabitants of the city either directly or indirectly derive their livelihood from the manufacturing enterprises, to a great extent indirectly, since about two-fifths of them were engaged in trade (1937). This proportion is approximately four times that found in the non-Jewish population of the community. The manufacturing industries occupied 22.5 per cent of the Jews and professions and clerical work about 25 per cent. Some 60 per cent of the Jewish population of Passaic in 1937 was native born, but about two-thirds of the Jewish households in the city were headed by foreign-born persons.

There were eight synagogues in Passaic (1942), seven Orthodox and one Conservative. B'nai Jacob, the first congregation established in the city, remained an adherent of the Orthodox ritual. Its rabbi in 1942 was Jacob Katzen. The other Orthodox synagogues in Passaic are the Adas Israel Congregation (Leon Katz, rabbi), Chevra Tehilim, of which Joseph Rosen is rabbi, Congregation Tifereth Israel, whose rabbi is M. Chapler, and the Hungarian Hebrew Synagogue, of which Kalman Kellner is the rabbi. The Bikur Cholim and Beth Israel synagogues have no rabbis. Temple Emanuel, the one Conservative Congregation in Passaic, has Max Zucker for rabbi. Its large building was partly destroyed by fire in 1939.

Most of the synagogues have various affiliated organizations, including Hebrew schools and auxiliaries. Beth Israel Hospital was founded in 1927 mainly through the efforts of Esther Pinck. The Jewish Old Age Home was established in 1923. There are branches of the various Zionist groups in Passaic and numerous local philanthropies. The Jewish Community Council of Passaic and vicinity, organized in 1933, is headed by Victor Greenberg, president, and Morris Novitsky, executive director; it administers the United Jewish Relief Campaign.

Among the Jews of Passaic who have held public office are M. Metz Cohn, who was made a member of the State Unemployment Commission in 1939, Edward A. Levy, who was municipal court judge from 1937 to 1940, and Oscar Wilensky, who served in the State Assembly from 1934 to 1938 and was elected to the State Senate in 1938. Julius Cinamon was made police commissioner in 1939.

LEON KATZ.

Lit.: Robison, S. M., "Some Characteristics of Trenton and Passaic Jews," Jewish Social Studies, vol. 2 (1940) 249-54.

PASSAU, city in Lower Bavaria, Germany, which in 1933 numbered twenty Jews out of a general population of 25,000. In 1942, as a result of the Nazi regulations, no Jews were left there.

Although Jews are mentioned in the early records (903) of the customs rules of Raffelstätten, which regulated trade between Bavaria and Bohemia, their presence in Passau can be traced back only until about the end of the 12th cent. The Jews settled originally in the old city, but subsequently they started a settlement on the right bank of the Ilz, in the region where this river empties into the Danube. In Passau they were under the jurisdiction of the bishopric; the bishops were the princes of the old German empire. In the beginning their situation in this pontifical principality was quite favorable, because of their economic importance. But in 1210 they were plundered; they were, however, compensated with 400 silver marks, which constituted a considerable amount at that time. In 1244 the bishop of Passau signed the then concluded public peace treaty between Bavaria and Salzburg, which permitted only the Jews to take any interest and only two-pfennig-per-pound at that. In 1260 the bishop promised the Jews a two years' exemption from taxes and customs as a remuneration for a loan which they granted him.

The Jews of Passau were affected also by the decree of the provincial synods of the archbishopric of Salzburg, adopted in Vienna in 1267, which tended to separate the Jews from the Christians; it appears, however, that these decrees were not rigorously enforced in Passau. Whether the persecutions of the Jews before and at the time of the Black Death (1337 and 1349) affected the Jews of Passau, too, is not certain. But in all probability, the Jews were imprisoned in consequence of the edict, by King Wenceslaus, cancelling debts due the Jews, but were released in 1390. In connection with the Trent case (1475), a trial of the Jews took place also in Passau in 1478, as a result of which the accused were condemned for desecrating the host. Some forty Jews, including their wives and children, embraced Christianity while the rest were expelled in perpetuity. The Jews' houses and synagogues were demolished after the trial, and the St. Salvator Church was erected in place of the synagogue; in the 20th cent. evidences of that trial were still shown. Thereafter, aside from temporary visits by Jews, there was no permanent Jewish settlement in Passau until the 19th cent., when the city was secularized.

JOSEF MEISL.

Lit.: Aronius, Julius, Regesten, Nos. 380, 549, 623; Salfeld, S., Das Martyrologium des Nürnberger Memorbuches (1898); Stern, M., in Jeschurun (1928) 541-60, 647-76; Schmid, W. M., "Zur Geschichte der Juden in Passau," Zeitschrift für Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland, (1929) part 2, pp. 119-35; Der Grosse Brockhaus, vol. 14, pp. 218-24.

PASSOVER (PESACH), name of a Jewish festival which begins on the 14th of Nisan (the first Hebrew month, corresponding roughly to the latter part of March and the first part of April) and lasts for eight days (according to the Bible, only seven days; cf. Ex. 12:15; 34:18; Lev. 23:6; Num. 28:17; Deut. 16:3). Only the first two and the last two days of the festival are observed as full holy days. According to the Bible, only the first and seventh days are so observed; Reform Jews in the United States and other countries keep Passover for only seven days, observing the first and seventh days as holy. The intermediate days of Passover are Hol Hamoed (half-holidays, literally the profane [days] of the festival). The first two evenings of the festival are called Seder evenings, because on them there is held a rather lengthy service in the house in accordance with an exactly prescribed "order" (in Hebrew the word Seder means order). However, Reform Jews usually observe only one Seder, that on the first night.

In Ex. 12:42 the evening before the first day of Passover is called lel shimmurim ("a night of observation"), according to the traditional interpretation because God's love had for a long time been directed to this particular night as the night of the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egypt (see Rashi to the passage); according to more recent commentators, the expression means "night of guarding," i.e. from destruction. Passover is celebrated in reminiscence of the freeing of Israel from Egyptian slavery. The unleavened bread, or Matzoth, which are eaten throughout the Passover are to remind the Hebrews of "the bread of affliction" (Deut. 16:3), of the wretchedness of the Hebrews during their enslavement in Egypt, also of the haste with which the Hebrews left Egypt when the hour of their deliverance had finally struck (Ex. 12:39). In the Biblical period Passover was likewise celebrated as the first of the three pilgrimage festivals which were connected with the harvests and harvest-life in ancient Palestine. The festival of Passover signalized the beginning of the barley harvest in Palestine.

As is indicated by the two names for Passover, i.e. hag hapesah and hag hamatzoth, "festival of the Passover offering" and "festival of the unleavened bread," the festival presumably had a two-fold origin. As the festival of the unleavened bread, which was made from the new grain which could not be eaten before that and was therefore made quickly and hence without the use of leaven, it points to an agricultural civilization which was already in existence, hence to the period after the entrance of the Hebrews into Palestine. The festival of the Passover offering, on the other hand, which was subsequently merged with the former, indicates a nomadic period as the time of its origin. The original character of this latter Passover festival is obscure. According to the view of many scholars, it was a lunar festival (connected with the worship of the moon) because it began with a nocturnal celebration; according to others, however, it was a solar festival (connected with the worship of the sun) which was related to the entrance of the sun into the zodiacal sign of the ram in the spring; a solar festival of this kind was observed also by the ancient Egyptians and Babylonians. Many scholars interpret the word Pesach as "ritual circular dance," and connect the festival with a spring festival of the Arabians; still others regard it as the festival of the bringing of the offering of the first-born of the herds.

Pages from the Haggadah written (1650) by Abraham the Scribe of Eirengen. Original in the Jewish Museum of London

Many investigators believe that Passover may originally have been a festival by means of which the house was to be protected against pestilence; they base their view on the rite of sprinkling the threshold and the door-post with blood, as a result of which a closer communion with the protecting deity was believed to be achieved. It is quite possible that in the pre-Canaanite period a festival of this character, containing also elements of other festivals, was merged with an original festival of the sacrifice of the first-born. After the entrance of the Hebrews into Palestine this Passover, in view of the predominantly agricultural character of the civilization of the land, became a festival of the bringing of the first-born of cattle and flocks, which automatically became combined with the festival of the bringing of the first-fruits of the grain. The Passover festival and the festival of the unleavened bread which had thus been combined then finally, as the historical consciousness of Israel began to take form, was made the fitting occasion for a celebration in memory of the redemption of Israel from Egypt, in which the freedom-loving Hebrews perceived one of the greatest benevolent acts of their God. The ritual of the sprinkling of the blood, the offering of the first-born, and the unleavened bread all were naturally connected with the reminiscences of the redemption from Egypt. Because of its profound and extraordinary significance both for the popular consciousness and for the historical life of Israel, the month of the redemption from Egypt now became "the beginning of months" (Ex. 12:2), and the idea of the deliverance became the culminating idea of the festival. Indeed, after the second destruction of Jerusalem (70 C.E.), this became the sole idea, wherefor this festival is always called "the time of our deliverance" in the prayer-book.

In the subsequent periods of the dispersal and oppression of Israel, this significance of the festival was still further amplified in that there became associated with the "Passover of Egypt" also the idea of the "Passover of the future," i.e. the hope for Israel's redemption from exile and dispersal. Thus Passover became the festival of the future deliverance, corresponding to the originally strong love of freedom and profound desire for redemption which the Jewish people possessed. This two-fold character of Passover is expressed in the poetical insertions of the festival prayer and by the Haggadah booklet, which forms the basis for the family service held in the home on the Seder evenings.

The festival liturgy, in so far as it originated in the Talmudic period, corresponds to that of the two other pilgrimage festivals. However, beginning with the first half-holiday (the first day of Hol Hamoed Pesach), only the half-Hallel is recited, because, as the Midrash states, the redemption of Israel could be effected only through the destruction of the Egyptians, who were also the creatures of God. On the first day of Passover, with reference to the growth of vegetation in Palestine, a prayer for the granting of dew is inserted. On the eighth day, in Eastern Europe, in Eastern Germany, and in some of the Western countries, including the United States, a memorial service (Hazkarath Neshamoth; frequently called also Yizkor) is held. On the Sabbath of Hol Hamoed Pesach the Song of Songs is read, which is interpreted as being symbolical of the love which binds Israel to God and for which the deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage represents the expression of the awakening love of the bridegroom for the bride. On the day before Passover (the day preceding Ereb Pesach) there is a fast of the first-born (ta'anith bechorim), in remembrance of the sparing of the first-born of the Israelites on the night of the deliverance from Egypt; however, the regulations concerning this fast of the first-born have been liberally interpreted even among Orthodox and Conservative Jews. When the day before Ereb Pesach falls on a Sabbath, the fast of the first-born is held on the preceding Thursday.

The Greek Orthodox church originally celebrated Easter on the 14th of Nisan, in accordance with the Jewish custom. However, the Roman Catholic church always observes Easter on the Sunday after the spring full moon. The latter became the usual Christian practice toward the end of the so-called "Pasah dispute" (325).

See also: SEDER. MAX JOSEPH.

Lit.: Marti, Geschichte der israelitischen Religion; Lehrman, The Jewish Festivals; Adlerblum, A Perspective of Jewish Life, 20-29; Abrahams, Festival Studies, 1-4, 40-57, 103-10, 167-73.

PASSOVER LAMB, PASSOVER SACRIFICE, see PASCHAL LAMB.

PASSOVER, ALEXANDER YAKOVLEVITCH, jurist, b. Umanny, province of Kiev, Russia, 1840; d. St. Petersburg, 1910. He graduated in law from the University of Moscow in 1861. After some time as a deputy prosecutor in the Russian ministry of justice, Passover became an attorney in Odessa in 1871. In 1874 he moved to St. Petersburg. His reputation in Russian law was recognized in other countries as well, and his services, in the practical and theoretical divisions of his profession, were frequently called on by citizens of other lands. Although he published little under his own name, his contributions to Russian legal literature were significant.

Passover's affiliation with the Jewish community was open, but he was not active in political movements. During his residence in Odessa a pogrom occurred, and Passover was one of the group of Jewish lawyers who organized legal assistance for the victims and an investigation into the causes of the outbreak. At his suggestion, also, a survey of Jewish participation in handicrafts and a general survey of the economic conditions of the Russian Jews were made.

Lit.: Yevreiskaya Entziklopedia, vol. 12, cols. 314-16.

PASTERNACK, JOSEF ALEXANDER, conductor, b. Czenstochowa, Poland, 1880; d. Chicago, 1940. He was a pupil of Michalowski and Nosowski at the Warsaw Conservatory. In 1896, he came to the United States where, for a short period, he toured as concert pianist. For ten years, he served as solo violist with the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House. In 1909, he became assistant conductor at the Metropolitan, and from 1910 to 1913 he conducted its Sunday concerts. For the next few years he filled numerous assignments as conductor, with the Century Opera Company, the Philadelphia Philharmonic, and the Boston Symphony "Pops" Orchestra. In 1916, he was appointed music director of the Victor Phonograph Company, holding this post until 1927, when he associated himself with the radio and directed numerous orchestral concerts over the N.B.C. He made many excellent orchestral arrangements of musical favorites, and wrote an engaging operetta, Countess Clou (1918).

A rare Passover plate. Reproduced by courtesy of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America

PASTERNAK, BORIS LEONIDOVICH, Russian poet, b. Russia, 1890. Among his early books of poetry in Russian were Twin in the Clouds (1914) and Above the Barriers (1917), both showing a tendency to keep himself apart from the political events of the time. However, when Mayakovsky presented Russian poets with the problem of actively serving the revolution, Pasternak tore himself away from his futuristic leanings and from the groups which saw art as bare form. His poems 1905 (1925-26) and Lieutenant Schmidt (1926-7) portrayed the events of the 1905 Russian revolution. Even there, however, he lapsed into lyricism and concerned himself mainly with the personal fate of the hero of his poem.

Pasternak was most successful in his translations into Russian of the Soviet Georgian poets, (Georgian Lyrics, 1935). The most noteworthy of his prose books was his volume of memoirs in Russian, Protective Charter (1931). Early in 1940 a new three-volume set of Pasternak's poems was published, containing some new as well as old poems. In 1942 Pasternak was living in Moscow.

Lit.: Malaia Entziklopedia (1931); Bolshaya Entziklopedia (1939).

PASTERNAK, JOSEPH, motion picture producer, b. Szilágy-Somlyó, Hungary, 1901. In the United States since 1921, he was associated with the film industry since 1923. From 1928 on he produced motion pictures for Universal Pictures Co. in Germany, Austria and Hungary.

From 1936 on he produced notably for the same film company in the United States: Three Smart Girls; One Hundred Men and a Girl; I'm Mad About Music (1937); Youth Takes a Fling; That Certain Age (1938); Three Smart Girls Grow Up; First Love; It's a Date; Spring Parade; Little Bit of Heaven; Seven Sinners (1940); Nice Girl; It Started with Eve (1941); also Flame of New Orleans; Destry Rides Again. In 1942 he was producing Seven Sweethearts for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures.

PASTERNAK, LEONID OSIPOVICH, painter and etcher, b. Odessa, Russia, 1862. He received the degree of attorney-at-law from the University of Moscow and studied painting under Sorokin and at Munich under Herterich and Liezen-Mayer. From 1894 to 1921 he was professor in the Moscow School of Art.

Pasternak's first great painting, A Letter from Home, was exhibited at the Paris Exposition (1889) and was purchased by the Moscow Museum. His Students Before Examination (1895) was acquired by the Luxembourg Museum in Paris and won for him the Gold Medal award. Tolstoy in the Family Circle (1900) is one of his major paintings in the Leningrad Museum.

In 1921 he settled in Berlin and established himself as a portrait painter. The portraits painted by him include those of Nachman Bialik, Lovis Corinth, Mischa Elman, Albert Einstein, Adolf von Harnack, Gerhard Hauptmann, Reiner Maria Rilke, Zalman Shneur, Nahum Sokolov, Gustav Stresemann, Leo Tolstoi, Saul Tchernichovsky, Emile Verhaeren and Chaim Weizmann. His portrait of Albert Einstein was exhibited permanently at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In 1924 Pasternak visited Palestine and exhibited water colors and drawings in Berlin in 1927. Among his major works are also: In the School for the Blind (1890); Homeward; Hour of Creation (1893); Where To? as well as his self-portraits and his drawings for Tolstoi's novel Resurrection. He published in Hebrew and Yiddish a book on Rembrandt and the Jews (1923). Pasternak also wrote some autobiographical sketches for a book published by Max Osborn: Leonid Pasternak, mit vier Fragmenten aus der Selbstbiographie des Künstlers (1932). In honor of his seventieth birthday a collection of his works was published in book form (Warsaw, 1932).

In 1938 Pasternak removed to England where he was reported to be residing in 1942.

PÁSZTOR, ÁRPÁD, author and publicist, b. Ungvár, Hungary, 1877. He became a journalist in Budapest and travelled a great deal, being the first newspaperman to interview Tolstoi for a foreign publication. In the United States he familiarized himself with the works of Edgar Allan Poe and Walt Whitman; he translated into Hungarian the latter's Leaves of Grass.

The varied experiences of his trip around the world were told in the volumes Tengeren, tengeren túl (On and Across the Sea); Budapesttől a föld körül Budapestig (From Budapest around the World to Budapest); Kanadától Panamáig (From Canada to Panama); Tolstoj tragédiája (The Tragedy of Tolstoi); E. A. Poe; Walt Whitman; Találkoztam Poe Edgarral (I Have Met Edgar Poe); Pintér Mari Amerikába megy (Mari Pintér Goes to America); Newyork (New York).

Pásztor also published several volumes of original poetry as well as fiction. His novel Vengerkák, a poignant story about the victims of white slave traffic in Russia, was converted into a successful play. He wrote a dozen or more plays and operettas for the Hungarian stage. His play Innocent was performed in the United States. He embraced the Christian faith.

Jewish street musicians in Prague. From a sketch by Leonid Pasternak

PATAI, JÓZSEF, Hebrew and Hungarian writer, editor and translator, b. Gyöngyöspata, Hungary, 1882. He was living at Budapest in 1942. He studied at various Hungarian Yeshivas, at the Gymnasium of Nyitra, and at the rabbinical seminary of Budapest. In 1907 he received the Ph.D. degree from the University of Budapest. He taught Hungarian and German literature in one of the high schools of Budapest until 1919 and contributed to the Hungarian Jewish weekly Egyenlöség, which combatted Zionism. However, Patai, a fine Hebrew poet (he published the volume Shaashue Alumim in 1902), hearkened to the call of the Jewish renascence. From 1911 on he devoted the illustrated Hungarian monthly, Mult és Jövö (Past and Future), to the propagation of cultural Zionism. By acquainting his public with contemporary Hebrew poetry and art, by lecturing on Palestine, arranging for trips to that country, and as one of the leading figures in the Hungarian Pro Palesztina League, Patai was in his time the most effective exponent of Zionism in Hungary.

Among his published books are: Zsidó irások (Jewish Writings; 3 vols.); Politika nélkül (Without Politics); Kabbala, stories from Hasidic life (German version by Leo Singer; partly translated also into French); Középsö kapu (The Middle Gate), scenes from Heder life, (German version by Lajos Bató, 1936); Babilon vizein (At the Waters of Babylon; poems, two editions); Szulamit, látod a lángot? (Shulamith, Do you See the Flame?), poems; Feltámadó Szentföld (The Holy Land Resurrected), travel impressions; Herzl, a biography (1932; Hebrew version by J. L. Baruch, 1936). In 1938 three volumes of his collected works were published: Harc a zsidó kulturáért (Struggle for Jewish Culture); Lelkek és titkok (Souls and Mysteries); Az uj Palesztina utjain (On the Pathways of the New Palestine).

Patai's translations from Hebrew poets, ranging from Eleazar Kalir to those of the 20th cent., filled five volumes: Héber költök (1922). He also published for the first time certain medieval Hebrew poems from the manuscripts in the Bodleian Library. In 1939 there appeared in Jerusalem his Misefune Hashirah (From the Hidden Treasures of Poetry). Some of Patai's own poetry was translated into English and Hebrew. He edited Magyar Zsidó Könyvtár, a series of Jewish publications; Magyar Zsidó Almanach, a year book; and A biblia képekben, artistic plates illustrating the Bible.

From 1940 to 1941 he lectured in Hebrew at The Hebrew University, Jerusalem, on Jewish authors in Hungarian literature.

EDIT PATAI (née Ehrenfeld), poet and critic (b. Nagyvárad, Hungary, 1889), was the wife of József Patai. Her Hungarian poetry is suffused with Jewish feeling. She published the volume Engem is hiv a föld (The Land Calls Me Too; 1927). Her novel, Szent Szomjuság (Sacred Thirst; 1936; 2nd ed., 1937), gives a complete picture of life in the new Palestine. It received the award of the IMIT (Jewish Hungarian Literary Society).

RAFAEL (ERWIN GYÖRGY) PATAI was a son of József and Edit Patai. He received the Ph.D. degree from the University of Budapest in 1933, his thesis being on the poetry of Israel Berachya Fontanella and Judah Fontanella, which he himself translated into Hebrew. In 1936 he was the first to receive the Ph.D. degree from The Hebrew University, Jerusalem, for his work Hamayim (The Water). For that work he shared with Professor Segal of The Hebrew University (1937) the Bialik prize offered by the city of Tel Aviv. He contributed articles on Biblical folklore and the history of the Jews in Hungary to the Palestinian publications Doar Hayom, Haaretz, Moznayim and Tziyyoni Hakelali, and to the Budapest journal Hatzofeh. Patai wrote for the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia the major part of the article on Hungary. He was ordained in 1936 at the rabbinical seminary of Budapest. In 1938, in collaboration with Zebi Wohlmuth, he published Mibhar Hasippur Haeretz-yisraeli, a prose anthology from twenty-seven Palestinian authors, with brief bio-bibliographical notes and an introduction by Joseph Klausner. ANNA BETTELHEIM.

PATER SYNAGOGAE (Father of the Synagogue). Among the functionaries of the synagogue in Cologne, the Theodosian Code (331 C.E.) includes "fathers of the synagogue" (patres synagogae) who are exempted from tax payments. This office, while very common, must not be confused with that of the presbytery. The fact that "mother of the synagogue" also occurs shows that no official position was hereby designated, and that, on the contrary, it was an honorary title bestowed upon those who had contributed special services to the welfare of the community. Only thus can one explain the fact that one and the same person could receive the title from more than one congregation. That the title was highly regarded can be gleaned from a Roman inscription in which the husband of the deceased is designated as the brother of T. Claudius, Synesius, "father of the synagogue." The fathers and mothers of the synagogue were accordingly helpers of the community, which bestowed upon them this title of honor. The title Pater Synagogae is found in inscriptions for the communities of Smyrna, Rome, Volubilis and Sitifir. Pater, alone, as a title of honor, is found in inscriptions in Rome, Venosa, Castel Porziano, and Milan. The expanded title pater tou stematos (father of the community) appears in Smyrna, pater laou (father of the people) in Mantinea, and both pater Judaeorum (father of the Jews), and pater patrum (father of the fathers) in Magona. "Mothers of the synagogues" are mentioned in inscriptions in Rome and Brescia. A Venosa inscription praises a Pateressa.

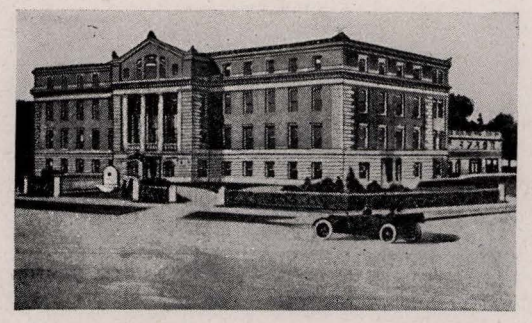
PATERSON, a city in northeastern New Jersey, about seventeen miles from New York city, with a population (1940) of 139,656, of whom about 23,000 were Jews. Information is meager about the early history of the Jews in Paterson, which was founded in 1791 by Alexander Hamilton; but there must have been a fairly large Jewish community in the early nineteenth century, for the first congregation in the city was organized in 1847. This was Congregation B'nai Jeshurun, now known as the Nathan Barnert Memorial Temple (Reform). Services were held for years in a room in a private residence; in 1858 a residence was purchased and fitted up as a synagogue; in 1877 the congregation moved to a more commodious home; and in 1894 it erected its present building, a gift from Nathan Barnert, after whom the congregation is now named. Myer S. Hood, who was engaged in 1883, was the first rabbi of B'nai Jeshurun. Max Raisin, elected in 1921, was serving in 1942. Early rabbis of Barnert Memorial Temple included Herman Bleichrode, Jacob S. Jacobson, Solomon Bergman, A. Brasch and Max Molle. Later rabbis of B'nai Jeshurun were Abram S. Isaacs, Eli Mayer, Leo Mannheimer, Marius Ranson and Harry R. Richmond.

Temple Emanu-El (Conservative), which had the largest congregation in the city, was founded in 1904. Its original building was erected in 1907 and in 1929 it moved into its new location, which houses a beautiful Temple and Hebrew School, in the city's finest residential section. Reuben Kaufman was rabbi (1928-). Early rabbis of Temple Emanu-El included J. Bril, J. Kleinfeld, Louis Goetz and Ludwig Roeder. Congregation B'nai Israel was organized by the Orthodox Jews of the city in 1886 and rented its meeting rooms until its own building was erected in 1897. The rabbi in 1942 was William Wittenstein. Other congregations in Paterson in 1942, both Orthodox, were Ahavath Joseph, of which Bezalel Cohen was rabbi, and Linath Hazedek, of which Leon Buckin was rabbi. There were in addition several smaller congregations, designed to serve the inhabitants of particular residential sections, and presided over by Rabbis Cohen or Wittenstein.

Hebrew schools in the city include Abraham M. Fabian Memorial Hebrew School, which is connected with the Temple Emanu-El; Miriam Barnert Memorial Hebrew Free School, the gift of Nathan Barnert; Paterson Talmud Torah; and Ohev Sholem Hebrew School. There are also Sunday schools conducted by the Barnert Memorial Temple and the Y.M.-Y.W.H.A. The Charles K. Solte Memorial Library, connected with the Fabian Hebrew School, had (1942) over 1,500 volumes on English Judaica, and was constantly being enlarged. Established in 1940, it had a complete collection of Bible and Talmud commentaries, together with volumes on history, biography, Judaism, ceremonies and customs, theology, encyclopedias and year books, and literature by and about Jews.

Nathan Barnert (1838-1927) was for years the leading Jewish philanthropist in Paterson. He was the only Jewish mayor of Paterson. He built the Nathan and Miriam Barnert Memorial Hospital, with its Nurses' Home, and the Daughters of Miriam Home for the Aged and Orphans. His statue in front of the City Hall was erected by a grateful citizenry in 1925. Jacob Fabian (1867-1941) made noteworthy charitable contributions in recent years, including over $400,000 toward the cost of the new Temple Emanu-El and Abraham M. Fabian Memorial Hebrew School, the latter being named for his deceased son.

Paterson has a community center, consisting of a



The Nathan and Miriam Barnert Memorial Hospital at Paterson, N. J.

Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association, which from 1925 on was housed in its own building, where it carried on religious, educational, social and physical education work. A Community Council, organized in 1933, coordinated the work of all the Jewish organizations in the city and served as fund-raising body in national and local campaigns.

Paterson has branches of all national Jewish fraternal and service organizations, and many local charitable and social organizations. Among the Jews of Paterson who have held public office are Abraham Klenert, who was judge of common pleas in 1903, George Surosky, who was made city attorney in 1939, and Filbert L. Rosenstein, who was district court judge from 1931 to 1939.

JULIAN M. SHINEDLING.

PATHAH, see VOWELS, HEBREW.

PATHOLOGY, see HEALTH OF THE JEWS; MEDICINE; PHYSICIANS.

PATIENCE, an attribute of God and of saintliness in man. The pious acceptance of personal suffering, however, does not imply toleration of social injustices, as prophetic literature eloquently testifies. Israel's unswerving faith in an ultimately better world, despite its long and bitter fate at the hands of cruel oppressors, is an epical illustration of patience on a grand scale. Thus, while patience means the endurance of the hardships of life, it does not relieve the Jew of the responsibility of working for the moral and social progress of mankind.

Among the individuals praised for their patience by Jewish literature are Job in the Bible and Hillel among the rabbis.

PATRIARCHATE, the office of the Nasi ("prince"), who was the communal head of Palestine Jewry, and the religious leader of all the Jews, after the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E. The office originated not as the result of a legal formula of the Roman rulers, nor as the consequence of any political procedure upon the part of the Jews themselves, but by a general acknowledgment of the sole authority of the scholars when other instruments of self-government had been destroyed.

Immediately after the destruction of the Temple, Johanan ben Zakkai had succeeded in establishing an academy at Jabneh. There he assembled a Beth Din, a court of justice, composed of the leading scholars, which was to preserve the integrity of the Oral Tradition and serve, in lieu of the Temple and the Sanhedrin, as a central authority for all Israel. Johanan himself served as president of the Beth Din, the establishment of which, indicating a defense of Jewish autonomy and therefore providing a possible nucleus for further rebellion, risked Roman displeasure. However, the general acknowledgment by the people of the authority of the court, its effective reweaving of the broken strands of national life, compelled the Romans at first to tolerate and eventually to recognize its legality.

When the reorganization had taken root, Johanan retired in favor of Gamaliel II (about 95). The latter, grandson of Gamaliel I, a scion of the house of David, enjoyed also the prestige of descent from Hillel, whose progeny had inherited his dominant status in scholarly circles. This, rather than his attainments in the field of Halachah, enabled Gamaliel of Jabneh to assume the title of Nasi, an enhancement of the dignity of the rabbinical presidency to make it include, as of right, jurisdiction over all internal secular government. As such, the Patriarch was not only accorded the decisive voice in the debates of the Beth Din, but his prerogatives included also final authority in civil jurisprudence as well as ritual, in the arrangement of the calendar, in deciding the appearance of the new moon, and in determining the leap years and the dates of the festivals for all Jewry. The heads of the other schools shared his privilege of granting ordination (Semichah) but he alone had the right to excommunicate.

In place of the tax formerly paid by all the Jews to the Temple, a new tax paid to the Patriarch was voluntarily adopted, being utilized for the maintenance of his office and of the scholars. To collect this "aurum coronarium," the Patriarch dispatched his "apostoli" throughout the Diaspora as well as Palestine. In his efforts to preserve the unity of Israel Gamaliel II worked constantly for the extension of the authority of the Beth Din and of his own status as its head. Prayer service was formulated and organized, and individual prayers, including the Shemoneh Esreh, were recast to conform with current circumstances; the foundation of the later codification of the Halachah was laid; the Greek translation of the Bible by the proselyte Aquila was made, and, of vital importance to natural unity, the chronic conflict between the schools of Hillel and Shammai was finally allayed.

Gamaliel's zeal for discipline, however, made him intolerant of opposition to his decisions, and he used the ban extensively to enforce his will. Consequently he aroused the rancor of his fellow-scholars, to the extent that he was deposed for a short time. His graceful acceptance of this rebuke won him reinstatement.

Between the time of the death of Gamaliel, during the reign of the Emperor Trajan, and the ascension of his son, Simeon (d. 169), there appears to have been a long period without any incumbent. In these years there occurred several uprisings of great proportions among the Jews of the Diaspora and those in Palestine, ending with the Bar Kochba revolt in 132-135 C.E. Simeon, faced with the task of presiding over a Jewry once more shattered and disorganized, insisted upon maintaining the prerogatives and dignity of his office. Opponents seeking to reveal his inferior scholarship were sharply disciplined. He led the way, however, towards overcoming the embittered relations between the Jews and their Samaritan and pagan neighbors. In the interest of reconstruction he also favored the validity of local custom and facilitated the ransoming of war prisoners.

Simeon's successor was his son Judah I, who became Patriarch about 170. Unlike his two predecessors, the famous Judah, surnamed "Hanasi," definitely surpassed his fellows in scholarship. His character was such as to make him not only revered by the Jews but respected by the Romans; he was said to have been a friend of one of the Roman emperors, probably Marcus Aurelius. Under him much was accomplished, including the completion of the codification of the Mishnah. Upon Judah's death in about 217, his son Gamaliel III became Patriarch. Little is recorded of the latter's activities, which came to an end in 225 or 230.

The reign of Gamaliel's son Judah II endured, according to one mode of reckoning, until 255, but perhaps some years longer. During this time the seat of the Patriarchate, which had been moved by Judah I to Sepphoris, was established at Tiberias. Among the achievements of Judah II was the extension and improvement of the system of elementary education.

While the material condition of the next two patriarchs, Gamaliel IV and Judah III (320 or 330), waxed, their moral and intellectual prestige declined, and with it the usefulness of the Patriarchate. Rome, moreover, was now ruled by Christian emperors, rendering it difficult to maintain friendly relations between the Patriarchate and an imperial administration dominated by exponents of a rival religion. However, Hillel IV (320 or 330 to 365), the next Nasi, was of higher caliber. Part of his reign coincided with that of the emperor Julian the Apostate. The latter was inclined to favor Judaism in order to offset the influence of the Christians, and therefore went out of his way to display his respect for the Patriarch. Yet even he opposed, though in polite terms, the continuance of the Patriarch's tax. Hillel II, perhaps foreseeing the trend of events, drew up a fixed calendar, making the people no longer dependent upon the Patriarchate for this information.

Under Gamaliel V (365-385) and Judah IV (385-400) the Patriarchate began the decline to obscurity. Christian oppression in Palestine left little opportunity for the development of communal or scholarly life. The schools of Babylonia, and consequently the Exilarchate of that country, began to supplant the Palestinian institutions. Gamaliel VI (400-425), the last Patriarch, futilely protested the oppression of the Roman rulers. The Patriarch's tax was seized by the Roman government, and the office was without means of support. At the death of Gamaliel VI, who left no male children, Emperor Theodosius II ordered the Patriarchate abolished.

SOL BERNSTEIN.

PATRIARCHS, a collective term for Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, as the common ancestors of the Israelite people. They are often coupled in the Bible as the worshippers of the true God and the makers of a covenant with Him. Similarly, the ancestresses of Israel, Sarah, Rebekah, Leah and Rachel, are called "the four mothers." The rabbis lay great stress on the activity and merits of the patriarchs, tracing back to them the origin of the daily prayers, declaring that their merits inure to the benefit of all Jews, and incorporating their names into the liturgy, as in the opening paragraph of the Eighteen Benedictions, which is called Aboth, "patriarchs." A frequently repeated sentence is ma'aseh 'aboth siman labanim, "the story of the patriarchs is a sign to their descendants," and accordingly the stories of their lives in Genesis were applied to Israel as a whole.

See also: ABRAHAM; ISAAC; JACOB.

PATRIARCHS, THE TWELVE, TESTAMENTS OF, see TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS.

PATTERSON, JOHN HENRY, English non-Jewish soldier and champion of Zionism, b. Dublin, Ireland, 1867. Following experience as a bridge engineer in Africa, distinguished service in India, and as a commander of the 33rd Battalion of Imperial Yeomanry in the Boer War (1900-2), he was placed in command of the so-called Zion Mule Corps, organized by Vladimir Jabotinsky and Joseph Trumpeldor. He participated in the ill-fated Gallipoli campaign against the Turks (1915). A devout Protestant and Bible student, Patterson thus made his first contacts with Jews, having previously known nothing about them, "excepting what I had read about them in the Bible." Among these Jews, mostly Russians expelled from Palestine, Trumpeldor distinguished himself through his valor—"the bravest man I have ever seen in my life," according to Patterson, his commander.

Patterson, who published a book on this campaign (With the Zionists in Gallipoli, 1916), declared himself willing to abandon command of the 5th Battalion of Royal Dublin Fusiliers and assume command of the first Jewish Infantry Unit, raised for service in Palestine by Jabotinsky, but he thought it advisable and just that these troops be headed by a Jewish officer. Jabotinsky, however, declared that the colonel was the only man suitable for this job, and hoped that Patterson would become their general one day. When prominent Jewish leaders opposed Jabotinsky's plan, maintaining that if foreign Jews were to fight for England they should do so as individuals, and in Flanders rather than in Palestine, Patterson aided the Zionists. After a long struggle with conservative elements in the British government, the First Judean Regiment, as it was to be called, was formed in August, 1917, "in the darkest days of the great World War." A Jewish Regiment Committee for the care of these soldiers was formed by Mrs. Patterson and Mrs. Chaim Weizmann.

This Jewish Legion aided General Allenby considerably in the conquest of Palestine. "The career of this unique battalion," wrote Patterson (With the Judaeans in the Palestine Campaign, 1922), "is bound to be closely followed by all Jews, while it would not surprise me if the historian of the future seized upon this dramatic appearance of the Jewish warrior, fighting for the redemption under the banner of England, as one of the most interesting episodes of the great World War." Theodore Roosevelt, in a letter dated December 11, 1918, congratulated Patterson on leading "in what was not only one of the most important but one of the most dramatic incidents in the whole war. To have the sons of Israel smite Ammon on hip and thigh under your leadership is something worth while."

During that campaign Patterson saw to it that his soldiers were able to observe the Sabbath, if possible, and that regular Jewish services were held. Patterson, who acknowledged that the Jewish troops under his command "upheld at all times the best traditions of the British army," continued to retain his interest in the "Restoration of the Jewish People to the Promised Land." After the World War he participated in promoting the work of the Palestine Foundation Fund in England and in the United States. He sharply assailed the veiled anti-Zionist policy of the British administration, declaring that he had noticed the beginning of the policy of knifing the Jewish National Home while he was commanding the Jewish Legion.

In three articles, "Behind the Palestine Betrayal," written for the American Jewish Chronicle (Dec. 1 and 15, 1939; January 1, 1940), he charged Great Britain with nullifying, in effect, the Balfour Declaration which pledged the establishment of a Jewish National Home, going so far as to declare that the record of Britain in Palestine was "blackened by one of the most cynical pages in the world's history," although the country was the obvious "vital safeguard for the British Empire on the most important cross roads of the Old World." In May, 1940, Patterson returned from a six-month tour of South America on behalf of the American Friends of a Jewish Palestine and spoke from the same platform with Jabotinsky, in New York, shortly before the latter's sudden death.

ALFRED WERNER.

Lit.: Jabotinsky, Vladimir, Die jüdische Legion im Weltkrieg (1930); Salaman, R. N., Palestine Reclaimed (1920).

PAUCKER, SIMON, editor and publicist, b. Jassy, Roumania, 1864. He was reported to be alive in 1942. One of the first Jews to contribute to newspapers published in the Roumanian language, he associated himself with a daily newspaper of radical tendencies, called Lupta (The Struggle), which between 1885 and 1900, under the direction of George Panu, one of the very few Roumanians openly favorable to the Jews, courageously advocated their emancipation. Panu, a man of great reputation in the publicistic and political life of Roumania, was much influenced by Paucker in pursuing this course. But later, after the Lupta ceased to appear, Panu passed from radicalism to conservatism and turned against the Jews.

Collaborating on various publications after his separation from Panu, Paucker founded at Bucharest, in 1912, the Argus, first daily newspaper in the Balkans devoted entirely to economic and financial subjects, which went far toward popularizing knowledge on these subjects both in Roumania and in other Balkan countries. In 1942 it was still being published under non-Jewish direction.

Together with his brother, EMIL PAUCKER (b. Jassy, Roumania, 1884), he founded, in 1909, a weekly newspaper called La Roumanie Industrielle. Emil Paucker became one of the owners (1923) of the great democratic daily newspapers Adeverul and Dimineatza.

PAUL, apostle of Christianity, b. Tarsus, Cilicia, about 10 C.E.; d. Rome, about 62 C.E. He received a liberal Greek and a thorough Jewish education. The twofold character of his spiritual origins finds expression in his bearing the Greek name Paul and the Hebrew name Saul. That he was a Roman citizen by birth indicates a third influence, that of the highly organized Roman Empire. In this way he seemed to be predisposed to bring Christianity to the Gentiles.

Paul was a tentmaker by profession. As a youth he went to Jerusalem to study in the school of the Patriarch Gamaliel I. Paul never saw Jesus, as Jesus had already died when he came to Jerusalem. The early church, a small body of persistent Jewish believers in the Messiahship of Jesus, was slowly spreading over the frontiers of Palestine to Jews abroad, and for that reason was persecuted by the Jewish authorities. Paul distinguished himself in this persecution, and took it upon himself to go to Damascus to fight the Christians there. But on his way he had, according to his own repeated report, a vision which changed his convictions. He says that he saw a great light and heard a voice asking him: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" He was subsequently requested to go as missionary to Jews and Gentiles. Paul baptized himself and started on his mission, which lasted thirty years and was highly successful. His vision took place about 32 C.E. Three years later he visited in Jerusalem with the leaders of the church, particularly Peter. At a later visit it came to an understanding that Paul should specialize in preaching to Gentiles. It was conceded that he would not demand from them circumcision or other submission to the strict Jewish law as the early church had done in the case of proselytes. He made journeys all over Syria, Asia Minor, Greece and the islands of the eastern Mediterranean.

Paul always started preaching in the synagogues, addressing the born Jews and their proselytes. These, at his depreciation of the Jewish law, mostly denounced him to the authorities and persecuted him in every way. Then Paul decided to turn to the Gentiles. He won numerous adherents among them, and, being a good organizer, founded Christian congregations everywhere. Sometimes he performed miracles. He remained a Jewish patriot, always collecting money for the poor of Palestine and returning, if possible, to Palestine for the Jewish holy days. While there after his third missionary journey, he was denounced to the Roman authorities by the Jews as a troublemaker. As a Roman citizen he claimed the privilege of being tried before the emperor in Rome. The governor, Festus, sent him thither. Acts, which reports his life in detail and is supposed to have been written by an eye-witness, tells of his arrival at Rome, but breaks off the report after that. Christian tradition has it that he was executed by the Romans about 62 C.E. The New Testament contains fourteen Epistles which he is supposed to have written to his faithful churches in the last ten years of his life. But only Romans, I and II Corinthians, and Galatians are generally admitted as genuine. Paul extended Christianity beyond the teachings of Jesus, and constituted Christianity as a religion independent of and separate from Judaism.

The keystone of Paulist religiosity is the belief in Jesus as the Christ (Messiah; Redeemer; I Cor. 3:11). He died on the cross for the sins of mankind. Thereafter, on the third day, he rose, and to a number of still living witnesses he appeared, and finally to Paul himself (I Cor. 15:3-8). He was the son of God (II Cor. 1:19 and other passages), verily David's seed in the flesh, and a human being born of woman (Gal. 4:4); at the same time, however, a supernatural being. In the Epistles whose writing by Paul is disputed the figure of Christ is raised even further. Finally he becomes a completely divine figure (Phil. 2:6-7; Eph. 1).

Like Jesus, Paul was convinced of the imminent end of this world and the appearance of the "other" world, the Kingdom of Heaven. It meant the same thing to him as the return (parousia) of the Son of God (I Thess. 1:10), who would appear with his hosts of angels to rule the world (II Thess. 1:5-10; Rom. 2:16). A period of decline, of anti-Christ, must precede (II Thess. 2:3-4). Jesus' people will receive eternal life (Rom. 5:2; 6:22), just as the last enemy, death, will be annihilated (I Cor. 15:24-27) and the dead will rise (I Cor. 15:52). The hour is unknown, but already the night is much spent (Rom. 13:11-14). All creation awaits and sighs toward it (Rom. 8:19 et seq.). Present suffering is not comparable with future glory (Rom. 8:18).

According to Paul, man in his miserable state stands opposite the Lord in His glory. He is a dual being, for in him flesh and spirit fight with one another (Gal. 5:17; Rom. 8:4 et seq.). The flesh is the seat of sin and draws man on to death. The contemporaneous world is coarse and evil (Gal. 1:4). Paul goes back to Adam either in that sinfulness was already determined in the creation of Adam (I Cor. 15:45) or it is a consequence of his sinful fall from Paradise. Paul laid the basis for the later doctrine of original sin (Rom. 5:19). Man can not do the good even if he wills.

At this point Paul separated himself from Judaism. He entirely disregards the Jewish teachings that God forgives the repentant sinner. He declared that even the law can not lead sinful man to righteousness (Gal. 2:16), that it rather makes sin much more powerful (I Cor. 15:36; Rom. 5:20). Paul did not deny the divine origin of the law. But sin has used it in order to excite all the lusts. Paul's sharpest utterance about the law called it a curse (Gal. 3:10-14), it was given for the sake of sin (Gal. 3:19). Where he judged it favorably, he granted it a certain temporal usefulness (Gal. 4:3); it was a discipline for Christ (Gal. 3:24). With the raising of Christ the task of the law ended.

Man is not to remain in sin (Rom. 6:1 et seq.), and will be freed, according to Paul, through the grace of God. It was revealed in the sacrificial death of the Lord, through whom the power of sin was to be destroyed. Christ took the place which until then was held by the law. Jesus died for all; therefore all must die in him and all will rise again with him as new creatures freed of sin (Gal. 2:20; II Cor. 5:14-17). The service of man is nothing; the grace of God, all (Rom. 11:6; 3:24-27; 1:17; Eph. 2:8 et seq.). This grace will be shared only by those who believe in Jesus as the Savior and in his resurrection from the dead (Rom. 10:9). Therein no difference exists between Jew and non-Jew (Rom. 3:22). The state of the believer is thenceforth: faith, love, hope. Paul himself sought to prove his doctrine of justification through faith by the Old Testament; he found it in Abraham (Rom. 4:1-5) and in the words of David (Rom. 4:6-8).

The thought expressed by Jesus that many are called but only few are selected (predestination) was taken up by Paul. According to him, it is not a question of man's "willing and running" but of God's calling about which no one can dispute with Him (Rom. 9:14-23). God has called not only from among the Jews but also from among the heathens (Rom. 9:24; I Cor. 1:24).

The thesis of selection requires conciliation with the witness of the Old Testament (which had complete validity for Paul), according to which Israel is God's chosen people. Paul sought to prove that Israel's selection was invalidated, and he related the Biblical promise to the Christians who were of the seed of Abraham since they held to Jesus (Gal. 3:29; 4:22-31). The "holy ones" are from then on the Christians (II Cor. 3:14-18). In the Epistle to the Romans (chaps. 9 to 11) Paul began by holding firmly to Israel's advantages: to them belong the filiation and the glory, the testaments, the laws, the service and the promises; the patriarchs and Christ himself—according to the flesh—stem from them (cf. also Rom. 1:16; 3:2). Now that Israel has been renounced in so far as they have turned away from Christ, may God accept them again! God has not pushed them aside forever, for His choice is irrevocable. Israel had to fall so that through their error salvation could come to the heathen. When the many heathens will have been converted, then all Israel shall be saved.

In the worship of the original Christian community Paul already found baptism and supper as sacraments. Baptism and supper permit a mystic experiencing of the death and resurrection of the Redeemer. The sober worship of Judaism was given up. The miracle of faith became the center of religious practice. Paul's doctrine could lead to moral dissoluteness, as the case of incest in Corinth proves (I Cor. 5). The flesh easily wins the upper hand (Gal. 5:13). He commanded the crucifying of the flesh with its passions and desires (Gal. 5:24), and demanded sanctification (II Cor. 7:1; Rom. 6:12-21). Like Jesus, Paul was unmarried. He allowed marriage, but celibacy seemed more desirable to him (I Cor. 11 and other passages). He demanded obedience toward authority, for all authority comes from God and is His minister and avenger (Rom. 13:1-7). On the basis of this statement, Christianity was later misused for political purposes. He shared the indifference of Jesus toward this world and its possible improvement. For him ethics was no longer the center of religion, for faith had suppressed it. I Cor. 5:5 tells of a sinner delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved on the Day of Judgment; Rom. 3:7 tells of the "lie" unto the glory of God. Both statements have been misinterpreted and have caused much grief (the former during the Inquisition, when heretics and criminals were burned for the salvation of their souls).

Paul was the great organizer of the Christian church. He founded communities and held them together. He looked upon the totality of believers in Christ as a holy mystic unity. By his concepts, which are not without contradiction in detail, Paul, who can be characterized as the first Christian theologian, set up Christianity as an independent religion opposed to Judaism, although he himself had neither the consciousness that he was founding a new religion nor the intention of so doing. For him Christianity was a Judaism adapted to the times. Paul had great intellectual gifts, a rich emotional life and a strong tendency toward mysticism; but above all he was a man of will. One may characterize this as a typical Jewish trait in his personality. For him all theories were only justification of his deeds. He wanted to bring to the heathens faith in Jesus as the Savior. The Christian mission to the heathens had already been started beforehand, but he was the first who clearly recognized the conditions for success. Faith in Jesus could not conquer the world if it remained bound to the preservation of the law and the customs of Judaism as in the original Judeo-Christian community, among the apostles and with Jesus himself. Sabbath, dietary prescriptions and circumcision were subjects of ridicule by the heathens, burdensome discomforts which only few of them would accept in order to be able to join the new faith. At that time even Judaism did missionary work. Paul recognized that by complete denial of law he could outdo Jewish missionary work and even draw to himself its proselytes. He felt himself inwardly compelled to justify before his Jewish past this denial at which he arrived out of practical considerations. Out of this necessity grew his doctrine of law, and he sought to explain it away with all the means of an allegorist who had been educated not rabbinically but in Hellenism.

Paul had still another intellectual difficulty to overcome. It lay in the advantageous position of Israel as the chosen people. But while it apparently was not difficult for him spiritually to free himself from the law, it was a greater sacrifice for him to deny to the Jewish patriots the "chosenness" of Israel. For this reason he did not go so radically and so far as the destruction of the law.

Paul's mission to the heathens could be carried out in the original Christian community only against great opposition. Peter and the Christians of Jewish descent in Jerusalem demanded of the converted heathen circumcision and acceptance of the whole Mosaic law. About the year 50 C.E. an apostolic council was held in Jerusalem (Acts 15; Gal. 2) at which a compromise was made: converted heathens could escape circumcision and they had only to forego idol worship and fornication, and partake of no blood or of what was strangled. Soon there were further concessions, but the development in detail can not be followed exactly. Finally, only a small circle of Jewish-born Christians still held fast to the law. The abandonment of the law by Christianity does not imply, however, an acceptance of Paulist theories. It can be said that his mission but not his theology had conquered. The later Hellenizing theology ignored almost completely Paul's thoughts on the law and set the law aside by allegorical interpretation. Only the central attitude of faith as Paul created it was taken up completely in Christianity. By emphasizing the faith he started Christianity on its way to a fateful inclination toward intolerance. Consequently the execution of Paul's ideas invoked the creation of sects, religious wars, courts of heresy and the Inquisition. Overemphasis upon the faith led to a devaluation of reason so that Tertullian could later say: Credo quia absurdum ("I believe because [it is] absurd"). As a consequence, the Christian Middle Ages declined into ignorance and absence of culture, and lagged behind Islam and Judaism in the development of the sciences.

The reaction of Judaism to Paul was even stronger than that to Jesus. The Messiahship of Jesus could perhaps have been maintained even within Judaism, but the casting out of Israel and the law, as well as the fundamental attitude of pessimism, were not acceptable. Thus by their opposition to Paul and pagan Christianity, the Jews recognized and hastened the cleavage with Christianity. ERNEST I. JACOB.

Lit.: See under CHRISTIANITY. See also: Glover, T. R., Paul of Tarsus (1925); Morgan, W., The Religion and Theology of Paul (1917); Montefiore, Claude G., St. Paul and Judaism (1914); Schweitzer, Albert, Geschichte der paulinischen Forschung (1911); Parkes, James, Jesus, Paul and the Jews (1936).

PAUL III, PAUL IV (popes), see PAPAL BULLS; POPES.

PAULLA VETURIA (Veruzia; proselyte), see PROSELYTES.

PAULLI, HOLGER (Oliger), religious fanatic, b. Copenhagen, Denmark, 1644; d. Copenhagen, 1714. He studied theology at the University of Copenhagen, and shortly thereafter became a slave merchant in the West Indies, where he accumulated a considerable fortune. In 1694 he returned to Denmark, seeking the advice of his coreligionists as to how he might best ameliorate their condition through the power of his wealth.

Suddenly Paulli came under the spell of religious illusions. He abandoned his family, and traveled first to France and then to Amsterdam, where, in 1697, he published his first religious pamphlet, Triomph, Triomph, Triomph, in den Afgehouwen Steen Zonder Handen; in this work he tried to propagate the idea of merging Judaism and Christianity. He proclaimed himself the new Messiah and the king of the Jews chosen by God to rebuild the Jewish empire in Palestine. In 1700 he addressed a pamphlet to the crowned heads of Europe, informing them that the Jewish kingdom would be founded once more in the year 1720. The king of France was specifically advised to abandon his throne and join with Paulli in baptizing by force those Jews who would not embrace Christianity voluntarily.

Subsequently, charged with having incited to riot, Paulli was imprisoned by the authorities of Amsterdam in 1701, but through the intervention of his relatives and friends, who pleaded insanity in his behalf, he was released, on condition that he would leave the country. He went to Germany, where he stayed a short while, under the strict surveillance of the authorities, and then returned to Denmark. By order of the authorities he was barred from further meddling in religious affairs and from all contact with Jews, and spent his last years in forced retirement.

Lit.: Hecquet-Cramer, "Holger Paulli," The New Era Magazine, March, 1904, pp. 171-74; Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 5 (1927) 177.

PAULUS DE SANTA MARIA (Paul de Burgos), apostate, b. Burgos, Spain, about 1351; d. 1435. His real name was Solomon Levi. Levi was well versed in Biblical, Talmudic and Rabbinical literature, and was a wealthy man besides. Convinced, however, that he could advance much further by being a Christian, he was baptized (about 1391). His children became Christians with him, but his wife did not.

As Paulus de Santa Maria, he went to the University of Paris, where he studied theology, and became a priest. Subsequently he was made archdeacon of Trevino, bishop of Cartagena and finally archbishop of Burgos (1415). Like many other converted Jews of his time, Paulus began to hate Jews and Judaism, and became a persecutor of his former co-religionists. He tried to convert his former friends and pupils, but was in most cases unsuccessful.

Paulus had become privy councillor to King Henry III of Castile. On King Henry's death, he was made the tutor of his young son Juan II, and a member of the Regency. On January 2, 1412, Paulus collaborated with the Regent Donna Catalina and the Infante Don Ferdinand in the issuance of an edict for the young king. The edict consisted of twenty-four articles, whose aim was to impoverish and degrade the Jews and to reduce them to the lowest grade in the social scale, all for the purpose of converting them. In his old age, Paulus wrote Scrutinium Scripturarum, an essay aiming at the conversion of the Jews. His two sons also became high church dignitaries.

PAULY, ROSE, dramatic soprano, b. Eperjes, Hungary, 1895. She studied voice in Vienna, following which she made her opera debut as Aïda in Hamburg. At the Cologne Opera, she was discovered by Otto Klemperer who brought her to the Kroll Opera in Berlin (1927) where, for the next few years, she was giving starring roles in most of the important premières. She built an extraordinary repertoire including more than sixty roles and was invited to appear with most of the leading opera houses of Europe. At the Vienna Opera, she appeared successfully in most of the Wagnerian and Richard Strauss soprano roles, scoring a triumph in Strauss's Elektra. She was given in Vienna the highest appointment to which a prima donna could aspire, that of Kammersängerin. In Italy, where she sang in every major opera house, she was also honored: In the hall of fame at the Verdi Opera House of Trieste her portrait was hung between Duse's and Moissi's.

In 1937, she made her American debut in a concert performance of Elektra with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. She was a sensation. A few months later, she was engaged by the Metropolitan Opera House, making her debut there in Elektra. She also scored triumphs as Elektra in Covent Garden and Salzburg. However, though Elektra has been her most successful role, she proved her talent in a great variety of standard and modern operas through appearances in leading opera houses of the United States and South America. She appeared extensively in song recitals.

PAWTUCKET, see RHODE ISLAND.

PAYTAN ("poet"), term used to designate a composer of Piyutim, or religious poems. Originally the composer of a Piyut was at the same time the one who recited it; in the course of time these two functions were separated and became assigned to different persons.

The oldest liturgical poems written by Paytanim were anonymous. Very few Paytanim are known of by name until the 9th cent. The oldest were from Palestine, thus Jose ben Jose and Jannai (about 650); Jannai was the first to employ acrostics of names and to use rhymes. The most prolific poet, who exercised tremendous influence over the style of the Piyutim, was Eleazar Kalir, about 700; in the following centuries he had a great number of imitators and disciples. From the 10th cent. on many Paytanim are mentioned by name; the most important of these were: Saadia, who composed a rhyming lexicon (930); Solomon ben Judah Hababli of Rome (950), a favorite composer of Selihoth (penitential hymns); Kalonymus of Lucca (about 980); Meshullam ben Kalonymus; Simon ben Isaac of Mayence (1000); Gershom ben Judah; Meir ben Isaac, the highly renowned precentor of Worms (about 1060); Rashi; Jacob ben Meir Tam; Eliezer ben Nathan of Mayence (1096); Ephraim ben Jacob, the "last poet in Germany to compose Aramaic verses."

At about this same period the number of Paytanim in Spain likewise was very great; indeed, Spain was the country in which the Piyut attained to its highest perfection. The oldest Paytanim in Spain were: Joseph ben Isaac ibn Abithur; Isaac ben Judah; Solomon ibn Gabirol (1040). The greatest of the Paytanim, Judah ben Samuel Halevi and Moses and Abraham ibn Ezra, lived at the end of the 11th and in the 12th cent. The following centuries witnessed the activities of many other Paytanim; however, synagogal poesy was by that time regarded as closed, since the congregations were already provided with a great number of Piyutim, and thus had an ample choice. For this reason only a very few of the liturgical poems composed in these later centuries were admitted to the prayer-book.

However, new religious tendencies and currents always resulted in the composition of new hymns, and especially among the Jews of the Orient Piyutim continued to be composed. Despite the unexpected discoveries of the last few decades, one can get only a faint idea of the tremendous wealth of such material produced by the writers of synagogal poetry. Countless thousands perished when the manuscripts were lost. The manner in which these Piyutim were preserved and handed down was not a very efficient one. The printed editions, for the most part, not only did not reproduce the texts with any degree of accuracy, but were so arbitrary as regards the Piyutim that only rarely can the subtlety and fineness of the poetical structure of the Piyutim be recognized.

See also PIYUT. ARJEH SAMUEL DÖRFLER.

Lit.: Idelsohn, Jewish Liturgy, 34-39 and the literature cited there.

PAZER, see CANTILLATION.

PE, see ALPHABET.

PEABODY, a city in the northeastern part of Massachusetts, with a population (1940) of 21,711, of whom a little more than a thousand were Jews. The first Jewish settlers in the community did not come until 1900. Congregation Sons of Israel, which follows the Conservative ritual, was organized in 1910, and in 1942 was the most important synagogue in the city. Its building was constructed in 1913. Irving Herbert Perlman became rabbi in 1940. The city also had a Hebrew School, founded in 1915, and a community center, established in 1939. There were (1942) several Jewish fraternal organizations and a division of the United Jewish Appeal. The Community Center opened a library in 1942.

Among the Jews of the city who have held public office were Elihu A. Hershenson, who was city solicitor from 1925 to 1929, and Abraham A. Ankeles, who was made city collector in 1941.

PEACE. Biblical deprecations of war are to be found in the prophets Isaiah, Hosea, Micah and Zechariah; and in I Chronicles. To quite some of these:

"Every boot stamped with fierceness,
And every cloak rolled in blood,
Shall even be for burning, for fuel of fire" (Isa. 9:4).

"I will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the land" (Hosea 2:20).

"And He shall judge between many peoples,
And shall decide concerning mighty nations afar off;
And they shall beat their swords into plowshares,
And their spears into pruning-hooks;
Nation shall not lift up sword against nation,
Neither shall they learn war any more.
But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree;
And none shall make them afraid" (Micah 4:3-4; Isa. 2:4).

"I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim,
And the horse from Jerusalem,
And the battle bow shall be cut off,
And he shall speak peace unto the nations" (Zech. 9:10).

"He maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth;
He breaketh the bow and cutteth the spear in sunder;
He burneth the chariots in fire" (Ps. 46:10).

"But the word of the Lord came to me saying: Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made many wars; thou shalt not build a house unto My name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in My sight" (I Chron. 22:8; 28:3).

Alongside of these can be ranged the numerous commendations of peace such as:

"The work of righteousness shall be peace;
And the effect of righteousness
Quietness and confidence forever.
And my people shall abide in a peaceful habitation,
And in secure dwellings, and in quiet resting-places" (Isa. 32:17-18).

This thought is reputed to be identical with that in Ps. 85:11: "Righteousness and peace have kissed each other." Further encomiums on peace are: "I will make peace thine officers" (Isa. 60:17), "The Lord will bless His people with peace" (Ps. 29:11), and numerous others. It should be borne in mind that the Hebrew word, shalom, "peace," means not only absence of warfare but also the positive enjoyment of physical, economic and social wellbeing.

Aspirations for peace seem likewise to reside in passages like Ps. 147:10-11:

"He delighted not in the strength of the horse;
He taketh no pleasure in the legs of a man.
The Lord taketh pleasure in those that reverence Him,
In those that wait for His mercy."

Among the prophets, the outstanding protagonist of peace is Isaiah. Even in the face of invasion, Isaiah counseled non-resistance and reliance upon God. "If ye confide not, then ye abide not" (Isa. 7:9), said Isaiah; "In returning and rest shall ye be saved, in quietness and confidence shall be your strength" (30:15). That Jeremiah also favored non-resistance has been disputed, in spite of Jer. 27:8, 11, 12, 17 and 38:2, 17 which apparently urge surrender to the Babylonians (see, however, Buttenwieser, Prophets of Israel, 60-62; Finkelstein, The Pharisees, vol. 1, pp. 364, 365, 369, 422, 427; vol. 2, pp. 504, 534).

Attention has been called to the pacifism exemplified by the patriarchs. Isaac and Jacob never engage in warfare (Gen. 48:2 is an exception) and the only instance in which Abraham undertakes a military venture is that recounted in Gen. 14, a strangely heterogeneous chapter, which Biblical critics are unable to assign either to J or to E or to P or to any other of the Hexateuchal sources. For their attack upon the Shechemites (Gen. 34:30), Simeon and Levi receive their dying father Jacob's rebuke (Gen. 49:5-7); while Isaac's non-resistance to Philistine vandalism is extraordinary (Gen. 26:18-22).

One type of war which the Bible condemns invariably is civil war, such as the wars between Jephthah and the Ephraimites, David and Absalom, Asa and Baasha, Tibni and Omri, Jehu and Jehoram, Amaziah and Jehoash, Menahem and Shallum, Pekah and Pekahiah, and those of Sheba and of Gedaliah. Joshua tells how a committee headed by the chief priest once conducted an inquiry, dispelled a misunderstanding, and averted a war between the tribes east of the Jordan and the tribes west of the Jordan (Josh. 22). The prophet Shemaiah prevailed upon King Rehoboam to desist from civil strife with King Jeroboam (I Kings 12:22); and Isaiah inveighs against the internecine conflict between Ephraim and Judah (Isa. 11:13).

Numerous, in the Old Testament, are the affirmations of international friendship, such as that between Abraham and the Hittites, between Jethro and Moses, between Saul and the Kenites, between Solomon and Hiram of Tyre; and expressions of international good will such as Deut. 23:8; I Kings 8:43; Isa. 19:25; Amos 9:7, not to mention the prophet's remonstrance with Moab for offenses committed not against Israel but against Ammon (Amos 2:1). To these might be added Jonah, gracious to the Ninevites, and Ruth, gracious to the Moabites, both of them Israel's traditional foes. Unexampled is the cosmopolitanism of Isa. 53:5, which envisages Israel as suffering vicariously in behalf of the other nations.

Two notable passages voicing aspirations for world peace are offered by Josephus. One is the oration of King Agrippa, exhorting the Jews to avoid war with Rome. This oration urges, among other things:

"Nothing so much damps the force of strokes as bearing them with patience; and the quietness of those who are injured diverts the injurious person from afflicting" (Jewish War, book 2, chap. 16, section 4).

—an argument which advocates of non-resistance still employ. There is also the story of Onias, a saint noted for the efficacy of his prayers. Commanded by one side in a civil war to pray for the defeat of the other side, Onias forfeited his life by supplicating:

"O God, the king of the whole world! Since those that now stand with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are also thy priests, I beseech thee, that thou wilt neither hearken to the prayers of those against these, nor bring to effect what these pray against those" (Antiquities, book 14, chap. 2, section 1).

The Talmud, reporting the opposition of Johanan ben Zakkai and his associates to the war with Rome, quotes arguments similar to some of those advanced by peace proponents in the 1940's (Git. 56a).

The literature of the Talmud and kindred works contains a number of peace anthologies. One of these is the Perek Hashalom, a minor tractate printed at the end of the division Nezikin. Another is Midrash Lev. 9:9; another Midrash Num. 11:16; another Midrash Deut. 5:12; yet another is Sifre, section 199. Samples from the Perek Hashalom are:

"Did God not place peace on earth, sword and wild beasts would annihilate mankind."

"Great is peace, for when Israel said, 'All the word which the Lord hath spoken will we do' (Ex. 24:3), God rejoiced in them, gave them the Law and blessed them with peace."

"Great is peace. Other commands of the Torah are conditional but the peace command is unconditional: 'Seek peace and pursue it' " (Ps. 34:15).

"Great is peace, for God is called peace (Judges 6:24). The Messiah is called peace (Isa. 9:5). Israel is called peace" (Zech. 8:12).

The following are excerpts from Midrash Lev. 9:9:

"Great is peace, for all blessings are contained therein."

"Great is peace, for all Divine commands are connected therewith."

"Great is peace, for when King Messiah cometh, his beginning will be peace."

"The angels above, though void of enmity, hatred, jealousy, envy, and malice need peace; how much the more do mortal men need peace."

Midrash Num. 11:16 contains phrases like these:

"Great is peace; all of the benedictions end with 'peace,' because benedictions are worthless except they be attended by peace."

"Peace is the equivalent of all good things."

"Great is peace; the prophets planted in the mouths of men nought but peace."

Midrash Deut. 5:12 says:

"How great is peace! For even with regard to war in which swords and lances are used, God said: 'When you go to war, first attempt peace.' "

"God said to Moses: 'Wage war' (on Sihon, Deut. 2:24). But Moses did otherwise. He sent emissaries of peace (verse 26). God said to Moses: 'I bade thee wage war but thou didst offer him peace. As thou livest, I shall ratify thine action. In every war henceforth, there shall first be an attempt at peace.' "

From Sifre, section 199, we quote the following:

"Great is peace; even the dead need peace."

"Great is peace; even in the midst of war, Israel needs peace."

"Great is peace; even they who dwell on high need peace."

"Great is peace; the priests terminate their benediction with 'peace' and Moses was a lover of peace."

While many of these statements may refer chiefly to peace in personal relationships, there is nothing about them to preclude the wider applicability. Nor are such utterances limited to these anthologies. Encomiums on peace are scattered throughout the Talmud and the allied literature. To cite a few examples:

"Rab Safra was wont to append these words to his daily devotions: 'May it be Thy will, O Lord our God, to make peace in the family above and in the family below' " (Ber. 17a).

"When the Messiah comes, weapons will not be needed for wars will have ceased. Weapons will be as superfluous as a candle at noon-tide" (Sab. 63a).

"With every effective prayer, the seed of Jacob is connected; with every victorious war, the seed of Esau" (Git. 57b).

"Love peace, pursue peace" (Aboth 1:12).

"The world rests on three things; on justice, on truth and on peace" (Aboth 1:18).

"God found for Israel no surer vehicle of blessing than peace" (Uktzin 3:12, the last sentence in the Mishnah).

"There may be food, there may be drink; when peace is lacking, all is lacking" (Sifre, Behukkothai 1, at the end).

"Three days before the advent of the Messiah, Elijah will announce: "Peace has come to the world" (Pesikta Rabbathi, 35).

The Eighteen Benedictions enshrine a supplication for peace in their last prayer and last word.

Also applicable here is the rabbinic interpretation of the Biblical verses which prohibit the use of tools in the construction of the altar (Ex. 20:22; Deut. 27:5-6). The rabbis explain that tools, being made of iron, the metal of war, must not touch the altar, the symbol of peace "between man and man, family and family, nation and nation" (Mechilta, Yithro 25; Sifre, Kedoshim 11:8). It is further maintained that the bearing of weapons on the Sabbath is forbidden not because weapons are ornaments but because weapons are odious (Sab. 6:4). Significance has been found in the fact that, in the old illustrations of the Passover Haggadah, the wicked son is commonly pictured as a soldier wearing a sword.

Not to be ignored in any appraisal of Talmudic attitudes toward war is the curious penchant of the Talmud for transmuting the Biblical heroes of the battlefield into heroes of the schoolroom. Such is the Talmudic conception of the fighters, Joshua, Caleb, David, and Benaiah, of the three hundred and eighteen who fought under Abraham (Gen. 14:4), of David's royal bodyguard, and of those "strong and apt for war" in II Kings 24:16. All of these are represented as men occupied with sacred studies and observances. Similarly, "my sword" in Gen. 48:22 is taken to mean prayer, and "my bow" to mean supplication (Ber. 18b); while the king's sword in Ps. 45:4 is identified with scholarship. One Talmudic passage says expressly that "heroes" always means "heroes" in the study of the Torah (Aboth de Rabbi Nathan 23:1).

Talmudic expressions favoring international good will are too numerous to cite. (A list of them will be found in the 1936 Year Book of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, p. 211, note 38.) One of the most striking of these is the passage which narrates that when the Egyptians, pursuing the Israelites, were drowned in the Red Sea, "the ministrant angels sought to break forth into song. God said to them: 'Will ye break forth into song when the works of my hands are drowning?' " (Meg. 10b; Sanh. 39b).

Among Jewish advocates of peace in modern times, mention can be made of Ivan S. Blioch, Elijah Benamozegh, Tobias Michael Carel Asser, Alfred Hermann Fried, Judah L. Magnes, Salmon Levinson, and Albert Einstein. It was Blioch, a Jew by birth and sympathies though not by affiliation, whose influence led Czar Nicholas II to convene the first peace conference at The Hague. Benamozegh was an Italian rabbi who, for his book, Le crime de la guerre dénoncé à l'humanité (Paris, 1881), was awarded a medal. Asser and Fried were winners of the Nobel Peace Prize, the latter being a co-worker of the noted Baroness von Suttner. Judah L. Magnes, later chancellor and then president of the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, was foremost among the Americans who, in 1917, strove to prevent America's participation in the then raging war. Salmon Levinson, a Jewish attorney residing in Chicago, originated the phrase "outlawry of war" and the ideas subsequently embodied in the Kellogg Pact. Albert Einstein, father of the doctrine of relativity, was for a time a conspicuous advocate of resistance to war. Einstein held that, should two per cent of all recruits in any belligerent country decline to fight, war would be impossible. To these names might be added that of Rosika Schwimmer, a Jewess by lineage. Louis D. Brandeis, the only Jewish member of the United States Supreme Court at the time, was one of the two justices who favored Madame Schwimmer in her appeal from the decision which, because of her pacifism, denied her American citizenship. It was also a Jew, Bernard Baruch, who was the first to propose "taking the profits out of war." Rabbi Sidney E. Goldstein was, for a period, chairman of the Executive Committee of the American War Resisters' League. A Jewess, Estelle Sternberger, is the president of World Peaceways.

From time to time, since the armistice of 1918, various of the Jewish national organizations in the United States have created committees on international peace, have engaged in peace activities either separately or in conjunction with non-Jewish groups and have issued peace pronouncements. The most prominent of these organizations are The Central Conference of American Rabbis, The Rabbinical Assembly of America, The National Council of Jewish Women, and The National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods. Some or all of these bodies have favored the Kellogg Pact, the World Court, the various attempts at reduction of armaments, the abolition of private traffic in munitions, embargoes on arms to belligerents, strict neutrality of the United States in case of another European war, withdrawal of protection from Americans who, conducting business in foreign lands, violate the laws of those lands, the conscription of profits as well as of men, and the fostering of steps to create good will among nations. These bodies have, further, challenged the theory that preparedness obviates war, have condemned the display of films that exalt war and have opposed military training in schools and colleges. One of the Jewish women's organizations has even decried the manufacture and sale of toys that simulate military implements. President Roosevelt's efforts to avert the war which began in September, 1939, received warm Jewish support.

A pronouncement issued by the Rabbinical Assembly of America on May 3, 1933, contains the words: "The world has risked so much for war. Let it risk as much for peace." Fourteen months later—July 2, 1934—the Quakers of Great Britain, in a "Call to Complete Disarmament," employed almost the identical words: "We take risks in war—we can take risks for peace." In view of the likelihood that the one organization had never heard of the other, the similarity of language is most arresting.

The rabbinic associations have bestowed especial attention upon the conscientious objector. The eligibility of conscientious objectors for citizenship and their legal exemption from military service have received rabbinic endorsement. Going still further, the members of the Central Conference of American Rabbis were, in 1935, canvassed by mail on the proposal:

"That the Central Conference of American Rabbis recommend to its members that they refuse to support any war in which this country or any country may engage, on the ground that war is a denial of all for which religion stands."

Ninety-one voted "Yes"; thirty-two voted "No"; and thirty-one voted "Yes," with reservations. That same year, when the Conference met in Chicago, debate though not action, occurred on the resolution:

"That this conference declare that henceforth it stand opposed to all war, and that it recommend to all Jews that, for the sake of conscience, and in the name of God, they refuse to participate in the bearing of arms."

The following year, however, a resolution somewhat to the same effect was adopted. The resolution read:

"The Central Conference of American Rabbis reaffirms its conviction that conscientious objection to military service is in accordance with the highest interpretation of Judaism and therefore petitions the Government of the United States to grant to Jewish religious conscientious objectors to war the same exemption from military service as has long been granted to members of the Society of Friends and similar religious organizations."

This resolution provoked the outspoken antipathy of leading Jewish laymen. Steps had to be taken to conciliate the lay group. These had advanced the argument which Jews opposed to pacifism commonly proffer, namely, that Jews who are pacifists furnish justification for the anti-Semitic eagerness to accuse the Jew of disloyalty. Still it must be recorded that anti-Semites have never singled out for attack any Jewish pronouncement favoring refusal to bear arms but that, on the contrary, during the tension that accompanied and followed the Munich agreement of September, 1938, the chief assault upon the Jews consisted of the charge that the Jews were fomenting international strife. To the argument that Jewish pacifism fosters anti-Semitism, some rabbis replied that the Jews today should, like those of the past, be willing to suffer for their convictions.

Like numerous clergymen among the Christians, various American rabbis who supported the war in 1917 and 1918 subsequently recanted and announced their resolve never to repeat that stand. Most prominent among these was Stephen S. Wise who thus expressed himself on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Free Synagogue, April 17, 1932, and again, on October 31, 1932, before the American Club at Geneva, Switzerland.

The Reform Jewish liturgy contains a prayer for peace in the Union Prayer Book, vol. 2 (1922) p. 250, and also in vol. 1 (1924) p. 110. This latter prayer, appearing many times in vol. 1 and vol. 2, petitions:

"Grant us peace, Thy most precious gift, O Thou eternal source of peace, and enable Israel to be a messenger of peace unto the peoples of the earth. Bless our country that it may ever be a stronghold of peace and the advocate of peace in the councils of nations. . . . Praised be Thou, O Lord, Giver of peace." ABRAHAM CRONBACH.

Lit.: Zangwill, Israel, The Voice of Jerusalem (1920) 1-37; Rabnitsky, J. H., and Bialik, C. N., Sefer Ha-aggadah (1922) book 5, pp. 144, 145; Kornfeld, Joseph S., Judaism and International Peace; Union of American Hebrew Congregations, The Jewish Peace Book (1932); idem, The Quest for Peace (1937); "War and Peace in Jewish Tradition," Central Conference of American Rabbis Year Book (1936) 198-221.

PEACE-OFFERING, see SACRIFICE.

PEACE TREATIES, PARTICIPATION OF JEWS IN, see BERLIN, CONGRESS OF; MINORITY RIGHTS OF THE JEWS; PALESTINE MANDATE; VERSAILLES PEACE CONFERENCE; VIENNA, CONGRESS OF; also CZECHOSLOVAKIA, HUNGARY, POLAND, ROUMANIA, TURKEY, and other countries (under Modern Times).

PEAH ("corner of the field"), second tractate of Zeraim, the first division of the Mishnah. It contains eight chapters, and deals with those portions of the crop, such as the corners of the field, the gleanings and the forgotten sheaf, which were to be given to the poor and the stranger (Lev. 19:9; 23:22; Deut. 24:19-22). The tractate deals with such subjects as what agricultural products are subject to these laws, the manner in which the poor may gather their share, and the definition of those to be included among the poor. The opening verse, which is cited in the Orthodox Jewish liturgy, gives a list of things for which there is no fixed measure, as well as of those things which are rewarded both in one's lifetime and in the world to come.

The Tosefta contains four chapters and much Haggadic material. There is no Babylonian Talmud to the tractate, but there is a Gemara to the Mishnah in the Palestinian Talmud. The Tosefta upholds the value of good intention, and praises beneficence as the only true religion and the equal of all the other commandments of the Law.

Lit.: Lauterbach, J. Z., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, pp. 568-69; Danby, H., The Mishnah (1933) 10-20.

PEARLMAN, BENNO, British civic official. He was sheriff of Hull for three terms, in 1923-24, 1932-33 and 1939-40. In 1928-29 Pearlman was Lord Mayor of Hull. He was also active in communal work, serving (1923-24) as governor of the Hull Incorporation of the Poor and from 1914 to 1924 as president of the Yorkshire Conference of Friendly Societies Councils.

PECK, SAMUEL MILTON, physician, b. New York city, 1900. He received his medical degree from Columbia University College of Physicians and Surgeons in 1924. From 1932 to 1934 Peck was associate dermatologist at the Hospital for Joint Diseases; in 1931 he became assistant histo-pathologist at Mt. Sinai hospital, New York city, and in 1942 still held this post. Peck was also assistant clinical professor of dermatology and syphilology at the New York University College of Medicine from 1933 to 1936.

Peck was the discoverer of the Peck test for capillary fragility (1932) and introduced the use of moccasin venom for hemorrhagic conditions (1932). He was a first lieutenant in the medical reserve corps of the United States Army from 1925 to 1930.

Lit.: Kagan, Solomon R., Jewish Contributions to Medicine in America (1939) 652.

PÉCS, capital city of Baranya county, Hungary, with 4,000 Jewish inhabitants in a total population of 47,000. After the expulsion of the Turks and in the course of national reconstruction, the city council of Pécs solemnly pledged (1692) to keep Jews away from the city. Under Joseph II, at the cost of great effort, Salamon Fuchs and Mark Weiszmayer succeeded in being admitted to Pécs in 1788. From these beginnings, the community slowly grew to number ten male members in 1803, and thirty souls in 1841 when a house to serve as a synagogue was purchased at the cost of 600 Gulden. Previously the city had donated land for the cemetery, and Hebrah Kaddisha statutes were laid down in 1827, thus removing the prohibition for Jews to own land or houses, which had constituted a serious handicap to religious life.

The abolition of the toleration tax (1846) encouraged further development of the Jewish community, which however, was temporarily brought to a standstill by the Hungarian war of independence (1848-1849) and by the war tax of 5000 Gulden in gold with which the Jews of Pécs had to expiate their participation in the struggle. In 1868 the synagogue was erected; the community also maintained a public school from 1852 on. The removal of discriminatory laws and the reorganization of the national economy resulted in increasing the Jewish population of Pécs a hundred-fold in seventy years.

Pécs had a number of prominent rabbis: Izrael Löw (1842-57); J. H. Hirschfeld (1858-63); Ede Ehrlich (1863-74); Alexander Kohut (1874-82); Armin Perls (1889-1914); Izsák Pfeiffer (up to 1922); Zoltán Wallenstein (from 1923 on). They enjoyed the cooperation and respect of the Catholic clergy. The bishop of Pécs contributed 1,000 gulden toward the cost of the first volume of Alexander Kohut's Aruch completum. During the temporary occupation of Pécs by Yugoslav troops (1919), Rabbi Izsák Pfeiffer and Bishop Gyula Zichy joined in organizing resistance to foreign occupation.

In the 1920's and 1930's the community maintained a Talmud Torah School and Talmud Torah Association for adults; an institution which provided one hundred children with a daily meal; another to provide Jewish college students with meals and a home for the aged poor.

The Jews of Pécs were prominent in all branches of industry until, from 1938 on, anti-Jewish legislation gradually disorganized the participation of Jews in economic activities. To save the morale of the young generation, the community of Pécs, in 1941, provided guidance by adults, and mutual aid amongst themselves, for Jewish children who were then barred from attending the high schools.

PEDAGOGY, see EDUCATION.

PEERCE, JAN (originally Jacob Perelmuth), tenor, b. New York city, 1904. He studied singing with Emilio Roxas, after having received a musical training on the violin. Discovered by Samuel Rothafel (Roxy), he was engaged as tenor soloist with the Radio City Music Hall in 1933. He achieved local fame by virtue of his appearances in the Music Hall stage productions, singing more than two thousand times over a period of several years. He also acquired national repute through the weekly broadcasts of the Music Hall over the National Broadcasting Company, in which he was featured not only in an extensive repertoire of songs but also in abridged versions of Italian and German operas. In 1938 Peerce appeared as soloist under Toscanini in performances of Verdi's Requiem and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Following his successful debut in a recital in New York in 1939, Peerce was engaged by the Metropolitan Opera House, appearing there for the first time in the winter of 1941. He has also been a frequent soloist on many major symphonic hours over the radio.

PEISER, FELIX ERNST, Semitist, b. Berlin, 1862; d. Königsberg, 1921. In 1890 he became instructor of Assyriology at the University of Breslau and subsequently professor at the University of Königsberg. Peiser was an associate of H. Winkler, a pioneer in Assyriology, in the founding of Mitteilungen der vorderasiatischen Gesellschaft. After 1897 he edited the Orientalische Literatur-Zeitung. In 1914 he wrote

Benjamin F. Peixotto

Hosea: philologische Studien zum Alten Testament. He was author also of Der Prophet Habakuk (1903). Peiser was interested chiefly in Babylonian legal and economic questions, and in the history Bible texts, applying his theory of glosses to the restoration of the original text. He was also a student of the history of ancient East Prussia, directing archeological excavations in the region and serving as president of Prusia, a society for the study of ancient history.

Lit.: Wininger, S., Grosse Jüdische National-Biographie.

PEISER, KURT, social work executive, b. Breslau, Germany, 1897. He was brought to the United States in 1907 and received his M.A. in 1918 from the University of Michigan. After serving as the assistant supervisor of the Jewish Orphan Home in Cleveland (1918-21) and as the executive director of Abraham Lincoln House in Milwaukee (1921-3), Peiser was made executive director of the Federated Jewish Charities of Milwaukee (1923). He held this post until 1927, when he assumed a similar position with the United Jewish Social Agencies of Cincinnati. From 1932 until 1937 Peiser was executive director of the Jewish Welfare Federation of Detroit, and in 1937 he was made director of the Federation of Jewish Charities of Philadelphia. Peiser was a lecturer at the graduate school of the University of Cincinnati from 1927 to 1930 and at the graduate school of Wayne University in 1935-6.

PEIXOTTO, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, lawyer, diplomat and Jewish communal leader, b. New York city, 1834; d. New York city, 1890. He was the son of Daniel Levy Maduro Peixotto and was brought up in Cleveland, where he prepared for a career in law by working in the offices of Stephen A. Douglas. Later, as political editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Peixotto supported Douglas in the presidential campaign of 1860, but during the Civil War his influence was wielded for the war effort.

At this point he also became affiliated with the Jewish community, joining the B'nai B'rith in 1863. He was elected president of the Supreme Lodge the same year, and held this post four terms. Peixotto recommended to the Lodge the establishment of a Jewish orphanage, originally intended to care for Jewish children whose fathers had been killed in the Civil War. It was from this suggestion that the Cleveland Jewish Orphanage developed, and Peixotto was present in 1888 at the opening of its new building. Other Jewish matters, national as well as international, had his support, such as the protest against North Carolina laws which barred non-believers in both the Old and New Testaments from public office, and the raising of a fund for the relief of cholera victims in Palestine.

In 1867 Peixotto moved to New York and in 1868 to San Francisco, where he practised law. Meanwhile the persecution of Jews in Roumania, on a level of barbarity considered strange in the 19th cent., had produced a tension in American-Roumanian relations. Simon Wolf, who had been an early associate of Peixotto in Cleveland, induced President Ulysses S. Grant to offer Peixotto the post of consul to Roumania, so that the United States government might have as its official representative there a person of the religious group that was being persecuted. No salary was connected with the position, but Peixotto accepted (1870), and the consulship was paid for by a special fund raised by Simon Wolf and others with the aid of the B'nai B'rith.

Reaching Bucharest early in 1871, Peixotto soon succeeded in establishing a friendly influence over Prince Charles (Carol I), the ruler of Roumania. During the five years he was in Roumania there were only two bloody outbreaks against the Jews, supposedly prompted by Russian incitement. Peixotto made Bucharest the focal point for rousing public opinion in other countries against Roumanian excesses, and he marshalled the consular representatives in Roumania in outspoken protests when persecutions occurred.

He also made an effort to unite the Jews of Roumania, forming the Order of Zion, which eventually became affiliated with the B'nai B'rith. Cooperating with the leading European Jews of the period, Peixotto was an important figure in the calling of the Brussels Conference in 1872, where the condition of the Jews in the Balkans was discussed. The Berlin Congress of 1878, at which Roumania was made an independent kingdom on condition that the civil and political rights of Jews be recognized, was made possible by the Brussels Conference.

In 1876 Peixotto returned to the United States for a short time, and soon was sent to Lyon, France, by President Rutherford B. Hayes, to serve as United States consul. Here he remained until 1885, when he settled in New York. Peixotto was one of the founders of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and of the Menorah Monthly (1886).

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 24 (1916) 3-25; National Jewish Monthly, Nov., 1940, pp. 82-83; Markens, Isaac, The Hebrews in America (1888) 235-39.

PEIXOTTO, DANIEL LEVY MADURO, physician, b. Amsterdam, 1800; d. New York city, 1843. He was the son of Moses Levy Maduro Peixotto and came to New York in 1807. He received his M.D. degree at Columbia University in 1819 and his M.A. degree in 1825. Prior to taking his degree in medicine he studied at the office of Dr. David Hosack, formerly the physician of Washington. For several years after his graduation Peixotto practiced in the West Indies, but returned in 1823 to New York, where he soon became one of the leaders in the medical profession. He served as physician at the old New York City Dispensary, being lecturer on "abdominal diseases and complaints of females" in 1826 and 1827. For many years he was active in the New York County Medical Society, serving as president from 1830 to 1832. He was active on many committees and advocated legislation for the reform of existing medical conditions.

In 1825 Peixotto helped in the founding of the Academy of Medicine, organized for the "cultivation of medical science and collateral branches," and was its first secretary. He also helped organize the Society for Assisting the Widows and Orphans of Medical Men and urged the establishment of a medical library. In 1825-26, conjointly with Drs. Beck and Bell, he edited The New York Medical and Physical Journal, the first regular quarterly medical journal ever undertaken in the English language, in which many of his articles had been published. In 1829 he became its sole editor. In 1836 he was given the title of Professor of Theory and Practice of Medicine and of Obstetrics and was elected an honorary member of the Medical Society of Lower Canada. In the same year he was called to the presidency of the Willoughby Medical College and removed with his family to Cleveland, Ohio, occupying the position of dean of the faculty for several years. He then returned to New York and resumed practice.

Peixotto's interest was not confined to medical affairs only. He was an accomplished linguist and contributed frequently to the magazines and the lay press of his day. As an intimate friend of General Jackson he advocated his election to the presidency, editing the True American in his behalf. He was active in Masonry and was Master of the Washington Lodge in 1833. Peixotto married Rachel Seixas and was active in Jewish communal life.

Lit.: Morrison, H., Early Jewish Physicians in America (1929); Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 26, pp. 219-30; Markens, I., The Hebrews in America (1888) 22; Kagan, Solomon R., Jewish Contributions to Medicine in America, pp. 10-12, 485, 556-57.

PEIXOTTO, ERNEST CLIFFORD, painter, b. San Francisco, 1869; d. New York city, 1940. He studied at the Académie Julian in Paris, under Benjamin Constant and Jules Lefebvre. Living in Paris for many years, Peixotto exhibited at the salons there as well as in the United States. He also did illustrations for American periodicals, including Scribners; among the books he illustrated were Theodore Roosevelt's Life of Cromwell and Henry Cabot Lodge's Story of the Revolution.

In 1911 Peixotto returned to the United States, to execute a commission for a set of murals for the Cleveland Public Library, Le Morte d'Arthur. Commissions for other public buildings in the United States followed. During the first World War he was named official artist with the expeditionary forces, holding the rank of captain. The work done during this period is in the New National Museum in Washington. At the end of the war, Peixotto established an art training center for the American Expeditionary Force at Bellevue, France; this school was eventually taken over by the French Government and formed the nucleus for the Fontainebleau School of Fine Arts, on the American committee of which Peixotto was a member.

Returning to the United States in 1919, Peixotto became director of the department of mural painting at the Beaux Arts Institute of Design, and retained this post until 1926, when he resigned to have more time for his own work. His murals, though bold and vivid, were sufficiently attached to old forms to make them desirable for public and private buildings. He did the murals for the Seaman's Bank for Savings in New York in 1928, as well as for the Bank of New York and the Embassy Club.

Always interested in the work of young artists, and in the introduction of art to the population at large, Peixotto became a supporter of the Works Progress Administration (WPA) art projects. In 1935 Mayor Fiorello H. La Guardia of New York appointed him to the Municipal Art Commission to arrange for WPA murals in New York city buildings. He remained on this commission until 1939. He also served on the New York World's Fair board of design.

Peixotto was the author of By Italian Seas (1906); Through the French Provinces (1910); Romantic California (1911); Pacific Shores from Panama (1913); Our Hispanic Southwest (1916); A Revolutionary Pilgrimage (1917); The American Front (1919); Through Spain and Portugal (1922) and A Bacchic Pilgrimage (1932). He was an officer of the French Legion of Honor (1924), and was made a member of the National Academy in 1909.

NATHAN RICARDO.

Lit.: New York Times, Dec. 17, 1940, p. 17; Magazine of Art, June, 1939, p. 372; Saturday Review of Literature, May 27, 1933, pp. 613-15.

PEIXOTTO, GEORGE DA MADURO, painter, b. Cleveland, Ohio, 1859; d. White Plains, N. Y., 1937. He was the son of Benjamin Franklin Peixotto. During his father's diplomatic service in Europe, Peixotto was placed in a school in Dresden, and he graduated from the Dresden Art Academy in 1877, a silver medallist. Later he studied in Paris, with Meissonier, Munkácsy and other painters. Subsequently he went to England, where he painted portraits of Cardinal Manning, Sir Moses Montefiore (in his hundredth year), and the Countess d'Avigdor. The portrait of Montefiore was acquired by the Corcoran Gallery in Washington.

In the United States, Peixotto's subjects included President William McKinley, President McKinley's mother, John Hay and Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite. He also did a portrait of Victorien Sardou.

In addition to the Corcoran Gallery, portraits by Peixotto are found in Eastnor Castle, England, and the Widener Memorial Library at Harvard, as well as in private collections. Peixotto was also known as a mural painter, and did the murals for the New Amsterdam Theatre and the Criterion Club in New York. He was an officer of the French Academy (1895).

Lit.: Dictionary of American Painters; New York Times, Oct. 13, 1937.

PEIXOTTO, JESSICA BLANCHE, economist, b. New York city, 1864; d. Berkeley, Calif., 1941. She was the sister of Ernest Clifford Peixotto. After her high school education in San Francisco, she had private preparatory instruction, and entered the University of California as a special student. She was graduated in 1894 and went to Paris to study at the Sorbonne. Returning, she took her doctor of philosophy degree at the University of California (1900), the second woman to be awarded this degree at the institution, and in 1905 began to teach economics there. In 1918 she was appointed a full professor, the first woman to hold such a position at the school, and seven years later was nominated head of the department of social economics. She resigned in 1935, becoming professor emeritus. In her years of service she gained renown as an inspiring teacher.

An outstanding pioneer and expert in social research, she was a member of the California State Board of Charities and Corrections from 1912 to 1923. In that capacity, she especially furthered progress in child welfare work. During the first World War Jessica Peixotto was on the Council of National Defense as an expert on child welfare and women in industry.

In 1933 she worked with the National Recovery Administration. She was one of the early proponents of training for social work, and her efforts resulted in the establishment of such a department at the University of California. Likewise, she was the first chairman of the Heller Committee for Research in Social Economics.

Among her writings was Getting and Spending at the Professional Standard of Living (1927).

Lit.: American Hebrew, Nov. 7, 1924, p. 819 et seq.

PEIXOTTO, MOSES LEVY MADURO, merchant and rabbi, b. Curaçao, 1767; d. New York city, 1828. Other records give his birthplace as Amsterdam, Holland. He married his second wife, Judith Lopez Salzedo, in Amsterdam, and returned to Curaçao to engage in business on a large scale. In 1807 he came to New York city and, since he could not take American goods back with him because of the Embargo Act, remained in New York, engaging as a merchant on Front Street. When Gershom Mendez Seixas, minister of the Congregation Shearith Israel, died (1816) Peixotto volunteered his services as acting minister. In 1820 he gave up his business and was regularly elected minister, a position he filled until his death. Peixotto turned his salary over to the widow of Seixas. He was a prominent Masonic figure in New York.

At his death, in accordance with his wish, Peixotto was buried in the congregation's old cemetery in Chatham Square; for that prohibited privilege, the president of the congregation paid $250 to the city's Common Council. But in 1856 his remains had to be removed to the new cemetery on Twenty-Third Street.

Lit.: Daly, Settlement of the Jews in North America (1893) 56-57; Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 6 (1897) 132-33.

PEIXOTTO, VICTORIA MAUD (Mrs. Maud Brunner; stage name, "Victoria Addison"), actress, daughter of Benjamin Franklin Peixotto, b. Lyon, France. She was educated at Paris and began her career as actress in 1902, when she played with Mrs. Fisk. In 1903 she played with Stuart Robson, and in 1904 with Henry Miller. Her specialty was the interpretation of classical and modern comedy roles, in which she toured the United States from New York to San Francisco. Later she retired to Louisville, Ky.

Lit.: American Jewish Year Book, 1904-5, p. 164.

PEKAH, king of Israel from about 736 to 734 B.C.E. The son of an otherwise unknown Remaliah, Pekah headed the last attempt on the part of the anti-Assyrian party in Israel to oppose the might of the Assyrian empire. His story is related in II Kings 15:27-31, with sidelights in II Chron. 28 and Isa. 7. The Bible gives him a reign of twenty years, which is impossible to fit into the chronology unless it represented the period in which he claimed the kingship—in which case he might have arisen as leader as early as the latter part of the reign of Jeroboam II, who was on friendly terms with Assyria.

Pekah may possibly have been recognized as king over part of the country of Israel, but he did not attain supreme authority either in the period of anarchy that followed the death of Jeroboam II (about 741) or during the rule of the strong Menahem. His opportunity came when the latter died; he slew Pekahiah, the son of Menahem, and immediately upon assuming control, began to combine with the surrounding peoples to fight against Assyria. He made an alliance with Rezin of Aram and the Edomites. Ahaz of Judah was invited to join the coalition and refused; whereupon his port of Elath was attacked and captured by the Edomites. Pekah and Rezin were apparently on the point of invading Judah when they were halted by news of an Assyrian invasion (the account in II Chron. 28 of how Pekah took 200,000 captives from Judah, but released them when upbraided by the prophet Oded, sounds hardly historical). Aram and Israel were no match for the Assyrian armies; Tiglath-pileser of Assyria put an end to the kingdom of Damascus and annexed a large part of northern and eastern Palestine. Pekah was slain by his successor, Hoshea.

Lit.: The Biblical histories for the period, and the commentaries on Kings, Chronicles and Isaiah.

PEKAHIAH, son of Menahem, king of Israel from about 737 to 736 B.C.E. The only thing told about him is that he was assassinated by his successor Pekah (II Kings 15:25). Since Pekahiah and Pekah are actually the same name, it is possible that the former is not the real name of the son of Menahem but that the latter was crowded out in the lists of the reigns by the longer and more exact name of his successor.

PEKELIS, ALEXANDER H., legal sociologist, b. Odessa, Russia, 1902. He studied in Odessa, then at the universities of Leipzig and Vienna, and received his Ph.D. degree from the University of Florence (1928). For a time he served as associate professor of law at the University of Rome. In 1941 Pekelis came to the United States, and joined the staff of the Graduate Faculty of Political and Social Science. Pekelis was the founder and editor of the Massimario della Corte Toscana, and the author of Diritto come volontà costante (1931) and of Saggio sui rapporti tra diritto e morale (1932). Among his Jewish activities was his membership on the advisory council for European affairs of the World Jewish Congress.

PEKIDIM, see FUNCTIONARIES, RELIGIOUS AND COMMUNAL.

PEKIIN (Arabic, El-Bukeia), a village in Upper Galilee, Palestine. The Jews of Pekiin form a minority of the population, which is composed chiefly of Druses, Moslems and Christians. Pekiin is the sole Jewish community which has survived in Palestine from the last centuries. The Jews here maintain that they never left the country during the centuries of the Diaspora.

The name Pekiin appears in writing for the first time in the travel reports of the "Unknown" in 1522. According to the responsa of Moses ben Joseph di Trani in his Sheeloth Uteshuboth (Venice, 1629) and Joseph di Trani in his Sheeloth Uteshuboth (Venice, 1645), a peasant community was in existence in Pekiin at the beginning of the 16th cent. During the first World War a large number of its inhabitants emigrated to South America. In 1942 the total Jewish population of Pekiin was about 100; they occupied about twenty-five acres of land and were engaged in olive growing and vegetable-farming.

The customs, garb and language of the Jews of Pekiin are Arabic. Due to the existence of a Hebrew school and their connection with the new Yishub (Palestinian colonization), they are familiar with Hebrew as well.

Lit.: Weissenberg, S., "Pekiin und seine Juden," in Globus, vol. 96 (1909) 41-45; Masterman, Studies in Galilee (1909) 15 and 17; Luncz, A., Luah Eretz Yisrael, vol. 5 (1899) 126-35; Palestine Directory and Handbook (1926) 76.

PELONI ALMONI, see PHRASES, POPULAR.

PELTZ, JACOB, novelist, b. Bucharest, Roumania, 1899. He was the author of some ten novels in addition to various short stories, poems and essays which made his name popular in Roumania. His greatest success was the novel Calea Vacaresti (Vacaresti Avenue; 1934). Calea Vacaresti is in the ghetto of Bucharest and, in the novel, Peltz depicts, with a great humor and talent, the life of the Jews living there, especially of the lower Jewish middle classes. The novel was translated into Hungarian in the year of its publication. Another novel, Viatza cu haz si fara a numitului Stan (The Cheerful and Non-Cheerful Life of the So-Called Stan), the humoristic picture of the life of the non-Jewish small bourgeoisie, was awarded, in 1929, the prize of the Societatea Scriitorilor Romani (Society of Roumanian Authors) which began its course (1900) by not accepting Jewish authors as members, and reverted (1940), after a brief period of liberal attitude, to its former anti-Jewish policy.

Popular were also Peltz's novels Moartea Tineretzei (The Youth's Death; 1935) and Tzara Noastrà (Our Country; 1938), the vision of a better world and a better country without hatred and prejudice.

PELUGTA, see CONTROVERSIES; OPINION, FREEDOM OF.

PENAL LAW, see LAW, CRIMINAL.

PENANCE, an act of self-mortification or devotion performed as a sign of repentance for sin. Such acts are comparatively rare in Jewish practice. It is true that the obligation of fasting on Yom Kippur was regarded as "afflicting your souls" (Lev. 23:27); the extra penalties imposed in cases of fraud, and the offerings to be brought in case of certain sins, might also be considered acts of penance. With the destruction of the Temple (70 C.E.) these special offerings ceased; from that time on penances were never imposed by ecclesiastical authorities as a rule, but were voluntarily assumed by individuals. The chief form of penance was fasting. During the Middle Ages, especially in Central Europe, a heightened conviction of sin led to an increase in voluntary penances, which might take such forms as sitting in cold water, rolling the bare body in snow, or flagellation. Such self-mortification reached its height at the time of the Sabbatai Zevi movement (1666). Occasionally communities imposed a penance on their members, such as forbidding card-playing after a disastrous fire, which was attributed to the sins of the community; but perhaps this was an attempt to check gambling rather than a true penance.

The reason for the rarity of penance in Jewish life is probably because Jewish thought prefers to redress sin by repentance and benevolence rather than by self-affliction. In the words of the Yom Kippur liturgy, the proper remedies for the punishment that would come upon the wrongdoer are "prayer, repentance and charity."

PENE ADONAI, see FACE OF GOD.

PENE YEHOSHUA, see JACOB JOSHUA BEN ZEVI HIRSCH.

PENIEL (also Penuel), city in Transjordan, near Mahanaim, which was a fortress in Bible times; it was captured and destroyed by Gideon (Judges 8:9, 17) and later rebuilt and strengthened by Jeroboam I (I Kings 12:25). The name means "face of God" and the Bible connects this with the story of Jacob's wrestling with a superhuman creature who was unable to overcome him and was forced to give him a blessing (Gen. 32:25-33). Biblical scholars suggest that this story is the reworking of an ancient legend in which the hero (Jacob) overcomes the deity of the river Jabbok ("the wrestler").

Lit.: The commentaries on Genesis; Frazier, J., Folklore in the Old Testament.

PENITENTIAL DAYS ('asereth yeme teshubah), the first to the tenth days of Tishri, from Rosh Hashanah to Yom Kippur inclusive. Like New Year and the Day of Atonement, they are devoted to repentance. Penitential prayers (Selihoth) are said in the synagogue before the night is completely over, before the morning devotions. Some persons fast on these days, with the exception of the Sabbath and of the day before Yom Kippur. The day after the second day of Rosh Hashanah is also observed as the Fast of Gedaliah (Tzom Gedaliah). The day preceding Yom Kippur has more of a festal character, the penitential prayers for that day being shorter, and fasting forbidden (cf. Orah Hayim 582, 602-3).

These days are called also Yamim Noraim ("awesome days"). The name corresponds to the double meaning of the word nora. On the one hand, as the great days of God's judgment, they remind the Jew of his responsibility before God, and therefore fill him with deep anxiety. On the other hand, since the Jew sees at that time his high religious and moral tasks, they inspire him to exaltation, and arouse within him the feeling of supreme consecration and solemnity. For this reason they are frequently called also the "high holidays."

Lit.: Dembitz, L. N., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, p. 586.

PENITENTIAL PRAYERS, see SELIHOTH.

PENNSYLVANIA, a Middle Atlantic state of the United States, ranking second in its population of 9,900,180 (census of 1940), including a Jewish population of approximately 435,000 (1942), second only to the Jewish population of New York state. Centrally located, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania became one of the largest and wealthiest of the original thirteen states of the Union. Its liberal government attracted immigrants of an unusual diversity of country and creed: in this heterogeneous population Jews encountered fewer obstacles to their enterprise than in the more homogeneous states to the north and south.

Itinerant Jewish traders might have been striking bargains as early as 1623 with the Swedes who were settled along the lower valley of the South (or Delaware) River, the bends of which divide Pennsylvania from New York and New Jersey. It is recorded that when, in 1655, Peter Stuyvesant conquered these Swedish colonies of the Delaware, three Jews, Abraham de Lucena, Salvator Dandrade and Jacob Coen, asked permission to carry on their commerce along the South River. Stuyvesant refused: only business already begun might be finished. About half a year later the directors of the West India Company reversed Stuyvesant's decision. Jews were then free to risk the dangers of wilderness trading and reap its profits, and they so continued to be when in 1664 the Delaware passed into the hands of the English, who declared that "all people shall enjoy the liberty of their conscience . . . as formerly."

Not much more is chronicled in the 17th cent. of whatever intrepid Jewish traders were plying their wares in this wilderness. The business woes of one Isaiah Mesa (perhaps Isack Meza, or Masa, or Mara) are told in the records of a dispute as to whether a hogshead of tobacco sold to him was as good on bottom as on top. Mesa is designated as a Jew. This was in 1657. Other Biblical names and surnames appear in the records; but they may well be those of Swedes or Dutch given to pious conning of the Old Testament. In 1662 a group of Anabaptists projected a colony, and in their articles of association excluded such undesirables as Quakers, Puritans, foolish believers in the millennium, and "usurious Jews."

But although Jews were in the land of Pennsylvania a full twenty-five years before William Penn came to own it, in 1681, it is not until the end of the century that the chronicles of their activities become ampler. Arriving from across the Atlantic, or moving in from other colonies, they tended to remain in the equable climate of the southeastern region of the commonwealth. The bustling, cosmopolitan little harbor city of Philadelphia attracted many of them. A business directory of 1703 lists the name of Jonas Aaron; thus be becomes the first known Jew, though not indubitably the first Jew, to reside in the city. (In the previous year, across the river, there is noted one Benjamin Levy, "a Jew here.") Jews were merchants and they thrived. But Pennsylvania's first known native Jew, born in Philadelphia either 1720 or 1735, was no merchant. His original family name remains undiscovered, but he called himself Jacob Philadelphia, for his city. He became a scientist and philosopher of international and somewhat mysterious repute. The first Jew to hold office in Pennsylvania, and indeed in all the provinces, was the "fashionable Christian proselyte" Isaac Miranda, wealthy landholder and driver of a hard bargain with the Indians, who was appointed in 1727 deputy judge of the court of the vice-admiralty. Other large-scale men of affairs were David Franks and the brothers Gratz, Barnard and Michael. Franks sat in the Colonial Assembly in 1748. His family (he was married to a non-Jew) moved in Philadelphia's highest social circles, as did other Jews, but they were not intimately associated with the Jewish community which had taken firm root by 1740. About this date one Nathan Levy was granted land for a Jews' burial ground in the city. Evidently there was regular worship from this time on, and soon afterwards the famed congregation Mikveh (Mickvé) Israel was constituted, of which the brothers Gratz became leading factors.

Not all the Jews going into Pennsylvania chose to remain in the city of Philadelphia. Within a radius of less than a hundred miles west and north, they settled in Lancaster, York, Easton, Schaeffersville and Reading. In the Lancaster area, where Pennsylvania Jewish pioneers made their second permanent settlement of the commonwealth, Isaac Miranda owned land even before 1730, when the town of Lancaster was incorporated. However, it remained for Joseph Simon, arriving about 1735, to make Lancaster an exciting and famous trade outpost. One of the most ambitious of colonial entrepreneurs, Simon started with a store in Lancaster on Penn Square. Soon he was landholder and trader on a grandiose scale. Out of Lancaster into the wilderness went the huge pack trains of Joseph Simon and his partners. By 1747 there were ten Jewish families in the town. The colony included Isaac Cohen, Pennsylvania's first Jewish doctor, an immigrant from Hamburg, Germany. In that year, 1747, Joseph Simon and Isaac Nunez Henriques, who had moved in from Georgia, were deeded a half-acre of land for a burial ground. Although no formal congregation was organized, it seems certain that the Jews met in the home of leading citizen Simon for religious service.

It would appear that even before Jews thrived in the town of Lancaster, they were settled about twenty miles north, in and around Schaeffersville, which was at that time also in Lancaster county (later in Lebanon county). Schaeffersville was a settlement of one of the numerous German religious sects which had found a haven in Pennsylvania. The historian Julius Friedrich Sachse, writing in 1899, ascribed to pioneer Jews a special influence on the lives of this German sect. Absorbed as they were in the perils of fur trading in the wilderness, Jews were nevertheless devout and observing. In the contact with them, the German sectarians seem to have taken over sections of the Mosaic code. Sachse asserted even more: that many Germans were completely Judaized, and that on an Indian trail at Schaeffersville the first "schul" in the wilderness of the new land was erected. There is record of a cemetery, laid out about 1732, but afterwards obliterated. In the 20th cent. descendants of these German sectarians were still not mixing milk with meat. An intermingling of fact and fiction has blurred this remote history; but it is clearly impressive of Jewish influence.

As early as 1753 Jews would seem to have been living at Reading, a town laid out about fifty-eight miles northwest of Philadelphia in 1748. From a document published in 1920 it appears that the Reading Jewish community borrowed a Scroll of the Law from Congregation Shearith Israel of New York city for use on the high holy days of 1761. The return of the scroll was guaranteed by leaders of the Philadelphia Congregation Mikveh Israel. However, the history of this early community does not continue. It is not until the middle 1830's that a continuous Jewish settlement begins to emerge.

At York, among the earliest Jews was Elijah Etting, who came to the colonies from Germany in 1758. He married a daughter of Joseph Solomon of Lancaster, and in York were born the children of Elijah, who were later to be influential Jewish citizens of Baltimore and Philadelphia. Elijah Etting's name is found in a petition of incorporation of old York Town in 1762. Three years later he was naturalized at York. Other records mention the names Barnitz, Solomon Schmuck, Abraham Miller, Solomon Kauffman, Abraham Lehman, and Abraham Greenawalt.

The town of Easton, not much more than a frontier stockade in constant danger of Indian attack, was surveyed in the year 1750. Listed among the eleven families then resident were Myer Hart and his wife Rachel. Hart was the first merchant of the town, and became Easton's foremost citizen. Later, Michael Hart, who, according to some annalists, was Myer's son, was Easton's most important merchant. There is evidence that, lacking a congregation, the Jews of Easton supported Mikveh Israel of Philadelphia.

In the town of Northumberland, Aaron Levy, who had emigrated from Holland in 1760, was the leading merchant. His name and that of Andrew Levy appear in the county's first tax assessment list on record; the date is probably before 1775. Levy, widely known as a pioneer of Northumberland county, eventually came to be one of the large land operators in colonial America. He owned land in almost every county of Pennsylvania, and in 1786 laid out the town of Aaronsburg in Centre County; this was the first town in the country to be established by and named after a Jew.

Separated by geographical space then difficult to traverse, these colonial Jews of Pennsylvania were nevertheless intimately linked in an ambitious community of trade. Ships arriving at Philadelphia laden with eagerly sought goods of the Old World; long pack trains of commodities, bound for the hinterland; flatboats nosing their way down the Ohio and its tributaries; pelts, the basis of all this trade, taken over in vast quantities from Indian hunters and traded again: in this intricate drama of far-flung commerce, often violent with the spilled blood of Indian and white, early Jews of the commonwealth played a role beyond the proportion of their actual small numbers. Partnership was the rule, often cemented by marriage. Joseph Simon inducted numerous sons-in-law into his business. Michael Gratz married Miriam Simon. The names Gratz, Simon, Franks, Levy, were constantly linked in various business combinations. They were, moreover, associated with the names of the greatest non-Jewish traders and speculators of the times—William Trent, Sir William Johnson, George Croghan, Robert Morris. Jews participated in the struggle of French against English and Indian against White. In the French and Indian War, Moses Franks and David Franks provisioned the army. The latter contributed to the £5,000 defense fund of the colony after Braddock's defeat. Later he supplied the regiment that accompanied George Washington on the Virginia expedition to dislodge the French from Fort Duquesne. Levy Andrew Levy was in the thick of Indian affairs, and once seems to have been taken prisoner. The Gratz brothers, in close touch with their agents penetrating into the wild country to the west, knew more about Indian intrigue than many an official. In 1763 England, victorious over the French, was left in sole possession of all territory east of the Mississippi. That year the most violent of the Indian uprisings, under Pontiac, were suppressed. In the now freer westward push of the American frontier, the Jews continued to take a leading part.

Land was cheaper than money. Fantastically enormous tracts of it exchanged hands. Jews were in on the deals. Aaron Levy owned immense stretches in Pennsylvania, and was associated with Robert Morris in the disastrous speculations in the western part of the commonwealth. At Bloody Run, in 1763, Indians attacked a pack train; a group of traders lost their cargo of £80,000. In 1768 these traders were indemnified by the Indian chiefs with a huge land grant; among the traders were David Franks, Joseph Simon and Levy Andrew Levy. Later the Indians conveyed southern Illinois to a group of twenty-two traders. Franks, Simon and Levy were again included, and also, this time, Michael and Barnard Gratz, Moses Franks, Moses Franks Jr. and Jacob Franks. In 1760, a year after Fort Pitt was established as a trading post, Joseph Simon, William Trent and Levy Andrew Levy founded a trading house there. Simon, Levy, and David Franks were the original owners of Wilkinsburg, known as Jews' Land, which afterwards became a suburb of Pittsburgh. In addition to Aaronsburg, already mentioned, there was a Franks Town in the vicinity of Pittsburgh, and, in the same area, Gratz, on the Youghiogheny River. The public land speculations precipitated endless litigation between states and individuals and in the end came to naught for the speculators. Yet even before the final repudiation of the deals, the American Revolution drew to itself the energy of Pennsylvania's commercial pioneers.

The "Keystone" commonwealth rendered important service in the War of Independence. Among Jews, as among non-Jews, sympathies were divided. Some were loyalists. Most were staunch patriots. Prominent Jewish merchants of Philadelphia signed the non-importation agreement of 1765. Jewish owners of merchant vessels joined in the privateering game. Jewish citizens took the oath of allegiance. One Mordecai Levy publicly retracted his former disparagement of the Revolutionary cause. On the other hand, a petition of 1777 asking financial aid for the British troops during their occupancy of Philadelphia included some members of the Jewish community: notably David Franks, who, as a Loyalist, was finally forced to leave the city, together with his Loyalist daughter Rebecca, luminary of Philadelphia's high society.

In Lancaster, in 1777, a group of citizens pledged themselves to maintain one or more messengers to ride between their town and Washington's headquarters. Five Jews joined the pledge. In Easton, Myer Hart took charge of the British prisoners' camp. Later, Michael Hart entertained George Washington in his Easton home.

The journal of the Continental Congress records numerous transactions of Jews in purveying army supplies. Joseph Simon appears frequently: his was one of the few gunsmithies equipped to turn out quantities of firearms. Others mentioned are Hyman Levy and Levy Marks. David Franks, until his expulsion, was "agent to the contractors for victualling the troops of the king of Great Britain," and supplied the troops quartered in Reading. The financial genius of Haym Salomon supplemented the work of the famed Robert Morris. The brothers Gratz were also financiers of the Revolution. Benjamin Levy was authorized to sign bills of credit "emitted" (issued) by the Congress. Isaac Moses gave 3,000 pounds sterling to the colonial coffers.

Army records of the time are meager, but it is certain that Jews were in the fight. Major Benjamin Nones, on the staff of Lafayette and Washington, was in command of a legion of four hundred, among whom were a number of Jews. Solomon Bush, lieutenant colonel, was appointed deputy adjutant general of the state militia. Colonel David Salisbury Franks, aide to Benedict Arnold, was cleared of any complicity in Arnold's treason. Major Lewis Bush was fatally wounded at Brandywine. Philip Moses Russell, of Germantown, surgeon's mate, suffered the winter hardships of Valley Forge and was commended by Washington. Others who fought were Captain Noah Abraham, Henry Pike Bush, Ensign Mordecai Davis, Moses Hammer, Solomon Isaac and Jacob Moser. Bernard Hart was quartermaster of a brigade of state troops. Michael Hart was on the muster role of a military company in 1776.

In 1783 the patriot Jews of Pennsylvania celebrated the peace. Philadelphia Jews of Congregation Mikveh Israel were also still celebrating the opening of their historic synagogue. In all Pennsylvania there were, at the close of the war, about 800 Jews. Most of these had come into the state after 1765. Many were from New York; they had taken refuge from the invading British in neighboring Philadelphia, and a number of them now returned to New York.

Long before the movement for independence, Pennsylvania Jews had availed themselves of the Naturalization Act of 1740, and taken their oath of citizenship on the Old Testament. Several Jews had held high office under colonial rule. Benjamin Cohen was in the upper house of the colonial legislature in 1755, and in the same year, by royal appointment became attorney general of Pennsylvania. However, the state constitution established in 1776 set up a restrictive condition for holding office in the state General Assembly: an oath had to be taken affirming belief in the divine inspiration of the New Testament. Petitions of prominent Jews to remove the disability had no immediate effect, but were instrumental in the eventual abolishment of the condition. All other offices were open to Jews. Liberal opinion was unanimous that the Jew, by his record in the struggle for national freedom, had won for himself the right to civil recognition.

In higher education Pennsylvania could boast of greater liberality from the beginning than any other state. Thus the University of Pennsylvania, established at Philadelphia in 1749, included in its earliest records names of Jewish entrants and graduates. The famous Moses Levy who was graduated with two classmates in 1772 was for a quarter of a century a trustee of the college. Franklin College, later renamed Franklin and Marshall College, was founded at Lancaster in 1787. In the first year of its existence four Jewish students enrolled: Jacob Franks, William Franks, Hyman Gratz and Richea Gratz. Richea Gratz was one of the first American women to matriculate in a college. Some of the early college graduates in Pennsylvania became leaders in the profession of law, and it is notable that Pennsylvania was one of three states (together with Georgia and South Carolina) where there was any significant number of Jewish lawyers before the 19th cent.

One of the institutions by which the early Jews of Pennsylvania were brought into close relations with their fellow non-Jews was masonry. In the commonwealth, Jews were particularly active in the Scottish Rite of the Order. Lists of members in the Sublime Lodge of Perfection in Philadelphia between the years 1781 and 1786 include a score of Jewish names. Jews held high office in masonry. Solomon Bush was Grand Master of the Sublime Lodge (1787 and 1788). Solomon Etting was one of the founders of a masonic lodge in Lancaster in 1785. Other Pennsylvania masonic lodges included active Jewish members. Later (1859, 1860) Henry M. Phillips was to become Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, and leave to it a considerable part of his fortune.

Pennsylvania Jews continued to develop their particular communal interests. In Philadelphia, at the close of the Revolution, approximately one hundred Jews were members of the Sephardic congregation Mikveh Israel. The Ashkenazic Jews organized a separate group in 1802, for the city and county of Philadelphia, calling themselves the Hebrew German Society Rodeph Shalom (later Congregation Rodeph Shalom). Before then, in 1783, Mikveh Israel had set up Pennsylvania's first Jewish charitable association in a travelers' aid society, Ezrath Orhim. In 1813 a Society for the Visitation of the Sick and Mutual Assistance was founded.

In 1812 Rabbi Gershom Seixas estimated Pennsylvania's Jewish families to number about one hundred, of whom thirty were in Philadelphia. That year, in the War of 1812, Pennsylvania Jews enlisted; some were the sons of those who had fought in the Revolutionary War. Official records show more than thirty known army volunteers. Pennsylvania Jews were also in the navy, several as officers. Uriah Phillips Levy, who later became commodore, was master of the brig Argus which destroyed twenty-one British merchantmen.

It was not until 1825 that the rate of growth of Pennsylvania's Jewish community rose sharply. About that time there was an exodus of Jews from Germany. Many chose to settle in the commonwealth. It is noteworthy that the early pioneers of the state had come from Germany and Holland (some after first residing in England), while the pioneer settlers in other colonial provinces were Spanish Jews. Many of the new German immigrants took up their residence in the already well-established community of Philadelphia. Others went farther west, with the general popular movement into new country. In this period the western Pennsylvania Jewish communities of Pittsburgh, Harrisburg, Wilkes-Barre, Scranton and Reading began to emerge. A quarter of a century later European repression drove more masses of German Jews into America, and the increase was reflected in the expanding Jewish communities of the cities of Pennsylvania.

The rise in Jewish population was of course reflected also in the larger numbers of Jewish soldiers enlisted for the Union in the Civil War. The state as a whole gave 336,000 men. Official lists, specifying the regiments, record 527 Jews as soldiers. Pennsylvania thus ranks fourth in this total, led by New York, Ohio and Illinois. An exceptional number of Jewish soldiers rose to officer rank. These included Colonel Max Einstein, Major Lyon Levy Emanuel (enlisted with two brothers, Louis and Jonathan), Colonel Max Friedman, Captain Abraham Hart, Sergeant Elias Hyneman, Lieutenant Herman Hamburger, Major Aaron Lazarus, Captain Nathan D. Menken, Captain Ullman. The Reverend Jacob Frankel of Philadelphia was appointed chaplain of the United States hospitals by Abraham Lincoln.

By 1880 there was an estimated total of 18,000 Jews in Pennsylvania. Then a new and different migration, this time of Jews fleeing from the threat of Russian pogroms, came to swell the ranks of Pennsylvania Jewry. Russian Jews brought their own culture, and set up their own Orthodox communal institutions. By the beginning of the 20th cent. they were in the majority in Pennsylvania, as they were in other large states of the east. The total Jewish population of the state was estimated at approximately 100,000. According to a survey made at this period, there were thirty-four cities and towns with at least one Jewish institution, and these localities supported a total of ninety-two congregations. Fifty-nine of these congregations had a total of 6,176 members. Eight were affiliated with the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. Twenty-nine of the congregations had schools with a total attendance of 2,433 pupils; free religious schools were conducted by two societies, one of which reported 2,721 pupils. Two Hebrew free schools had an enrollment of 430 pupils. There were, besides, industrial schools, kindergartens and day nurseries. There were forty-one charitable societies. Of twelve literary clubs, eleven were in Philadelphia. In two cities the Alliance Israélite Universelle had branches; four localities supported sections of the Council of Jewish Women; five had a total of nine Zionist societies. Seventeen cities and towns had a total of sixty fraternal lodges. Philadelphia was credited with a large share of all this activity.

From 1889 to 1910, from Russia, Austria-Hungary and Roumania, more than 1,074,000 Jews arrived in the United States. Of this number more than 108,500 named Pennsylvania as their destination, a number second to those who named New York state. Skilled laborers and artisans made up the majority of this latest immigrant population, and they became an integrated part of the general Pennsylvania proletariat. They were for the most part Orthodox Jews, and as such formed their own congregations, erected their synagogues and continued, under their different cultural patterns, the educational and institutional work which the German Jews had initiated and successfully developed.

In 1917 Pennsylvania Jews numbered about 322,000; in 1927, about 405,000; in 1937, approximately 434,000. In 1942 the Jewish population was distributed mainly as follows:

Allentown	2,500	Lancaster	1,800
Altoona	1,800	McKeesport	6,800
Bethlehem	1,100	Philadelphia	293,000
Braddock	1,350	Pittsburgh	55,000
Chester	2,200	Reading	3,000
Easton	1,500	Scranton	9,800
Erie	1,600	Uniontown	600
Harrisburg	5,000	Wilkes-Barre	6,200
Hazleton	1,700	York	1,000
Johnstown	1,300

In addition, approximately eighteen communities had a Jewish population of over 500, and there were several hundred communities with lesser Jewish populations.

ALLENTOWN (separately treated). Jews settled in the community in the 1840's and organized for regular worship in the 1850's. In 1942 the Orthodox congregations were Agudas Achim, Bnai Israel, and Shaari Sholem (Orthodox); Keneseth Israel was Reform, and Temple Beth-El Conservative. There were also a welfare agency and a community center. Henry B. Friedman was assistant United States attorney (1923-30), and president of the city's community chest (1933-36).

ALTOONA, with a general population of 80,071 (census of 1940), including in 1942 about 1,800 Jews, began to have a Jewish settlement in the 1860's and 1870's. The first congregations were the Orthodox Talmud Torah (1873), the Mountain City Hebrew Reform (1874), and the Austrian Congregation. Agudath Achim (Conservative) built its first synagogue in 1892, and a new one in 1924. Simon Glazer was the first rabbi (1898-1902), followed by Rabbi Lifshitz, S. Rabinowitz, Rabbi Horowitz, C. Rosen, S. Yampol and Rabbi Maun. In 1942 Henry R. Goldberger was the incumbent. Reform Congregation Beth Israel had Samuel Cook as its rabbi in 1941. Other institutions of Altoona were the mutual benefit society Somech Noflim (1898), the United Hebrew Charities (1900), the Hebrew Free Loan Society (1908), a lodge of the B'nai B'rith (1920), and a district of the Zionist Organization of America (1930). Representatives of the community in civic life were Morris Henderson, on the city council (1908-12), and Samuel Jubelirer was city solicitor in 1942 (elected in 1940).

BETHLEHEM. The general population of 58,478 (census of 1940) included a Jewish population of about 1,100 in 1942. Early German Jewish settlers, prior to the establishment of their own congregation, were affiliated with the Covenant of Peace Congregation at Easton, and some were buried in the Easton cemetery. In 1890 the Conservative Brith Sholom Congregation of Bethlehem built its first synagogue. In 1926 Bethlehem Jews erected a $200,000 community center which sponsored schools, club rooms and sports. Among the rabbis who served with Brith Sholom were Isador Signer (1926-27), Jerome Mark (1937-39) and Mordecai L. Brill (1940-). The Orthodox congregation Agudas Achim was organized in 1926. In 1942 it had an approximate membership of thirty. Other Bethlehem organizations were a lodge of the B'nai B'rith, a district of the Zionist Organization of America and A.Z.A., a chapter of Hadassah, a Young Judea, an Arbeiter Ring and a post of the Jewish War Veterans. From 1935 to 1936 Dr. L. C. Ziegler of the Jewish community was president of the Bethlehem board of education.

BRADDOCK, a city of 18,317 (census of 1940), had, in 1942, approximately 1,350 Jews. The first Orthodox congregation, Agudas Achim, was organized in 1895. Ahavath Achim, also Orthodox, was founded in 1904. Both were in existence in 1942. A lodge of the B'nai B'rith was established, as well as a Hebrew Ladies' auxiliary of the lodge. Several general clubs also came into existence.

BRADFORD had an active Jewish community of about 150 families in 1942, in a general population of 17,531 (1940). The First Bradford Orthodox Hebrew Congregation was established in 1880. In 1942 the congregation sponsored a sisterhood, a daily Hebrew school and a religious school. Congregation Beth Israel was also Orthodox. The Reform congregation was incorporated as Beth Zion in 1880. The first rabbi was S. Weil. Isaac M. Wise officiated at the dedication of the first Temple in 1881; in 1910 a new Temple was erected. The congregation was served by Rabbis Louis Reynolds, R. Reich, L. Weiss, Jacob B. Menkes, Schwalb, Rosenberg and Saul B. Appelbaum. In 1942 Leo E. Turitz was the incumbent, having been elected to the pulpit in 1938. The Temple had a ladies' auxiliary, a men's club and a school. Other Bradford organizations were a lodge of the B'nai B'rith and auxiliary, a section of the Council of Jewish Women, a Junior Council, and the Welfare Fund. Mrs. Nathaniel (Janet Simons) Harris, of Bradford, was national president of the National Council of Jewish Women from 1911 to 1917. Together with two other clergymen of Bradford, Rabbi Saul B. Appelbaum founded the local Juvenile Court, widely known as the Bradford plan. Joseph C. Greenewald was mayor of Bradford (1899-1901).

EASTON (separately treated). The town was settled by Jews in pre-Revolutionary days, but the community did not have organized religious activity until 1842; in that year Congregation Brith Sholom (Covenant of Peace) was chartered and a synagogue erected. The historic building was still standing in 1942, when the congregation celebrated its centenary. Brith Sholom changed its ritual from Orthodox to Reform in 1870. The Orthodox congregation Bnai Abraham was founded in 1890 and erected its synagogue in 1909. Other institutions built up by Easton Jewry included a Y.M. and Y.W.H.A. and local organizations of the B'nai B'rith, Hadassah, Junior Hadassah and the Jewish War Veterans. The Jewish Community Council was formed in 1939.

ERIE (separately treated) had its earliest Jewish settlers, of German origin, in the 1840's. In 1942 the Jewish congregation included Anschai Chesed (Reform), Brith Sholom (Conservative), and Ohel Jacob (Orthodox). The two latter sponsored the Talmud Torah. Other organizations were a lodge of the B'nai B'rith, a Workmen's Circle, a Hebrew Free Loan Society, a section of the Council of Jewish Women, the Jewish Welfare Society, the Jewish Community Council and ICOR.

GREENSBURG, with a population of 16,679 (census of 1940), included about 125 Jewish families in 1942, mainly of Russian origin. In 1889 Congregation Bnai Israel, then Orthodox, but subsequently Conservative, was organized. The synagogue was built about five years later. In 1941 Henry Goody was called to the pulpit, which prior to that date had been served by no regularly functioning rabbi. A brotherhood was organized in 1940. Other groups of the community were the Council of Jewish Women and of Jewish Juniors, Young Judea, a district of the Zionist Organization and of Masada, and a lodge of the B'nai B'rith. Samuel Wise was an alderman of Greensburg in 1942.

HARRISBURG (separately treated). Jews who first came to the city in the 1840's were from Germany and England. In 1942 there were a Reform congregation, Ohev Sholom (organized in 1852); the Orthodox synagogues Chizuk Emunah (1884) and Kesher Israel (1901); Beth El, Conservative (organized in 1926); and Machazike Hadas, Hasidic (organized in 1904).

HAZLETON. Hazleton's population of 37,979 (census of 1940) included an estimated 1,700 Jews in 1942. The first Jews settled in the city in the 1860's. It was not until some thirty years later, however, that a regular community was established, composed of Jews who had come in from other places in Pennsylvania, some of German and others of East European origin. Isaac Honig was one of these early settlers. About 1895 the Orthodox congregation Agudas Israel was organized; its first synagogue, built in 1903, was superseded by a new structure in 1923. In 1942 Philip Tatz, elected in 1939, was rabbi. The Reform congregation Beth Israel was organized in 1906, and first served by Rabbi Meyer Noot. Other incumbents included Rabbis Montague N. A. Cohen, Arthur S. Montaz (1922-24), Morris Ulrich (1925), Abraham S. Anspacher (1926) and Jacob I. Meyer (1930-35). Allan Tarshish was in the pulpit in 1942, having become the incumbent in 1936. Other institutions established by Hazleton Jews were the Y.M. and Y.W.H.A. (1898), a lodge of the B'nai B'rith, a district of the Zionist Organization, and a United Jewish Appeal. Dr. Maurice L. Blum became president of the advisory board of the Salvation Army in 1930, and was still serving in 1942. Rabbi Allan Tarshish, elected in 1940, was president of the Welfare Council and Community Chest. Max Friedlander was Luzerne County Assessor (1928-32). Joseph Sherman was assistant district attorney of the county (1936-39), and assistant city solicitor of Hazleton (1942).

HONESDALE situated on the Lackawaxen River, with a population of 5,687 (census of 1940), including, in 1942, about seventy-five Jews, became famous for its synagogue, built in the 1850's and said to be, with its seating capacity of only eighty-five, the smallest in the United States. The first Jewish family arrived in Honesdale in the spring of 1849; by fall of that year Congregation Beth Israel was organized, and in 1854 the Hebrew and religious schools were holding regular sessions. The little synagogue was dedicated in 1856. Styled in early New England church architecture with a gold Star of David on the spire of its tower, it was constructed of white clapboard, erected on the river's bank. The lot for the Temple was donated by a non-Jew, who contributed also to the building fund. A Rabbi Kutner was the first to serve the congregation. A resident rabbi was maintained until 1891, but the removal of many of the families in the decade from 1880 to 1890 necessitated economy, and thereafter students from the Hebrew Union College and the Jewish Institute of Religion were called in for the major holiday services.

JOHNSTOWN, a city of 66,610 inhabitants (census of 1940), had, in 1942, about 1,300 Jews. A well established Jewish community had emerged by 1882. A cemetery association was founded about 1885, and in 1899 Rodef Sholom Congregation was organized, at its inception Orthodox, but later Conservative. The synagogue in use in 1942 was built in 1905. Rabbis who served included Ralph Simon (1931-36) and Mordecai Brill (1936-40). Irving Ganz was then elected, and was serving in 1942. The congregation had both a Hebrew and a religious school. Beth Zion, the Reform congregation, joined the Union of American Hebrew Congregations in 1919, and in 1941 had sixty members; it was served by Rabbi H. Goren Perelmuter. Other organizations of the community included a district of the Zionist Organization of America (established about 1912), chapters of Senior and Junior Hadassah (1935, 1938), a section of the Council of Jewish Women and a Junior Council. An early participant in civic government was Abe Cohen, who served as councilman for about fifteen years, until 1895. Maurice Shadden was solicitor to the Cambria County controller (1935), and in 1942 assistant district attorney (appointed in 1936).

Beth Israel, Honesdale, Pa.

LANCASTER (treated separately). Though Jews had settled in Lancaster in pre-Revolutionary days, the community did not grow until the middle 1800's, when a number of new families arrived. In 1942 the two congregations were the Reform Shaarai Shomayim and the Orthodox Degel Israel. Other community organizations were the Temple Sisterhood and Brotherhood, the Ladies' Aid Society, the Harmonie Club, a lodge of the B'nai B'rith, a section of the Council of Jewish Women, and a chapter of Hadassah. The Organized Jewish Charities was created in 1927.

MCKEESPORT included in its general population of 55,460 (census of 1940) a Jewish community of about 6,800 persons in 1942. The McKeesport Jews had several early congregations: Etz Chaim (Tree of Life) was organized in 1893; other Orthodox congregations were Ahavath Achim, Gemilas Chesed and Anshe Sfard. In 1942 there were also Congregation Keser Israel and Temple Bnai Israel. In addition, there were established at various dates the Hebrew Benevolent Society, the Hebrew Ladies' Aid Society and the Hebrew Ladies' Beneficial Society (organized in 1896). A lodge of the B'nai B'rith was organized. For a number of years, prior to the first World War, a Y.M.H.A. was maintained. Frank R. S. Kaplan was a member of the board of education from 1916 to 1922.

MOUNT CARMEL, with a population of 17,753 (census of 1940), had in 1942 about 200 Jews. The first group came in the 1880's from Germany, as well as from Eastern Europe. In 1888 the Orthodox Tifereth Israel congregation was organized, and a synagogue built. The first rabbi, Jacob Rabinowitz, served for twenty-eight years. Other rabbis were Jacob Feinstein, Herman Beck, Menachim Perr and Jacob Epstein. The new synagogue, erected in 1922, was in use in 1942, with Jacob Blachorsky as rabbi. It had a Hebrew school and a Ladies' Aid Society. The community also established a Jewish Fellowship Club and a lodge of the B'nai B'rith (1940), and an annual United Jewish Appeal.

NEW KENSINGTON had no Jewish settlement until 1890; in 1942 there were in the city's population of 23,984 (census of 1940) about 175 Jewish families. The Orthodox Beth Jacob congregation was founded in 1904; its old synagogue was superseded by a new one built in 1925. Rabbis who served included a Rabbi Cooper, H. Levendorf, Rabbi Mendelsohn, Henry Goldberger, Mordecai Thurman, N. N. Hurwitz, and Maurice Lyons. In 1940 Judah Isaac Washer became the incumbent. The congregation organized a religious school, a sisterhood, and a Community Forum (1941). In addition, New Kensington Jewry instituted a district of the Zionist Organization (1920), an A.Z.A. (1941), a Y.M.H.A. (1930), a chapter of Hadassah and Junior Hadassah, a Junior Council, a Young Judaea (1940) and a lodge of the B'nai B'rith (1942). Representatives of the Jewish community serving in civic affairs of New Kensington were Louis Claster, city solicitor for New Kensington and Arnold (1920-35); Dr. Nathan Kopelman, member of the Arnold City Council (1930-32), and city physician (1939-41); Arpad Steiner, in the city council (1936-40). In 1942 Jacob Sakulsky, elected in 1930, was an alderman; Maurice Claster, appointed in 1940, was attorney for the public utilities commission.

PHILADELPHIA (treated separately) had numerous Orthodox, Conservative and Reform congregations in 1942. Among these, Rodef Shalom and Keneseth Israel were the leading Reform, Mikveh Israel the foremost Orthodox, and Adath Jeshurun the leading Conservative congregations. All important national and fraternal organizations were well represented. In 1942 the Federation of Jewish Charities encompassed more than a score of constituent agencies. The United Jewish Appeal also sponsored many philanthropic and educational causes outside of Philadelphia.

PITTSBURGH (treated separately) supported, in 1942, the Reform congregation Rodef Shalom, the three Conservative groups Tree of Life, Beth Shalom and B'nai Israel, and several Orthodox congregations: Poale Zedek, Shaare Torah, Beth Hamidrash Hagodol, Adath Jeshurun, Agudath Achim and Mogen Dovid. National organizations were represented by local branches, and the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, founded in 1912, had more than ten constituent agencies in 1942. The United Jewish Fund coordinated the work of other organizations.

POTTSVILLE, seat of Schuylkill County, included in 1942 a Jewish community of about 175 families among its 24,391 inhabitants. Jews came in from Germany early in the city's history. The Strouse family arrived in 1832. Later, Eastern European Jewish immigrants augmented the group. Congregation Oheb Zedeck, chartered in 1857, was originally Reform. Subsequently it shifted to the Orthodox ritual, and finally to the Conservative. It built a Hebrew school and organized a sisterhood. In 1942 Jacob Hochman was rabbi. Other local organizations included a United Jewish Charities Appeal, a Ladies' Benevolent Society and the Esras Achim Lodge. There were also a chapter of Hadassah, a district of the Zionist Organization and a lodge of the B'nai B'rith. Myer Strouse of Pottsville was editor of the North American Farmer (1848-52), and was elected to the United States Congress, serving from 1863 to 1867. During the Civil War the community gave notable support to the Union in money, and out of the twenty Jewish families then resident in Pottsville, five men enlisted.

READING (separately treated) had a scattering of Jewish settlers long before the 1830's, but it was about that time that the community emerged. Congregations in 1942 included Oheb Sholom (Reform), Shomrei Habrith (Orthodox), and Kesher Zion (Conservative). Reading also developed various fraternal and Zionist organizations, and a Jewish Community Council wherein representatives of all Reading organizations collaborated for the annual United Jewish Campaign.

SCRANTON (separately treated) had its first pioneer Jews in the decade of 1840 to 1850. After journeying for a number of years to the Wilkes-Barre synagogue to observe the high holy days, Scranton Jews finally organized their own Anshe Chesed Congregation (Reform) in 1860. Later a number of Orthodox synagogues were founded; in 1942 these included Ahavath Sholom, Bnai Israel, and Bnai Zion. Temple Israel was Conservative.

SHAMOKIN numbered among its 18,826 inhabitants (census of 1940) about one hundred Jewish families, in 1942. Jews first came to Shamokin in the 1880's and 1890's. In 1885 the Orthodox Congregation B'nai Israel was organized, and a school established. A synagogue was built in 1922. Samuel I. Zakuto, who came to the pulpit in 1939, was rabbi in 1942.

SHARON, which in 1942 had about 140 Jewish families in its general population of 25,324 (census of 1940), saw its earliest Jewish settlers in the 1880's. An Orthodox congregation, House of Israel, was organized in 1890; subsequently it became Conservative. The early synagogue, built in 1903, was superseded by a new structure in 1923. Among the rabbis who served the congregation were Maurice Moskowitz (1929-34), Aaron Shapiro (1934-36), Meyer Finkelstein (1936-37) and Harry Seeve (1937-41). Sidney Riback became the incumbent in 1941. The congregation organized a sisterhood, as well as a religious and a Hebrew school. It also issued an annual New Year journal. Other Jewish organizations instituted in Sharon were a Ladies' Aid, Chevrah Kadisha, Young Judea, Young People's League, a section of the Council of Jewish Women, Senior and Junior Hadassah chapters, a district of the Zionist Organization of America, an A.Z.A. lodge and a lodge of the B'nai B'rith. In 1939 the Federation of Jewish Charities was organized. Jewish representatives in the larger Sharon community were Jacob Goldberg, councilman, Nathan Routman, county solicitor, and Lewis Levine, mayor of the neighboring city of Farrell.

STATE COLLEGE counted among its 6,226 inhabitants (1940 census) about fifty Jews, in 1942, exclusive of the Jewish student body at Pennsylvania State College. It was not until 1910 that Jews came to the town. The B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation at the college was formed in 1935. In 1939 the Foundation erected a building, in which a community center was organized and a library built up. Rabbis who served were Ephraim Fischoff (1935-37), Theodore H. Gordon (1937-40) and Benjamin M. Kahn, who was the incumbent in 1942. At Pennsylvania State College there were, in 1942, fifteen Jewish faculty members. The annual United Jewish Fund drive came to be sponsored jointly by students, faculty and townspeople. In 1942 Charles Schlow of the Jewish community was serving in the city council of State College.

SUNBURY had in 1942, in its population of 15,422 (census of 1940), fifty-one Jewish families, or a total of 160 individuals. Jews first began to settle in the community in the late 1880's. In 1942 Sunbury supported one synagogue, the Conservative Temple Beth El (organized in 1919). The rabbi was Abraham H. Israelitan. The community also had a sisterhood and a lodge of the B'nai B'rith, organized in 1938. One of the city's outstanding philanthropists was Mrs. Jennie L. Weinreich (d. 1926), who bequeathed more than $150,000 for the creation of a playground for Sunbury children, called the Oppenheimer Pleasure Grounds. She also provided about $68,000 for the Sunbury hospital, and for a fund to distribute coal among the underprivileged.

UNIONTOWN had about 600 Jews in 1942; its general population was 21,794 (census of 1940). The Hollander family known to have resided in Uniontown in the 1860's, may have been the first Jewish family there. Other early residents were the families Fell, Amberg, Stern and Baum. In 1904 the Temple Israel Congregation (Reform) was incorporated, and built a synagogue. Student rabbis from the Hebrew Union College officiated for the high holy days. The first regularly serving rabbi was Isadore Reichert, who remained the incumbent for four years. Succeeding him were William Loewenberg (1913-15), Harry J. Stern (1922-27), Samuel H. Baron (1927-29), Henry E. Kagan (1929-34) and Maurice H. Schatz (1934-36). Samuel Glasner came to the pulpit in 1936, and was the incumbent in 1942. A religious school and a sisterhood were instituted by the congregation. Shortly after the organization of Temple Israel the Orthodox Tree of Life synagogue was formed. In 1942 Rabbi Samuel J. Chill was in its pulpit. Other institutions were a section of the Council of Jewish Women, a district of the Zionist Organization of America, a chapter of Hadassah, and a lodge of the B'nai B'rith. In 1939 the community set up the United Jewish Federation. Nick Rosenberg of the Jewish community was onetime district attorney of Fayette County. Samuel Feigus was assistant district attorney.

WASHINGTON had approximately 400 Jews in 1942, in a total population of 26,078 (1940 census). About 1890 Rabbi Jacob Goldfarb became a resident of the town, and it was he who took the lead in organizing the Orthodox Congregation Beth Israel; this was the first congregation to be formed in Washington County. A synagogue was built in 1902. Goldfarb served until 1941, when he retired as rabbi emeritus; he was succeeded by Maxwell Berger, son of the chief rabbi of Toronto, Canada.

WEST CHESTER. West Chester's Jewish population in 1942 numbered about 275; the city's general population was 13,187 (census of 1940). The first Jewish families came from Russia and Poland in the late 1890's and early 1900's. About 1910 Congregation Kesher Israel was organized. A synagogue was erected in 1925, and in 1942 the congregation, Conservative, was still using this structure. Rabbi Isadore H. Shoulson, who came to the pulpit in 1936, was serving in 1942. There were a Talmud Torah and a religious school. In 1939 the community organized the Kesher Israel Fund to care for all charitable work.

WILKES-BARRE (separately treated) had an early Jewish settlement. The first families arrived from Bavaria in the 1830's. B'nai B'rith, the Reform congregation, was the first to be organized. Other congregations, in 1942, were B'nai Jacob, Holche Yosher, Ohev Zedek, Anshe Emeth, Anshei Sfard, all Orthodox; and Temple Israel, Conservative. There was, besides, a Y.M. and Y.W.H.A. The Wyoming Valley Jewish Committee administered the welfare funds of the Wilkes-Barre community.

YORK. The city's 56,666 inhabitants (census of 1940) included, in 1942, about 1,000 Jews. York was the home of a number of Jews in colonial and Revolutionary days, and had over a score of Jewish families about the time of the Civil War. Among these were the Reineberg, Walker, Lehmayer and Jandorf families, whose descendants were, in 1942, still residents of York. In 1867 the Reform Beth Israel Congregation was constituted. One of its early lay readers was J. Lebach, who presided until 1907. Rabbis who succeeded were Jacob Singer (1910-12), Alexander D. Segal (1927-37) and Alexander D. Goode (1937-42). The synagogue of Beth Israel in use in 1942 was erected in 1906. Other congregations were Adas Israel and Ohev Sholom. There were, in addition, a community center, a United Jewish Appeal and a United Jewish Council, as well as a section of the Council of Jewish Women, a chapter of Hadassah, a lodge of the B'nai B'rith and a branch of the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods. Herbert B. Cohen of York was in the state assembly (1936-40) and in 1937 to 1938 was Democratic leader.

Long before the Civil War Pennsylvania Jews—and here this is tantamount to saying the Philadelphia community—assumed leadership in establishing the many institutions which were to extend and solidify Jewish culture in America. Pennsylvania stood in the country's most strategic eastern trade position; Philadelphia was the country's chief commercial city well into the 19th cent. Jewish Pennsylvanians had shared in the pioneer trade development and shared handsomely in the profits. One of the rewards was leisure and money for cultural pursuits. Children of pioneer Pennsylvania Jews, many of whom were well educated, carried on the tradition of such education. Thus Rebecca Gratz, daughter of Michael Gratz and Miriam Simon, helped establish in Philadelphia the first Sunday school in America (1838). Previously, in 1829, Isaac Leeser had come to the pulpit of Mikveh Israel; from Philadelphia his intellectual leadership exercised a vigorous influence in the life of American Jewry. In 1843 Leeser established the Occident and Jewish Advocate. Two years later the first Jewish Publication Society was founded. In 1847 Keneseth Israel, one of the earliest Reform congregations in the country, was established. The Hebrew Education Society was founded to promote secular and Hebrew studies. Maimonides College, the first Jewish theological school in the country, was opened in Philadelphia. Dos Licht, one of the earliest Yiddish papers, began publication in 1886. Later the monthly Jewish Woman was issued (1892). The Jewish Chautauqua Society (1897) began to send lecturers throughout the country. Gratz College, the first in the United States for the training of Jewish religious teachers, was founded in 1897. That year the National Farm School was opened in Doylestown. Dropsie College was established in 1907, made possible by the bequest of Moses Dropsie.

With these institutions, and with many others as well, there came to be identified a notable roster of rabbis, scholars and educators, whose influence and repute spread beyond the confines of their own state of Pennsylvania. These Jewish leaders included: Cyrus Adler, Philip D. Bookstaber, Henry Berkowitz, Max C. Currick, William H. Fineshriber, Solomon B. Freehof, Solomon Grayzel, Julius H. Greenstone, Isaac Husik, Morris Jastrow, Joseph Jastrow, Joseph Krauskopf, Bernard L. Levinthal, Louis E. Levinthal, J. Leonard Levy, Sabato Morais, Abraham A. Neuman, Joseph Reider, Ephraim A. Speiser, Mayer Sulzberger, Simon Wolf, and Louis Wolsey.

Pennsylvania Jews have had notable representation in the state government and in the Congress of the United States. In the Congress there were: Charles Lewis Levin (1845-51); Henry M. Phillips (1857-59); Myer Strouse (1863-67); Benjamin Golder (1925-33); Henry Ellenbogen (1932-38); Leon Sacks (1936-); Samuel A. Weiss (1940-).

In the State General Assembly were: Moses Levy (1789); Jacob Gratz (1835-37; upper house, 1837-39); Charles Kauffman (1887); Emanuel Furth (1888-92); S. J. Gans (1908-12 and 1916); Max Aaron (1916); Ben Balden (1916); Simon B. Bransky (1916); H. K. Hecht (1916); Philip Sterling (1916); Isidore Stern (1916); Benjamin Golder (1917-25); Morris Einstein (upper house, 1918-24); Joseph A. Simon (1929-38); Samuel A. Weiss (1934-36; upper house, 1936-40); Herbert B. Cohen (1936-40); Harry Shapiro (upper house, 1936-38); Herbert S. Levin (upper house, 1938-40); Israel Stiefel (upper house, 1936-).

In the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, Horace Stern became judge (1935-). Two Jews had served as prothonotaries (chief clerk) of that court in an earlier century: Isaac Franks (1819-22) and Joseph Simon Cohen (1840-53). Joseph Stadfield was in the Superior Court (1933-); Harry E. Kalodner was United States District Court judge (1938-). Charles Edwin Fox, of Philadelphia, was district attorney (1911-25); Joseph Goldstein of Erie was district attorney of Warren County (1937-39).

Richard H. Lansburgh was state secretary of labor (1924-27), as was Peter Glick (1928-30). Alice F. Liveright was secretary of the state department of welfare (1931-35). Harry E. Kalodner was state secretary of finance (1935-36). Marcus Aaron, president of the Pittsburgh board of education, was a member of the Pennsylvania State Board of Education (1916-23). Others who participated prominently in Jewish life, and were, as well, distinguished public servants, included: Joseph L. Kun, of Philadelphia, judge of the court of common pleas (1927-); Louis E. Levinthal, special counsel to the Public Service Commission of the state (1935), president of the Zionist Organization of America, and judge of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia (1937-); William M. Lewis, of Philadelphia, judge of the municipal court (1922-39); Isador Sobel, of Erie, president of the city council, postmaster (1898-1910) and president of the National Association of Postmasters of the United States; Josiah M. Cohen, of Pittsburgh, judge of the court of common pleas (1907-30).

Mayors in several communities were Abraham Sass, of Carbondale (1908); Jonas Fischer, of Williamsport (1916); Lewis Levine, of Farrell (1935-38). Joseph A. Simon, of Lock Haven, was in the city council (1927-29). Morris Einstein, of Allegheny, was in the city council (1898-1918).

Prominent Jewish names in the cultural life of the Pennsylvania community are those of A. S. W. Rosenbach; the Mordell family of Philadelphia; Joseph Fels and Samuel Fels; Edwin A. Fleischer and Samuel Stuart Fleischer; Jules Mastbaum; the Falk and Rauh families of Pittsburgh.

See also: ALLENTOWN; EASTON; ERIE; HARRISBURG; LANCASTER; PHILADELPHIA; PITTSBURGH; READING; SCRANTON; WILKES-BARRE.

SHERRY ABEL.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society; Lebeson, Anita Libman, Jewish Pioneers in America 1492-1848 (1931) 130-60; Markens, Isaac, The Hebrews in America (1888); American Jewish Year Book, vol. 3 (1901-2); vol. 9 (1907-8); vol. 42 (1940-41); Popkin, Zelda F., "The Synagogue in the Wilderness," American Hebrew, Sept. 10, 1926, p. 577 et seq.

PENSO, JOSEPH, Marrano poet, (called after his mother's family de la Vega), place of birth unknown, b. 1650, d. after 1703, place of death unknown. He was a man of versatile talent. After his escape from Spain, he lived openly as a Jew in Amsterdam, where with his father he conducted a banking business. At the age of seventeen he composed the Hebrew drama Asire Hatikvah (Prisoners of Hope; Amsterdam, 1673), one of the first examples of Hebrew writing of this kind, applying Spanish forms in modern Hebrew. The drama is intended to teach young Marranos, who had been accustomed to Spanish immoral life, the high value of a virtuous conduct.

Penso wrote a series of Spanish poems and moral and philosophical observations. His three novels, Los Rumbos Peligrosos (Dangerous Journeys), were widely read and praised.

Lit.: Delitzsch, Franz, Zur Geschichte der Jüdischen Poesien, p. 77; Kayserling, Mayer, Biblioteca Espanola-Portugueza-Judaica, p. 85a et seq., Karpeles, Gustav, Geschichte der Jüdischen Literatur, vol. 2, p. 304.

PENTAPOLIS (Greek for "five cities"), term used to designate: 1. The five most important cities of the Philistines: Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Gath and Ekron (Josh. 13:3; I Sam. 6:17); 2. The five cities of the plain mentioned in Gen. 14:2: Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim and Bela (equal to Zoar). These are called Pentapolis in Wisdom of Solomon 10:6.

PENTATEUCH (from the Greek penta, "five," and teuchos, "tool" or "book"), a common designation of the Torah, or Five Books of Moses. The term apparently arose among the Hellenistic Jews as a translation of the Hebrew term humesh, also used for the Torah.

For details as to the Pentateuch itself, see Torah.

PENTECOST, see SHABUOTH.

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK, a term used by Mohammed, and possibly coined by him, to designate Jews and Christians, each of whom possessed a book (Bible) from which they quoted the teachings of their religion, in contrast to the Arabs who depended on oral tradition. The term has been taken up by some authors and applied especially to the Jews because of the fact that the authority in Judaism rests not upon a hierarchy, but upon a literature.

PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE OF CHICAGO, JEWISH, see CHICAGO.

PEOR, name of a mountain situated east of the Jordan in the territory of Moab (Num. 23:28). It received its name from the immoral cult of Baal-peor (Num. 25). Moses was buried in the valley opposite Beth-peor (Deut. 34:6).

PEORIA, a city in north central Illinois, with a population (in 1940) of 105,087, of whom about 1,570 were Jews. The first Jewish settlers seem to have come to Peoria in about 1847. Although ground for a Jewish cemetery was purchased in 1852, and religious services were probably held at that time, or earlier, the first congregation, Anshai Emeth, was not organized until 1859, and not incorporated until 1867. The first rabbi was Marx Moses, who served from 1863, when the first synagogue building was purchased, to 1873.

With the 1870's, Jews from Eastern Europe began to come to Peoria, and divergent preferences about the degree of Orthodoxy to be adopted in the synagogue provoked the formation of a second, more Orthodox, congregation: Beth Israel (1874). A year earlier, the Orthodox Jews had purchased their own burial ground. Beth Israel dedicated its own temple in 1875. Edward N. Calisch, who came as rabbi around 1890, effected a union of the two synagogues; the name Anshai Emeth was retained. Anshai Emeth dedicated a new temple in 1898; its rabbi, in 1942, was Harry B. Pastor, who began his service in 1935.

The first Jewish welfare group in the city was the Ladies' Hebrew Benevolent Society, founded in 1852; the first branch of a national fraternal organization was the Peoria group of B'nai B'rith, established in 1868. Subsequently numerous other welfare and fraternal societies were established. An Orthodox synagogue, Agudas Achim, was founded in 1897 and moved into its own building in 1912. In 1942 there were in Peoria branches of many national Jewish fraternal organizations and of the various divisions of the Zionist movement.

Peoria Jews were active in civic affairs and held many offices. Henry Schwabacher was a member of the city council in 1875 and 1876; Henry Ullman was director of the Peoria Public Library until 1898; Rabbi Charles S. Levi was member of the Board of Education from 1898 to 1909; Samuel Woolner was a member of the city council for four terms and (around 1909) served for a time as acting mayor. Among others who held civic posts were Joseph Szold and Harry Frankel, aldermen; Milton G. Newman, park commissioner, A. Weil, city health officer; and Sandor Horwitz, health commissioner of Peoria and later district health superintendent for Illinois. The Bradley Polytechnic Institute, located in Peoria, had among its faculty members Florence B. Gumbiner, Marvin E. Mundel, Richard M. Steiner and (in 1942) Harold Tarkow, of the chemistry department.

PEOTH, see SIDE-LOCKS.

PEREFERKOWITCH, NAHUM ABRAMOWITCH, Talmudist and writer, b. Stavropol, Caucasus, 1871. He studied oriental languages at the University of St. Petersburg, from which he was graduated (1894) with honors. He then taught Jewish religion in several Gymnasiums of the city. He soon became a frequent contributor to various literary periodicals, Jewish and Russian, and to the Brockhaus Russian-Jewish Encyclopedia. He wrote voluminously in Russian on modern Hebrew literature; but his most noteworthy work was done in translating and interpreting for Russian scholars the Talmud and Mishnah. In 1897 he published Talmud, Yevo Istoriya i Soderzhaniye, an exposition of the history and contents of the Talmud. He followed this with the translation, Talmud, Mishnah i Tosefta (8 vols., 1899-1904). These volumes constitute a complete translation of the Mishnah into Russian, and the first translation of the Tosefta into a European language. They had a large sale and were a source of new and valuable information to Russian non-Jews interested in Jewish religious history.

In 1899 Pereferkowitch published, in Russian, What is the Shulhan Aruch? After the Russian Revolution he went to Riga, Latvia, where he became a teacher and continued to write for publications. There he published (1929), in Yiddish, Hebrew Words in the Yiddish Language.

Lit.: Yevreiskaya Entziklopedia, vol. 12.

PEREIRA, JONATHAN, physician and writer, b. London, 1804; d. London, 1853. Graduated as an apothecary (1823), he was appointed resident medical officer of the Aldersgate General Dispensary, and three years later became lecturer in chemistry at the Royal College of Surgeons. Then followed a series of successively higher appointments. In 1832, established as a London physician, he was nominated professor of materia medica in the Aldersgate Medical School; in 1839 he became professor at the London Hospital, and assistant physician in 1841, a year after he had been granted his medical degree from Erlangen University. Two years later he was elected to the post of Professor of medicine at the Pharmaceutical Society, which instituted in his honor the Pereira Medal. On the establishment of the London University he was appointed examiner in materia medica and pharmacy. In 1851 he became head physician at the London Hospital. His courses on polarized light attracted much attention and were published. His reputation was based both on his work as practitioner and on his research in physiology and physics.

Isaac Péreire

Most important of his medical literary contributions was his Elements of Materia Medica and Therapeutics (1839-40), which established his reputation as a scientist and a man of practical medical knowledge. Other writings include: A General Table of Atomic Numbers with an Introduction to the Atomic Theory (1824); A Treatise on Food and Diet (1843). A marble bust was erected, in his honor, in the London Hospital.

Lit.: Pharmaceutical Journal (London), March, 1853.

PEREIRA, MOSES LOPEZ, see AGUILAR, DIEGO D'.

PÉREIRE, EUGÈNE, financier and educator, b. Paris, 1831; d. Paris, 1907. He was the son of Isaac Péreire. A graduate civil engineer, Eugène turned his talents to the enterprises founded by his father and uncle. He was an administrator in their Midi railroad, helped organize a railway in Northern Spain, and was one of the organizers of the Spanish Crédit Mobilier. In addition, he was a factor in several public utilities, banks and insurance companies at home and abroad. Like his father and his uncle, he was a member of the Corps Législatif (1863). He also served as consul general to Persia.

Emulating his grandfather, Jacob Rodriguez Pereira, he made one of his chief interests the education of deaf-mutes, was an officer of the national institute for deaf-mutes and member of the central Jewish consistory.

Péreire published Tables numériques de l'intérêt composé des annuités and des rentes viagères (1860) and Tables graphiques de l'intérêt composé (1865). He was created commander of the Legion of Honor.

Lit.: Vapereau, Dictionnaire universelle des contemporains.

PÉREIRE, ISAAC, financier and economist, b. Bordeaux, France, 1806; d. Armanvilliers, France, 1880. With his younger brother Émile, he joined the circle of St. Simonists in Paris and together they promoted industrial and financial enterprises which brought them fame and fortune. Isaac helped found the Société Générale du Crédit Mobilier, an association which existed until its crash in 1867, and effected basic changes in the French money market.

Like Émile, Isaac was elected to the Corps Législatif (1863). From 1876 to 1880 he owned La Liberté, Paris daily, which he made the organ of his political and industrial ideas. Péreire established a prize of 100,000 francs for outstanding works in social economics. He was made a knight of the Legion of Honor.

Péreire was the author of a number of pamphlets and books on the relation of politics to industry and finance. Among them were Leçons sur l'industrie et les finances (1832); Le rôle de la banque de France (1864); Principes de la constitution des banques (1865). At various times he collaborated on the Globe, Temps, Journal des Débats.

Lit.: Castille, Charles H., Les frères Péreire (1861); Larousse, Grand dictionnaire universelle du xixième siècle, vol. 12, p. 598.

PÉREIRE, (JACOB) ÉMILE, financier and economist, b. Bordeaux, France, 1800; d. Paris, 1875. In Paris, where he settled (1822) and worked as a bank clerk, he became an adherent of the economic and political theories of St. Simon, but eventually broke away from the group. In close collaboration with his brother Isaac, Émile rose to be France's outstanding railroad entrepreneur, and one of its most successful bankers. From 1835 to 1851 he promoted half a dozen railway lines throughout France: the first, and the first in the country, was the suburban Paris-St. Germain, which became a model for the others. He was also interested in the omnibus lines of Paris, and in the city's lighting and heating systems. His foreign enterprises included railroads and similar public ventures in Spain, Austria and Russia. One of the leading partisans of Napoleon III, Péreire served in the Corps Législatif (1863-69) and in the general council of the Gironde for about two decades.

In 1852 he founded the vast and ill-fated Crédit Mobilier, which involved thousands of small speculators in the loss of millions; its failure in 1867 discredited both brothers Péreire.

He began to edit the St. Simonist Globe in 1832 and simultaneously collaborated on several other liberal economic journals. From 1832 to 1835 Péreire edited the Republican National. In addition to numerous pamphlets on St. Simonism, he published one on Austro-Italian politics entitled L'Empereur Franz Joseph. A boulevard, as well as a steamship, was named for Péreire; and he was made an officer of the Legion of Honor.

Lit.: Castille, Charles H., Les frères Péreire (1861); Larousse, Grand dictionnaire universelle du xixième siècle, vol. 12, pp. 597-98.

PEREIRE, JACOB RODRIGUEZ, first teacher of deaf-mutes in France, b. Berlanga, Spain, 1715; d. Paris, France, 1780. He was the son of a Marrano, Abraham Rodriguez Pereire. His mother fled with him after his father's death to Bordeaux, where he returned to Judaism. It is said that he fell in love with a girl there who had been mute from birth, and this inspired him to seek a means of imparting speech to deaf-mutes. He spent ten years in the study of anatomy and physiology and experimentation on congenital deaf-mutes. He invented a new system of communication and was the first to teach deaf-mutes with any degree of success. He devised a means of training deaf-mutes to utter articulate sounds and so prevent their depending on signs. He considered lip reading more important than gestures, a belief also held by modern authorities. In addition to his work of teaching, Pereire did much to obtain for deaf-mutes the treatment that is accorded to other human beings.

Pereire's fame spread far and wide and he received invitations to teach from all over Europe. In 1749 he presented his system in a memoir before the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, and in the following year Louis XV granted him eight hundred pounds for an arithmetical machine which he had invented. He was made a member of the Royal Society of London in 1760 and was appointed royal interpreter for Spanish and Portuguese in 1765. His activity in behalf of the Jews was no less distinguished. In 1749 he became voluntary agent for the Portuguese Jews at Paris, although this title was not officially conferred upon him until 1761. It was due to his efforts that the right to settle in France was first bestowed upon the Jews of Portugal (1777).

He was buried in the cemetery of La Villette, for which Pereire had obtained the ordinance as the first legal Jewish cemetery in France. In 1929 a monument was erected to his memory in Peniche, Portugal. His name is also found in the Spanish form, Jacob Rodriguez Pereira.

Lit.: The New York Times, Oct. 13, 1929; La grande encyclopédie, vol. 26, p. 354; Sachar, A. L., A History of the Jews (1930) 306.

PEREK HASHALOM, see DERECH ERETZ ZUTA.

PEREK KINYAN TORAH, PEREK RABBI MEIR, see ABOTH; BARAITHA.

PERELMAN, JOSEPH, see DYMOW, OSSIP.

PERELMANN, YERUHAM JUDAH LEIB, Talmudist, b. 1835; d. 1896. From 1883 until his death he was rabbi in Minsk, whence his sobriquet "Der Minsker Godel." Of his numerous writings, only Or Gadol (1909), new reflections on the Talmud, and Yithron Haor, notes to the Mishnah (printed in the Romm edition of the Mishnah, Vilna, 1910) were published.

PERETZ, ISAAC LOEB, Yiddish and Hebrew writer, b. Zamosc, Poland, 1851; d. Warsaw, Poland, 1915. Early Hasidic influences were counteracted by the progressive atmosphere in the city of Zamosc, so that Peretz was by environment as well as by endowment equipped for the great role he was to play in the presentation of knowledge, including self-knowledge, to the Jewish masses. His first linguistic affiliation was with Hebrew (he was literary editor of the Hatzefirah in 1886), and although he was later the leader of the Yiddishist movement, his devotion to Hebrew did not change, and much of his correspondence with Sholom Alechem was carried on in this language. Yet Peretz did not foresee the use of Hebrew in speech; it remained for him, like the spiritual essence of religion and of Hasidism, the motivation of life; Yiddish, like the economic and social surroundings he described, was the form of life.

Peretz' first published volume was a collection of poems in Hebrew, which appeared in 1877 together with some poems by Gabriel Judah Lichtenfeld, the father of his first wife. Peretz' first marriage was unhappy, however, and even after his second marriage and his return from a year's stay in Warsaw (1876-77) to practise law in Zamosc for almost a decade, he did not immediately find the full tempo of his creative force. He did contribute, during this period, to the various Hebrew periodicals throughout Russia. In the 1880's he returned to Warsaw; here he obtained a post as secretary with the Jewish community, and remained an employee of the community, in increasingly important capacities, until his death. In 1887 the poem that marked Peretz' future importance to Yiddish literature, "Monish," appeared in Sholom Alechem's Die Yiddishe Folksbibliothek. "Monish" is a long narrative poem, drawn from the vivid, economically impoverished and spiritually rich sources of Eastern European life that were to provide Peretz with most of his future material.

Isaac Loeb Peretz

Now Peretz' role, not only as a writer, but as a man of action, opened up before him, though his action, too, was accomplished with literary tools. Long before scorn of the "ivory tower" became popular in the 1930's, Peretz chose the path of action. He realized that the Jews about whom he would write in their daily language could see their weakness, their misery and their glory only if they saw also the rest of the world. Education was the way to this knowledge, and consequently, in the Yiddishe Bibliothek, an annual which he himself edited for several years, Peretz wrote and published articles on chemistry, physics, economics and other secular subjects. A tour he undertook through certain parts of Russia and Poland to gather statistics for an economic survey planned by Jan Bloch, a convert who nevertheless wanted it proved that the Jews were economically productive citizens, gave Peretz still further material and insight for his stories and poems.

In his stories, written in dynamic prose that is not swift because it is laden with sententiousness, Peretz railed at, pitied and blessed the Jewish life around him. In fiction, he wrote only short stories, never formulating the larger panorama of a novel, and it is impossible to imagine his style sustained to novel length. It did not need to be, for the profundity and the simplicity of what he had to say were consummate in the shorter form, aided here and there by asterisks leading into the void. Bontzye Schveig tells of the death of a silent, misused man, the typically meek Jew. Heaven, however, knows his greatness, and greets him with fanfare. But all that he can think of asking for in this new existence, where he may have what his heart desires, is the privilege of eating a fresh roll and butter every morning, in contrast to the dry crusts that had maintained him during his lifetime. The Meshullah

(the messenger) tells of an old man, past seventy, with a life of tribulations and losses behind him, who freezes to death in the forest happy that he was still being entrusted with money to transport from one village to another. What is Jewish in such stories is the attitude of the individuals described, an attitude which accepts spiritual wealth as compensation for actual deprivation. Peretz never wanted to minimize the meaning of the spiritual tradition; in his drama Die Goldene Kaite (The Golden Chain) and in other Hasidic treatments he made this clear. On the contrary, he wanted the Jews to continue to depend on spiritual grandeur. But he wanted at the same time a fulfilment of temporal needs, and here he became a militant socialist, a forthright spokesman for equality and fairness, scoffing at meekness and humility.

Peretz had still another task—and that was to serve as guide to the younger Yiddish writers who appeared at the turn of the 19th cent. and soon thereafter, when Yiddish reached its maturity, and turned toward decrescence. His home in Warsaw was a gathering place for all the poets and writers who came out of Poland to make Yiddish literature the monument to an era. To them, as to his readers, he taught the significance of the Jewish spiritual tradition, but fought for the worldly affirmation of life. When he died, suddenly, during the early days of the first World War, in the midst of writing a poem, he left a sense of loss so great that more than 100,000 men and women came to his funeral.

BARUCH MEYERSON.

Lit.: Waxman, Meyer, A History of Jewish Literature, vol. 4 (1941); Roback, A. A., Story of Yiddish Literature (1940); Madison, Charles A., in Poet Lore, vol. 37, pp. 73-106; Rogoff, Hillel, Nine Yiddish Writers (1931); The Reflex, vol. 3, July, 1928, pp. 22-29; The Bookman, vol. 43 (1916) 524-30; Reisen, Z., Lexikon fun der Yiddisher Literatur, Presse un Filologie, vol. 2 (1930), cols. 974-1043; Rosenzweig, A., Der radikaler Period fun Perez's Shaffen (1934); Levin, Gershon, Perez (1919); Maisil, Nachman, Perez (1931); Finkelstein, Z. F., Stürmer des Ghetto (1924); Roback, A. A., I. L. Peretz, Psychologist of Literature (1935).

PEREYRA (PEREIRA), ABRAHAM ISRAEL (Marrano name, Thomas Rodrigues Pereyra), philanthropist and writer, b. Madrid; d. Amsterdam, 1699. He fled the Spanish Inquisition, first going to Venice and then to Amsterdam, where as a man of great wealth and culture he became a leading factor in the Sephardic community. For several years he was its president. In 1656, together with Ephraim Bueno, he established a Talmud Torah, donating to it 46,000 gulden.

Pereyra also founded the Talmudic seminary at Hebron, in which the physician Meir, adherent of the pseudo-Messiah Sabbatai Zevi, lived for a time. Pereyra himself, accompanied by Isaac Naar, journeyed to Italy to pay his respects to Sabbatai Zevi.

Pereyra wrote several philosophic works in Spanish. Most elaborate was La Certeza del Camino (1666), a book of twelve sections expounding his general notions on Providence, man and the world's vanity. In 1671 he published Espejo de la Vanidad del Mundo (Amsterdam).

Lit.: Amzalak, Moses Bensabat, Abraham Israel Pereyra: noticia biobibliografica (1927); Barrios, Relación de los poetas, p. 60.

PERICOPE, see PARASHAH.

PERIODICALS AND PRESS. Table of Contents:

1. Europe.
Introduction.
a. The Netherlands.
b. Germany.
c. Austria.
d. England.
e. France.
f. Hungary.
g. Roumania.
h. Other European Countries: Belgium, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, Greece, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Yugoslavia.
i. The Hebrew Press.
j. The Yiddish Press.
k. The Judeo-Spanish Press.

List of Jewish Periodicals in Europe Which Appeared for at Least Twenty Years.

l. Jewish Journalists in the General European Press.
2. The United States.
a. Scholarly Periodicals.
b. Other Periodicals.
c. The Yiddish Press.
d. Hebrew Periodicals.
e. Periodicals Published in Other Languages.
f. Jews in Journalism.
3. Canada.
4. Central and South America, and the West Indies.
5. Africa.
6. Asia.
7. Australia and New Zealand.
8. Palestine.

1. Europe. Introduction. Seventy-five years after the first European newspaper was published in Strasbourg, the first Jewish periodical in Europe—besides being the first Jewish paper in the whole world—was discontinued in Amsterdam on November 14, 1678, after an appearance of exactly eleven months. From this early date until 260 years later, when the Nazis, on November 10, 1938, suppressed the Jewish press in Germany and thus brought to an end a bright chapter of Jewish life, more than 2,000 Jewish periodicals appeared and disappeared in Europe. However, only two of them survived one hundred years of existence: The Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums in Germany celebrated this anniversary in 1938, and the Jewish Chronicle in England in 1941.

A complete survey of this period of Jewish journalism has to consider the history of the Jewish press in Europe as a whole and in each of the European countries in particular; duration of publication, importance, purpose, and languages of these periodicals; the men and women who edited and published these papers; the work of Jewish writers, publishers and editors within the general European press.

The creation of a Jewish press originated and coincided with the contact of the Jewish with the surrounding European world after the walls of the ghettos were loosened or broken down during the period of Emancipation. What the development of radio accomplished in the 20th cent. was fulfilled by the influence of the printing press 300 years ago. It was to be expected that the broadening horizon of Jewish life and the new religious impulses which resulted from these facts would use the press to spread the new theories. This was not surprising, especially since America and Russia as well as France and England, after a long period of oppression and expulsion, accepted Jews anew within their boundaries or admitted and acquired Jews in the course of history. The Jews were not merely an object any more, but they became again a part—if even a particular one—of their respective homelands. Jews as well as non-Jews were looking for a solution. However, it was not only these circumstances which were responsible for the sudden blossoming of a Jewish press. The religious life—for a long time in stagnation—was stirred up during the period of Hasidism, Haskalah, Reform, Science of Judaism, Zionism and its counterparts of emancipation, assimilation, and, last but not least, by the reaction of the non-Jewish world, whether it be expressed through humanism (John Toland), emancipa-tion (Gotthold Ephraim Lessing), tolerance (Christian Wilhelm Dohm) or anti-Semitism and racism (Houston Stewart Chamberlain and Joseph Arthur Gobineau).

The period of the merely "existing" Jew had come to an end, and the hope of developing a real life in an atmosphere of liberty and equality glimmered before the eyes of many a Jew. The imminent danger of a dissolution of Judaism was prevented by the will to survive which the Jewish people in Eastern Europe expressed quite differently from those in Western Europe. The first-mentioned group developed new religious impulses based on Jewish tradition, being conservative in a certain sense; the second group searched for a solution by developing new ideas based on the study of Jewish history. The creation of the "Science of Judaism," the renaissance of Hebrew and the transforming of Yiddish into a living language are milestones of this evolution which are unthinkable without the existence of a Jewish press. Each of the aforementioned ideas produced a printed mouthpiece, and the success or failure of these organs is in many cases certain evidence for the popularity but never for the importance of the respective publications.

Four periods are clearly visible in the history of the Jewish press in Europe: The 17th cent. gives the prelude in the Netherlands; the 18th cent. shows the first serious endeavors to create and maintain a Jewish press, and leads to the golden age of the Jewish press in Germany and in Western Europe during the first half of the 19th cent.; the second half starts the renaissance of Hebrew, and brings the creation of the Yiddish and Spaniolish press in Eastern and Southern Europe. The 20th cent., eventually, is characterized by the consolidation of the now firmly established field until the flame is extinguished by the victory of anti-Semitism and Nazism in Europe. What has remained until today (1942)—with a few exceptions in Sweden, Switzerland and Turkey—is a sad remnant under Nazi supervision. However, it still conserves a spark of the once proud flame.

The following are the chief divisions of the Jewish press presented chronologically by countries and by languages.

a. The Netherlands. In the 17th cent. The Netherlands became the cradle of the Jewish press, and the city of Amsterdam, with its large Jewish population, deserves honor for producing the first Jewish periodical. The Gazeta de Amsterdam, published by David Tartas at irregular intervals from January 24 to November 14, 1678, in Judeo-Spanish, dealt with economic questions. Its successor, ten years later, was the Dienstagische und Freitagische Kurant, from April, 1686, to December, 1687, printed in Judeo-German and containing mainly economic news. The same may be said of the Zeitung aus Indien (for the first time the word Zeitung is now used in connection with a Jewish paper), which printed, in Judeo-German, translations of Moses Pereyra's Notizias dos Judâos de Cochim. Finally, the first periodical which was Jewish in every respect, Peri Ez Hajim, represents a monthly bulletin containing rabbinical decisions of the Sephardic community. This paper survived for a period of more than thirty years (it was published from 1728 to 1761).

Throughout all these centuries the Jewish press in The Netherlands maintained a high standard, and produced such well-known periodicals as: Weekblad for Israelieten (1855-84); the organ of the Agudah, Nieuw Israelietisch Weekblad (from 1863); Weekblad for Israelietische Huisgezinnen (from 1869); M. Roest's scientific quarterly Israelietische Letterbode (1875-89); Israelietische Nieuwsbode (1875-93); Nieuwsblad for Israelieten (1884-93); Centralblad voor Israelieten in Nederland, the mouthpiece of the community from 1885 on; the Orthodox Achawah (from 1894); and the Zionist De Joodsche Wachter (from 1905). All those papers were printed in Dutch and published in Amsterdam, with the exception of De Joodsche Wachter, which appeared in Rotterdam. Finally, it may be mentioned that Jacob Landau's Jewish Telegraphic Agency established its first office in The Hague in 1917. When the Nazis invaded The Netherlands, in 1940, about fifteen Jewish papers were still in existence: five weeklies, eight monthlies, and two irregulars, all printed in Dutch. From 1940 on, the Joodsche Weekblad was published under Nazi supervision at Amsterdam.

b. Germany. After the early Amsterdam publications ceased to appear, the center shifted from The Netherlands to Germany. Moses Mendelssohn, together with Tobias Back, created his Koheleth Musar, a philosophical Hebrew weekly of which only two issues were printed (Berlin, 1750). Even less successful—and mentioned only in order to show the beginning of a Jewish press in Germany—was Benjamin Zachmann Croneburg of Neuwied, with his general newspaper Der grosse Schauplatz, printed in German with Hebrew characters and known only by fragments of one number of 1751. Its successors were the Dyhernfurther privilegierte Zeitung (1771-72) and Die Zeitung in Metz (1789-90), both for Jewish readers, printed and edited like Der grosse Schauplatz. The last link in this chain of early Jewish papers in Western Europe is the famous Hebrew monthly Hameassef, inaugurated by Moses Mendelssohn, and founded by his disciples. Seven volumes were printed in Berlin from 1784 to 1811. It was discontinued because knowledge of Hebrew dwindled rapidly among its subscribers.

The 19th cent. started with a lull, a breathing space. New ideas were being shaped, new personalities were entering upon the stage. The year 1823 had its importance because the first Jewish papers were edited in Austria, England, Poland and the United States. We can now distinguish between four sections of periodicals: scientific, religious, political, and communal and fraternal papers. Many of these papers had only a short life. However, very often they were succeeded by similar publications which kept the spirit and tradition of their predecessors. Only a few papers appeared around 1800, and from 1825 to 1831 the Austrian paper Bikkure Haittim (1820-31) and the German paper of the Reform Movement, Sulamith (Dessau, 1806-33), were the only known Jewish papers throughout the world.

The first group, scientific papers, had its forerunner in the Jüdische Monatschrift, first published in Hebrew characters in Prague, later in Brünn (1802), and in Ignaz Jeitteles' Siona (Vienna, 1819). It was followed by Leopold Zunz' famous Zeitschrift für die Wissenschaft des Judentums (Berlin, 1822-23), which was renewed in Breslau from 1851 to 1940 as Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, founded by Zacharias Frankel and last edited by Isaak Heinemann. Gabriel Riesser's Der Jude appeared in Altona (1832-35), and was renewed by Martin Buber in Berlin (1916-24). Then Julius Goldstein's Der Morgen started publication (1925) in Darmstadt, moving after his death (1929) to Berlin, where it was edited by Hans Bach and Eva Jungmann until 1938. Abraham Geiger's Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift für jüdische Theologie followed in Frankfort (1834-48). Ludwig Philippson founded his Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums at Leipzig in 1837. Gustav Karpeles was its second editor, after Philippson's death in 1889, until 1909 in Berlin, when Abraham Geiger's son, Ludwig Geiger, became editor. He died in 1919, and was succeeded by Albert Katz. In 1922 this famous liberal paper became the mouthpiece of the Central-Verein deutscher Staatsbürger jüdischen Glaubens, and its title was changed to C.-V.-Zeitung, Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums (until 1938). Moritz Steinschneider's Ha-maskir, for Hebrew bibliography, appeared in Berlin from 1858 to 1882; Abraham Geiger's Jüdische Zeitschrift für Wissenschaft und Leben in Berlin from 1862 to 1875; Nehemiah Brüll founded at Frankfort, in 1874, the quarterly Jahrbuch für Geschichte und Literatur der Juden, edited until 1890 by Abraham Berliner and David Hoffmann. Ludwig Geiger, later editor of the Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums, published in Braunschweig (1887-92) the Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland, which was revived at Berlin in 1929 by Ismar Elbogen, Aron Freimann and Max Freudenthal. A magazine for literature, art and theatre was Leo Winz' Ost und West (Berlin, 1901-22). The last important publication in this field was the aforementioned Der Morgen. This phase ends with the publication of the Monatsblätter des Jüdischen Kulturbunds in Berlin, Frankfort, Cologne and Hamburg (1934-38).

The second group, that of the religious papers, is comparatively small. Again we have a forerunner in the paper of the Reform Movement, Sulamith (Dessau, 1806-33). (The same name was given to a Dutch paper in Amsterdam, 1806-8.) Sulamith was followed by Mendel Hess' and Samuel Holdheim's Der Israelit des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts (Hersfeld and Meiningen, 1839-48), Julius Fürth's Zion

1. 100 JAHRE No. 1.
Allgemeine
Zeitung des Judenthums.
Ein unpartheiisches Organ für alles jüdische Interesse in Bezieff von
Politik, Religion, Literatur, Geschichte, Sprachkunde und Belletristik.
(Mit königl. Sächsischer allergnädigster Concession.)
Redacteur
Dr. Ludwig Philippson, israelitischer Prediger in Magdeburg
Verlag von Baumgärtners Buchhandlung
zu Leipzig.
Leipzig, den 2. Mai 1837.

Reproduction from the front page of the hundredth anniversary issue of the "C.-V.-Zeitung" (published in May, 1937), showing the masthead of the first issue of the "Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums" (May 2, 1837) which was predecessor of the "C.-V.-Zeitung" of Berlin. The latter ceased publication in 1938 (Frankfort, 1840-42), Ludwig Philippson's Jüdisches Volksblatt (Leipzig, 1854-66), Allgemeine israelitische Wochenschrift (Berlin, 1891-1906), Jüdisch liberale Zeitung (Berlin, 1921-34), continued as Jüdische Allgemeine Zeitung (Berlin, 1934-38); all these papers were Liberal. The Conservative and Orthodox papers were: Der Orient (Leipzig, 1840-51), Samson Raphael Hirsch's Jeschurun (Frankfort, 1854-70; renewed in Berlin, 1914), Die Jüdische Presse of Azriel (Israel) Hildesheimer and his son Meier Hildesheimer (Berlin 1869-1923), the paper of the Mizrachi in Frankfort (1900-20), Israelitisches Familienblatt, Marcus Lehmann's Der Israelit (Frankfort, from 1860), Die Laubhütte (Hamburg, 1866-67, and again from 1884), the publication of the Agudah, Deutsch-israelitische Zeitung (Hamburg, from 1884).

The group of the political newspapers is very short; however, their influence was very extensive, and so was their circulation. From the middle of the 19th cent. until after the first World War interest in Jewish papers decreased from year to year. Only when anti-Semitism swept through Europe did a sudden renaissance take place. The first periodical of the Central-Verein, the monthly Im Deutschen Reich (Berlin, 1895-1921, editor, Alphonse Levy), as well as the Zionist Jüdische Rundschau (Berlin, from 1896) were created during the convulsions of the Dreyfus Affair. The C.-V.-Zeitung, which followed Im Deutschen Reich, and its editors, Ludwig Holländer, Alfred Wiener, Margaret T. Edelheim and Alfred Hirschberg, believed in a solution of the Jewish question through emancipation. Fighting against assimilation on the part of the Jews and against anti-Semitism and Nazism on the part of the non-Jews, it kept its spirit until the last moment. It even published a monthly issue for distribution only among the non-Jewish world. Its circulation rose to more than 40,000. The Jüdische Rundschau and its editors, R. Wohlberg, Heinrich Löwe, Robert Weltsch and Karl Löwenstein, believed in Zionism and fought violent battles for this idea. Its circulation was 37,000, and it was the only Jewish paper in Germany which was printed twice weekly. There was never a Jewish daily in Germany. Other Zionistic papers were: the monthly Palästina, published in Berlin, Munich and Vienna (1902-38, with some interruptions); the magazine Zion (Berlin, 1895-99); the monthly Altneuland (Berlin, 1904-6). On the extreme right Max Naumann's Der Nationaldeutsche Jude fought for complete assimilation (Berlin, 1921-35), and on the left Der Staatszionist (Berlin, 1933-35) not for a Jewish homeland but for a Jewish state in Palestine. Leo Lessmann's Hamburger Israelitisches Familienblatt (founded 1898, from 1934 on in Berlin, circulation in 1936 more than 30,000) tried to be neutral; Alfred Kupferberg and Joachim Prinz were its editors. The organ of the war veterans, Der Schild, was founded in Berlin in 1921, and had a circulation of 15,000; it stood for emancipation.

The last group comprises the papers of the Jewish communities and Jewish cultural organizations. Most of them were founded at the beginning of the 20th cent. In 1936 twenty-five community papers appeared throughout Germany. Only the Mitteilungsblatt des Oberrats der badischen Israeliten (Karlsruhe) and the Berliner Jüdisches Gemeindeblatt were published over a period of more than twenty years. The former was founded in 1884, and the latter in 1911; its last editor was Leo Kreindler, and its circulation in 1936 more than 50,000. Besides, about twenty papers of small organizations were printed at that time. The following table shows what the Nazis destroyed in 1938:

CIRCULATION OF JEWISH PRESS IN GERMANY

	1934	1938
6 political papers	150,000	130,000
25 community papers	120,000	130,000
5 religious papers	18,000	15,000
14 fraternal papers	40,000	55,000
8 cultural papers	22,000	30,000
58	350,000	360,000

One of these papers was published twice a week, ten once a week, seventeen monthly and eight irregularly. They appeared in thirty different cities (twenty-eight in Berlin), all printed in German.

After the Nazis' rise to power, these papers were the only source of information about Jewish questions, since the general press was not allowed to touch this matter unless in an anti-Semitic sense. The Jewish papers were generally not censored before their appearance. However, they had to obey strict orders and regulations furnished by a special branch of Paul Josef Goebbels' ill-famed ministry of propaganda under the supervision of Hans Hinkel. If, in the opinion of the authority, the scores of ordinances had been violated, the papers could be suppressed for a certain time or forever. It will always be an astonishing fact that those papers kept a fighting spirit and were eager to contribute to the development of the Jewish future. After Ernst von Rath's assassination in Paris in November, 1938, all Jewish papers in Germany were suspended, their offices sealed, their property confiscated, and their editors imprisoned. (After several weeks they were released.) The same applies to Jewish publications in other parts of Europe after they were conquered by the Nazis.

Thus starts the last sad and strange chapter: There was still (1942) a "Jewish" press in Europe. The Nazi authorities were in need of a mouthpiece to announce their threats and regulations, their "New Order." This fact created the following periodicals, printed under Nazi supervision in Nazi Europe: The Gazeta Zydowska, published in Polish in Cracow; the Informations juives, published in French in Paris; the Jüdisches Nachrichtenblatt-Zidowska Listy, published in German and Czech in Prague; the Jüdisches Nachrichtenblatt in Berlin and the Jüdisches Nachrichtenblatt in Vienna, both printed in German; the Joodsche Weekblad, printed in Dutch at Amsterdam. All these are weeklies.

c. Austria. The already mentioned Bikkure Haittim, a Hebrew year book, published in Vienna in the printing office of Anton Schmid under the editorship of Shalom Kohen, was the first Jewish periodical to be printed in Austria (1820-31). It was an imitation of Moses Mendelssohn's Hameassef, and did not even dare to reprint essays which had been published in this paper more than thirty-five years previously. Its successor, the Kerem Hemed (1833-36), and M. E. Stern's Kochebe Yitzhak (1845-73) were also printed in Hebrew by Anton Schmid. They stood for the "Berliner Aufklärung" (enlightenment) and against Hasidism, and were religious and patriotic. The same may

100TH BIRTHDAY NUMBER

The Jewish Chronicle

THE ORGAN OF BRITISH JEWRY — INCORPORATING THE "JEWISH WORLD"

One Hundred and First Year — Established November 1841

No. 3,788. REGD. AS A NEWSPAPER — Friday, November 14, 1941 — Marcheshvan 24, 5702 — Price : 4d.

CENTENARY OF THE JEWISH CHRONICLE

Messages from State and Religious Leaders

From THE PRIME MINISTER

(The Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill)

Masthead and part of the front page of the centenary issue of the "Jewish Chronicle" of London

be said about Isidor Busch's Jahrbuch für Israeliten (1842) and Meir Letteris' Österreichisches Zentralorgan für Glaubensfreiheit, Kultur, Geschichte und Literatur der Juden, a quarterly which appeared from 1853 to 1863; both were printed in German. Ignaz Blumenfeld's Hebrew monthly Otzar Nehmad (1857-63), Naphtali Keller's Bikkurim (1864) and the Hebrew monthly Beth Hamidrash, published by B. Pollak and W. Guttmann (1865-66), followed the way of the German Science of Judaism. Adolf Jellinek fought his fights for liberalism in the famous German weekly Die Neuzeit (1861-1904), founded by Leopold Kompert and Simon Szanto. The struggle between the ideas of emancipation and "Autoemanzipation" created Joseph Samuel Bloch's Österreichische Wochenschrift (1884-1920) and Nathan Birnbaum's Autoemanzipation (1885-93); both were forerunners of S. Werner's Die Welt (1897-1914), which was the central organ of the Zionist Movement, first published in Vienna, later in Cologne and finally in Berlin. Competitors of the very successful Österreichische Wochenschrift were Die Neuzeit and the weekly Die Wahrheit (1885-1938; editors M. Löwy and Oscar Hirschfeld), the apologetic publication of the Union Österreichischer Juden. Aron Liebermann (pseudonym, Artur Freeman) believed in a third solution, socialism. He published (1878) three numbers of a socialistic Hebrew weekly, Haemeth. He had to flee to the United States, where he committed suicide. Many Zionist papers followed Die Welt. Among them were the daily Wiener Morgenzeitung (1919-27), the monthly Palästina (1927-38), the weeklies Jüdische Presse (1915-34) and Die Stimme (1928-38), Robert Stricker's Die neue Welt (1927-38), and the Zionistische Rundschau (1938). Die jüdische Front (1931-38) was the Jewish war veterans' organ.

During one hundred years of the history of the Jewish press in Austria about sixty papers were published. One of them was a daily, one appeared twice a week, eighteen were weeklies, six fortnightlies, twenty-four monthlies, seven were published irregularly; twenty-one were Zionistic, thirteen religious, ten scientific, three German Jewish, one socialistic, one communistic, and ten fraternal. All were printed in Vienna. The Nazi invasion in 1938 doomed four Zionistic, three German Jewish and one scientific paper, all printed in German. Under the supervision of the Nazi authorities the Jüdisches Nachrichtenblatt was published in Vienna from 1939.

d. England. England's history in this field is only one hundred years old. However, it can claim to have the Jewish periodical with the longest uninterrupted appearance: the London weekly Jewish Chronicle, which was founded in 1841, and later became Zionistic. During its long history such men as Moses Angel, David Meldola, Marcus H. Bresslau, Abraham Benisch, Michael Henry, Asher Myers, Morris Duparc, L. J. Greenberg and his son Ivan M. Greenberg, and J. M. Rich became its editors. During the famous air-raid on London, on December 12, 1940, its London offices were completely destroyed. Forerunners of the Jewish Chronicle were the conservative monthlies Hebrew Intelligencer (London, 1823), Marcus H. Bresslau's The Hebrew Review (London, 1834-60), Jacob Franklin's Orthodox half-monthly Voice of Jacob (London 1841-48), all printed in English. Most of the papers until about 1910 were printed in Yiddish. Among them were the socialist dailies Der Yiddisher Journal (London, 1905-13) and The Jewish Times (London, from 1913). The Zionist Review appeared in English (London, from 1911), and the Hadegel Hayehudi was a Zionist Hebrew periodical (London, 1898-1920). The weekly Jewish Echo was published in Glasgow as a neutral paper in English from 1928. Altogether, in 1940, twenty Jewish papers were in existence in England; all except four were published in London; fourteen were in English, four in Yiddish and two in Hebrew.

e. France. The history of the Jewish press in France began even later than that in England. Napoleon's policy, which aimed at the complete assimilation of the Jews, as well as the slogan of liberty, equality and fraternity, overshadowed Jewish problems. Jews lived at that time mainly in the border region of Alsace-Lorraine, although a steady stream of Jews came from the Iberian peninsula; these were Marranos who tried to reach the free shores of France in order to regain a real Jewish life.

La famille de Jacob, a Conservative monthly in Avignon, is the first-known Jewish publication in France (1859-91; editor, Benjamin Mossé). Fourteen more papers had appeared or had ceased publication up to 1920; six of them were printed in French, seven in Yiddish, one in Spanish. All were published in Paris; seven were weeklies, five monthlies, one a daily, and the rest appeared irregularly. Seven were Zionist, two literary, one liberal, one socialistic.

Fairly well-known were the Liberal weekly La vérité israélite (1860-65), the weekly L'écho sioniste (1900-21), and the weekly Le peuple juif (1907-22), also Zionist. The short-lived daily was the Parisian Allgemeine Yiddishe Folkstzeitung, containing general news and edited by Moses Zuckermann (1892).

In addition, more than twenty papers were still in existence when the Nazis entered Paris in June, 1940. Among them were: the weekly Les archives israélites (from 1840; editors, Samuel and Isidor Cohen); the famous scientific quarterly, Revue des études juives (from 1880; editors, Isidore Loeb and Israel Lévi); S. Bloch's Conservative weekly, L'univers israélite (from 1846); the Orthodox La tribune juive (Strasbourg, from 1919); the publication of the Alliance Israélite Universelle, Paix et droit (from 1921); the Zionist monthlies La terre retrouvée and Palestine (both from 1928); the youth magazine Chalom (from 1921); the publication of the OSE, Revue OSE (from 1925); and, finally, the Zionist Yiddish daily, Der Pariser Haint (from 1926). The Nazis suppressed five papers in Yiddish, one in Hebrew, one in Russian, and fourteen in French, of which six were published monthly, five weekly, two daily and the rest irregularly; all except two were printed at Paris. From 1940 on the Nazi authorities made compulsory the publication of Informations juives in Paris.

f. Hungary. Nationalism was always an outspoken symptom of Hungarian life. This fact is reflected also in the history of its Jewish press. Out of one hundred newspapers published during one century, about half were printed in Hungarian, one-third in German, one-sixth in Hebrew, and only three in Yiddish. Most of them stressed patriotism; they were Hungarian Jewish. Fourteen were scholarly, sixteen Orthodox, eight Zionist and four Reform. One was a daily, most of them were weeklies, ten monthlies, several quarterlies, and many were published irregularly. Furthermore, it is interesting that these periodicals were published in twenty different cities. Only the German, Polish and Russian Jewish press shows a similar distribution. The most important papers were or are: Lipót Löw's national Hungarian quarterly, Magyar Zsinagóga (Pápa, 1846-47); the Ben Chananja, which was edited in Szeged from 1858 to 1867 by Lipót (Leopold) Löw, and of which ten volumes appeared. They contain much material on the history of Hungarian Jewry and on the Reform Movement. Nehemiah Brüll, Eliakim Carmoly, Isaak Markus Jost, Alexander Kohut, Salomon Munk and Adolf Neubauer were among its most eminent collaborators; Ignatz Einhorn's Der Ungarische Israelit (German; Pest, 1848) stood for "Reform." Henrik Deutsch's Izraelita Közlöny was a Hungarian weekly (Budapest, 1866-70). The Pester Jüdische Zeitung was printed by I. Reiss five times a week in Budapest (1869-87); the Hungarian monthly, Hitközségi Hivatalnok, was published in Budapest by M. Friedmann and R. Goldberg for more than fifteen years (1882-97) and the German Conservative weekly Allgemeine Jüdische Zeitung for more than thirty years (Budapest, 1887-1919). Miksa Szabolcsi's Egyenlőség was a famous Hungarian weekly (Budapest, from 1882 on); it was continued by Lajos Szabolcsi until 1939, when it appeared as the official organ of the Hungarian Jewish community, authorized by the government, as Magyar Zsidók Lapja. Well-known was the Hungarian scientific monthly, Magyar Zsidó Szemle (Budapest, from 1884 on), founded by Wilhelm Bacher and József Bánóczi. From 1927 on it was published bimensually. The Pressburger Jüdische Zeitung, founded and edited by Samuel Bettelheim (Pressburg, from 1908 on; later at Budapest as Ungarländische Jüdische Zeitung, until 1915), was the first Zionist paper in Hungary; the fortnightly Zsidó Szemle was the Zionist mouthpiece from 1909. Hatzofeh Lehochmath Yisrael was a scientific Hebrew paper (1911-31) edited by Lajos Blau. Later, Hasoker, a Hebrew periodical for Jewish studies, was published by Michael Guttmann, Samuel Löwinger and Ferenc Hevesi. Tel Talpiyoth, a journal of Halachah, was founded by Isaiah Silberstein; Shebil Haet, a Hebrew periodical edited by Arthur Friedmann from 1937 on, was short-lived. Orthodox newspapers were: Magyar Zsidó (1867-70), published three times a month, later weekly, by Albert Farkas, subsequently by Zsigmond Krausz (revived in 1908, it appeared for several years with Jakab Gabel and Lajos Hartstein as editors); Zsidó Ujság, organ of Hungarian Orthodoxy from 1925 on; Országos Egyetértés, a weekly (from 1925 on), editor Miksa Pintér, and Szombat, a weekly (from 1928 on), editor Ede Kenéz-Kurländer, both of which had to cease publication in 1939 when the government authorized only one weekly newspaper for the progressive Jewish community of Hungary, Magyar Zsidók Lapja (successor to Egyenlőség), and one for the Orthodox Jewish community, Zsidó Ujság. Later, the government authorized also the weekly Képes Családi Lapok. The monthly Mult és Jövő also continued to be published.

g. Roumania. The Jewish press in Roumania sprang up about the middle of the 19th cent. and had to struggle against the indifference of the Jewish public and, beginning with 1885, also against the hostility of the government which expelled Jewish journalists and authors fighting for rights for the Jews. The Jewish press was altogether suppressed by the government in 1941.

From 1855 to 1875. The first Jewish weekly newspapers in Roumania were published at Jassy. Most of them appeared for several months only. They include Koroth Haittim, which appeared under a Hebrew title in the Yiddish language in the years 1855, 1859, 1860 and 1867; Gazeta Romana-Evreiasca, partly in Roumanian, partly in Yiddish (in 1859), which advocated a modern education; Timpul (The Times), in Roumanian and Hebrew (1872); Vocea Aparatorului (The Defender's Voice, 1872; it became a biweekly in 1873). At Bucharest appeared: Israelitul Roman, edited by the eminent scholar and historian Dr. Iuliu (Julius) Barasch in 1857, partly in Roumanian, partly in French; another Israelitul Roman was edited in 1868 by Armand Lévy, a French Jew who had come to Roumania to use his influence with Roumanian ministers in behalf of the Jews of that country; he soon left Roumania, disappointed; Viitorul (The Future) and L'Espérance, in Roumanian and French, founded by Antoine Lévy in 1866. All these newspapers are valuable sources of history. The Rumänische Post (1871-73), edited by Benjamin Franklin Peixotto, consul general of the United States in Roumania, partly in Roumanian, partly in German, fought against anti-Semitism and also advocated emigration to the United States. In Galatz appeared L'Écho Danubien, edited by the Austrian Jew Sigismund Carmellin (1865) in Roumanian and French. In addition to the Roumanian-Yiddish weekly newspaper Timpul—Die Zeit (The Times), edited by the educator Naphtali C. Popper, and Eth Ledaber (Yiddish), both published at Bucharest in 1859, there were many small, short-lived publications in Yiddish of restricted local interest.

From 1875 to 1941. Of great importance were the Bucharest periodicals Fraternitatea (Fraternity), founded in 1879 by Isaac Auerbach and A. S. Gold, and at the zenith of its importance under Dr. Elias Schwarzfeld, who was expelled in 1885, and revived by Auerbach in 1890 until his death in the same year; Egalitatea, founded by Moses Schwarzfeld, a brother of Elias Schwarzfeld (1890-1940), the most important Jewish newspaper in Roumania—the period it covers and its high standards make it a valuable source of history; Curierul Israelit (1910-41), founded by Moses Schweig, which became the official organ of the Union of Roumanian Jews after 1918; Infratirea (Fraternization), another weekly newspaper, founded by the Union of Roumanian Jews. Other publications of general Jewish tendencies were Drepturile (The Rights), founded in 1897 at Focshani by Botoseneanu, continued at Galatz as Pamanteanul (The Native), an organ of Jewish reservists; Botoseneanu was expelled in the following year; Emanciparea (Emancipation; 1897); and Cronica Israelita (Bucharest, 1901-11). Of assimilationist tendencies were Inainte (Forward, 1889-90), a biweekly, and Asimilarea (1890), which secured the collaboration of non-Jews. Lumina (Light), a socialist weekly (founded 1887, republished 1895-97), and its Yiddish edition, Wecker, wielded great influence among Jewish workers. Chovevei Zionist publications were: in Hebrew, Yezreel (Jassy); in Yiddish, Die Hoffnung (Piatra-Neamtz, 1881) and Der Emigrant (Focshani and Bucharest, 1882); in Roumanian, Aparatorul (The Defender; edited by A. S. Gold, 1881-84) and Stindardul (The Flag; Focshani, 1882). Zionist newspapers were; in Yiddish and Roumanian, Ahavath Zion (Galatz, 1898); in Roumanian, Vocea Sionului (The Voice of Zion; Ploesti, 1898); Rasaritul (The East), founded by Heinrich Rosenbaum, a friend of Theodor Herzl and edited by the poet and author Steuerman (Jassy, 1899-1901), one of the best Jewish newspapers in Roumania; Mevasereth Zion (1906-9), edited by Horia Carp; Tribuna Israelita (edited by Saniel Grosman, Bucharest, 1900); Mantuirea (Salvation; 1922-27); Renasterea Noastra (Our Rebirth), revisionist; and Stiri (The News). As already stated, all the Jewish papers were suppressed in 1941. Among the journals in Yiddish, Hayoetz (from 1875 until about 1918) was subsidized, at its beginnings, by Peixotto and edited by Max Asiel; Der wahre Hayoetz (after 1918), edited by a son of Max Asiel; Hatoḳea and Der National (both Botoshani, 1884), which Edward Herbert found to be "exceptionally rich in style and in contents."

To historical studies and general instructive contents were devoted: reviews and yearbooks, Anuarul pentru Israeliti (The Yearbook for Jews; edit. Moses Schwarzfeld, Bucharest, 1879-98); Analele Societatii Istorice Dr. Iuliu Barasch (Bucharest, 1889-1893); Sinai, a historical and literary quarterly (edit. M. H. Halevy, Bucharest, 1935-41). Magazines were: Revista Israelita (edit. by M. Beck, chief rabbi of the Coral Temple, 1886-1909); Lumea Israelita (The Jewish World), an illustrated review (1909-13; edit. Saniel Grosman); Adam, founded by I. Ludo (Bucharest, 1930-40); Cultura, a monthly (Bucharest, 1937-41); Almanachul Cronicei Israelite (Bucharest, 1908-9).

In Transylvania, the Zionist Uj Kelet was published in the Hungarian language, from 1918 on as a weekly, and from 1920 on as a daily (editor, Ernő Marton) until 1940. Uj Kelet also published Föld (The Soil), a literary review, at first a monthly, but subsequently a weekly.

Jews in the Roumanian Press. Most of the important Roumanian daily newspapers employed in certain periods the services of Jewish journalists; Jews were the chief editors of many Roumanian newspapers, among others of Opinia, an influential daily newspaper of Jassy. At Bucharest Jews collaborated chiefly on the democratic newspapers, and after the first World War, the two big democratic daily newspapers, Dimineatza (The Morning) and Adeverul (The Truth), were taken over by three Jewish journalists. Jews founded also the Bucharest daily newspaper Lupta (The Struggle) in 1925. All these publications were suppressed by the government of Octavian Goga in 1940.

Lit.: Schwarzfeld, Moses, in Anuarul pentru Israeliti (1886); Herbert, Edward, The Jewish Press in Roumania; Podoleanu, S., Istoria presei evreesti din Romania.

h. Other European Countries. BELGIUM. Fifteen Jewish papers appeared in Belgium from 1841 to 1940; five weeklies and five monthly newspapers printed in Brussels and Antwerp were still in existence when the Nazis invaded that country.

BULGARIA. Ten papers were published in Bulgaria from 1882 on in Bulgarian, French and Spaniolish. In 1940 six monthlies and four weeklies existed; four were Zionistic, three scientific, and three fraternal.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA. From 1802 on Czechoslovakia had about forty-five papers. Their history is similar to that of the Jewish press in Germany and Austria, and the languages in which they were published were as manifold as was that state itself. At least fifteen cities had Jewish periodicals. The Zionist Selbstwehr (at Prague, from 1907 on), the Zionist Jüdische Volksstimme (at Prague, from 1901 on), Daniel Ehrmann's Das Abendland (Prague and Brünn, 1864-69), and Rozvoj (Prague, from 1894 on) may be mentioned. After the Nazis invaded the country in 1939, only one paper remained, and this under the supervision of the authorities: Jüdisches Nachrichtenblatt-Zidowska Listy, a bi-language weekly, published in Prague.

In Slovakia (Pressburg) the non-partisan Jüdisches Familienblatt (editor, Moses Müller) and the Jewish nationalist Jüdisches Volksblatt (editor, David Gross), both weeklies, were published in German between 1919 and 1939. In Ruthenia there appeared the Zionist periodicals Dos Yiddishe Folksblatt (Yiddish; Munkács; editor, Simon Sauer) and Zsidó Néplap (Hungarian; Ungvár; editor from 1919 on, Bela Szerény), and the Hasidic-Orthodox Yiddishe Tzeitung (Yiddish; Munkács). Otzar Hahayyim, a Hebrew monthly on traditional Jewish literature and history, was edited by Hayim L. Ehrenreich at Humenne.

DENMARK. Six papers were printed in Denmark in Danish and Yiddish from 1865 on.

ESTONIA had four Yiddish papers in 1940.

FINLAND at the same time published two papers in Finnish.

GREECE produced fifteen papers from 1861 on in Spaniolish, Greek, Turkish and French. One monthly, one weekly, and two dailies existed in 1940.

ITALY. The Italian Jews published seven papers in Italian from 1845 on. In 1938 four Jewish papers were published in Milan.

LATVIA. Twenty-two papers appeared in Latvia from 1881 on, most of them in Yiddish, and some in Hebrew or Russian and German. Two dailies, three weeklies and some scientific magazines were published in Latvia in 1940.

LITHUANIA. Twenty Jewish papers were published in Lithuania in Yiddish and Hebrew. More than ten were still being published in 1940, including three dailies, all printed in Kaunas.

NORWAY. There was in Norway, in 1940, one Zionist monthly.

POLAND. From 1823 on, Poland produced more than 250 papers in every field of journalism. Until 1918 nearly all of them were printed in Yiddish. After the creation of the new Polish state, however (1919), about ten Polish papers were published; the Hebrew press shows about twenty-five publications. The Gazeta Zydowska, printed under the supervision of the German authorities in Cracow, may be the only Jewish paper printed in Poland from 1939 up to 1942.

PORTUGAL. Three Portuguese papers were published in Portugal in 1940.

SWEDEN. Three papers were published in Sweden from 1916 on in Yiddish and Swedish.

SWITZERLAND. The small Swiss state showed fifteen papers from 1834 on, when Samuel Preiswert's Altes und Neues Morgenland appeared at Basel (1834-40). The Jüdische Presszentrale was published in Zurich from 1921 on and M. Littmann's and David Strauss' Israelitisches Wochenblatt für die Schweiz from 1901 on. Most of the papers were printed in German, one in French, one in Hebrew, and three in Yiddish.

TURKEY. Twelve papers were published in Turkey from 1841 on, in Spaniolish, French, Turkish and Hebrew. Many of them were printed in two of these languages.

YUGOSLAVIA. From 1881 on there were fourteen papers in Yugoslavia, printed in the different languages of that polyglot country.

i. The Hebrew Press. The Hebrew press and its development are not outspokenly connected with one country. Wherever Jewish life flourished, Hebrew periodicals were printed. A far-reaching influence is not noticeable until the second part of the 19th cent., in Russia, as far as Europe is concerned. However, also in the case of the Hebrew press one may observe that a decline at one point means a decrease at another. Palestine is keeping alive what Europe created. The character of the Hebrew press in Europe was mostly scientific, and its standard was high. The Jewish intelligentsia, even during the high-water mark of emancipation, did not abandon the knowledge of Hebrew outside of the religious world. The Hebrew press served less outspoken special purposes, ideas or movements. It served the cause of Judaism generally.

From Holland, where the above-mentioned Peri Etz Hayim (1728-61) appeared as the first-known Hebrew periodical, by way of Germany with its Koheleth Musar (1750) and its Hameassef (1784-1811), and by way of Austria with its Bikḳure Haittim (1820-31), S. L. Goldenberg's Kerem Hemed (1833-36), Kochebe Yitzhaḳ (1845-73), Otzar Nehmad (1857-63) and Hashahar (1869-84) led the way to Poland and Roumania.

Galicia, in the middle of the 19th cent., became the center of the Hebrew press. The Yerushalayim was published in Zólkiew (from 1844; later in Lemberg and Prague). Josef Kobak's Yeshurun started publication in Lemberg in 1856, and later moved to Breslau, Fürth and Bamberg. The Haḳarmel of Samuel Joseph Fünn and H. L. Markon (1860-81) was a noteworthy weekly published in Vilna, and the Hatzefirah (Warsaw, 1862-1928) of Hayim Slonimski and Nahum Sokolow became the first Hebrew daily. In Galicia the weeklies Hamebasser (1860-70; editor, A. Minkes) and Hanesher (1864-72; editor, Joseph Kohen-Zedek), both published in Lemberg, became well-known, as did the monthly Haboḳer (1876-86), of which Abraham Bär Gottlober was editor. Perez Smolenskin's Hashahar (1856-64) and Baruch Weber's Haibri (Brody, 1865-78) were also very successful, as was Alexander Zederbaum's Hamelitz (Odessa, 1860-1904), which became a daily about 1885. Other Hebrew periodicals were: Hamaggid, in East

THE ISRAELITE.

A weekly Periodical, devoted to the Religion, History and Literature of the Israelites.

PUBLISHED BY CHAS. F. SCHMIDT & CO., OFFICE: NO. 71, EAST THIRD STREET.

יהי אור LET THERE BE LIGHT

EDITED BY ISAAC MAYER WISE, RESIDENCE: NO. 111, EAST THIRD STREET.

Vol. I. Cincinnati, O., July 15., 5614 A. M., 1854 A. C. No. 1.

Masthead of the first number of "The Israelite," published at Cincinnati, July 15, 1854, which continued to appear in 1942

Prussia (Lyck, 1857-92; editors, Eliezer Lipman Silberman, David Gordon and Dob Bär Gordon); Tebunah, edited by Israel Lipkin in Memel (1861-62); the above-mentioned Haemeth in Vienna (1877); the Leningrad daily Hayom (1886-87), under the editorship of Judah Löb Cantor; Isaac Moses Bader's Mahazike Hadath (Lemberg, 1879-1914); the Warsaw dailies Hatzofeh (1902-4) and Haboker (1909); J. Rein's Hamitzpeh (Cracow, 1904-22); Haibri (Berlin, 1910-22); Hacham (London, 1913).

j. The Yiddish Press. The Yiddish press is barely sixty years old, and was centered in Russia (Lithuania), Poland and Roumania (Galicia), and later on in the United States (New York city), England (London), Canada and South Africa. When the Russian Jews, in connection with the new liberal spirit which knocked even at the doors of the Russia of the czars, demanded a vernacular press instead of Hebrew, the Odessa Hebrew Hamelitz furnished its readers a weekly supplement in Yiddish, the Kol Mevasser (1853-72). This supplement became the first Yiddish paper in the modern sense of this word. In contrast with the Hebrew periodicals, the Yiddish newspapers were the papers of daily life. Most of them were political papers. Certainly they had an outspoken tendency with reference to Jewish questions as well. They were democratic, nationalistic or socialistic as regards general matters, and Orthodox, Zionist, Liberal or in favor of emancipation as regards specifically Jewish problems.

A page from the German weekly (in Hebrew characters) "Dyhernfurther Privilegirte Zeitung," dated December 13, 1771, which was discontinued in 1772

The most famous Yiddish newspapers published in Europe were: Hayim Rohatin's Lemberger Yiddishe Tzeitung (1848-49), a weekly; Londoner Yiddish-Deitche Tzeitung (1867); the Zionist weekly Hadegel Hayehudi (London, 1898-1920; editor, Isaac Suwalki); Hayoetz, a weekly at Bucharest (1876-1920); Pester Yiddishe Tzeitung (Budapest, 1869-87; editor, L. Reiss); the daily Moment (from 1900); Unzer Leben (1907-20), organ of the Poale Zion; the Zionist Haint (from 1900; the last three published in Warsaw). In Lodz the daily Lodzer Tagblatt appeared (from 1908); in Leningrad Der Fraind (1902-13), in Moscow the Communist daily Emes (from 1919) and Der Tog (from 1904); and in Kaunas the daily Yiddishe Shtimme (from 1919). In Germany unsuccessful attempts were made to establish a Yiddish press.

k. The Judeo-Spanish Press. Generally less important but interesting as one chapter in the history of Jewish journalism is the Judeo-Spanish (Spaniolish, or Ladino) press, whose cradle was in the Balkans. What Yiddish means to the Ashkenazim, Spaniolish is for the Sephardim. This dialect is more important for the religious literature than for the development of modern Jewish literature and periodicals. However, in Bulgaria, Turkey, Greece and some of the islands of the Mediterranean the Spaniolish press flourished, especially between 1850 and 1900.

The Puerta del Oriente er Shaare Mizrah (1846) was the first Jewish paper published in Turkey. The number of this kind of papers, which were often printed in several languages, increased steadily until 1870. Few survived. But at one time more than twenty-five were printed. The most famous were: Chronica Israelitica (Gibraltar, 1842); Ezekiel Gabbai's Journal Israelith (1860-71) and El Tresoro (1867); David Fresco's El Telegrapho (1872); Mercado Fresco's El Tiempo (1872; the latter four all published in Istanbul). In Salonika appeared the first Jewish comic paper, Biri-Biri (1867), as well as Saadi Halevi's La Epoca (1874). The following also may be mentioned: Adolf Zemlinski's La Politica (Vienna, 1878); El Sol (Istanbul, 1879); La Verdad (Smyrna, 1884); El Tresoro (Ruschuk, 1894-98); A. Pipano's La Verdad (Sofia, 1898); La Alborado (Sarajevo, 1898-1902).

The will to survive is one of the most significant symptoms in the history of the Jewish press in Europe. Threats which endangered certain parts of the press from within and without could not interrupt steady developments. The Hebrew press moved from Western to Eastern Europe, and finally to Palestine. The Yiddish press was conserved (1942) by the Jews in the United States, the Spaniolish press still existed (1942) in Turkey. The spirit of the Jewish press in Western Europe was still alive in that year in England, and even the most endangered German press existed in Switzerland, Palestine, North America and South America. There can be no doubt that the Jewish problem all over the world will be changed as a result of the second World War. New ideas are in the making, new Jewish centers are developing, new Jewish papers will be a most necessary element in voicing the Jewish right to live when the new world is shaped. Whether the Jewish press in Europe will be reborn or whether the voice of the European Jews will survive in other Jewish centers all over the world could not be foreseen when these lines were printed.

(Continued on next page)

George Wolf

List of Jewish Periodicals in Europe Which Appeared for at Least Twenty Years

EXPLANATIONS AND ABBREVIATIONS

The first paper to appear in each country is listed independently of the duration of its publication.
Language: When nothing else is stated the papers are printed in the language of the country where they are published; papers printed in more than one language are listed in the language of the country where printed.
Frequency of publication: Periodicals printed each second month, three times a year, twice a year, etc. are listed as irregular; papers printed more than three times a week are listed as daily.

Cz. — Czechoslovakian
E — English
F — French
G — German
H — Hebrew
Hung. — Hungarian
Russ. — Russian
S — Spaniolish
Y — Yiddish
d — daily f — fortnightly
i — irregular
m — monthly q — quarterly
w — weekly
y — year book

Title	City and Duration of Publication		Language	Frequency	Editor	Character
			Austria
Bikkure Haittim	Vienna	1820–1831	H	y	Shalom Kohen	Reform, scholarly
Kerem Hemed	Vienna	1833–1856	H	i	S. M. Goldenberg	Reform, scholarly
Kochebe Yitzhak	Vienna	1845–1873	H	i	M. E. Stern and M. Weismann	Reform, scholarly
Die Neuzeit (continued as Die Wahrheit)	Vienna	1861–1904	G	w	Simon Szantó Adolf Jellinek	Reform, scholarly
Der Wiener Israelit	Vienna	1863–1880	Y	w	Wilhelm Weiss
Österreichisch-Ungarische Kantorenzeitung	Vienna	1881–1902	G	three times a week	Jacob Bauer	Professional
Dr. Blochs Österreichische Wochenschrift	Vienna	1884–1920	G	w	Joseph Bloch	In favor of emancipation, Conservative
Die Wahrheit	Vienna	1885–1938	G	w	M. Löwy O. Hirschfeld	In favor of emancipation, religious neutral
Mitteilungen der österreichischen israelitischen Union	Vienna	1888–1908	G	m		In favor of emancipation, religious neutral
Die Welt	Vienna	1897–1914	G	w	S. Werner	Zionist
Mitteilungen der Loge Bnai Brith	Vienna	1901–1938	G	m		In favor of emancipation fraternal, liberal
Die jüdische Presse	Vienna	1915–1934	G	w		Organ of the Agudah
Palästina	Vienna	1917–1938	G	m		Zionist, economics
			Belgium
Revue orientale	Brussels	1841–1846	F	m	Eliakim Carmoly	Scholarly
Hatikvah	Antwerp	1908–1940	F	f		Zionist
Maccabi	Antwerp	1921–1940	Flemish	f		Zionist, sports
			Bulgaria
Karmi Scheli	Adrianople	1882–1896	H, S	w	Baruch Mitrani	Scholarly
Eco Judaico	Sofia	1901–	S	w	A. Piperno	Zionist
El Judio	Varna	1909–	S	w		Zionist
Haschofar	Sofia	1910–		w		Zionist
Bulletin na Zentralnata Konsistoria	Sofia	1921–		w		Official
			Czechoslovakia
Jüdische Monatsschrift	Prague	1802–	G	m		Scholarly
Israelitische Gemeindezeitung	Prague	1873–1898	G	f	J. B. Brandeis	Pedagogic
Rozvoj	Prague	1894–1932	Cz.	w		Czech-Jewish
Jung Juda	Prague	1900–1930	G	i	Siegmund Springer	Youth
Jüdische Volksstimme	Brünn	1901–	G	f, w	Salomon Rubinstein	Zionist
Selbstwehr	Prague	1907–1939	G	w	Felix Weltsch	Zionist
Zidovske Zpravy	Prague	1918–1939	Cz.	w		Zionist
Jüdische Volkszeitung	Bratislava	1919–1939	G	w	David Gross	Zionist
Jüdisches Familienblatt	Bratislava	1919–1939	G	w	Moses Müller	Non-partisan
Zsido Népláp	Uzhorod	1920	Hung.	w	Belay Szereny	Zionist
Mitteilungen der Loge Bnai Brith	Prague	1921–1939	G	m		Fraternal
			Denmark
Israelitisk Tidende	Copenhagen	1865–1866		m		Scholarly
Jodisk Ugeblad	Copenhagen	1906–		m		Neutral
Israeliten	Copenhagen	1912		m		Non-partisan
			England
Hebrew Intelligencer	London	1823–1823	E	m		Conservative
The Hebrew Review	London	1834–1860	E	m	Marcus H. Bresslau
The Jewish Chronicle	London	1841–	E	w	Morris Raphall	Zionist
Jewish Quarterly Review	London	1888–1908	E	q	Israel Abrahams C. G. Montefiore	Scholarly
Jewish Express	London	1896-1935	Y	d		Zionist
Hadegel Hayehudi	London	1898–1920	H	w	Isaac Suwalki	Zionist, historical
The Jewish Times	London	1913–	Y	d		Zionist
Haolam	London	1913-1939	H	m		Zionist
New Judaea	London	1924–	E	m		Zionist
Palestine	London	1925	E	f		Zionist
			France
Les archives israélites de France	Paris	1840-1940	F	m, w	Samuel and Isidor Cohen	Historical, literary, Reform
L'univers israélite	Paris	1846–1940	F	w	S. Bloch	Conservative
La famille de Jacob	Avignon	1859–1891	F	m	Benjamin Mossé	Orthodox
Bulletin mensuel de l'Alliance Israélite Universelle	Paris	1861–1940	F	m	Isidore Loeb	Organ of the Alliance Israélite
Revue des études juives	Paris	1880-1940	F	q	Isidore Loeb Israel Lévi	Scientific
L'Echo Sioniste	Paris	1900–1921	F	m	A. Marmorek	Zionist
Rassviet	Paris	1905–1932	Russ.	w		Zionist
La tribune juive	Strasbourg	1919–1940	F	w		Orthodox
Chalom	Paris	1921–1940	F	m		Juvenile
Paix et droit	Paris	1921–1940	F	m		Alliance Israélite
Menorah	Paris	1922–1940	F	f		Zionist

Title	City and Duration of Publication	Language	Frequency	Editor	Character
Germany
Koheleth Musar	Berlin 1750–1750	H	w	Moses Mendelssohn	Enlightenment
Hameassef	Berlin 1784–1811	H	m	initiated by Moses Mendelssohn	Enlightenment
Sulamith	Dessau 1806–1833	G	m	David Frankel	Reform
Jedidja	Berlin 1817–1833	G	i		Religious
Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums (continued as C.-V.-Zeitung from 1922)	Berlin 1837–1938	G	w	Ludwig Philippson Gustav Karpeles	Liberal, scholarly, emancipation
Liturgische Zeitschrift	Meiningen 1848–1862	G	i	Herman Ehrlich	Musical
Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums	Breslau 1851–1938	G	m	Zacharias Frankel Isaak Heinemann Marcus Brann	Scholarly
Jeschurun	Frankfort 1854–1870	G	m	Samson R. Hirsch	Orthodox
	Hannover 1883–1886	G	m	Isaac Hirsch	Orthodox
	Berlin 1914–1930	GH	m	A. Lewin	Orthodox
	Breslau 1856–1878	GH	i	Josef Kobak	Scientific
Jeschurun	Fürth Bamberg
Hamaggid Maggid Hehadash	Lyck, Berlin Cracow 1856–1892	H	w	Eliezer Lipman Silberman, David Gordon	Orthodox
Ha-Mazkir, Zeitschrift für hebräische Bibliographie	Berlin 1858–1882 revived 1896–1920	G	m bimonthly	Moritz Steinschneider Hayim Brody Aron Freimann	Scholarly
Der Israelit	Frankfort 1860–1938	G	w	S. Schachnowitz	Agudah
Israelitische Wochenschrift für die religiösen und sozialen Interessen des Judentums	Magdeburg-Breslau 1868–1894	G	w	A. Treuenfels M. Rahmer	Conservative
Die jüdische Presse	Berlin 1869–1923	G	w	E. and M. Hildesheimer	Orthodox
Mitteilungen vom deutsch-israelitischen Gemeindebund	Berlin 1872–1921	G	i		Orthodox, neutral
Magazin für Geschichte, Literatur und Wissenschaft des Judentums	Berlin 1874–1893	G	q	Abraham Berliner David Hoffman	Scholarly
Monatsblätter zur Belehrung über das Judentum	Frankfort 1881–1908	G	m		Scholarly
Blätter des Oberrats der badischen Israeliten	Karlsruhe 1884–1938	G	m		Official
Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland	Braunschweig 1887–1892	G	m	Ludwig Geiger	Scholarly
	Berlin 1929–1938	G	q	Ismar Elbogen Aron Freimann
Israelitisches Gemeindeblatt	Cologne 1888–1921	G	w		Orthodox
	1931–1938		w	F. Neuländer	Official
Mitteilungen der Loge Bnai Brith	Berlin 1891–1938	G	m	D. Bernstein	Fraternal
Allgemeine Israelitische Wochenschrift	Berlin 1892–1906	G	w	M. Klausner A. Lewin	Liberal
Im Deutschen Reich (continued as C.-V.-Zeitung)	Berlin 1895–1921	G	m	Alfred Levy	in favor of emancipation, Organ of the Central Verein
Israelitische Rundschau (continued as Jüdische Rundschau)	Berlin 1895–1938	G	twice a week	R. Wohlberg H. Löwe Robert Weltsch	Zionist
Hashiloah	Berlin 1896–1914	H	m	Asher Ginzberg (Ahad Haam)	Zionist, scholarly
Jüdisches Volksblatt (continued as Jüdische Zeitung)	Breslau 1897–1938	G	w	Erich Bildhauer	Zionist
Israelitisches Familienblatt	Hamburg Berlin 1900–1938	G	w	M. Deutschländer A. Kupferberg A. Jacoby	neutral, family
Jüdische Turnzeitung	Berlin 1900–1922	G	m	H. Jolowitz	Zionist, Sports
Der Makkabi	Berlin 1900–1938	G	m		Zionist, Sports
Ost und West	Berlin 1901–1922	G	m	Leo Winz	Literary, Art
Zeitschrift für Demographie und Statistik der Juden	Berlin 1904–1922	G	m		Scientific
Korrespondenzblatt für jüdische Auswanderung	Berlin 1905–1938	G	i	Mark Wischnitzer	Scientific
Der jüdische Handwerker	Berlin 1909–1938	G	m	Erich Salinger	Fraternal
Gemeindeblatt der jüdischen Gemeinde Berlin	Berlin 1911–1938	G	m, w	Leo Kreindler	Neutral
K.-C.-Blätter	Berlin 1912–1938	G	m	Ludwig Holländer	Students
Mitteilungen der jüdischen Reformgemeinde	Berlin 1918–1938	G	m	Joseph Lehmann	Reform
Der Schild	Berlin 1921–1938	G	w	Reichsbund jüdischer Frontsoldaten
C.-V.-Zeitung (combined after 1922 with Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums and Im Deutschen Reich)	Berlin 1922–1938	G	w	Ludwig Holländer Alfred Wiener A. Hirschberg M. Edelheim	Neutral, in favor of emancipation, against anti-Semitism
Der Morgen	Darmstadt Berlin 1925–1938	G	m	J. Goldstein Hans Bach	Scholarly Greece
Chronica Israelitica	Corfu 1861–1863	Greek	m	M. D. Levi, Z. Naramalli	Scholarly
El Tiempo	Salonika 1873–	S	d
La Epoca	Salonika 1874–	S	w	Saadi Halevi
Hungary
Magyar Zsinagóga	Pápa 1846–1847	Hung.	q	Lipót Löw	Hungarian-Jewish
Pester Jüdische Zeitung (continued as Allgemeine Jüdische Zeitung)	Budapest 1869–1887	G (at first printed in Hebrew characters)	d	I. Reiss, M. Ehrentheil,	Conservative
	1887–1919	G	w	Lipót Grossberg	Conservative
Der Ungarische Israelit	Budapest 1874–	G	w	Ignatz Wilhelm Back	Non-partisan
Magyar Izraelita Országos Tanitó-Egylet Ertesitője	Budapest 1875–	Hung.	m		Teachers
Egyenlőség (from 1939 on, Magyar Zsidók Lapja)	Budapest 1882–	Hung.	w	Miksa Szabolcsi, Lajos Szabolcsi	Hungarian-Jewish

Title	City and Duration of Publication		Language	Frequency	Editor	Character
Hungary—Continued
Magyar Zsidó Szemle	Budapest	1884–	Hung.	f	József Bánóczi Wilhelm Bacher Ludwig Blau	Scholarly, historical
Mult és Jövő	Budapest	1911–	Hung.	m	József Patai	Art
Hatzofeh Lehochmath Yisrael	Budapest	1911-1931	H	m	Lajos Blau	Scholarly
Remény	Budapest	1917–	Hung.	m		Youth
Zsidó Szemle	Budapest	1909-39	Hung.	twice a month (at first a monthly)	Zsigmond Alt (later edited by József Schönfeld)	Zionist
Italy
Rivista Israelitica	Parma	1845–1848		i	S. H. Margulies	Scholarly
Educatore Israelita (continued as Il Vessillo Israelitico)	Vercelli	1853–1874		m	G. Levi, E. Pontremoli, Flaminio Servi	Scholarly
	Turin	1874–1922		m
L'Idea Sionistica	Rome, Milano	1901–		m	Carlo A. Conigliano	Zionist
Israel	Florence	1916		w		Zionist
Latvia
Yevreskaya Sapiski	Riga	1881–1882	Russ.	m		Scholarly
Lithuania
Nasze Utro	Grodno	1915–1919	Russ.	d		General
Die Yiddishes Shtimme	Kaunas	1919–	Y	d		Zionist
Yiddishes Leben	Kaunas	1921–	Y	w		Agudah
Nayes	Kaunas	1921	Y	w
The Netherlands
Gazette de Amsterdam	Amsterdam	1678–1678	S	i	David Tartas	Economics
Peri Etz Hayim	Amsterdam	1728–1761	H	m		Orthodox
Nieuws en Advertenticblad, continued as Nieuwsblad for Israelieten and Israelietische Nieuws and Avertenticblad	Amsterdam	1849–1883		w		General Information
		1883–1893		w
		1901–		w
Weekblad for Israelieten	Amsterdam	1855–1884		w	M. L. van Ploeg
Weekblad voor Israelietische Huisgezinnen	Amsterdam	1870–		w	Haagens Brothers	Popular, Scholarly
Israelietische Letterbode, continued as Israelietische Nieuwsbode	Amsterdam	1875–1893		m w	M. Roest	Historical, Literature
Centraal Blad voor Israelieten in Nederland	Amsterdam	1885–1940		w		Non-partisan
Achawah	Amsterdam	1894–		m		Pedagogic
De Joodsche Wachter	Rotterdam	1905		w		Zionist
Hatikwah	Amsterdam	1917		m		Zionist
Mizrachie	Haarlem	1917		m		Mizrachi
Norway
Hatikvoh	Oslo	1929–1940		m		Zionist
Poland
Beobachter an der Weichsel	Warsaw	1823–1824	Y	w	A. Eisenbaum	Non-partisan
Yeshurun	Lemberg	1856–1878	H	i	Josef Kobak	Orthodox
Hakarmel	Vilna	1860–1880	H	m	Samuel Joseph Fünn H. L. Markon	Scholarly Literary
Hatzefirah	Warsaw	1862–1928	H	d	H. Slonimski	Zionist
Haibri	Brody	1865–1890	H	w	Baruch Weber	Orthodox
Israelita	Warsaw	1865–1899		w	S. H. Peltyr Nahum Sokolow	Polish-Jewish
Der Israelit	Lemberg	1869–1908	G	f	J. Klein	Orthodox
Jüdisches Literaturblatt	Cracow Lemberg	1873–	G	q, w	M. Rahmer Ezekiel Caro	Literary Literary
Mahzike Hadath	Lemberg	1879–1914	H	w	Isaac Moses Bader	Orthodox
Drohobyczer Zeitung	Drohobycz	1883–1914	G	w	A. H. Zupnik	Conservative
Haeshkol	Cracow	1898–	H	q	J. S. Fuchs	Scholarly
Hamitzpah	Cracow	1903–1922	H	m	J. Rein	Zionist
Lodzer Tagblatt	Lodz	1908–1939	Y	d		Zionist
Haint	Warsaw	1908–1939	Y	d		Zionist
Der Moment	Warsaw	1910–1939	Y	d		Non-partisan
Nowy Dziennik	Cracow	1918–1939	Polish	d		Zionist
Lubliner Tagblatt	Lublin	1918–1939	Y	d		Neutral
Befreiung Arbeiterstimme	Warsaw	1919–	Y	w		Poale Zion
Das Naie Leben	Bialystok	1919–	Y	d		Neutral
Chwila	Lemberg	1919–1939	Polish	d		Zionist
Vilnaer Tog	Vilna	1920–1939	Y	d		Neutral
Lomzaer Shtimme	Lomza	1920–1939	Y	w		General
Shul und Leben	Warsaw	1921–1939	Y	m		Pedagogic
Die Naje Shul	Warsaw	1920–1939	Y	q		Pedagogic
Der jüdische Kantor	Bromberg	1879–1898	G	w	A. Blaustein	Fraternal
Portugal
Halapid	Porto	1926–		i		Community
Roumania
Eth Ledabber	Bucharest	1854–1856	H, Y	i	N. C. Popper	Scholarly
Hayoetz	Bucharest	1876–1920	Y	w	M. Asiel	Chovevei Zion
Revista Israelita		1886–1909	H	m	M. Beck	Scholarly
Egalitatea	Bucharest	1890–1940		w	M. Schwarzfeld	Zionist
Curierul Israelit	Bucharest	1906–1941		w	M. Schweig	Non-partisan
Die Volkswehr	Cernauti	1910–1941	G	w		Zionist
Hasmonea	Bucharest	1915–1941		m		Zionist
Die Yiddishe Tzukunft	Galatz	1917–1941	Y	f		Zionist
Yiddishe Vissenshaft	Jassy	1918–1940	Y	f		Scientific
Uj Kelet	Cluj	1918–1941	Hung.	w	Ernő Marton	Zionist
Uj Kor	Timisoara	1919–1941	Hung. G	f		Zionist
Ostjüdische Zeitung	Cernauti	1919–1941	G	three times a week		Zionist
Copilul Evreu	Bucharest	1922–1941		f		Youth

Title	City and Duration of Publication		Language	Frequency	Editor	Character
Russia
Hamelitz	Odessa	1860–1904	H	w, d	A. Zederbaum	Haskalic
Voskhod	Leningrad	1881–1906		m	A. Landau, G. Syrkin	Scientific
Der Emes	Moscow	1919–	Y	d		Communistic
Der proletarische Gedank	Moscow	1921–	Y	m		Communistic
Sweden
Israeliten	Stockholm	1914–		m		Non-partisan
Switzerland
Altes und Neues Morgenland	Basel	1834–1840	G	m	S. Preiswerk	Scholarly
Israelitisches Wochenblatt für die Schweiz	Zurich	1901–	G	w	M. Littmann	Neutral
Jüdische Presszentrale	Zurich	1918–	G	w	Oskar Grün	Neutral
Turkey
Journal Israélite	Istanbul	1841–1860	S	w	Ezekiel Gabbai	General
El Telegrafo	Istanbul	1872–	S	three times a week	David Fresco	Neutral
El Tiempo	Istanbul	1872–	S	twice a week	Mercado Fresco	General
Yugoslavia
Das jüdische Zentralblatt	Bielovar	1881–1882	G	f		Scholarly
El Amigo del Puevlo	Belgrade	1888–1902	S	m	S. Bekor Elias	General
Zidov	Zagreb	1917–	Croatian	w		Zionist

1. Jewish Journalists in the General European Press. The influence and importance of Jewish writers, editors and publishers within the general press of Europe has increased during the past one hundred years. However, this is a Jewish question only insofar as the men and women were of the Jewish faith or Jewish blood. All over Europe they did not work as Jews but as representatives of their respective countries and political convictions.

Only in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Hungary, and, to a certain degree, in England, France and Roumania, were Jewish journalists active in large numbers. Only a few of them worked with the general press in Scandinavia, the Baltic states, Italy, Belgium, Russia, The Netherlands, the Iberian Peninsula, the Balkans and Switzerland, most of them as correspondents abroad or in the economic field for which they were well fitted, due to the structure of the Jewish population. The time is too short and the subject too extended to judge accurately at this moment the importance of these writers in all branches of journalism. Very often it is even not known whether a writer was a Jew or not. Only in Germany has this question been clarified by force. The following list contains only the most important personages; it is by no means complete, and gives only some idea of what has been achieved in the field of journalism in the general press of the various countries of Europe during the past one hundred years.

List of Jewish Journalists Active in the General European Press

Name	Paper	Active in	City	Approximate Time of Activity
Austria
Adler, Viktor	Arbeiterzeitung	Politics	Vienna	1880–1918
Austerlitz, Friedrich	Arbeiterzeitung	Politics	Vienna	1890–1930
Bacher, Eduard	Neue Freie Presse	Politics	Vienna	1870–1905
Benedikt, Moritz	Neue Freie Presse	Politics	Vienna	1875–1920
Bermann, Richard A.	Berliner Tageblatt	Theatre	Vienna, Berlin	1910–1939
Bettauer, Hugo	Der Morgen	Politics	Vienna	1900–1925
Decsey, Ernst	Neues Wiener Tagblatt	Music	Vienna	1895–1938
Fried, Alfred H.	Friedenswarte	Politics	Vienna	1890–1921
Friedlaender, Max	Neue Freie Press	Politics	Vienna	1864–1870
Frydmann, M. Ritter von	Fremdenblatt	Politics	Vienna	1880–1900
Gelber, Adolf	Neues Wiener Tagblatt	Politics	Vienna	1875–1920
Goldmann, Paul	Neue Freie Presse	Politics	Vienna	1890–1935
Hartmann, Moritz	Neue Freie Presse	Politics	Vienna
Heine, Gustav	Wiener Fremdenblatt	Politics	Vienna	1850–1875
Hertzka, Theodor	Neue Freie Presse Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung	Politics	Vienna	1870–1927
Herzl, Theodor	Neue Freie Presse	Literature	Vienna	1890–1904
Kompert, Leopold	Österreichische Lloyd	Literature	Vienna	1850–1880
Korngold, Julius	Neue Freie Presse	Music	Vienna	1902–1930
Kraus, Karl	Die Fackel	Politics	Vienna	1899–1933
Kuh, Anton	Various papers	Literature	Vienna, New York	1920–1941
Kuh, Emil	Various papers	Literature	Vienna	1860–1875
Kuranda, Ignaz	Ostdeutsche Morgenpost	Politics	Vienna	1848–1866
Lippowitz, Jakob	Neues Wiener Journal	Politics	Vienna	1890–1934
Lipschuetz, Leopold	Kronenzeitung	Politics	Vienna	1900–1915
Lothar, Ernst	Neue Freie Presse	Literature	Vienna	1920–1934
Nordau, Max	Neue Freie Presse	Politics	Vienna	1870–1920
Polgar, Alfred	Weltbühne	Literature	Berlin	1900–1933
Salten, Felix	Various papers	Literature	Vienna	1900–1934
Saphir, Moritz G.	Der Humorist	Literature	Vienna	1834–1895
Schalek, Alice	Neue Freie Presse	Travel	Vienna	1910–1925
Singer, Wilhelm	Neues Wiener Tagblatt	Politics	Vienna	1875–1917
Specht, Richard	Various papers	Music	Vienna	1905–1930
Spitzer, Daniel	Neue Freie Presse	Literature	Vienna	1870–1890
Stefan, Paul	Anbruch	Music	Vienna	1910–1934
Stricker, Robert	Wiener Morgenzeitung Die Neue Welt	Politics	Vienna	1919–1938
Szeps, Julius	Fremdenblatt	Politics	Vienna	1905–1928
Szeps, Moritz	Neues Wiener Tagblatt	Politics	Vienna	1870–1902
Wertheimer, Paul	Neue Freie Presse	Politics	Vienna	1910–1934

Name	Paper	Active in	City	Approximate Time of Activity
		Czechoslovakia
Baum, Oscar	Prager Presse	Music, Literature	Prague	1910–1938
Blau, Sigmund	Prager Tagblatt	Politics	Prague	1905–1938
Breier, Eduard	Prager Zeitung	Politics	Prague	1850–1880
Brod, Max	Prager Tagblatt	Literature	Prague	1910–1935
Budschislawski, H.	Neue Weltbühne	Politics	Prague	1933–1938
Fuchs, Rudolf	Prager Tagblatt	Literature	Prague	1915–1938
Haas, Willy	Literarische Welt	Literature	Berlin, Prague	1925–1938
Heller, Seligmann	Bohemia	Politics	Prague	1920–1938
Hollosch, Julius	Prager Mittag	Politics	Prague	1920–1938
Keller, Rudolf	Prager Tagblatt	Politics	Prague	1910–1938
Kuh, David	Tagesbote aus Böhmen	Politics	Prague	1852–1879
Laurin, Arne	Prager Presse	Politics	Prague	1920–1938
Munzer, Jean	Czeske Slovo	Politics	Prague	1920–1938
Saudek, Robert	Various papers	Science	Prague	1915–1935
Strauss, Emil	Der Sozialdemokrat	Politics	Prague	1918–1938
Teweles, Heinrich	Prager Tagblatt	Politics	Prague	1890–1927
Winder, Ludwig	Bohemia	Literature	Prague	1920–1938
		Denmark
Brandes, Carl Edvard	Politiken	Politics	Copenhagen	1880–1930
Brandes, Ernst	Kjøbenhavns Borstidende	Politics	Copenhagen	1870–1890
Brandes, George	Politiken	Literature	Copenhagen	1870–1920
Davidson, Jacob	Flyveposten	Politics	Copenhagen	1850–1890
Goldschmidt, M. A.	Corsaren and Nord og Syd	Literature	Copenhagen	about 1870
Koppel, Valdemar	Politiken	Politics	Copenhagen	from 1900
Meyer, Edvard	Flyveposten	Politics	Copenhagen	1890–1902
Nathansen, Moritz	Berlingske Tidende	Politics	Copenhagen	1870–1900
Nathanson, Mendel L.	Berlingske Tidende	Politics	Copenhagen	1840–1868
Siesby, Gottlieb	Flyveposten and Morgenblad	Politics	Copenhagen	1850–1880
		England
Beer, Arthur	Observer	Publisher	London	about 1900
Beer, Rahel	Sunday Times	Publisher	London	1890–1920
Benjamin, Lewis S.	Various papers	Literature	London	from 1910
Bensusan, Samuel L.	Various papers	Editorials	London	from 1900
Blumberg, Philipp	Associated Press	Editor	London	from 1925
Blumenfeld, Ralph D.	Daily Express	Publisher	London	from 1890
Burnham, Lord	Daily Telegraph	Publisher	London	1870–1916
Disraeli, Benjamin	Various papers	Politics	London	1840–1880
Easterman, A. L.	Daily Herald	Politics	London	from 1915
Emanuel, D.	Punch	Satirics	London	about 1900
Gilbert, Simon	Daily Press	Editor	London	from 1900
Godar, Philipp	Times	Politics, Literature	London	from 1920
Gollancz, Israel	Various papers	Literature	London	1900–1930
Gordon, Samuel	Various papers	Literature	London	about 1900
Kalisch, Alfred	Various papers	Music	London	1900–1930
Landa, Jaques M.	Daily News, News Chronicle	Politics	London	1910–1940
Laski, Harold J.	Various papers	Politics	London	from 1914
Lee, Sidney	Various papers	Literature	London	1885–1926
Levy, Joseph M.	Daily Telegraph	Publisher	London	1855–1888
Low, Sidney	St. James Gazette	Publisher	London	1880–1900
Magnus, Laurie	Morning Post	Publisher	London	about 1900
Mangrove, Lord	Various papers	Scientist	London	1900–1940
Myers, Maurice	Various papers	Editor	London	1910–1940
Montague, Ivor	Observer	Theatre	London	from 1925
Palgrave, Francis	Various papers	Literature	London	1810–1861
Pulvermacher, Max	Daily Herald	Publisher	London	from 1920
Reuter, Paul J.	Reuter's Telegraphic Bureau	Founder	London	1850–1900
Rothstein, Andrew	TASS	Editor	London	from 1921
Sacher, Harry	Manchester Guardian	Politics	Manchester	about 1900
Shinwell, Emanuel	Forward	Politics	Glasgow	from 1920
Spielman, M. H.	Various papers	Art	London	1900–1930
Wilenski, Reginald H.	Various papers	Art	London	from 1910
Wolf, Lucien	Daily Graphic	Publisher	London	1890–1930
Zangwill, Israel	Various papers	Literature	London	1880–1926
Zangwill, Louis	Various papers	Literature	London	from 1890
		France
Astruc, Gabriel	Figaro and Liberté	Politics	Paris	1890–1925
Berle, Emanuel	L'Homme Libre		Paris	1938–1939
Blum, Léon	Populaire	Politics	Paris	1920–1939
Bernard, Tristan	Marianne		Paris	1935–1939
Boris, Georges	La Lumière		Paris	1930–1940
Brombach, Salomon	La Lumière		Paris	1930–1940
Cahen, Isidore	Temps	Politics	Paris
Crémieux, Albert	Europe	Politics	Paris
Crémieux, Benjamin		Literature	Paris
Dreyfus, Camille	Lanterne	Politics	Paris
Finot, Jean	Revue des Revues	Politics	Paris
Forest, Louis	Matin	Politics	Paris
Gombault, Charles	Paris Soir		Paris	1933–1939
Gombault, Georges	France and La Lumière		Paris	1932–1940
Hertz, Henri
Hutin, Marcel	L'Écho de Paris and L'Époque	Politics	Paris	1900–1930
Kahn, Gustave	Various papers	Literature	Paris	1890–1935
Kayser, Jaques	Le Dépêche de Toulouse	Politics	Toulouse	1937–1939
Keissel, Joseph	Paris Soir	Politics	Paris	1935–1940
Knittel, Jean	Dernière Nouvelle de Strasbourg	Politics	Strasbourg	1920–1939
Lange, Robert	La République	Politics	Paris	1932–1935
Lazareff, Pierre	Paris Soir	Politics	Paris
Levy, Louis	Populaire and Information	Politics	Paris	1924–1939
	France	Politics	London	1940–
London, Géo	Le Journal	Politics	Paris	1920–1939
Lussy, Charles	Le Soir	Politics	Paris	1938–1940
Meyer, Arthur	Gaulois, Paris Journal	Politics	Paris	1880–1920
Mortier, Pierre	Le Mond Illustré		Paris	1920–1939
Nozières, F.	Matin, Gil Blas	Literature	Paris	1900–1935
Ratisbonne, L. G. F.	Journal des Débats	Politics	Paris	1870–1900
Run, Carlo	Vu and Intransigeant	Politics	Paris	1922–1935
Weill, Alexandre	Figaro	Politics	Paris
Weiss, Louise	L'Europe Nouvelle		Paris	1920–1938

Germany

Name	Paper	Active in	City	Approximate Time of Activity
Bab, Julius	Volkszeitung	Literature	Berlin	1910–1933
Bekker, Paul	Frankfurter Zeitung	Music	Frankfort	1916–1933
Bernhard, Georg	Vossische Zeitung	Politics	Berlin	1915–1933
Bernstein, Aron	Volkszeitung	Politics	Berlin	1870–1884
Bernstein, Arthur	Morgenpost	Politics	Berlin	1890–1933
Bernstein, Eduard	Neue Zeit	Politics	Berlin	1880–1932
Bie, Oskar	Neue Rundschau	Music	Berlin	1890–1933
Bloch, Joseph	Sozialistische Monatshefte	Politics	Berlin	1890–1933
Blumenthal, Oskar	Various papers	Literature	Berlin	1880–1915
Börne, Ludwig	Die Wage	Literature, Politics	Frankfort	1818–1837
Breslauer, Siegfried	Berliner Lokalanzeiger	Politics	Berlin	1900–1933
Buchwald, Bruno	Börsenberichte	Economics	Berlin	1900–1933
Cohnstaedt, Ludwig	Frankfurter Zeitung	Economics	Frankfort	1900–1934
Cossmann, Paul N.	Süddeutsche Monatshefte	Politics	Stuttgart	1903–1930
Davidsohn, Georg	Berliner Börsen-Courier	Politics	Berlin	1868–1897
Deri, Max	Berliner Tagblatt	Art	Berlin	1900–1933
Dernburg, Friedrich	Berliner Nationalzeitung	Politics	Berlin	1875–1890
Donath, Adolf	Der Kunstwanderer	Art	Berlin	1900–1933
Einstein, Alfred	Berliner Tagblatt	Music	Berlin	1927–1933
	Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft
Elbau, Julius	Vossische Zeitung	Politics	Berlin	1930–1932
Elias, Julius	Various papers	Art	Berlin	1890–1927
Eloesser, Arthur	Vossische Zeitung	Literature	Berlin	1905–1933
Engel, Fritz	Berliner Tagblatt	Literature	Berlin	1900–1935
Ettlinger, Josef	Nationalzeitung	Literature	Berlin	1890–1910
Faktor, Emil	Berliner Börsen-Courier	Politics	Berlin	1910–1933
Fechenbach, Felix	Weltbühne	Politics	Berlin	1920–1933
Feder, Ernst	Berliner Tageblatt	Politics	Berlin	1920–1933
Feiler, Arthur	Frankfurter Zeitung	Economics	Berlin	1920–1933
Goldschmidt, Salli	Frankfurter Zeitung	Politics	Frankfort	1910–1930
Goldstein, Moritz	Vossische Zeitung	Law	Berlin	1920–1933
Georg, Manfred	Tempo, Jüdische Revue	Politics, Literature	Berlin, Prague	1920–1933
Grabowsky, Adolf	Zeitschrift für Politik	Politics	Berlin	1918–1933
Grossmann, Kurt	Weltbühne	Politics	Berlin	1925–1933
Grossmann, Stefan	Das Tagebuch	Politics	Berlin	1920–1933
Guttmann, Bernhard	Frankfurter Zeitung	Politics	Frankfort	1899–1933
Hahn, Victor	8 Uhr Abendblatt	Politics	Berlin	1910–1933
Handl, Willi	Various papers	Literature	Berlin	1900–1920
Harden, Maximilian	Die Zukunft	Politics	Berlin	1892–1923
Heilborn, Ernst	Die Literatur	Literature	Berlin	1900–1933
Heine, Heinrich	Rheinische Zeitung and others	Politics	Cologne	1825–1850
Hess, Moses	Rheinische Zeitung	Politics	Cologne	1840–1875
Hirschstein, Hans	Hamburger Fremdenblatt	Economics	Hamburg	1920–1933
Holländer, Felix	Berliner Tagblatt	Literature	Berlin	1890–1931
Jacobs, Monty	Vossiche Zeitung	Literature	Berlin	1900–1933
Jacobsohn, Siegfried	Die Weltbühne	Politics	Berlin	1905–1926
	Die Schaubühne	Literature
Jonge, Moritz	Kreuzzeitung	Politics	Berlin	1890–1920
Kalisch, David	Kladderadatsch	Literature	Berlin	1848–1872
Karpath, Ludwig		Music	Berlin	1890–1936
Kastan, Isidor	Berliner Tageblatt	Politics	Berlin	1890–1931
Katz, Richard	Berliner Morgenpost	Travel	Berlin	1925–1933
	Grüne Post
Kauder, Gustav	Tempo	Politics	Berlin	1925–1933
Kayser, Rudolf	Neue Rundschau	Literature	Berlin	1915–1933
Kerr, Alfred	Berliner Tagblatt	Literature	Berlin	1919–1933
Kisch, Egon Erwin	Various papers	Reporting	Berlin	1915–1933
Klausner, Max Albert	Berliner Börsen-Courier	Politics	Berlin	1890–1920
Klötzel, C. Z.	Various papers	Travel	Berlin	1915–1933
Kohut, Adolph	Various papers	Travel	Berlin	1880–1917
Korff, Kurt	Berliner Illustrirte Zeitung	Special Features	Berlin	1900–1933
Landau, Isidor	Berliner Börsen-Courier	Politics	Berlin	1880–1925
Lassalle, Ferdinand	Various papers	Politics		1850–1864
Leipziger, Leo	Roland von Berlin	Politics	Berlin	1894–1910
Levy, Isidor	Vossische Zeitung	Politics	Berlin	1910–1929
Levysohn, Arthur	Kölnische Zeitung	Politics	Cologne	1865–1908
Lewald, August	Europa	Special Features	Stuttgart	1830–1870
Lewinsohn, Richard	Vossische Zeitung	Economics	Berlin	1920–1933
Lubliner, Hugo	Der Abend	Politics	Berlin	1880–1910
Marx, Karl	Rheinische Zeitung	Politics	Cologne	1842–1843
Meisel, Hans	Vossische Zeitung	Literature	Berlin	1922–1934
Misch, Carl	Vossische Zeitung	Politics	Berlin	1920–1933
Mosse, Rudolf	Berliner Tagblatt	Publishing	Berlin	1870–1820
	Berliner Volksszeitung
Moszkowski, Alexander	Lustige Blätter		Berlin	1890–1934
Naphtali, Fritz	Frankfurter Zeitung	Economics	Frankfort	1920–1930
Nathan, Paul	Die Nation	Politics	Berlin	1890–1927
Oppenheim, Bernhard	Jahrbücher für Politik	Politics	Berlin	1862–1880
Osborn, Max	Vossische Zeitung	Art	Berlin	1910–1933
Pinner, Felix	Berliner Tagblatt	Economics	Berlin	1915–1933
Pinthus, Kurt	8 Uhr Abendblatt	Literature	Berlin	1920–1933
Reiner, Max	Vossische Zeitung	Politics	Berlin	1923–1933
Rodenberg, Julius	Deutsche Rundschau	Politics	Berlin	1874–1914
Rundt, Arthur	Berliner Börsen-Courier	Travel	Berlin	1918–1933
Schloss, Justus	Deutsche Getreidezeitung	Economics	Berlin	1927–1933
Schwarzschild, Leopold	Tagebuch, Montag Morgen	Politics	Berlin	1918–1933
Sittenfeld, Konrad	Berliner Morgenpost	Politics	Berlin	1910–1925
Sonnemann, Leopold	Frankfurter Zeitung	Publishing	Frankfort	1856–1909
Stahl, Fritz	Berliner Tageblatt	Art	Berlin	1900–1928
Stampfer, Friedrich	Vorwärts	Politics	Berlin	1917–1933
Stern, Joachim	Metallbörse	Economics	Berlin	1920–1933
Stern, Louis	Frankfurter Zeitung	Economics	Frankfort	1871–1930
Stettenheim, Julius	Die Wespen	Literature	Berlin	1862–1894
Stolper, Gustav	Der Deutsche Volkswirt	Economics	Berlin	1920–1933
Strich, Fritz	Various papers	Literature	Bern	1920–1933
Tucholsky, Kurt	Weltbühne	Politics	Berlin	1918–1933
Ullstein, Leopold, and his five sons	Vossische Zeitung	Publishing	Berlin	1877–1935
	Berliner Morgenpost
	B.Z. am Mittag, and others

Name	Paper	Active in	City	Approximate time of Activity
		Germany—Continued
Wallenberg, Ernst	B.Z. am Mittag	Politics	Berlin	1903–1933
Weissmann, Adolf	Various papers	Music	Berlin	1910–1933
Wengraf, Richard	Westermanns Monatshefte	Special Features	Braunschweig	1910–1933
Wolff, Bernhard	W.T.B. (D.N.B.)	Politics	Berlin	1848–1879
Wolff, Max	B.Z. am Mittag	Politics	Berlin	1909–1925
Wolff, Theodor	Berliner Tageblatt	Politics	Berlin	1906–1933
		Hungary
Ágai, Adolf	Borsszem Jankó	Politics, Literature	Budapest	1870–1916
Biró, Lajos	Világ	Politics	Budapest	1910–1930
Boros, László	Esti Kurir	Politics	Budapest	1925–1940
Bródy, Zsigmond	Neues Pester Journal	Politics	Budapest	1870–1910
Deutsch, Antal	Pester Lloyd	Politics	Budapest	1870–1918
Einhorn, Ignatz	Die Thesis, Neuer Freier Lloyd		Budapest	1849, 1870
Falk, Miksa	Pester Lloyd	Politics	Budapest	1849–1905
Feleky, Géza	Világ	Literature, Politics	Budapest	1910–1926
Fényes, Samu	Uttörő and Diogenes	Literature	Budapest	1908–1918
Hatvany, Baron Lajos	Pesti Napló	Politics, Literature	Budapest	1900–1930
Hevesi, Lajos	Pester Lloyd	Literature	Budapest	1866–1885
Ignotus (Hugó Veigelsberg)	Nyugat, Világ	Literature	Budapest	1907–1938
Kecskeméti, György	Pester Lloyd	Politics	Budapest	1929–1942
Kóbor, Tamás	Ujság	Politics	Budapest	1890–1940
Kunfi, Zsigmond	Népszava	Politics	Budapest	1907–1919
Ludassy, Mór	Esti Lapok and Magyar Világ	Politics	Budapest	1849 and about 1869
Márkus, Miksa	Pesti Hirlap	Politics	Budapest	1891–1938
Miklós, Andor	Az Est	Politics	Budapest	1901–1933
Molnár, Ferenc	Various papers	Literature	Budapest	1910–1940
Neményi, Ambrus	Pesti Napló	Politics	Budapest	1880–1904
Purjesz, Lajos	Világ	Politics	Budapest	1910–1925
Silberstein-Ötvös, Adolf	Pester Lloyd	Politics	Budapest	1875–1899
Singer, Artur	Neues Budapester Abendblatt	Politics	Budapest	1900–1920
Singer, Sigmund	Pester Lloyd		Budapest	1906–1913
Szatmári, Mór	Egyetértés		Budapest	1881–1925
Veigelsberg, Leo	Pester Lloyd		Budapest	1872–1907
Vészi, József	Pester Lloyd	Politics	Budapest	1890–1940
Zsolt, Béla	Ujság	Politics	Budapest	1921–1940
		Italy
d'Ancona, Alessandro	Various papers	Literature	Pisa	1870–1914
Barzilai, Salvatore	Tribuna	Politics	Rome	1883–1893
Benedetti, Salvatore	La Vedetta	Politics	Novarra	1850–1890
		Latvia
Aronstam, Arved	Jaunakas Zinas	Politics	Riga	1925–1940
Ganfman, Michael	Sevoduja	Politics	Riga	1925–1940
		Lithuania
Valsonok, Rudolf	Various papers	Politics	Kaunas	1925–1940
Poljeski, Raphael	Various papers	Politics	Kaunas	1925–1940
Simon, Jakob	Memeler Beobachter	Politics	Memel	1925–1940
		The Netherlands
Blankenstein, Marcus van	Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant, Haagsche Post	Politics	Rotterdam	1906–1937
De Jong, Louis	Groene Amsterdamer	Politics	Amsterdam	?–1940
Elias, Eduard	Various papers	Politics, Columnist		1927–1939
Godschalk, Jacob	Telegraaf	Politics	Amsterdam	1919–1940
Mechanicus, Philip	Algemeen Handelsblad	Politics	Amsterdam
Oss, Salomon F. van	Haagsche Post	Director	The Hague	1914–1940
Person, Bernard	Haagsche Post	Politics	The Hague	1929–1938
Polak, Daniels Gerard	Vaderland	Politics	The Hague	1905–?
Spier, Jo	Telegraaf	Cartoons	Amsterdam	?–1940
Stoppelman, Joseph W. F.	Dutch Syndicate De Locomotief, Semarang Dutch East Indies	Correspondence	London and Paris	1924–1931
Vas Dias, Arnold	Telegraaf	Correspondence	Amsterdam	1926–1940
Vaz Dias, M. S.	Netherlands Press Agency	Director	Amsterdam	1926–1940
		Poland
Berkelhammer, Wilhelm	Nowy Dziennik	Politics	Cracow
Besterman, Wladislaw	Gazeta Polska	Politics	Warsaw
Feldmann, Wilhelm	Krytyka	Literature	Warsaw
Grydzewski, Mieczyslaw	Various papers	Literature	Warsaw
Kempner, Stanislaw	Nowa Gazeta	Politics	Warsaw
Perl, Joseph	Robotnik	Politics	Warsaw
Posner, Stanislaw	Robotnik	Politics	Warsaw
Rosner, Edward	Kurjer Polski	Politics	Warsaw
Schwarzbart, Ignatz	Nowy Dziennik	Politics	Cracow
Sokolow, Florjan	Gazeta Polksa	Politics	Warsaw
		Roumania
Branisteanu, B.	Adeverul and Diminiata	Politics	Bucharest
Brociner, Marco	Bukarester Tagblatt	Politics	Bucharest	1890–1935
Fagure, Emil D.	Lupta
Graur, Constantin	Adeverul and Dimineata	Politics	Bucharest	1920–1935
Hefter, Alfred	Arena and Lumea	Politics	Bucharest	1920–1935
Streitmann, H.	Politica	Politics	Bucharest

Name	Paper	Active in	City	Approximate Time of Activity
		Russia
Aichenwald	Russkiya Mysl, Rul	Literature	Moscow, Berlin	1905–1940
Dioneo (Shklovsky), Isaac	Russkiya Viedomosti	For. Correspondence	Moscow	1900–1935
Ganfman, Maxim	Ryetch and Sovremennoye Slovo	Politics	Leningrad	1906–1920
Hessen, Joseph	Pravo, Ryetch, Rul	Politics	Leningrad, Berlin	1900–1940
Hoffstetter	Nove Vrenya	Politics	Warsaw	1900–1917
Iollos	Russkiya Viedomosti	For. Correspondence	Moscow	1900–1907
Izgoeff, Alexandre	Ryetch	Politics	Leningrad	1900–1920
Jabotinsky, Vladimir	Odeskiya Novesti	Politics	Odessa	1897–1919
Kamenev, Leo	Various papers	Politics	Moscow	1910–1936
Kougel, Alexandre		Literature		1900–1920
Koulisher, Alexandre	Posliednia Novosti	Politics	Paris	1917–1941
Landau, Grigory	Rul	Politics	Berlin	1910–1933
Levinson, Andre	Ryetch, Posliednia Novosti	Literature	Leningrad, Paris	1900–1930
Nemanoff, Lev	Kievskaiya Mysl Ryetch Posledna Novosti	Politics	Kiev, Leningrad Paris	1905–
Notovitsh, Constantin	Novosti	Politics	Leningrad	1890–1905
Poliakoff-Litovtzeff, Salomon	Ryetch Rouuskoye Slovo	Politics	Leningrad Moscow	1902–1939
Portugeis, Semen	Posliedniya Novosti and Sovremennya Zapiski	Politics	Paris	1910–
Radek, Karl	Pravda and Izvestia	Politics	Moscow	1915–1930
Shklovsky, Victor	Various papers	Literature	Moscow	1918–19
Soloveitchik, Samson	Sovremennya Zapiski	Politics	Paris	1918–1940
Spoliansky, Aminad	Posledna Novosti	Literature	Paris	1918–1932
Stekloff (Nachamkes)	Izvestia and others	Politics	Odessa, Moscow	1900–
Trotsky, Leon	Kievskaiya Mysl Iskra	Politics	Kiev underground	1910–1940
Wengeroff, Semyon	Various papers	Literature	Moscow	1880–1920
Zasslavsky, David	Kievskajs Mysl, Izvestia	Politics	Kiev, Moscow	1905 on
		Sweden
Bonnier, Karl			Stockholm	1870–1900
Bonnier, Karl Otto			Stockholm	1914–1940
Lamm, Martin	Various papers	Literature	Stockholm	1910–1930
Levertin, Oscar	Various papers	Literature	Stockholm	1880–1906
Schück, J. H. E.	Various papers	Literature	Stockholm	1880–1930
Warburg, K. J.	Various papers	Literature	Stockholm	1890–1918

JOHN F. OPPENHEIMER.

Lit.: Graetz, Heinrich, Geschichte der Juden von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart (11 vols., 1853-75); Dubnow, Simon, Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes (10 vols., 1925-29); Lin, J., Die hebräische Presse (1928); Tietze, Hans, Die Juden Wiens (1933); Kastein, Josef, Eine Geschichte der Juden (1934); Elbogen, Ismar, Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland (1935); Gottheil, Richard, and Popper, William, in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, pp. 602-40; Bin Gorion, Emanuel, Loewenberg, Alfred, Neuburger, Otto, and Oppenheimer, John F., Philo-Lexikon (1937); Pan, E., General List of Jewish periodicals 1933-40 (1940); Jubilee issues of the C.-V.-Zeitung, Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums, Aug. 5, 1927 ("Unsere Mitarbeit an der deutschen Kultur"); May 2, 1937 ("Hundert Jahre Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums"); "One Hundred Years of Anglo-Jewish Journalism," American Hebrew, Sept. 12, 1941; "One Hundred Years of the Jewish Chronicle," Jewish Chronicle, Nov. 14, 1941; La colectividad israelita en la Argentina, a volume issued on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of El diario israelita (Buenos Aires), Nov. 15, 1940; Jüdisches Lexikon, vol. 4 (1930), cols. 1102-10.

2. The United States.

a. Scholarly Periodicals. When the first periodicals of Jewish interest in the United States appeared, in the 19th cent., the state of journalistic development throughout the world was such as to give almost all the publications a scholarly appearance. The diluted form of news and the preponderance of personal gossip was still far away. In 19th cent. American Jewish homes, as in 19th cent. homes everywhere, the kind of reading matter demanded was marked by solidity. Consequently, even The Occident and Jewish Advocate, a weekly which was founded in Philadelphia in 1843 by Isaac Leeser, and which published news of Jewish communities throughout the United States, could be classed as a scholarly periodical despite its reportorial accent. Mayer Sulzberger was the editor of the last volume of The Occident, which ceased publication in 1868. A journal calling itself by the same name appeared in Chicago for a short time in 1874, but did not have the literary quality of the original.

In the decades that followed the less scholarly type of publication made its appearance, and it was not until 1880 that a second journal of major literary intent was published: The Jewish Review (1880-82), a quarterly published in Cincinnati as the organ of the Rabbinical Literary Association of America. It was first under the editorship of Max Lilienthal, and then, when Lilienthal left to found The Rabbinical Review (Cincinnati, 1881-82), The Jewish Review was edited by Kaufmann Kohler. The New Era, a literary monthly published in New York in 1874 to 1875 by Raphael d'C. Lewin, was followed by several other periodicals using the same name in other cities, but which did not have the quality of the first. The Menorah, a monthly which appeared under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith from 1886 to 1902, bridged the centuries chronologically. It was first under the editorship of Benjamin Franklin Peixotto, and then of Moritz Ellinger. The Journal of Jewish Lore and Philosophy, founded at Cincinnati in 1919 by David Neumark, ceased publication later.

Well into the 20th cent., S. M. Melamed, from 1927 to 1930, published The Reflex, a monthly modeled after the secular semi-scholarly journals that divide their pages between analyses and exposés. Another short-lived periodical of this period was the Current Jewish Record, edited in 1931 to 1932 by Sidney Wallach. It was the forerunner of the Contemporary Jewish Record.

Among the periodicals still existing in 1942 it is hard to draw the line between the scholarly and the non-scholarly type. Reportorial journalism has made its inroads into almost all of them, but at the same time the journalism itself has assumed a somewhat dignified and authentic air in these publications. One of the newest was the Congress Weekly (1940-), published by the American Jewish Congress and edited by Samuel Caplan, with Menachem Boraisha as its editorial writer. It is a journal of reportage and analysis. The Contemporary Jewish Record, a monthly started by the American Jewish Committee in 1938, is a review of current events, well ramified statistically, and was in 1942 under the editorship of Allan Lesser. The Jewish Forum, founded in 1918 by Solomon T. H. Hurwitz, is a monthly publishing reviews and articles. In 1942 Isaac Rosengarten was its editor.

A journal of the specific scholarly type is Jewish Education, published three times a year in Philadelphia by the National Council for Jewish Education. It was founded in 1929, and in 1942 was edited by an editorial board headed by Leo Rosen. The Jewish Quarterly Review, originally published in England, began to appear in Philadelphia with its second series (1910). It was at first edited by Cyrus Adler and Solomon Schechter; its editors in 1942 were Abraham A. Neuman and Solomon Zeitlin. The Jewish Social Service Quarterly, founded in 1924, was edited by an editorial board. Jewish Social Studies, a quarterly published by the Conference on Jewish Relations, was founded in 1939 and edited by Salo W. Baron. The Journal of Jewish Bibliography, founded in 1938, was edited by Joshua Bloch. Historia Judaica, founded in 1939 by Guido Kisch, appears semi-annually, and is devoted especially to the legal and economic history of the Jews.

Of individual quality and superior standing, both in Jewish and secular circles in the United States and other countries, is the Menorah Journal, established in 1915 under the editorship of Henry Hurwitz. Published in conjunction with the activities of the Intercollegiate Menorah Association, the Menorah Journal is the outstanding periodical of Jewish literature and art in English. It was for a time a monthly magazine, but in 1942 was appearing as a quarterly.

Opinion, a monthly, was established in 1931 under the editorship of Stephen S. Wise. Wise was still its editor in 1942. It is a literary and publicistic magazine. The ORT Economic Review, a bi-monthly published by the ORT Economic Research Committee, was edited by Margaret T. Edelheim in 1942. The Reconstructionist, a bi-weekly established in 1930 by the Society for the Advancement of Judaism, was edited by Mordecai M. Kaplan. The newest addition to the list was the Jewish Mirror (1942), a monthly edited by M. J. Nuremberger.

LIBBY BENEDICT.

b. Other Periodicals. The early American periodicals of Jewish interest which stressed news rather than a scholarly viewpoint were largely short-lived attempts at meeting the complicated needs of the community. Some of them were published in German and English; later Yiddish and English were combined. This was exclusive of the periodicals that appeared entirely in German or, later, in Yiddish.

The Jew, a monthly which was issued in New York city in 1823 by Solomon H. Jackson, combatted missionary activity, during a span of existence that covered about two years. The Asmonean, founded by Robert Lyon in New York in 1849, was a weekly "family journal of commerce, politics, religion and literature." Before its disappearance in 1858 it had added occasional German supplements. The Israelite was founded in Cincinnati in 1854 by Isaac M. Wise. Less literary than Isaac Leeser's The Occident and Jewish Advocate, which had preceded it in Philadelphia by little more than a decade, The Israelite (which became The American Israelite in 1874) was in 1942 the oldest Jewish periodical in the United States. In San Francisco, a periodical appeared as early as 1855, with the founding of the Jewish Times and Observer, a weekly, edited by M. S. Levy and William Saalburg. It lasted into the 20th cent. The Jewish Messenger, a weekly established in New York city in 1857 by Samuel M. Isaacs, was absorbed by The American Hebrew in 1903. Another publication of the period which contained a German supplement was the Hebrew Leader, a weekly founded in New York in 1850, emphasizing Masonic news. In 1865 it took over the Jewish Record, published in New York from 1862 on by Abraham Cohen.

In the Middle West, St. Louis was the first city to have a Jewish periodical—The Jewish Sentinel, which appeared in 1868 and lasted but a short time. Young Israel, a monthly for Jewish children, first appeared in New York in 1871. The Jewish Advocate, founded in New York in 1879 by Raphael d'C Lewin, who had earlier edited the more literary New Era (1871-75), was a monthly which survived until 1886. During this period (1878-82) The Jewish Advance (in German and English) appeared as a weekly in Chicago. The American Hebrew made its first appearance in New York in 1879. A successor to the Hebrew Leader, the Hebrew Standard, was founded in New York in 1883, and lasted into the 20th cent. Outside of New York, the American Hebrew News, a weekly, was published in Portland, Ore., from 1892 to 1901, and the Jewish Home Journal in Ligonier, Ind., from 1896 to 1900. A woman's paper, The American Jewess, a quarterly edited by Rosa Sonnenschein, appeared in New York from 1895 to 1899; Helpful Thoughts, a monthly under the editorship of Julia Richman and Rebekah Kohut, was published between 1897 and 1903.

The 20th cent., when the first generation of immigrants from Russia began to show the results of Americanization, introduced a bevy of periodicals in the various cities of the country. Some were short-lived; others survive even in the 1940's. They developed a technique of spacious treatment for the social and communal life of the particular Jewish community which they served, with some handling of problems of a wider nature. At the same time, trade and occupational journals began to appear, many of them written in both English and Yiddish. Factional periodicals, representing political movements, also made their entry, such as The Maccabean, a Zionist monthly, which started publication in 1901. To aid the local periodicals in obtaining general news, a system of news syndicates sprang up. The first of these, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, was organized in 1918, providing a daily service. In 1924 it undertook also the publication of a daily small news sheet, the Jewish Daily Bulletin. In 1934 this became a full-size daily newspaper, but it lasted only throughout the year; thereafter the Agency continued its service to newspapers without trying to reach the lay public directly. Palcor News Agency, specializing in news centering around activity in Palestine, inaugurated its service in 1934. There were, in 1942, two syndicates furnishing special feature material to the Jewish periodicals throughout the country: the Independent Jewish Press Service and the Seven Arts Feature Syndicate.

A list of periodicals (arranged by states) published in the United States in English in 1942, and which had been in existence for at least twenty years, follows:

Name	City	Frequency	Year Founded
California
B'nai B'rith Messenger	Los Angeles	weekly	1897
California Jewish Voice	Los Angeles	weekly	1922
Emanu-El and the Jewish Journal	San Francisco	weekly	1895
Southwestern Jewish Review	San Diego	weekly	1914
Colorado
Intermountain Jewish News	Denver	weekly	1914
District of Columbia
National Jewish Monthly (formerly B'nai B'rith Magazine)	Washington	monthly	1886
New Palestine	Washington	weekly	1921
Illinois
Advocate Magazine	Chicago	weekly	1891
Chicago Israelite	Chicago	weekly	1886
Chicago Jewish Chronicle	Chicago	weekly	1918
The Sentinel	Chicago	weekly	1911
Indiana
Indiana Jewish Chronicle	Indianapolis	weekly	1921
Kentucky
Kentucky Jewish Chronicle	Louisville	monthly	1913
Louisiana
Jewish Ledger	New Orleans	weekly	1895
Maryland
Jewish Times	Baltimore	weekly	1919
Massachusetts
Jewish Advocate	Boston	weekly	1900
Michigan
Detroit Jewish Chronicle	Detroit	weekly	1915
Minnesota
American Jewish World	Minneapolis	weekly	1912
Missouri
Jewish Record (Yiddish and English)	St. Louis	weekly	1913
Kansas City Jewish Chronicle	Kansas City	weekly	1920
The Modern View	St. Louis	weekly	1900
Nebraska
Jewish Press	Omaha	weekly	1919
New Jersey
Jewish Chronicle	Newark	weekly	1921
New York
Buffalo Jewish Review	Buffalo	weekly	1917
Alliance Voice Monthly	New York	monthly	1913
American Hebrew and Jewish Tribune	New York	weekly	1879
Hadassah Newsletter	New York	monthly	1914
Jewish Center	New York	quarterly	1922
Jewish Farmer (Yiddish and English)	New York	monthly	1908
Jewish Forum	New York	monthly	1918
The Leader	New York	monthly	1911
Menorah Journal	New York	quarterly	1915
Young Judean	New York	monthly	1911
Ohio
American Israelite	Cincinnati	weekly	1854
Hebrew Union College Monthly	Cincinnati	monthly	1913
Jewish Daily World (Yiddish and English)	Cleveland	daily	1907
Jewish Review and Observer	Cleveland	weekly	1888
Ohio Jewish Chronicle	Columbus	weekly	1921
Toledo Jewish Times	Toledo	bi-monthly	1920
Oregon
The Scribe	Portland	weekly	1903

Name	City	Frequency	Year Founded
Pennsylvania
Jewish Criterion	Pittsburgh	weekly	1899
Jewish Exponent	Philadelphia	weekly	1887
Jewish Quarterly Review	Philadelphia	quarterly	1910
Jewish Voice	Reading	monthly	1922
Jewish World (Yiddish and English)	Philadelphia	weekly	1914
Texas
Jewish Herald-Voice	Houston	weekly	1906
Wisconsin
Milwaukee Jewish Press (Yiddish and English)	Milwaukee	weekly	1906
Wisconsin Jewish Chronicle	Milwaukee	weekly	1921

c. The Yiddish Press. The history of the beginning, the expansion and the contraction of the Yiddish press in the United States between 1880 and the 1940's is the history of an epoch in Jewish life. Attempts to publish periodicals in the vernaculars used by the immigrants from the Eastern European countries were made even before 1880. Henry Gersoni founded Die Jüdische Post in New York city in 1872, and Kasriel H. Sarasohn founded Die New Yorker Yiddishe Tzeitung the same year. Both were weeklies, and both suspended publication within a few months. The Israelitische Presse (Chicago, 1879) was also short-lived. Sarasohn, however, who was to become a successful pioneer in the Yiddish press in America, started to publish Die Yiddishe Gazetten in 1874. The reception for this new venture was better, and as the Yiddish-speaking population of the country was augmented by new arrivals, Sarasohn undertook the publication of a Yiddish daily. Established in New York in 1885, the Yiddishes Tageblatt seems to have been the first daily published in Yiddish anywhere in the world. Serving the Yiddish-speaking populations at a time when an Eastern European origin was synonymous with Orthodoxy, the Tageblatt represented an ultra-Conservative and Orthodox attitude. Die Yiddishe Gazetten continued to be a weekly supplement of the Tageblatt for several years. The second daily in Yiddish was the Vorwaerts, or Jewish Daily Forward. Established in 1897, it became, under the editorship of Abraham Cahan, the most stabilized Yiddish newspaper in the country. The Forward represented organized labor, and therefore espoused the Socialist point of view. When, after the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, there was a cleavage in the Socialist Party, the Forward identified itself with the right-wing, anti-Communist faction. Eventually it adopted a Zionist point of view as well, and thus renounced affiliations with the Socialist Bund, which remained truculently anti-Zionist. A morning newspaper in Yiddish, the Yiddisher Morgen Journal, or Jewish Morning Journal, was established in 1901 by Jacob Saphirstein. It represented Orthodox, Conservative elements. Until almost the end of the third decade of the 20th cent. the Yiddish-speaking population of the country was able to support both a morning and afternoon Yiddish paper which fostered the Orthodox point of view. Then, however, the shrinkage in immigration made itself sufficiently felt to require the consolidation of the Tageblatt and the Morning Journal. They combined in 1928, and appeared as a morning newspaper, the Morning Journal.

Although the Forward, and for short periods one or more of the other papers, published editions in Chicago and Philadelphia, the New York editions of the papers largely satisfied the needs of the Yiddish-speaking population throughout the whole country. This resulted, from the very beginning, in a distinctive type of publication. The Yiddish newspapers were eventually to be supplemented by various literary and other specialized journals, but the basic need for reading matter outside of simple news nevertheless had to be included in the daily press. Yiddish daily papers all had much of the quality exhibited by only the Sunday supplements to English newspapers, and went even beyond that. Articles on literature, economics, sociology and history were included on the inside pages of the newspapers every day, and these features remained part of the daily Yiddish press even when the circulation began to dwindle as the result of curtailed immigration.

Der Teglicher Herold, which had been founded in New York in 1891 by Michael Mintz, was incorporated into the newly established Wahrheit in 1905; the Wahrheit, in turn, was absorbed into the Tog (The Day), founded by Herman Bernstein in 1914, in 1917. The Wahrheit had been edited by Louis E. Miller, who had broken with Abraham Cahan of the Forward. In 1915 Miller established the Fihrer, which lived but a short time. Other temporary undertakings resulted in the publication of the Haint (1919) and Die Zeit (1920-22). Surviving Yiddish dailies in 1942 were the Morning Journal, the Day, the Forward, and the Freiheit, a morning newspaper, established in 1922 under the editorship of Moissaye Olgin. The four newspapers may be said to represent four factions in Jewish life, and to be connected with the same factions in general political life. The Morning Journal remains Orthodox-Zionist and usually Republican in political affiliation, the Day is nationalist-Zionist and usually Democratic, the Forward is Socialist-Zionist and Socialist, the Freiheit Communist. Several Yiddish dailies or weeklies were published in other cities.

Specialized publications in Yiddish, dealing with literature and politics, made their appearance almost as soon as newspapers. In 1880 there was an attempt at a humorous weekly, Der Grosse Baitch. Die Neie Tzeit was a literary weekly established in New York in 1886; Abraham Cahan was one of its editors. From 1889 to 1891 a literary weekly called Der Menshenfreund was published in New York. Political movements of the period were reflected in Die Freie Gesellshaft, an anarchist monthly edited in New York from 1895 to 1902 by M. Leontiev and M. Katz; another anarchist publication, the Freie Arbeiter Shtimme, appeared in 1899. It was still being published in 1942, but had passed over from its original anarchist alignment to a generally socialist point of view. Die Tzukunft, a literary monthly, made its first appearance in 1892, and although its career was subsequently interrupted by several breaks, it was again appearing in 1942. Another journal of literary and political content was Der Yiddisher Kempfer, a labor Zionist weekly (founded 1905). Der Groisser Kundes, a humorous weekly, was edited by Jacob Marinoff (1909-27).

Yiddish periodicals in the United States which had been in existence for more than twenty years in 1942 were:

Name	City	Frequency	Year Founded
Daily Jewish Courier	Chicago	daily	1887
Jewish Leader (Vegveiser)	Pittsburgh	weekly	1887
Tzukunft	New York	monthly	1892
Jewish Daily Forward	New York and Chicago	daily	1897
Freie Arbeiter Shtimme	New York	weekly	1899
Jewish American Family Magazine	New York	weekly	1901
Jewish Morning Journal	New York	daily	1901
Der Yiddisher Kempfer	New York	weekly	1905
Friend	New York	monthly	1910
Dos Yiddishe Folk	New York	bi-weekly	1910
The Day	New York	daily	1914
Kinder Journal	New York	monthly	1920
Der Veker	New York	monthly	1921
Morning Freiheit	New York	daily	1922

d. Hebrew Periodicals. Hebrew culture preceded the Yiddish vernacular into the new world, and in 1870 a Hebrew weekly, Hatzofeh Baaretz Hahadashah, made its appearance in New York under the editorship of Mordecai ben David Jalomstein. It survived until 1876. An organ of the Chovevei Zion movement, Haleumi, appeared for a short time as a weekly in 1888 to 1889. From 1892 to 1902 the weekly Haibri appeared in New York. Hayim Enowitz made several attempts to publish a Hebrew periodical:

Name	City	Frequency	Year Founded
Bitzaron	New York	monthly	1939
Hadoar	New York	weekly	1921
(Hadoar Lanoar, children's supplement)		bi-weekly	1935
Hapardes	Chicago	monthly	1927
Hamigdal (Hebrew and English)	Brooklyn	monthly	1940
Hamesillah (Hebrew and Yiddish)	New York	monthly	1936
Harofe Haibri	New York	semi-annual	1927
Niv	New York	monthly	1936
Ramah	New York	monthly	1937
Shebile Hahinnuch	New York	quarterly	1936

Haemeth (1894-95), Hazeman (1895-96) and Hadaath (1896). The Hatoren, a literary monthly, appeared from 1913 to 1925. A Hebrew daily, Hayom, was founded in 1909, but survived only a few months. Hadoar, a Zionist and literary weekly, established in 1921, was the oldest Hebrew periodical appearing in the United States in 1942.

e. Periodicals Published in Other Languages. In addition to the various early periodicals which had to combine German and English in order to attract the immigrants of the middle 19th cent., most of whom had come from German countries, there were a few attempts to publish journals exclusively in German. The most successful of these was Die Deborah, founded by Isaac M. Wise as a weekly in Cincinnati in 1855. Subsequently it became a monthly. It survived until 1903. Sinai, a monthly in German and English, appeared in Baltimore from 1856 to 1862. From 1880 to 1882 Die Zeitgeist, a monthly representing the Reform Movement, was published in Milwaukee. A weekly, Der Jude, appeared for a short time in New York in 1887, and another, of the same name, in 1895.

The resumption of immigration from Germany after 1933 resulted in the founding of the Aufbau, a weekly, in New York in 1934. It also incorporated several English pages. The Way in America (Neues jüdisches Gemeindeblatt), a bi-weekly, made its appearance in New York in 1938. Both periodicals were appearing in 1942.

La Vara, a weekly in Ladino, was founded in New York in 1922, and still appeared in 1942. LIBBY BENEDICT.

Lit.: Soltes, Mordecai, The Yiddish Press, An Americanizing Agency (1925; previously printed in the American Jewish Year Book, vol. 26, 1924-25, pp. 165-372); Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, pp. 616-39; Zitron, Geschichte der jüdischen Presse; American Jewish Year Book, 5660 to 5703 (lists of Jewish periodicals appearing in the United States); Lin, J., Die hebräische Presse, Werdegang und Entwicklungstendenzen (1928).

f. Jews in Journalism. The participation of Jews in American journalism began simultaneously with the inception of American journalism. From New York to the South, and finally to the Far West, there were Jews who aided in establishing and editing the first newspapers, though some of the papers were published in German, to fill the needs of the immigrant population. Among the most important early American journalists was Mordecai M. Noah.

Later, as the Jewish population of the country increased, and as the Fourth Estate moved into its 20th cent. prominence, Jews were active in all branches of journalism: reporting, foreign correspondence, feature writing, editing and publishing. Herman Bernstein achieved renown as a war correspondent during the first World War, as did also Isaac Don Levine and Elias Tobenkin. Isaac F. Marcosson passed from newspaper and magazine editing to special foreign correspondence. Later Eugene Lyons wrote for the United Press from Russia, and Joseph M. Levy was the New York Times correspondent in the Near East. Among those who were especially active as national reporters were Arthur Krock, David Lawrence, Charles Michelson (who became publicity director of the National Democratic Party) and Frederick W. Wile. A local reporter whose work brought unusual commendation was Meyer Levin, who covered the oddities of New York city for the New York Times.

The list of special feature writers contains many Jewish names. Benjamin DeCasseres was a regular column contributor to the Hearst press for many years. The brothers Gilbert and George Seldes shared critical writing and political reporting. Walter Winchell as a gossip columnist became a national figure, and Louis Sobel was well-known. Alan Dale (Alfred J. Cohn) was a dramatic critic, as was Gilbert Gabriel. Simeon Strunsky, once editor of the New York Post, later joined the staff of the New York Times, where he wrote a daily column, "Topics of the Times." Editor of a column called "The Conning Tower," which was of a peripatetic nature and moved from newspaper to newspaper, Franklin P. Adams, known as F. P. A., is one of the wittiest columnists of the country. H. I. Phillips, who remained affiliated with the New York Sun after the demise of the Globe, was another daily columnist. Samuel Grafton, author of a regular political commentary for the New York Post, was one of those to become prominent just before the outbreak of the second World War. Walter Lippmann, of the New York Herald Tribune, is a nationally known writer.

In supervisory and editorial work, there have been many Jews. Louis Weitzenkorn was Sunday editor of the New York World while Herbert Bayard Swope was its editor. Lester Markel was for many years Sunday editor of the New York Times. Fabian Franklin was editor of the Baltimore News until 1908; then, until 1914, he was connected with the New York Evening Post. Aaron J. Benesch was managing editor of the St. Louis Times.

Among newspaper executives were Louis Wiley, long the business manager of the New York Times, and Edwin S. Friendly, who held the same position with the New York Sun. Joseph Pulitzer, who published the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and the New York World, and Adolph S. Ochs, who became the publisher of the New York Times, were two of the most important figures in the development of modern American journalism. Cyrus L. Sulzberger, who later took over the Times, continued the standards which Ochs had set, and was succeeded by his son, Arthur Hays Sulzberger, who was still its publisher in 1942. Eugene Meyer was, in 1942, publisher of the Washington Post. Arthur D. Marks was for a time publisher of the Baltimore American. A newer addition to the list of publishers was George Backer, who issued the New York Post; he was followed by his wife, Dorothy Schiff Backer. Paul Block was the publisher of several newspapers in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Ohio. J. David Stern was publisher of the New York Post (1933-39), Philadelphia Record and other Eastern newspapers. Samuel I. Newhouse, of Newark, N. J., was publisher of the Newark Star Ledger, the Long Island Press and the Staten Island Advance. From 1898 to 1938, with a brief interruption, Victor Henry Polachek was associated with the Hearst newspapers as reporter, editor, publisher and major executive.

In newspaper syndicates there have been numerous Jews, both as writers and owners. Emanuel P. Adler was the president of the Lee Newspaper Syndicate, and Moses Koenigsberg was the head of the International News Service and affiliated services. NATHAN RICARDO.

3. Canada. Canada in 1942 had two Yiddish dailies; the Jewish Daily Eagle, founded in Montreal in 1907, and the Jewish Journal, founded in Toronto in 1938. The Winnipeg Israelite Press (1910) was founded as a daily, but later became a semi-weekly.

The first Jewish periodical in Canada to last any length of time was the Montreal Jewish Times, established in 1897, and lasting until 1914. In 1915 the Canadian Jewish Chronicle, which was virtually a continuation of the earlier paper, was established, and in 1942 it was appearing as a weekly. The Canadian Jewish Review, also published in Montreal, was established in 1921. Other periodicals in the country were the Western Jewish News, founded in 1926 in Winnipeg; the Jewish Post (Winnipeg); the Jewish Western Bulletin (Vancouver); and the Standard (Toronto).

4. Central and South America, and the West Indies. During the hundred year-old history of the Jewish press in these areas (the last fifty years are of the greater importance), approximately 300 publications were published. The Jewish press is of the greatest importance in the ABC countries (Argentina, Brazil and Chile, especially Argentina), and, after an interval, in Mexico and Uruguay.

In spite of the short period in question, there have been four periods of development. The first began about 1845 in the West Indies, the second brought about the establishment of the Yiddish press in Argentina about 1895, the third was responsible for the appearance of Jewish publications in the Spanish and Portuguese languages after the first World War (about 1920), and the fourth period was caused by the publication of newspapers and periodicals in German and the national language of the country of publication after the exodus of refugees from Nazi Europe.

WEST INDIES. The immigration of Jews from Eastern Europe and the Levantine countries in the middle of the 19th cent. brought about the first known establishment of Jewish publications. M. N. Nathan and Levi Aschenheim published a scientific monthly, First Fruits of the West, in the English language in Kingston, Jamaica, in 1844. Twenty years later Raphael d'C. Lewin established at the same place another English-language monthly of Jewish literary leanings, The Guide. About the same time, E. Beneveniste's Schema Jisrael appeared in Curaçao (1864-65). These three publications as well as several others enjoyed but a short life. During the 20th cent. a few Jewish publications appeared in Cuba. Oifgang was a Yiddish literary weekly about 1927; El Mundo Hebreo, a Yiddish bi-weekly, appeared in 1934; La Vida Habanera was published thrice weekly from 1931 on; Jüdische Rundschau was a German-language weekly for German immigrants from 1938 on. All these publications are in Havana. In 1942 the newly established community of Sosua, Dominican Republic, began publishing a regular information sheet.

ARGENTINA. The Yiddish press in Argentina, and thus in South America, began in 1898; during the forty-five years of its existence this press produced more than 130 publications (100 in Yiddish). Among them there were about forty monthlies, fifteen bi-weeklies, fifty weeklies, six dailies and twenty irregular publications. The overwhelming majority were in the past (and still in 1942) published in Buenos Aires. But in Avellaneda, Cordoba, Parana, Rosario, Salta and Santa Fe, also, appeared Jewish publications. Every branch of the press was represented: political dailies; periodicals serving the various religious and political directions of Jewry; publications serving the colonists (Yiddishe Colonizatzion, 1909-12; Kolonist Kooperator, 1917-19); humorous publications (Humor und Ernst, 1926; Der Mazik, 1919; Poenimer un Poenimlach, 1923); professional publications (Mein Doktor, 1933; Mein Shul Jawer, 1931); trade publications (Yiddishe Handelsvoch, 1924; La Semana Comercial, 1925, edited by B. Schekhter and B. Olschansky); literary publications (S. Rollansky's Zeglen, 1924; the monthly Die Penn, 1925; the monthlies Dorem Amerika, edited by S. Blostein, 1926, and Oifgang, 1927); theatrical publications (Der Aktior; Die Voch, a weekly, 1926; Teatro, 1929 [still published in 1942]); youth publications (Pioner, a monthly, 1927; Renacimiento, 1928; Kindervelt, 1935).

The first Jewish newspaper in Argentina was Michael A. Sinai's Der Viderhall (Echo), of which, however, only three issues appeared in 1898. The weekly Der Yiddishe Phonograph (edited by S. Halevi) appeared for about a year. Really successful was Abraham Vermont, whose Folksstimme was published weekly between 1898 and 1914. About 1900 the first Spanish-language Jewish newspapers appeared in Buenos Aires, also a larger number of Yiddish publications throughout the country. They did not survive.

On December 4, 1906, Fué M. Polak published the first issue of a Yiddish daily in Argentina, entitled Dos Yiddishe Leben. But at the end of that year Polak was forced to stop publication. Five other dailies followed, of which three still existed in 1942. J. S. Liachovitzki—later editor of El Diario Israelita—started the Argentiner Tog in 1913 (it was discontinued in 1916). M. Stolier established (1914) the liberal Yiddishe Tzeitung (furthering the reconstruction of Palestine), and beginning with that same year El Diario Israelita was published (under the editorship of Liachovitzki, Leon Maas and Jose Mendelson). P. Katz, J. Botoschansky, S. Freilaj, R. Wald and N. Frujter published the leftist Die Presse from 1918 on. B. Vainstock, W. Bresler, N. Zucker and N. Safoschnikoff founded the short-lived Morgentzeitung (1936).

The following publications also appear worthy of mention: Pedro Springberg's and E. Edelsohn's Leben un Freihait (1908); Die Yiddishe Hoffnung appeared first as a monthly, then bi-weekly, finally as a weekly from 1908 through 1917. S. Kaplansky and P. Wald issued a workers' publication, Der Avantgard, from 1918 to 1920. The monthly Die Naie Tzeit (1919) and the weekly Dos Arbeitervort (1924) were organs of the Poale Zion, while Der Rote Shtern (1926) and Rote Fahne (1926) were communist publications. Unzer Gedank (a monthly, 1925) was the organ of the Histadruth. A socialist paper, Naiwelt, appeared in 1927, and I. Z. Gruzman's weekly Der Spiegel was successful (1929).

The most important Spanish-language newspaper in 1942 was Mundo Israelita, published from 1906 on. Israel was a Spanish-Zionist magazine (1911-17). Another Spanish-language publication in 1942 was Semenario Hebreo, a weekly appearing from 1925 on. The Jüdische Wochenschau (La Semana Israelita), published in German and Spanish from 1939 on, was edited by Hardi Swarsenski and Günther Friedländer, who came from Germany.

BRAZIL. Brazil's Jewish press is about twenty years old. During this time about twenty publications made their appearance, about evenly divided between Yiddish and Portuguese, and some bilingual. The new press law which, from 1940, made it mandatory for all publications in Brazil to appear in Portuguese exclusively, put an end to the Yiddish press for the time being. Dos Naie Vort was a literary monthly, published bi-weekly in Rio de Janeiro. The Brazilianer Yiddishe Press appeared semi-weekly in Rio from 1923, as did the Yiddishe Volkstzeitung (1927-37). The weekly Unzer Leben appeared weekly from 1927 on, and the Folks Tribuna from 1933 on. In São Paulo Imprensa Israelita appeared in Yiddish from 1929, and A Noticia was published as a Portuguese-language paper and the organ of the Sociedad Israelita Paulista, Cronica Israelita (first in German and Portuguese, and from 1940 only in Portuguese). Its editor was Alfred Hirschberg, formerly of Berlin. These two were São Paulo's greatest publications (1942).

CHILE has had a Jewish press since 1920. All publications appeared (1942) in Santiago. La Patria Israelita was a Zionist bi-weekly from 1920, as was Israel, which began publication in 1925. Spanish-language papers were the monthlies El Mundo Israelita (1936), Nosotros (1926), and the weekly Mundo Judaica (1934). Of the Yiddish press, Unzer Leben was a short-lived publication (1926); the monthly Pacifik (1929) lasted ten years; the magazine Sid-Amerika (1934), a monthly, lasted a few months; and Nuestra Vida, a weekly, was also short-lived. Die Yiddishe Press appeared from 1931 as a weekly, in 1942 as a daily.

MEXICO produced about ten publications from 1926 on, most of them in Yiddish: Mexikaner Yiddish Leben (1927); Der Veg thrice weekly (about 1926); El Camino, Mexico's most important Jewish paper, semi-weekly from 1929; Mexikaner Shriften (from 1935); Die Zeit (from 1936). Among the Jewish Spanish-language papers were or are: Union Progresso; Tribuna Israelita (bi-weekly from 1935); Tribuna Sionista (from 1930).

PERU. There were, in 1942, three papers in Peru worthy of mention: Repertorio Hebreo, a monthly (1929); Nosotros (from 1930); and the Yiddish Peruaner Yiddishe Tzeitung (from 1935). All these were published in Lima.

URUGUAY. There were about ten Jewish papers in Uruguay in 1942, all of which appeared in Montevideo. The following were Yiddish-language publications: the dailies Die Yiddishe Tzeitung (from 1919); Folksblat (1930); Unzer Freint (1935); the weekly Unzer Leben (1926); the monthly Voz Nacional Israelita (from 1928). In the Spanish language appeared Decimos (1934) and Tribuna (1934). El Tiempo was bilingual (German and Spanish). It was established by German Jewish emigrants in 1936, and appeared regularly thereafter.

Lit.: La colectividad israelita en la Argentina, a volume published on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of El diario israelita (Buenos Aires), November 15, 1940.

5. Africa. The Jewish press in the Mediterranean area is closely related to the development of the Jewish press in Europe. Asia Minor and the coast of North Africa have a century-old tradition. Different, however, is the tradition of the Jewish press in South Africa, India and Australia. In the entire territory, with the exception of Palestine, there appeared about 200 newspapers and periodicals during the course of about a hundred years. Of these about fifty still existed in 1942 (thirty in Africa, ten in Asia, and ten in Australia and New Zealand).

Refugees from the Spanish Inquisition found a haven on the north coast of Africa. But not from there, but from Egypt, came the news of the first Jewish newspaper in the Black Continent. Israel Back published the monthly Al Chakik in the Arabic language from 1863 to 1864 in Alexandria. Fraj Mizrahi renewed publication of this paper twenty-six years later (1890-1902). This was a national Jewish and scientific paper. Al Frach was another Arabic monthly following a national Jewish tendency about 1900; the place of publication was also Alexandria.

The publications mentioned below were, or still are, published in Cairo. Isaac Karmone published the bilingual (Spanish-Arabic) weekly Al Mizraim about 1903. Die Tzeit (1907-8) was Africa's first Yiddish paper; it served Zionist tendencies. Growing French influence led to the appearance of the Zionist weekly L'Aurore about 1910, and another Zionist monthly, La renaissance juive, about 1912. The following Cairo publications were also published: the monthlies Le réveil and Kadima; the scientific quarterly L'illustration juive, still in existence in 1942 (published in Alexandria from 1929). The most important paper in 1942 was the weekly La tribune juive, which from 1919 to 1938 was published under the masthead of Israel; it was a bilingual (Spanish and Arabic) organ. The Hebrew weekly Hadashoth Mehaaretz (1918-19) and the Arabic weekly Ash Shams (from 1933 on) may also be mentioned.

R. Farchi published the Arabic-language Mubashir in Tunisia in 1884; it was followed five years later by Uzam's and Castro's Al Bustan. A weekly in the French language, La justice, made its appearance in 1914; L'avenir sioniste was a semi-monthly, and there was a weekly, Le réveil juif, in Sfax. In Tripoli appeared the Arabic-language Degel Tziyyon and Lunario ebraico. The Jewish press is better developed in Algiers: the Arabic-language weekly Kol Yisrael (about 1882); a Reform journal, Vigio israélite, appeared weekly in French and Arabic (1885-93); the semi-monthly L'israélite algérien in French. All these Algiers papers were published in Oran. La vérité was published for a time in Constantine. In Algiers itself there appeared in 1942 (from 1933 on) the monthly Bulletin de la Fédération des Sociétés Juives. Morocco added three papers to the above list of North African Jewish publications: Renacimiento was a Spanish-language weekly in Tangier; L'union maroccaine (from 1931 on) appeared semi-monthly in Casablanca (French-language paper); the monthly L'avenir illustré (from 1925 on), also published in Casablanca.

The Jewish press in the Union of South Africa, which is barely fifty years old, is concentrated in Johannesburg. Of about twenty-five Jewish papers in South Africa, about twenty were or are published there. Three are published in Cape Town, two in Durban and one in Pretoria. Der Afrikaner Israelit was a Yiddish weekly about 1890, when the English-language Jewish Star also appeared. The semi-weekly English-language The Light (Cape Town) made its appearance five years later, and The South African Jewish Chronicle (still in existence in 1942) was added to the list in 1902. The Jewish Advocate was a weekly in 1904; The Zionist Record is a Zionist monthly appearing in Durban from 1908 on; Ha-Sholom is a monthly in Durban from 1923; the Yiddish Jewish Opinion from 1924; the monthly The South African Menorah from 1926; Dorem Afrika is a Yiddish literary publication from 1928; The Jew is a scientific English-language quarterly in Pretoria. Among the Yiddish weeklies the following are worthy of mention: The African Jewish Newspaper (from 1930); The Jewish Express (from 1934); The Jewish Herald (formerly 11th Hour), the organ of the New Zionist Organization from 1936; also the monthlies Barkai (from 1933) and Jeshurun (from 1937); finally, The South African Jewish Standard in Durban and The South African Jewish Times, a weekly, from 1935.

Altogether about a hundred Jewish newspapers and periodicals appeared in Africa during the past hundred years. In 1942 there were about 25 papers in Alexandria, Cairo, Algiers, Casablanca, Johannesburg and Cape Town.

6. Asia. Smyrna, with its large Jewish population, is the cradle of Asia's Jewish press, a special branch of which is that of Palestine. Uzziel Pincherle published the Spanish-language Puerto del oriente in 1846 in Ladino; here, too, almost forty years later, appeared La verdad (1884), published by Bachor Ghaiyat, David ibn Esra and Raphael Cosi. Moses Fresco published the Turkish-language Ustadh from 1889 to 1891, while Leon Tedeschi and Gad Franco published the French and Spanish scientific weekly El novelista about 1890. Alexander ibn Ghaiyat founded the Spanish-Turkish monthly El Messaret in 1897; Al-Alam al Israili was a Zionist organ appearing twice monthly in Arabic in Beirut; L'univers israélite, a French monthly, appeared in Beirut.

In China appeared the Zionist monthly Israel's Messenger (Shanghai, 1904) and the Zionist weekly The Jewish Call, also in Shanghai. German refugees published a German-language weekly from 1935 to 1941. Tientsin was the place of publication of L'Ureiskaya Starina (1933-40).

In Japan appeared (about 1905) the Russian-language Zionist weekly Yevreiskaya Shisn. In Harbin, Manchuria, two papers were published in 1942: Hadegel, a semi-monthly from 1931, and the Yiddish Evreiskaya Lhivn, a literary weekly from 1921. In Iran: Shalom (Teheran, 1915). In Lawang, Dutch East Indies, the monthly Eretz Israel.

About fifteen papers are known to appear or to have appeared in India (Calcutta and Bombay). Tulb at Kir, an Arabic-language paper, appeared as early as 1855 in Bombay. Lamp of Judaism and the organ of the Beni Israel, Light of Truth (1877-82), appeared in the Indian dialect Mahrati; the latter's successor in 1894 was Bene Israelite; A. Reuben published a monthly, Friend of Israel, about 1898, and the B'nai B'rith published the monthly The Bene Israel Review from 1926; the Zionist Organization published the Jewish Advocate, a monthly, from 1929. In Calcutta, Perah and The Jewish Gazette came out about 1875; the Zionist organ Voice of Sinai appeared twice monthly from 1904 on in the English language; and The Jewish Tribune was published monthly from 1929 on. Of fifty Jewish papers, only five were still published in 1942.

7. Australia and New Zealand. Australia produced about twenty-five Jewish publications, of which about ten were still published (1942) in Melbourne, Perth and Sydney. The Voice of Jacob was founded by George Moss in 1842 in Sydney. The Australian Jewish Chronicle appeared in Melbourne from 1861 to 1869, and again appeared there from 1922; S. Joseph's The Australian Israelite was published for more than ten years (1870-82) in Melbourne; there also appeared for a short time Nahum Barnat ben Isaac Doob's Colonial Jewish Monthly (1874). The Dialectic, a monthly (1875), was also short-lived. The Australian Jewish Herald appeared at intervals from 1884 on in Melbourne and Sydney; The Hebrew Standard of Australia appeared from 1894 on in Sydney, and The Australian Hebrew (founded in 1895 by Jacob Goldstein of Sydney) in Melbourne; The Westralian Judaean, a monthly, appeared in Perth from 1929, and the Sydney Jewish News from 1938; The Progressive Outlook was a monthly in Melbourne from 1931; The Australian Jewish News was a weekly in Melbourne from 1934. Journal and Proceedings was published irregularly from 1939 by the Jewish Historical Society in Sydney.

In New Zealand, the Zionist monthly The Jewish Times was published at Wellington from 1931.

JOHN F. OPPENHEIMER.

8. Palestine. The history of Jewish periodicals and press in Palestine began shortly after the end of the first half of the 19th cent. The first periodical appears to have been the literary annual Minhah Hadashah, published at Jerusalem in 1856 by Albert Cohn. At that time Jerusalem was the main center of Jewish population and activity; hence the early Jewish periodicals which commenced publication from 1863 on all appeared at Jerusalem, with the exception of Der Anfang, Moledeth, Haadamah and Maabaroth, which were published at Jaffa. Their number increased greatly in the decade from 1871 to 1880, and still more during the period from 1880 to 1900, at which time a considerable number of newspapers made their appearance.

Among the earliest Hebrew periodicals and newspapers formerly published in the Holy Land for longer or shorter periods, but which failed to survive, were: Halebanon (1863-86, twice a week; Conservative); Hahabatzeleth (1869-1901; editor, Israel Frumkin; extreme Orthodox; twice weekly up to 1877, and thereafter weekly; from 1883 on it had a Hebrew supplement called Mebassereth Tziyyon); Haariel (Jerusalem, 1870-80; a literary monthly edited by Michael Kohen and A. Sussmann); Hatzebi (1876-1900; Chovevei Zion literary weekly edited by Eliezer ben Jehudah, and published from 1876 to 1900; from 1908 to 1912 it resumed publication under the title of Hashkafah); Hamisderonah (a rabbinic monthly published at Jerusalem from 1886 to 1887); Beth Yaakob (1892-93; a Chovevei Zion weekly). From 1889 to 1893 Eliezer ben Jehudah published at Jerusalem the moderately Reform Hebrew weekly Haor. During the period from 1881 to 1900 the two most important periodicals founded in Palestine were the scientific annual Yerushalayim, published in Jerusalem from 1882 on by Abraham Moses Luncz, and dealing especially with history and archeology (from 1895 on Luncz published at Jerusalem also the literary Hebrew annual Luah Eretz Yisrael); and Torah Mitziyyon, devoted to rabbinic subjects, and published under the editorship of Samuel Zuckermann from 1886 to 1887 and from 1896 to 1899. Other important periodicals of the later period included the agricultural quarterly Haikkar, published from 1894 to 1896 in the colony of Rishon Le Zion; the literary and scholarly Hebrew Zionist monthly Hashiloah, published at Jerusalem from 1896 to 1925 (it had formerly been published at Odessa, Russia); the Zionist daily Haheruth (1908-16); the Orthodox daily Moriah (1909-15); the Poale Zion weekly Haahduth (1909-15); the educational bi-monthly Hahinnuch (1910-22); the youth monthly Moledeth (1911-21); the scholarly bi-monthly Mimizrah Umimaarab (1919-21); the socialist monthly Haadamah (1919-21); and the literary monthly Maabaroth (1919-21). In addition, the Gazette de Jerusalem was published in French for a number of years, beginning with 1882, in the interests of Orthodox Judaism, and the following four Yiddish periodicals had a brief existence: Die Rose (founded at Jerusalem in 1874; Orthodox weekly); Der Heiliger Antzeiger (Orthodox monthly founded at Jerusalem in 1887); Der Anfang (a Poale Zion periodical founded at Jaffa in 1907); Unzer Bruder (a Zionist bi-weekly founded at Jerusalem in 1910).

In 1942 five Hebrew dailies were being published in Palestine: Dawar, a Labor paper founded at Tel-Aviv in 1925 under the auspices of the Histadruth Haobedim (its first editor was Moses Beilinson; in 1942 its editor was Berl Katznelson); Haaretz, founded at Tel-Aviv in 1919, and representing the central (General Zionist) liberal viewpoint; Haboker, the organ of the General Zionists Group B; Hatzofeh, the organ of the Mizrachi (the Orthodox Zionist organization); Hamashkif, the organ of the Revisionist Zionists. The daily The Palestine Post, published in English, was edited by Gershon Agronsky. Shortly after the outbreak of the second World War (1939), the Palestinian government restricted all dailies to a total of only twenty-four pages a week.

In addition, more than fifty weekly and monthly periodicals were published in Palestine in 1942, most of them in Hebrew, and periodicals were published also by independent trade and political organizations, by literary and agricultural groups, and by scientific societies. Moznayim, a literary monthly published at Tel-Aviv, was founded in 1929. In June, 1942, the Orient, a Hebrew periodical, began publication at Jerusalem as the organ of the Sephardic community of that city, and several months later, at Tel-Aviv, the industrial and economic monthly, Taasiyyah Vechalkalah, began to appear in Hebrew and English, under the direction of Walter Roth, of Jerusalem.

Besides those already mentioned above, the following periodicals in existence for twenty or more years were still being published in Palestine in 1942:

Name	City	Year Founded	Frequency	Language	Character
Ahduth Haabodah	Tel-Aviv	1919	weekly	Hebrew	Zionist and socialist
Doar Hayom	Jerusalem	1919	daily	Hebrew	Zionist
Haberenu	Jerusalem	1921	monthly	Hebrew	school periodical (the Tahkemoni school)
Haolam	Jerusalem	(founded in Europe in 1906; transferred to Jerusalem in 1937)	weekly	Hebrew	organ of the World Zionist Organization
Hapoel Hatzair	Tel-Aviv	1905	weekly	Hebrew	Zionist and Socialist (Palestinian labor)
Hasadeh	Tel-Aviv	1920	monthly	Hebrew	scholarly
Hator	Jerusalem	1920	weekly	Hebrew	Mizrachi
Hedim	Tel-Aviv	1922	bi-monthly	Hebrew	literary
Yedioth Hadassah	Jerusalem	1922	bi-monthly	Hebrew	medical and scientific

Other Palestinian periodicals which illustrate the wide range of activities and interests prevalent among the Jews of the Holy Land, and worth mentioning even though they had been published for less than twenty years up to 1942, or were no longer in existence in that year, include the following:

Name	City	Year Founded	Frequency	Language	Character
Bamaaleh			monthly	Hebrew	organ of Labor Youth
Bamah			monthly	Hebrew	the stage
Bamishor	Jerusalem		weekly	Hebrew	religious
Bustenai	Rehoboth	1929	weekly	Hebrew	organ of the colonists
Gillayon shel Machon Pasteur	Jerusalem	1928	monthly	Hebrew	scientific
Gilyonoth	Tel-Aviv		monthly	Hebrew	literature and art
Hahed	Jerusalem	1926	monthly	Hebrew	Orthodox
Haishah	Jerusalem	1926	monthly	Hebrew	women's periodical
Hamahar	Tel-Aviv	1927	monthly	Hebrew	literary
Hamakkabi	Tel-Aviv	1924	monthly	Hebrew	athletics
Hameshek	Hashittufi		monthly	Hebrew	cooperative news
Hamishpat	Jerusalem	1927	monthly	Hebrew	scientific
Hamizrachi Hatzair	Jerusalem	1927	monthly	Hebrew	Mizrachi
Hanaggar	Jerusalem	1928	monthly	Hebrew	vocational and occupational
Haobed Hatziyyoni			fortnightly	Hebrew	General Zionist
Hashabua Hapalestini	Jerusalem	1928	weekly	Hebrew	Zionist
Hashomer Hatzair	Jerusalem		weekly	Hebrew	organ of the Shomer
Hataasiyyah			weekly	Henrew	organ of the manufacturers' association
Hatotah	Jerusalem	1928	weekly	Hebrew	humor
Hed Hahinnuch	Jerusalem	1927	bi-monthly	Hebrew	teachers' organ
Hed Yerushalayim	Jerusalem		weekly	Hebrew	local news
Ispoklariah			monthly	Hebrew	readers' digest
Karnenu	Jerusalem	1927	monthly	Hebrew, English, French, Yiddish and German	Zionist literary Kethubim	Tel-Aviv	1926	weekly	Hebrew	literary
Kiryath Sefer	Jerusalem	1924	quarterly	Hebrew	bibliographical and historical
Kol Noah	Tel-Aviv		weekly	Hebrew	motion pictures
Kol Yisrael				Hebrew	organ of the Agudath Israel
Leshonenu	Tel-Aviv	1928	quarterly	Hebrew	scholarly
Mizrah Umaarab	Jerusalem	1928	monthly	Hebrew	scholarly
Neueste Nachrichten		after 1933		German	German translation of the general news for the German Jewish residents of Palestine
Palestine and Near East Economic Magazine	Tel-Aviv	1926	bi-weekly	English	economics
The Palestine Bulletin	Jerusalem	1925	daily	English	news
Der Roter Helfer	Jaffa	1927		Yiddish	communist
Sikkat	Tel-Aviv		weekly	Hebrew	humor
Sinai	Jerusalem	1938	monthly	Hebrew	scholarly (published by the Rabbi Kook Institute)
Tarbitz Lemaddae Haruah	Jerusalem	1929	quarterly	Hebrew	scholarly
Teatron Veomanuth	Jerusalem	1925	monthly	Hebrew	art and theatre
Technikah Umadda			monthly	Hebrew	popular science
Tishah Baereb	Tel-Aviv		daily	Hebrew	local news
Yalkut Betzalel	Jerusalem	1927	quarterly	Hebrew and English	art
Yedioth Hahistadruth Harefuith Haibrith Beeretz Yisrael	Tel-Aviv	1926	monthly	Hebrew	medical
Yerushalayim	Jerusalem	1929	weekly	Hebrew	literary
Zion (New Series)	Jerusalem	1935	quarterly	Hebrew	research in Jewish history

ABRAHAM I. SHINEDLING.

PERITZ, ISMAR JOHN, Bible scholar, b. Breslau, Germany, 1863. At the age of seventeen, living in Berlin, he was converted to Christianity. He moved to London, but shortly thereafter was called to New York city (1883) to engage in missionary work. He studied theology, became an elder of the Methodist Episcopal church (1891) and was appointed professor of Semitic Languages and Biblical Literature at Syracuse University, Syracuse, N. Y. In 1904 he became professor of English Bible at the school. He held both chairs until 1933, when he retired, as professor emeritus. Peritz was in Jerusalem in 1913, lecturing at the Newman Biblical Institute.

In 1908 Peritz founded the National Association of Biblical Instructors, and founded and edited its journal, known, from 1937 on, as the Journal of Bible and Religion. His own writings include: "Woman in the Ancient Hebrew Cult," in the Journal of Biblical Literature and Exegesis (1898); Old Testament History (1915). In the Encyclopedia Biblica he published the articles "Hallel" and "Synagogue."

PERIZZITES, one of the seven Canaanite nations; they are mentioned frequently in the Bible, the last time in an account of the reign of Solomon (I Kings 9:20) when they were all made bondservants. The meaning of the name is uncertain; it may be connected with perazon, "open country," or the Hittle pirzi, "iron."

PERJURY (shebu'ath sheker, "false oath," and shebu'ath shav, "vain oath"). The absolute sanctity of the oath in Judaism led to sharpest condemnation of perjury. The Third Commandment states: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain" (Ex. 20:7; Deut. 5:11), thus stigmatizing perjury as a desecration of the name of God. The injunction against perjury is particularly emphasized in regard to the oath which an individual takes to clear himself from the charge of keeping the property of others. Since perjury involves the use of the name of God, it is an offense against Him, and will be punished by Him. The curse of God will befall the perjurer, and will consume his house, "with the timber thereof and the stones thereof" (Zech. 5:4). In Jewish courts those who were about to take an oath were given an admonition reminding them of the importance of the oath and the punishment for perjury (Shebu. 39a).

The punishment of perjury varied according to the circumstances. If it was over a matter of property, the guilty party had to make a restitution, plus a fine of one-fifth, and to bring a sin-offering to the sanctuary. If it was a criminal case, witnesses committing perjury might sometimes be condemned to capital punishment. If the perjury involved no personal injury or monetary loss, but simply consisted of deceiving another, the perjurers were often subjected to corporal punishment. Perjurers were no longer permitted to take judicial oaths, and were not accepted as witnesses; in certain cases, however, their rehabilitation was regarded as possible.

See also OATH.

Lit.: The tractate Shebuoth, especially chap. 3; Maimonides, Hilchoth Shebuoth 1:7 et seq.; 7:1 et seq., 8; Mayer, Samuel, Die Rechte der Israeliten, Athener und Römer, vol. 3 (1876); the literature cited under OATH.

PERL, JOSEPH, Hebrew satirist and patron of education, b. Tarnopol, Galicia, 1773; d. Tarnopol, 1839. He worked energetically for the emancipation and modern education of the Jews, and founded the first modern Jewish school in Galicia at Tarnopol. He established a synagogue with a modernized form of service and preaching in German, but did not attempt further reforms. Finding that the main obstacle to the modernization of Jewish life was the opposition of the Hasidic leaders, he wrote satires in Hebrew against them under the pseudonym Obadiah ben Petahiah. In the first of these, Megalleh Temirin (Revealer of Secrets), he gives a pretended set of actual writings of the Hasidic leaders, obtained under a magical cloak of invisibility; in the second, Bohan Zaddik (Righteous Test, a pun on the Zaddik, or Hasidic leader) he furnishes a sequel through the use of a magic slate upon which all conversations become written and can only be erased by the breath of an honest man. Jewish leaders of all sorts are tried by this test and fail, and the only ones who pass it are the agriculturalists.

Perl accuses the Hasidim of hypocrisy, greed, ignorance and fanaticism. Perl also established a Hebrew print-shop and published an annual. His Yiddish writings were collected and published by the Yiddish Scientific Institute (Yiddishe Ksovim, 1937).

Lit.: Waxman, M., A History of Jewish Literature, vol. 3 (1936) 183-87; Mahler, R., in Jewish Social Studies, vol. 1 (1939) 195-240; Katz, Simhah, in Yivo-Bleter, vol. 13 (1938) 557-76; Mahler, Joseph, "The Hebrew Almanacs of Joseph Perl," Journal of Jewish Bibliography, vol. 3 (1942) 22-31.

PERLES, FELIX, Bible scholar and linguist, b. Munich, Germany, 1874; d. Königsberg, Germany, 1933. He was the son of Joseph Perles. In 1899 he became rabbi in Königsberg, and in 1924 honorary professor of Modern Hebrew and Aramaic literature at the university there. His works deal with textual criticism, linguistic research and religion. In addition to numerous contributions to periodicals (especially to the Orientalistische Literatur-Zeitung), he wrote Analekten zur Textkritik des Alten Testaments (1895; new edition, 1922); Zur althebräischen Strophik (1896); Was lehrt uns Harnack? (1902); Zur Erklärung der Psalmen Salomos (1902); Boussets Religion des Judentums im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter kritisch untersucht (1902); Jüdische Skizzen (1912; 2nd ed., 1920); Gedanken über Judentum (1924); "Biblical Criticism and Jewish Science," Judaean Addresses, vol. 3 (1927). His "Nachträge zu meinen Analekten I und II" was published in Abhandlungen zur Erinnerung an Hirsch Perez Chajes (1933, pp. 194-203).

Lit.: Wininger, S., Grosse Jüdische National-Biographie; Perles, Hedwig, "Verzeichnis der von Felix Perles veröffentlichten Schriften," Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, vol. 81 (1937) 369-92.

PERLES, JOSEPH, rabbi, philologist and archaeologist, b. Baja, Hungary, 1835; d. Munich, Germany, 1894. He was educated at the rabbinical seminary in Breslau. Even before he graduated his essay "Über den Geist des Commentars des Moses ben Nachman," published in the Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums (1858), was awarded a prize. The thesis which he prepared for his graduation, Meletemata Peschitthoniana (1859), has remained a reference work on the subject. In 1862 he became rabbi of Posen, where he wrote Geschichte der Juden in Posen (1865), and from 1871 until his death he served as chief rabbi of Munich.

Perles was author of about twenty major works in the field of rabbinical philology and archeology, some of them published in the Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissen- schaft des Judentums as well as in the Revue des études juives. They include: Die Leichenfeierlichkeiten im nachbiblischen Judentum (1861; translated also into English); Etymologische Studien zur Kunde der rabbinischen Sprach- und Altertumskunde (1871); Die in einer Münchner Handschrift aufgefundene erste lateinische Übersetzung des Maimonides Führers (1875); Kalonymos ben Kalonymos' Sendschreiben an Joseph Kaspi (1879); Beiträge zur rabbinischen Sprach- und Altertumskunde (1893). His sermons were published posthumously by his son Felix (1896).

PERLES, ROSALIE (née Schefftel), writer, b. Breslau, Germany, 1839; d. Königsberg, Germany, 1932. She was the wife of Joseph Perles. As a translator she introduced a number of valuable English works to the German literary world, such as the two books by R. Travers Herford, Das pharisäische Judentum in seinen Wegen and Zielen (1913) and Was Verdankt die Welt den Pharisäern? (1920). Besides, she translated Jüdische Gedanken und Gedanken über Judentum, the anthology edited by Joseph H. Hertz, chief rabbi of Great Britain (1924). She wrote original works, including Unsere Grossmütter and Unsere Grossväter.

PERLMAN, ELIEZER, see BEN JEHUDAH, ELIEZER.

PERLMAN, JACOB, economist, b. Bialystok, Russia, 1898. He emigrated to the United States in 1912. Brother of Selig Perlman, he first worked as statistician for the New York State Department of Labor (1919-21). From 1921 to 1933 he was on the teaching staffs of various universities, including that of North Dakota, where he was professor of sociology (1928-33). He then became chief of the wage statistics division of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor, and in this post published bulletins dealing with the wage structure in various industries. In 1940 he was appointed chief economist of the Bureau of Old Age and Survivors Insurance of the Social Security Board, a post he still occupied in 1942.

Perlman was made lecturer both in the Graduate School of Public Administration of the American University at Washington, D. C., (1936) and in the School of Social Sciences at Catholic University (1940).

PERLMAN, NATHAN DAVID, congressman and judge, b. Poland, 1887. He was brought to the United States as a child, and educated in New York city; in 1907 he was graduated from New York University law school. Four years later he was appointed special deputy attorney general of New York state to prosecute Pure Food law violations (1911-1914). Subsequently, he was elected as a Republican to the New York state assembly; here his tenure was especially notable for his efforts in behalf of increased workmen's compensation, and he won the repeated endorsement of the Citizens' Union of New York.

It was when Fiorello H. LaGuardia resigned his seat in the United States House of Representatives, to become president of the New York city Board of Aldermen, that Perlman was elected to fill the vacancy (1920); thereafter he was re-elected to the next three successive congresses (1920 to 1927). Perlman was on the judiciary committee of the House, and sponsored such social legislation as the Child Labor Amendment and the Immigration Law Amendment, extending non-quota status to wives and children of American citizens.

Failing of election to the 70th congress, he retired to private practice until, in 1935, he was appointed city magistrate by Mayor LaGuardia. The next year he was named justice of the Court of Special Sessions, was reappointed for successive terms, and in 1942 still held that post. In 1936 he was also Republican nominee for New York state attorney general.

In Jewish life Perlman was variously active, notably as vice-president of the American Jewish Congress and, from 1930 to 1932, grand master of the Independent Order of Brith Abraham. In New York city he was vice-president of Beth Israel Hospital and a trustee of the Federation for Jewish Philanthropic Societies.

Lit.: American Hebrew, Oct. 9, 1936, p. 408; 417.

PERLMAN, SELIG, labor economist, b. Bialystok, Poland, 1888. He emigrated to the United States in 1908, and continued his higher studies at the University of Wisconsin, where he began to teach economics in 1917. Prior to that he had worked with the United States Commission on Industrial Relations (1913-1915). At Wisconsin he became assistant professor in 1921, and six years later was named professor. The year 1938-9 he spent teaching at the University College of South Wales, in Great Britain.

A member of the American Association for Labor Legislation, and an expert in the American labor movement, Perlman wrote: History of Labor in the United States (with J. R. Commons and others, 1918, 1935); History of Trade Unionism in the United States (1922); A Theory of the Labor Movement (1928); Labor on Four Continents (with others, 1939).

PERLMUTTER, IZSÁK, painter, b. Budapest, 1866; d. Budapest, 1932. He studied at Budapest from Gusztáv Magyar-Mannheimer, Bertalan Karlovszky and Sándor Bihari; he also attended the Julien Academy at Paris. The pageantry of the Hungarian peasant's home has found no more loving interpreter than Perlmutter. Distilling folk art in his own vision of color and bright sunshine, he has placed his peasant figures, noble in their earnestness, amidst a scene of beauty of their own creation. His Dutch figures, from his early period, also speak of his profound respect for human dignity, whilst his landscapes of Holland are studies in the purely pictorial.

Perlmutter was awarded gold medals in Budapest and Munich, silver medals in Brussels and St. Louis. Several of his paintings, including his self-portrait in the Uffizi Galleries, Florence, were acquired by art museums of Hungary and Italy. He bequeathed to the Jewish Community of Pest thirteen of his paintings, four of which are on permanent exhibit in the National Jewish Museum, Budapest.

PERLROTT-CSABA, VILMOS, painter, b. Békéscsaba, Hungary, 1880. He studied painting at the art school of Nagybanya and from Matisse in Paris. He lived and painted alternately in Paris, Spain and Hungary, and his works were acclaimed by the critics of several countries, including the United States. In search for new means of expression, Perlrott-Csaba never lost contact with nature.

The influence of Cezanne is marked in his paintings which include Notre Dame de Paris with Two Portraits; Still-life with Notre Dame de Paris; Seine Embankment; Landscape in Szentendre; Gypsy Man.

PERLZWEIG, MAURICE LOUIS, rabbi and communal leader, b. London, 1895. He was the son of Asher Perlzweig, a composer and authority on Jewish music. After receiving his B.A. degree from the University of London in 1919, Perlzweig received the same degree from Cambridge in 1923, and the M.A. degree from Cambridge in 1925.

Having prepared for the rabbinate with Israel Abrahams, Perlzweig was in 1921 made second minister of the Liberal Jewish Synagogue of London, and also served as minister of the North London Liberal Synagogue. In 1938 he became minister of the Northwestern Reform Synagogue of London. During his incumbency of these pulpits Perlzweig was influential in returning to the Jewish faith British men and women who, though of Jewish descent, had been brought up in other faiths. He was a member of the governing body of the World Union of Progressive Judaism and also, from 1919 to 1939, instructor in Judaism at Eton College.

Inheriting from his father an affiliation with the Zionist cause, Perlzweig was the first president of the Young Zionist Organization of Great Britain and Ireland. Later he held many posts in the British Zionist Federation and was for a long time its honorary secretary. He was a member of the executive of the World Confederation of General Zionists and, from 1935 on, of the Zionist World Executive, in charge of political information at the London office.

Perlzweig was one of the founders of the World Jewish Congress movement in Great Britain and in 1936 was made a member of the executive and chairman of the British section of the Congress. When headquarters were moved from Paris to London in 1940, Perlzweig was appointed director of the European office. In 1941 he came to the United States, where he assumed charge of the political department of the World Jewish Congress at its New York headquarters.

In England, Perlzweig was a member of the executive of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, and of the executive of the British Grand Lodge of B'nai B'rith. He was co-editor of the Zionist Review and on the editorial board of Palestine, a weekly published by the Anglo-Palestine Committee. He was also a member of the advisory committee for refugees of the League of Nations. In recognition of his work, during his stay in the United States, for the British War Relief Society, a home for children in England was named after him.

PERLZWEIG, WILLIAM ALEXANDRE, biochemist, b. Ostrog, Russia, 1891. He was brought to the United States in 1906 and received his Ph.D. degree from Columbia University in 1915. From 1913 until 1916 he was assistant in biological chemistry at the Columbia University College of Physicians and Surgeons. Subsequently he held other scientific posts, including a year of service as assistant chemist with the Rockefeller Institute (1916-17). From 1919 to 1922 Perlzweig was research biochemist with the United States Public Health Service and from 1922 to 1930 he was chemist for the medical clinic and associate in medicine at the Johns Hopkins Medical School and Hospital. Then he was made professor of biochemistry at the Duke University School of Medicine, and in 1942 still held this position, as well as that of biochemist at Duke Hospital.

Perlzweig was especially interested in nutrition, mineral metabolism and immunochemistry, and wrote on these subjects for various scientific journals. During the first World War he was a lieutenant in the Sanitary Corps.

PERMUTATION OF LETTERS, see CRYPTOGRAPHY.

PERNAMBUCO, see RECIFE.

PERPETUAL LIGHT (Ner Tamid). The ever-burning lamp before the curtain appears as early as the Tabernacle (Lev. 24:2-3), from which it was taken by the synagogue and the Catholic church. As a rule it is an oil lamp, but in recent times the rabbis have permitted the use of electricity. The use of several lamps in one synagogue is also allowed. The receptacle of the lamp, which hangs from chains, is usually made of gold plated silver or silver plated copper. Artistic, most valuable figures, richly embossed, are often donations, engraved with the name of the donor and the year. The most unique perpetual lights are those formerly in Polish wooden synagogues, and now transferred to stone synagogues. Fearing, as it seems, the danger of fires, these lights are put into a niche in the wall; this is conspicuous in the building, has a richly ornamented foreground, and is a wonderful decoration for the synagogue. The niche is closed by an iron fence or by glass in a wooden frame. In Cracow it is in the eastern wall, but elsewhere always in the western wall. The most elaborate form of this was at the old Lemberg Synagogue (Boimow Street), once the synagogue of Deutsch-Krone.

The perpetual light symbolizes the perpetual fire on the altar, the continuous presence of God, and the permanence of the Law.

Lit.: Grotte, Synagogentypen (1915), illustrations 13-16.

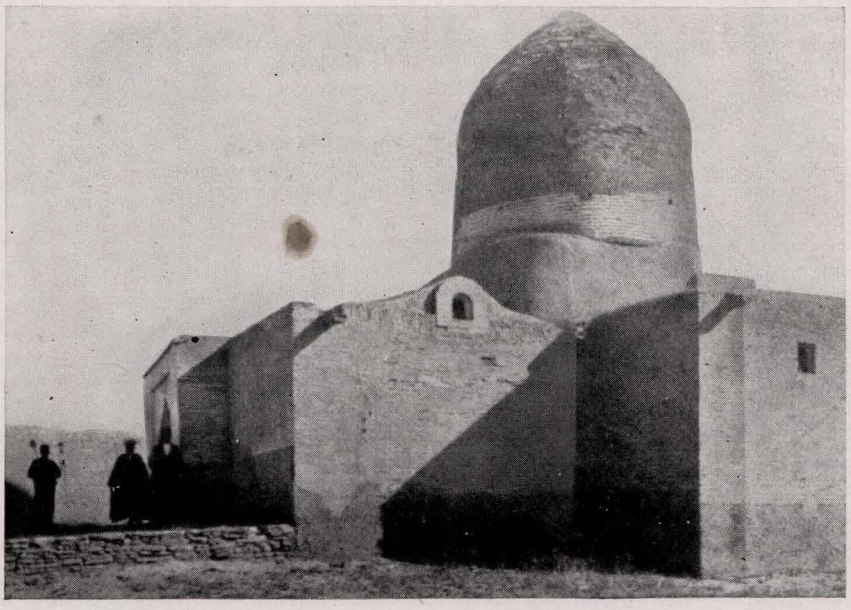
PERROT, GEORGE, French non-Jewish archeologist, b. 1832; d. 1914. He was a professor at the University of Paris. In addition to numerous archeological works, he wrote, together with Charles Chipiez, Histoire de l'art dans l'antiquité, a comprehensive work dealing in its fourth volume (1887) with Judea, Sardinia, Syria and Cappadocia. Although new discoveries invalidated some of its details, this book is still considered a fundamental work on the history of art in the Near East.

Lit.: Revue des études juives, vol. 8, p. 146; vol. 48, p. 296.

PERSIA (in the Bible, paras). 1. Ancient Times. The ancient Persian empire proceeded from the Median empire which was situated to the north of the Babylonian empire. Cyrus (in Persian Kurush, in Hebrew Koresh), the chief of a Persian tribe of horsemen, overthrew Astyages, the last Median king, and made himself king of Media, set up his capital at Ecbatana, and sought to legitimatize his position through marriage with the daughter of Astyages. Very little is known about the previous history of the Persians. They were an Aryan people which came out of the lands further east as part of a wave of Aryan peoples which began to migrate about the middle of the 7th cent. B.C.E., passed through the region of the Urmia lake and pressed southeast toward the mountainous regions of Western Iran. There it grew stronger through the arrival of tribes of the same stock from the steppes of Turkestan, who took possession of the rest of Iran. Two kingdoms were founded by these tribes; the larger, Media, which was established about 678-677, became a world power under Cyaxeres II, and destroyed the empire of the Assyrians with the help of the Chaldeans under Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadrezzar II. The empire of the Medes was later destroyed by the related tribe of Parsua, who lived in the Elamite east. Under Cyrus, these Parsua succeeded, in a rather short time, in uniting under one rule the entire Orient. In 546 Cyrus overcame Croesus, king of Lydia, who was at that very time engaged in forming a coalition against him, in which Babylonia, Egypt, Sparta and Greeks of Asia Minor took part.



The traditional tombs of Mordecai and Esther in Persia

The struggles of the young Persian state were naturally followed with interest and enthusiasm by the Jews who were at that time dwelling in captivity in Babylon. They saw in Cyrus the one sent by God, and destined to execute the sentence of God's judgment upon Babylon; they even gave him the title of Messiah (Isa. 45:1-5). After the persecutions which the Judeans had to undergo under the last Babylonian kings, the mildness of Cyrus to the conquered nations and his religious tolerance appeared to them like a deliverance. The literary results of this enthusiasm are found in Isa. 40 to 66 and in Ps. 95 to 99 and 105. In a document which has been preserved in Ezra 1:2-4 and II Chron. 36:23 Cyrus granted the Jews who were living in exile in Babylon permission to return home and to rebuild Jerusalem and the Temple (cf. Ezra 6:3-5). In 537 about 50,000 Jews availed themselves of this permission; for the most part they came from the poorer classes, who had nothing to lose by the change, whereas the rich and prominent Jews remained in Babylon. The reason that Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to Palestine was possibly the fact that he was already engaged in plans for the conquest of Egypt, and hence wished to establish a people that was devoted to his own interests on the border of the latter country. Another plausible reason that has been suggested was that Cyrus was interested in the Jews from the standpoint of religion; being a worshipper of Ahuramazda, he had recognized in Judaism a religion akin to his own.

The successor of Cyrus was his son Cambyses (529-522), who succeeded in conquering Egypt in 525.

The beginnings of a new Jewish communal life in Palestine which had followed the permission of Cyrus had come to a pause in the meantime. This was mainly due to the disturbances raised by the Samaritans and the other neighboring peoples; neither Cyrus nor his successor Cambyses, busy on their African campaigns, could trouble themselves to see that the young Judean community be protected. Conditions first improved after Darius I, the son of Hystaspes (521-485), ascended the throne.

Darius, in contrast to his predecessor Cambyses, was favorably disposed towards the Jews. I Esdras 3 and 4 relates that Zerubbabel came to Persia in the reign of Darius, became the attendant of the king there, and through his wisdom brought it about that the king provided for the continuation of the building of the Temple at his own expense. On the other hand Ezra 5 reports that the Jews began to build the Temple again of their own accord, whereupon the Persian governor Tattenai came and demanded that they prove their right to build it. The Jews referred to the document issued by Cyrus, and so Tattenai sent to Darius and requested that a search be made for this document. It was found and accordingly the king sent orders not only not to disturb the Jews in the building of the Temple, but even to aid this at the expense of the state and to furnish them with sacrificial animals and natural products. At the same time he ordered that prayers should be offered in the Temple for the life of the king. In remembrance of this favor granted by the monarch a picture of Susa, the Persian capital, was placed in the eastern gate of the Temple (Men. 88a).

Darius' successor on the throne of Persia was Xerxes (485-465). The situation of the Jews during his reign was probably favorable, as can be assumed from the Murashu texts. At that time the growing Jewish community in Palestine received numerous contributions for its support from its coreligionists in Persia, which is evidence of the prosperity of the Babylonian Jews under the Persian rule. A steady traffic existed between Jerusalem and Persia, and Jewish slaves who came to Persia were ransomed by the native Jews. The latter sought to guard their cultural individuality, deliberately fenced themselves in against all foreign influences, and observed all the religious laws connected with the Temple worship, such as the Sabbath and holidays, circumcision and the dietary laws, even more zealously than was the case in Judea. They cherished the Hebrew language and the literature that had come down to them in that tongue. Under Artaxerxes I (465-425), whose attitude toward the Jews was an especially favorable one, a rich and noble Jew, Nehemiah, even succeeded in obtaining a high governmental position at the Persian court, and enjoyed the personal favor of the ruler and his consort. In the meantime the state of the Jewish community in Palestine had become wretched both from a social and a religious point of view, due to the scantiness of its material resources. The religious law was but laxly observed, and the many mixed marriages that took place threatened to destroy the very existence of the community. The high taxes caused the poor to become indebted to the rich, who oppressed them severely. While the community was in such a situation, the Persian Jewish scribe Ezra begged permission from Artaxerxes I to go to Jerusalem and to reorganize the life of the new community. Artaxerxes was favorable to his appeal and granted him extensive powers, which have been recorded, in the Aramaic language, in Ezra 7:12-26. (It may be stated here that certain savants of modern times have questioned the authenticity of this document; however E. Meyer has energetically argued in favor of its verity.) In 459 Ezra, laden with rich presents and accompanied by a large number of pious Jews, journeyed to Jerusalem in order to begin his work of reform. However, the political conditions of the time were unfavorable, and Ezra represented only a spiritual power; hence his work came to a pause, and one of his tasks, that of rebuilding the Temple and walls, was never completed. It was at this time that the previously mentioned Nehemiah succeeded in obtaining from the Persian king the permission to go to Jerusalem as governor, in order to complete the work of Ezra there. The execution of his plan met with great difficulties in Palestine, which were caused by the neighboring peoples, especially the Samaritans. After Nehemiah had left Palestine the old unfortunate conditions of mixed marriages, desecration of the Sabbath, and the like recurred; the governor had to return to the country, and on his second visit finally succeeded in effecting the national and religious consolidation of the Jewish state.

Nothing is known of the relations between the later Persian kings and the Jews. With the exception of the previously mentioned Murashu text, there are almost no reports about the history of the Jews in Persia, nor any account of their social and cultural conditions; yet it is likely that their situation was a favorable one. It was during this period that Jewish colonies were probably formed in various provinces of the Persian empire. From that time on Jews were to be found not only in Babylonia, but also in such countries as Iran and Asia Minor; in the latter, for the first time, they came into contact with the Greeks.

In 331 the Persian empire was conquered by Alexander the Great and henceforward the Jews came under Greek rule.

About 250 the native land of the Persians was violently rent from the Syrian empire and conquered by the Parthians, a people belonging to the Scythian family of nations. Arsaces founded a great kingdom, and his dynasty, the Arsacids, established a powerful empire, which, within a hundred years after it was founded, embraced all the countries between the Euphrates and the Indus. They maintained this realm intact against the cultural onslaught of Hellenism, and, in later times, against the military attacks of the Romans (250 B.C.E. to 226 C.E.). The population of the kingdom was made up of Syrians, Greeks, Jews and Parthians. Many of the cities within ancient Babylonia, such as Nehardea and Nisibis, were populated almost exclusively by Jews; others, such as Seleucia and Ctesiphon, were principally inhabited by Greeks.

The number of Jews in the Parthian empire was very large, especially in Babylonia. These settlers had remained there of the descendants of the exiles whom Nebuchadrezzar had led to Babylon. As has been previously mentioned, they lived chiefly in the cities of Nehardea and Nisibis. According to a report of Josephus (Antiquities, book 18, chap. 9), a robber state, founded by the brothers Asinai and Anilai, which was the terror of its neighbors, existed within the Parthian empire during the reign of Artabanus III (11-40). This Jewish state existed for sixteen years, from 25 to 40 C.E. In the meantime Asinai had fallen victim to a family intrigue, and in 40 the Babylonians, who were embittered by the predatory expeditions of the Jews, fell upon Anilai and destroyed him and his host. The result was a general uprising against the Jews. About 5,000 Jews were killed in Seleucia; the rest fled to Ctesiphon, and later to Nehardea and Nisibis, which were populated by Jews only (41 C.E.).

Another event which took place during the reign of Artabanus III was the conversion of the royal family of Adiabene, a small state in northern Mesopotamia, which acknowledged the suzerainty of the Parthian empire. When Izates ascended the throne in 36, he openly espoused Judaism and was circumcised; in this step he was joined by his mother Helena and his wife Symmacho, as well as by his brothers, one of whom later succeeded him. The people of Adiabene were indifferent to the conversion of the royal family, but the nobility fomented uprisings against the king and even tried to bring about the interference of Vologases, the successor of Artabanus as emperor. Vologases actually began a campaign against Adiabene, but Izates was saved when the king was called away to repel a Scythian invasion. Izates later sent his sons to Jerusalem, and the dowager queen Helena often visited the Temple and made rich gifts to it, as did her sons (Yoma 3). When a famine afflicted Palestine, her ships brought foodstuffs from Alexandria and Cyprus to relieve the distress of the population of Jerusalem (46). She erected, within the walls of the lower city, a palace and a family sepulchre, which still is in existence under the name Tombs of the Kings. Monobazes II of Adiabene ruled only a short time, since his country was the arena in which the war between Rome and the Parthians was waged. In 66 his children were brought to Rome as hostages. Several members of the royal family took part in the great war of the Jews against the Romans.

After the Bar Kochba War (132-135) Hananiah founded a Sanhedrin at Nehar-Pakod, in the neighborhood of Nehardea. At first this was universally hailed with joy; later, however, when the religious institutions in Judea revived once more, it ceased to function. The general situation of the Jews of Persia at that time was favorable. They lived principally in the territory of ancient Babylonia, and in the districts of Sura, Pumbeditha, and Nehardea, cities which were inhabited almost entirely by Jews. The most important of all the Jewish settlements in Persia was Nehardea on the Euphrates. This was the central station for the collection of the gifts which the Jews would bring for the Temple, and it was thence that they were sent on to Jerusalem, escorted by a strong guard. For a time Pumbeditha was considered the chief city of the Diaspora, and yet, if a statement in the Talmud (Hul. 127a) is to be trusted, the Jews of that city were not entirely above suspicion. A poor Jewish population lived in Susa. Mahoza, in the neighborhood of Ctesiphon, was inhabited almost entirely by Jews.

The Jews of Babylonia under the Parthian rule were agriculturists, cattle-raisers, traders and artisans.

As a rule they enjoyed a certain amount of autonomy. They were under the jurisdiction of their exilarch, the representative of the house of David, who was considered to rank fourth after the king (Shebu. 6b). The signs of his dignity were a silken robe and a golden girdle. In later times the exilarchs surrounded themselves with a princely luxury (Sab. 20b). They were the chief justices of the Jews, and were granted police powers and the right to appoint officials. It was in Babylonia under the Parthian rule that there arose that important Jewish settlement, which took the lead in Judaism after the destruction of Palestinian Jewry and the Jewish state there in the 2nd cent. C.E. It is to this community that we owe the maintenance and further development of Jewish values and Jewish culture, and their embodiment within the voluminous pages of the Babylonian Talmud. Even in the time of the first exilarchs it was the custom that numerous young Jews of Babylon would travel to Galilee in order to receive their education there from Judah Hanasi. The most important of these were Hiyya and his sons, Abba Aricha, Rabbah bar Hana and Samuel. Some of these youthful pilgrims returned to their homes and became teachers there. There was a school at Nehardea at a very early period, but it first became important after Samuel returned from Palestine and became its head; the school of Sura, founded by Abba Aricha after his return from Palestine in 219, soon also became famous. The academy at Sura retained the intellectual leadership of Jewish life for more than 800 years. For further details, see ACADEMIES; BABYLONIA; EXILARCH.

2. From the Rise of the Sassanids to the Eleventh Century. This fortunate development of the Jewish settlement in Persian Babylonia was shortly afterwards rudely disturbed for a time. In 226 C.E. the Parthian kingdom was overthrown by the Sassanids, who founded the Neo-Persian empire and exercised the rule for more than 400 years. These native Persian kings, who replaced the Parthian Arsacids, regarded themselves as the rightful successors of the Achaemenids, and made every effort to continue the policy of the latter. Ardashir I (227-40), who was the conqueror of the Parthian empire, took the title "king of the kings of Iran" and reestablished in his kingdom the ancient Persian customs and religion. Mazdaism once more became the state religion, the altars of fire-worship were reerected, and the priestly class of the Magians was again invested with its ancient rights. The result of this restoration of ancient Persian culture was the persecution of all other religions, Greco-Roman paganism, Christianity, and, at times, Judaism. Thus on certain days the priests of the revived religion of fire-worship would force their way into Jewish houses, quench all the fires there, gather the glowing coals into their sacrificial basins, and bear them off to their temples as offerings. However, Sapor I (241-72), the successor of Ardashir, showed more consideration for the Jews, a favor which was probably due to the influence of Samuel, who was on friendly terms with the king. It is also likely that another reason for this rapid volte-face in the attitude of the ruler was the thought that he could use the help of the Jews in his wars against the Romans. Sapor even boasted at a later time that in all his expeditions he had never shed Jewish blood, with the exception of that of 12,000 Cappadocian Jews who had fought against him. During the war between Sapor and Rome the city of Nehardea and the academy there were destroyed (261), and the pupils of Samuel had to emigrate to Pumbeditha and other cities, where they founded other academies. As a rule the Sassanids of the following centuries, who were constantly kept on the alert because of their continuous wars with the Romans and were therefore dependent upon the help of the Jews, but seldom interfered in internal Jewish affairs. Consequently the development of Judaism within the neo-Persian empire was free and unhindered; it flourished to an unexpected extent and soon outshadowed even the spiritual center in Judea.

Under the rule of Sapor II (309-79) the situation of Jews in Babylonia was a very favorable one. The mother of the king, who was regent of the country during his minority, is reported to have made costly presents to the Jewish teachers of the law on numerous occasions. As a result of this favor the Jews were always faithful to the Persians during the war of twenty-five years' duration between the latter and the Romans. Beginning with the 4th cent. the Jews of Palestine began to be persecuted by Christianity, which had now become the state religion of Rome; many of the Jews of that country emigrated to Persia, which was then under the rule of Jezdegerd I (399-420), a king who was friendly to the Jews, and who is said to have made a daughter of the exilarch one of his wives.

Jezdegerd II (438-57) took a completely different stand towards those of other faiths. Swayed by the influence of the Magians, he began a severe persecution of the Christians and Jews of his empire, and was especially harsh against the newly arisen religion of Manichaeism. The chief oppression of the Jews consisted in forbidding them to utter the Shema prayers in public and to observe the Sabbath customs. The persecution became still more severe when Perozes (459-86) ascended the throne. Under his rule many clashes between Jews and Magians took place, and when two of the latter were killed at Ispahan, the king commanded that half of the Jewish population of Ispahan should be massacred, and that the Jewish children should be compelled to adopt the Persian religion. The exilarch Huna Mari and other teachers of the law were executed, the autonomous jurisdiction of the Jews was abolished, and the Jewish children were kidnapped and handed over to the Magians to educate. At that time many Jews emigrated from Persia to Arabia and India; others were stirred up by Mar Zutra into an uprising against the Persians. The latter succeeded in gaining control over a small district that was almost entirely inhabited by Jews; for seven years Mar Zutra ruled over it, but at the end of this time he was taken captive and executed.

Under Kobad (490-531) the communistic sect of Zendiks, to which even the king belonged, and which taught that all property, and even women, should be held in common, endangered the property of the Jews and the honor of Jewish wives and maidens. It was only under Chosroes I (531-79) that Persia once more regained freedom from disturbance within and power against foes without. At the same time the Jews recovered their former position and prosperity, and the communities in Mahoza, Sura and Pumbeditha began to flourish. However, this fortunate development came to an end at the death of Chosroes. Hormisdas IV (579-89) persecuted the Jews and the academies of Sura and Pumbeditha were again closed. It was no wonder, therefore, that the Jews joined the cause of the general Bahram, who had rebelled against the king, or that they helped him to attain the throne. However, he was soon overthrown by Chosroes II (591-628), whereupon the Jews were severely punished for the services they had rendered Bahram. On the other hand, as soon as the rebellion had been definitely suppressed, the Jews received kindly treatment from the king.

As a result of this, when Chosroes invaded Palestine, he was supported strongly by the Jews of that country, who hailed him as a liberator. However, his conquests were of a brief duration only, and soon afterwards the Sassanid empire succumbed to the onslaughts of Islam.

Under the Sassanid dominion important sages had taught at the academies of Sura, Pumbeditha and Mahoza. The most important of these were Abba Aricha, Samuel, Rabbah bar Nahmani, Raba, Abaye, and Rab Ashi of Sura, who was highly regarded by King Jezdegerd. These sages began to put into systematic order the material of the discussions of the Mishnah, which had arisen in the schools and had grown to immense proportions, and they also prepared it for codification. The sages of later generations, working under the most difficult conditions, succeeded in committing to writing the gigantic work of the Babylonian Gemara. Seventy years after the death of Ashi, Rabina bar Huna and his contemporaries, working in Persian Babylonia, completed the immense work of the Talmud, about 500 C.E.

When Persia was conquered by the Arabs in 641, Islam became the dominant faith instead of the old Zoroastrian religion. From this time on Persia was theoretically under the rule of the caliph. However, so great was the empire now subject to Islam that the country was never governed by him directly, but was administered by satraps. These sometimes gained for themselves the status of independent rulers and founded kingdoms of their own. In 1037 all Persia was conquered by the Seljuk Turks; in 1258 these were replaced by the Mongols as a result of the victories of Hulagu Khan; in 1502 a new Persian dynasty, the Safavid rulers, came to power and, under their first ruler, Ismail, made Shiism the state religion.

Under the dominion of Islam the Jewish settlement in Persian Babylonia again attained a high state of prosperity and culture; the exilarchate was restored, and Jewish learning reached new heights.

Basing their action on a sura of the Koran (9:29), the Mohammedan rulers granted their protection to those of other faiths in return for the payment of certain special taxes, which were rather high. The caliph Omar (634-44) is said to have issued a special law to regulate the attitude of Mohammedan countries towards both Jews and Christians; but it is not certain whether the laws cited in his name are really his or whether they come from a later time. It is certain, however, that the Jews enjoyed religious and political freedom on the soil of the Abbasid caliphate. The exilarchate received official recognition and attained a new importance. Bostanai, one of the first exilarchs to be mentioned, even received a present from the caliph in the form of the daughter of the Persian king Chosroes, Jizdundad, whom he made his wife. Bostanai must have been an important personage, since legends cluster thickly around him.

The conditions of the Jews became particularly favorable under the caliph Ali (656-61), who transferred his place of residence to Cufa, in the midst of the Jewish settlements in Persia. Ali owed his rulership to no small degree to the labors of Abdallah ben Saba, an Arabian Jew who had become converted to Islam, and who was one of the spiritual founders of the Shiite dogma, which regarded Ali alone as the rightful successor of the prophet. It was under Ali that the presidents of the Jewish academies in Persian Babylonia first acquired the title of Gaon, and in course of time these gradually attained a greater and ever greater influence in the political affairs of the Jews, an influence which often brought them into conflict with the exilarch. After Ali's death the caliphate was snatched away from his descendants by the Ommaiads. In the ensuing wars Persia played a large part, and the Jews there seem to have suffered severely as a result of this. Of course, only a very few reports from this time have been preserved, and only a few of the successors of Bostanai are known by name. On the whole they seem to have been unpopular with the multitudes, not only because they were descended from a heathen princess, but also because of their despotic treatment of the people and the Geonim. But little is known of this period, and the sources become more copious only in the time of the exilarch Hasdai (670-730), the grandfather of Anan ben David, who founded the sect of Karaites. Hasdai maintained harmonious relations with the heads of the academies, and represented Jewry before the secular ruler, leaving to the heads of the schools the guidance of the spiritual forces within Judaism. It was during this period that there arose in Persian Babylonia certain Jewish sects, such as that of Abu Isa Ispahani, which had numerous adherents in Damascus in the 10th cent., and that of the Judghanites. Both sects revealed the marked influence which victorious Islam had obtained over the minds of their founders and adherents.

A new period of prosperity for the Jews of Persian Babylonia began under the rule of the Abbasid caliphs (750-1040); this period was characterized by the prominence of the exilarchate and the Gaonate.

BERNHARD LEVY.

3. From the Twelfth to the Twentieth Century. Our knowledge of Persian Jewish life in the 12th cent. is almost entirely dependent on the accounts of the traveler Benjamin of Tudela. These speak of large Jewish communities in such places as Isfahan, Shiraz, Holwan and Hamadan. Isfahan was for a time the seat of the head of the Persian Jews, who was subject to the exilarch at Baghdad. Hamadan was the spiritual center by virtue of its academy, as well as because of the reputed tombs of Mordecai and Esther. The rise of the Messianic pretender David Alroy (1155-60) was a cause of great anxiety to the Persian Jews. He advocated an uprising against the Persian sultan, and gathered a large number of Jewish warriors in his native city of Amadia in the mountains of Kurdistan. The sultan, suspicious of Alroy's intentions, suggested to the exilarch and the Gaon the advisability of persuading him to halt his undertakings lest he destroy all the Jews of Persia. Alroy fell a victim to the knife of an assassin, but his movement survived after his death in the sect of Menahemites among the Jews of Kurdistan and Azerbaijan.

The invasions of the Mongols in the 13th cent. changed the condition of the Persian Jews for the better. This was particularly the case in the reign of the Ilchan Arghun, when Saad ad-Daula became their leader. Saad ad-Daula, at Abhar (northern Persia) was originally a physician at the court in Baghdad and Tabriz. His political rise was a unique one. In 1288 he was appointed chief of the financial administration of Iraq, and in 1289 he became vizier of the entire Mongol empire of Arghun, serving until his assassination in 1291. While he was head of the administration, he appointed many of his relatives and coreligionists to posts in the public service. The rise of a Jew to such a high position created discontent among the Mongols, both Christians and Moslems alike. Persian and Arabic sources praised Saad's successful administration, but also brought wild accusations against him, and he and many of his supporters were killed immediately after the death of Arghun (1291). This was followed by a terrible persecution of the Persian Jews in Tabriz, Baghdad and Mosul.

Under the later Ilchan rulers a prominent part in public life was taken by Jews, especially by the historian and statesman Rashid ad-Daula. Again this political ascent was followed by a sudden fall, intense persecutions, and the enactment of new anti-Jewish laws.

From the beginning of the 14th cent. to the end of the 16th the history of the Persian Jews is shrouded in thick darkness. It is certain, however, that the Jewish settlements in Persia remained in existence. With the rise of the Safavid dynasty, the veil is lifted; thanks to reports of such European travelers as Chardin and Texeiro, as well as the Persian and Armenian chronicles, we know that the number of Jews at that time was about 30,000, scattered over many cities and villages.

As a result of the introduction of the Shiite form of Islam by the Safavid rulers, the position of the Jews became very precarious. Under Shahs Abbas I (1587-1628) and Abbas II (1642-66) compulsory conversions of Jewish communities took place; these were followed by attempts to humiliate the Jews by forcing them to wear a distinct garb and suffer various discriminations. The Judeo-Persian chronicles of Babai ben Lutf and Babai ben Farhad give a vivid description in poetic form of the sufferings, persecutions and forced conversions of Persian Jewry under Safavid rule.

The lot of the Jews became much easier under Nadir Shah (1736-47). An opponent of Shia Islam, he took a tolerant attitude toward the Jews. He eagerly pursued religious studies with the aim of creating a new universal religion, and at his court at Meshed discussions between Jews, Christians, Moslems and Zoroastrians took place. Persian translations of Psalms and other parts of the Hebrew Bible have been traced back to the initiative of this enlightened monarch. He brought about the settlement of the Jews in Meshed, despite its holy character as a center of the Shiite world, by transplanting Jews thither from Kaswin (1734). After the death of Nadir Shah in 1747 the Jews of Meshed, deprived of their protector, had their lives made so unbearable by the fanatical Shiite population that they became Moslems in 1838.

After this conversion the community were called New Moslems (Djedid al Islam), had to attend the mosques, keep all the laws of Islam and even undertake pilgrimages to Mecca. Secretly, however, and under the most dangerous circumstances, they continued to observe their Jewish customs. They prayed in underground synagogues, observed the dietary laws, festivals and similar institutions, and did not intermarry with the Moslems. In course of time many of these crypto-Jews left Meshed and founded new settlements outside of Persia: in Afghanistan, Turkestan and Bokhara to the east, and in London and Jerusalem to the west. The largest of these colonies, at Jerusalem, numbered about 500 in 1942. In the fourth decade of the 20th cent. the number of crypto-Jews in Meshed was about 3,000. After the rise of Riza Shah and the trend in Iran towards westernization, they were allowed to live again as Jews without interference. Kethuboth (marriage contracts) and epitaphs are evidences of the dual life they lead; the first extensive and documentary presentation of the Meshed community was made by Walter J. Fischel, who visited them in 1936.

The Kadjar dynasty (1795-1925) continued the anti-Jewish policy of the Safavids. Jews and other believers were branded as ritually unclean and were subject to heavy taxation, discriminative and humiliating treatment in every respect. This led to disintegration in the life of the Persian Jews during the 19th cent. It was only in the latter part of this century that the Jews of Western Europe began to take an interest in the fate of their Persian coreligionists. In 1873, when Nazr ad-Din (1848-96) undertook a journey to Europe, diplomatic representations were made to him and representatives of the Alliance Israélite Universelle and the Anglo-Jewish Association, inspired by leaders such as Crémieux and Montefiore, met the shah in the capitals of Europe (such as Berlin, Amsterdam, London, Paris, Rome, Vienna and Constantinople) and pleaded for a change in the policy toward the Jews of Persia. This was partly successful, but did not effect the emancipation of the Persian Jews, as all the good intentions of the shah were blocked by the mullahs, the Shiite clergy. The activities of Christian missionaries and the influence of the Bahai movement made considerable inroads into the ranks of the Persian Jews. A decisive turn in the history of the Persian Jews came with the establishment of schools in a number of cities by the Alliance Israélite Universelle. The first of these was established at Teheran in 1898, and was followed by others at Hamadan, Isfahan, Shiraz, Kermanshah, Senne and other localities.

A typical Persian Jew

The Persian revolution of 1906 improved the condition of the Jews, but they did not achieve full equality until the rise of Riza Shah Pehlevi (1925-41). There have also been indications of a cultural renaissance of Persian Jewish life, aided by such forces as Zionism, the revival of Hebrew and the opening of new modern schools in Teheran. In 1942 the number of Jews in Persia was about 50,000.

See also: ARDASHIR; ARTAXERXES; BABYLONIA; CYRUS; DARIUS; EXILARCH; GAON AND GAONIC PERIOD; JUDEO-PERSIAN; LITERATURE, JUDEO-PERSIAN; TALMUD.

WALTER J. FISCHEL.

Lit.: Chardin, Journal du voyage en Perse (1686); Benjamin II, Masse Yisrael (1856); Flandin, Voyage en Perse; Browne, A Year Amongst the Persians (1893); reports of the Alliance Israélite Universelle; Bacher, in Revue des études juives, vol. 47, pp. 51-53; Seligsohn, ibid., vol. 44; Fischel, Walter J., in Zion, vol. 1, No. 1 (1935) 49-74; vol. 2 (1936-37) 273-94; idem, in Monatsschrift für die

Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, vol. 81 (1937) 145-53; Adler, E. N., edit., Benjamin of Tudela; Fischel, Walter J., The History of the Jews in Persia (scheduled for publication in 1943 by the Jewish Publication Society of America, and containing a full bibliography).

PERSIAN JEWISH LITERATURE, see LITERATURE, JUDEO-PERSIAN.

PERSIUS, see ROMAN WRITERS ON JEWS.

PERSKIE, JOSEPH B., judge, b. Alliance, N. J., 1885. He studied law at the University of Pennsylvania and was admitted to the New Jersey bar in 1907. He was city solicitor for Atlantic City from 1926 to 1933. Perskie became a justice of the Supreme Court of New Jersey in 1933, and in 1942 still held this post. Among his civic positions was his membership on the Commission for Uniform Legislation in the United States (1930-33). He was director of the Atlantic City Federation of Jewish charities. He was a son-in-law of Hirsch Masliansky.

PERSKY, DANIEL, Hebrew writer, b. Minsk, Russia, 1893. He came to the United States in 1908, and completed his education in New York city preparatory schools. The beginnings of the revival of Hebrew as a living language and the creation of a new Hebrew literature found their American roots at about this time, and Persky became one of the pioneers in the movement.

His first book, Hamedabber Ibrith (Spoken Hebrew), was published in 1920. Subsequently there appeared Mikra Lanoar, a guide to juvenile Hebrew literature (1929); Leelef Yedidim, a collection of his shorter writings (1935); Matamim Lehag, feuilletons for the holidays (1939); Hukkath Artzoth Haberith shel Amerikah, a study of the Constitution of the United States of America (1938); and Shaoth Yafoth (Pleasant Hours; 1942).

Among the newspapers and periodicals for which Persky wrote were Hadoar, Haaretz, Dawar, and Haolam. He was, in 1942, a weekly columnist for Hadoar, and also editor of its bi-weekly children's supplement, Hadoar Lanoar. The work that Persky did for his weekly column was in his characteristic feuilleton style, and was an example of the complete revivification of Hebrew and its adaptability to contemporary details of life. Persky was vice-president of Histadruth Ivrith and a life member of the Vaad Halashon in Jerusalem.

Lit.: Waxman, Meyer, A History of Jewish Literature, vol. 4 (1941) 1081; Goldberg, A., in Der Amerikaner, June 14, 1935.

PERSONAL INJURY, see ACCIDENT; NEZIKIN; TORT.

PERTH, capital of Western Australia, with about 2,500 Jewish inhabitants in a population of 224,800 (1939). The discovery of gold in Western Australia in 1892 led to a large influx of immigrants into that state, among them many Jews. A Jewish congregation was founded at Perth in the same year. A Jewish congregation was founded also at Coolgardie; this has since ceased to exist. A synagogue was erected in Brisbane Street in 1897, with D. I. Freedman as rabbi. Jews who had settled in other parts of the state migrated to Perth as the gold supply gave out, and as a result the small congregation grew rapidly. Also, since Perth was the first port of call for steamers from Europe, the Perth community received its share of Jewish newcomers.

Perth Synagogue during Pentecost

Freedman was a chaplain attached to the Australian forces during the first World War, and in 1928 was president of the West Australian Returned Soldiers' Association.

L. Rubin-Zacks was cantor of the Brisbane Street Synagogue in the 1940's. There were numerous local philanthropic, educational and social Jewish groups in Perth, as well as branches of the West Australian Jewish Education Association and the West Australian Zionist Association.

Lit.: Lyng, J., Non-Britishers in Australia (1935).

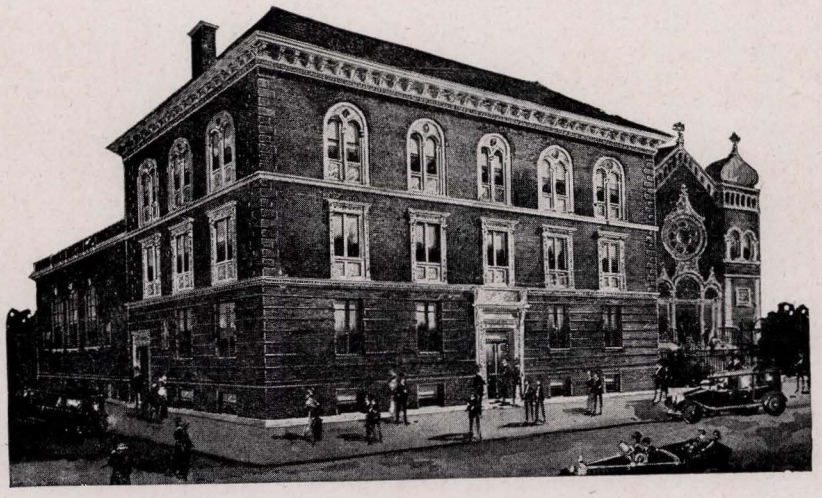
PERTH AMBOY, a city on the northern part of the New Jersey coast, facing Staten Island. Its population in 1940 was 41,242, of whom about 4,500 were Jews. The first Jews to settle in the vicinity came about 1870; among them the name of Henry Wolff is known. Congregation Beth Mordecai, which was incorporated in 1896, built its first synagogue in 1897; Elias Solomon, who served from 1903 to 1906, was the first regularly engaged rabbi of the synagogue. A new building was opened in 1927; the rabbi in 1942 was Max D. Davidson, who came in 1928. Beth Mordecai follows a Conservative ritual. Its Hebrew school was opened in 1897, its community center in 1927.

Among the Orthodox synagogues in 1942 were Beth Israel and Beth Jacob, for both of which Peretz (Ferencz) Weiss was rabbi, and Shaarey Tefilah, which was organized in 1890, building its own synagogue in 1903. Samuel Levy became its rabbi in 1924, and was serving in 1942. Adjoining the Shaarey Tefilah Synagogue on Madison Avenue was the Young Men's Hebrew Association building, for which the Shaarey Tefilah Synagogue donated the ground. The Y.M.H.A., which was already in existence in the early 1900's, contained (1942) a Hebrew school, library and community center. The city had branch organizations of various



The Y.M. & Y.W.H.A. building at Perth Amboy, N. J.

Jewish national movements, including the United Jewish Appeal. The first Jewish organization in Perth Amboy was the United Hebrew Association, founded in 1893 as the I.O.S.A. Lodge. Subsequently there were many local fraternal and benevolent groups formed, and a Council of Jewish Organizations was established in 1939.

A number of Jews from Perth Amboy held public office, both in the city and state departments. Among these were David T. Wilentz, city attorney from 1922 to 1926, who was elected attorney general of New Jersey in 1934 and was serving, after reelection, in 1942; Leo Goldberger, who was city attorney, then judge of the Perth Amboy district court; Morris Margaretten, special assistant attorney general for New Jersey; Harry S. Medinets, city attorney and later judge of the New Jersey State Compensation, and George Julius Miller, assistant attorney general and later director of the New Jersey Historical Records Survey of the Works Progress Administration.

PERU, a country on the west coast of South America, having in 1942 about 2,100 Jewish inhabitants out of a total population of about 7,000,000 (1940). Many Crypto-Jews, mostly Portuguese refugees, settled in Peru early in the history of the country. Here they prospered, and at the beginning of the 16th cent. had achieved a dominant position in the field of international trade. So rapidly did their influence and numbers grow that in 1569 Philip II of Spain introduced the Holy Office of the Inquisition into Peru. A year later the Licenciado, Servan de Cerezuela, reached Lima.

From 1573 to 1806 the Peruvian Inquisition ordered thirty-four autos da fé, and at ten or eleven of them there were Jewish victims, their number ranging from one to fifty-six (1639). Among those condemned to be burned were Juan Alvarez, physician; Moses Lopez; Duarte Nuñez; Manuel Bautista Perez, reported to have been the richest man of the time in Peru and through whose death the Inquisition gained a considerable fortune; Francisco Maldonado da Silva, surgeon, poet and philosopher. It is significant that the arrests preliminary to the great auto da fé of 1639 provoked a severe commercial and financial crisis in Lima, because the trade of the city was concentrated largely in the hands of those implicated. The Office of the Inquisition was abolished in Peru in 1820.

The Jewish population of Peru in the 17th cent. was known to be of considerable proportions. Due, however, to governmental repression, the early Jewish community did not maintain its identity, but became absorbed by the Indian and Catholic element. About 1870 many Alsatian Jews came to Peru, but a half-century later they, too, were assimilated. A third period of Jewish immigration began shortly after the first World War, when a number of Turkish Jews settled in Peru. A little later, Ashkenazic Jews came to Peru from Argentina and Brazil, in addition to a direct immigration of Ashkenazim from Poland and Roumania. Two towns, Novosulitiza in Roumania and Tizzotzi in Poland, furnished the bulk of these immigrants.

In 1940 about 1,700 of Peru's Jewish population lived in the city of Lima. Other Jewish settlements were situated at Arequipa, Iquitos, Huancayo, Trujillo, Ica and Piura, none of which had more than one hundred Jews. Some of Peru's remote outposts, in 1942, had one or two Jewish families who, as a rule, were proprietors of stores selling dry goods or general merchandise.

In Lima the Sephardic Jewish colony was established for the longest period. Comprising about one hundred families, the Sephardim, in 1942, had a large and elaborate synagogue and a communal organization known as the Colectividad Sefardi. Ozar Dalim was the philanthropic agency of the Sephardic women. The Ashkenazim were organized into the Union Israelita del Peru, founded in 1926 and afforded governmental recognition in 1937. This agency was a Kehillah, supported by graduated taxes imposed on the membership. The Union Israelita maintained a library, a Yiddish school, a cooperative bank and a Zionist organization. Zionist activity on the part of the membership was encouraged. It was, in 1942, the most influential spokesman of Peruvian Jewry, and exercised extensive control over the religious life of the membership. The German Jews, most of whom came to Peru in the 1930's, organized the Sociedad de Beneficencia Israelita. There were, in 1938, a Yiddish newspaper entitled Peruaner Idishe Tzeitung, and a monthly magazine, Nosotros:

The Jews of Peru were engaged mainly in trade, commerce, and manufacturing. Government positions were for the most part prohibited to them, and Jewish youths prepared to enter the professions as engineers, doctors, druggists and lawyers. The poorly renumerated crafts held no appeal for Peru's Jews.

The Turkish Jews, or Sephardim, were for the most part small traders, peddlers, owners of retail establishments of modest size, and employees of various categories. The German Jews who came to Peru after the rise of the Nazis to power were either employed in businesses established by earlier European immigrants or themselves became small merchants. In 1938 three German refugee college professors were employed at the University of San Marcos, and three at the University of Trujillo.

Jews, particularly the Ashkenazim, introduced the machine-knitting industry into Peru. The products of these factories were distributed by Jewish merchants who, in turn, stimulated sales by encouraging installment buying. Jews also organized local transport in the Lima vicinity, introduced improved methods in the manufacture and sale of furniture, and founded the fur industry.

Anti-Semitism in Peru was, in 1942, directed against alleged Jewish commercial monopolies in these fields. However, despite the fact that Jews pioneered in the development of the transport and knit goods industries, Italian capital, through the Banco Italiano (the leading bank of Peru), had achieved a dominant position in knit goods and transport.

Fostered by the German and Italian embassies and by Axis nationals holding high positions in the Peruvian government, anti-Semitic propaganda grew in intensity between 1933 and 1942. Henry Ford's International Jew was circulated in a cheap Spanish edition, while a large section of the press abetted the anti-Semitic cause. Although in this period anti-Semitic speeches were delivered in the Peruvian Parliament, a bill for the registration and control of Jewish residents was defeated late in 1939. Anti-Semitism forged some degree of unity among Peru's Jews with the formation of a legal committee to defend the rights of Jews, composed of representatives of the various elements in the Peruvian Jewish community.

The prohibition of certain forms of installment selling and peddling in the late 1930's worked considerable hardship among the Jews of Peru. With about 30 per cent of the Jewish population affected, the Asociación Mutualista Israelita del Peru was founded to assist in the trying period of economic readjustment.

As early as 1931 Peru was spoken of as a possible place of colonization for the Jews of Eastern Europe. In 1938 Peru pledged her cooperation at the Evian conference for the solution of the refugee problem, but in that same year the government press maintained an attitude of hostility toward the refugees. In 1941 a presidential decree permitted the immigration of refugees into Peru provided that 2,000 sol (about $800) was deposited with the government for each immigrant admitted. This was to be repaid after two years, provided that the refugee was well established and able to take care of his family.

EDWARD N. SAVETH.

Lit.: Adler, E. N., "The Inquisition in Peru," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 12 (1904) 5-39; Bab, Arturo, "Die Juden im Amerika spanischer Zunge (1492-1916)," Jahrbuch für jüdische Geschichte und Literatur (1927) 138-65; Roth, Cecil, A History of the Marranos (1932); Monin, José, Los judíos en la America española, 1492-1810; Cohen, J. X., Jewish Life in South America (1941); Ruppin, Arthur, Los judios en America del Sur (1938); Conference on Jewish Relations, Information Bulletin No. 4.

PERUSH, see BIBLICAL EXEGESIS.

PERUSHIM, see PHARISEES.

PERUTZ, LEO, novelist, b. Prague, 1884. He participated in the first World War as an officer of the Austria-Hungarian army, and was seriously wounded at the eastern front. Living in Vienna, Perutz became internationally known as the author of historical and fantastic novels, such as Die dritte Kugel (1915), dealing with Hernando Cortez; Der Marquis de Bolibar (1920), a prize winner, depicting the destruction of two German regiments during the Spanish revolution under Emperor Napoleon; and Turlupin (1924), a novel on the French Revolution. In collaboration with Paul Frank, he wrote the fantastic story Das Mangobaumwunder.

His other works include Zwischen Neun und Neun (1918; English trans., From Nine to Nine, 1926); Geburt des Antichrist (1921); Der Meister des jüngsten Tages (1923; English trans., The Master of the Day of Judgment, 1929); Herr, erbarme Dich meiner (short stories; 1930); Sankt Petri-Schnee (1933); Der schwedische Reiter (1936). His novel Wohin rollst du, Äpfelchen (1928; English trans., Where Will You Fall?; 1930) is set in the milieu of post-War Vienna and Soviet Russia. In 1942 Perutz was reported to be living in Palestine.

PESACH, see PASSOVER.

PESACH SHENI, see PASSOVER.

PESAHIM ("Passovers" or "paschal offerings"), third tractate of Moed, the second division of the Mishnah. It contains ten chapters and deals with the regulations for the festival of Passover. The first three chapters are devoted to the prohibition of the eating of leaven (Hametz): the time for its removal from the homes, and various foods that are to be regarded as leaven, and the like. There is also a statement of the kinds of grain from which Matzoth may be made and the bitter herbs that can be used in the festival. The fourth chapter deals with the prohibition of work on the day before Passover, and mentions certain acts of the men of Jericho and King Hezekiah. The next five chapters deal with the paschal lamb: its manner of slaughtering and roasting, cases in which it becomes unclean, those who are to partake of it, and the observance of the second Passover (Num. 9:10-14). The last chapter is devoted to the Seder service, which is described in some detail.

The Tosefta to the tractate has also ten chapters and includes some expansions, such as how Hillel was made Nasi and how Agrippa once tried to determine the number of those who observed the Passover in Jerusalem. Both the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds have Gemaras to the tractate, with much Haggadic material. The latter runs to 121 pages and contains such items of interest as the discussion of the Am Haaretz (49), the various high priests (57a) and the prophet Hosea (87).

Lit.: Lauterbach, J. Z., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 9, pp. 649-50; Danby, H., The Mishnah (1933) 136-51.

PESARO, a seaport on the Adriatic coast of Italy. Jews seem to have been settled there at the end of the 14th cent. In the 15th cent. there were Jewish money lenders in Pesaro, some of whom left the city in 1433, after having been maltreated and robbed by the population. In the history of the Jewish printing industry Pesaro is important as the native town of Abraham ben Hayim dei Tintori, the Dyer, as well as because it was, after 1507, the seat of a printing establishment of the Soncino family. In 1556 the duke of Urbino, who held sovereignty over Pesaro, permitted some Marrano families who had fled from Ancona to settle there, hoping to attract Levantine commerce to the port. These hopes were not fulfilled, and in 1557 the duke started to expel the Marranos from his lands. In 1571 he expelled also those Jews who had fled from the Papal States in 1569. There were still, in 1626, nineteen Jewish banking families in Pesaro, seventy-six well-to-do families, and many poor families. With the transfer of the dukedom of Urbino to the Papal States (1632), the Jews were shut up in a ghetto and subjected to the other restrictions which obtained in the Papal States. After a short period of liberty during the reign of Napoleon, the Jews finally obtained civic equality in 1860, when Pesaro was combined with the kingdom of Piedmont, but the small community did not grow. Not more than fifty Jews were living in Pesaro in the 1930's; they had no rabbi, and the synagogue was closed.

The synagogue at Pesaro, Italy

Lit.: Luzzatto, G., I banchieri ebrei in Urbino (1902); Kaufmann, in Revue des études juives, vols. 16, 20 and 31; idem, in Jewish Quarterly Review, vols. 4 and 9; Cassuto, U., Gli ebrei a Firenze, p. 92.

PESARO MAUROGONATO, ISACCO, Italian statesman, b. Venice, Italy, 1817; d. Rome, 1892. As a champion of the revolution of 1848 to 1849, he was elected in 1849 to the legislative assembly at Venice and appointed minister of commerce, industry, and finance. In this capacity he succeeded in raising funds for the defense of the besieged city. In 1866 he was elected to the Italian parliament, later he became vice-president of the chamber of deputies. In 1890 he was appointed senator. He was a devoted Jew, and was greatly concerned in the welfare of his coreligionists. The Jewish communities of Venice and Rome were especially indebted to him.

Lit.: In memoria di Isacco Pesaro Maurogonato, senatore del regno (1892); Per la inaugurazione del ricordo monumentale a Isacco Pesaro Maurogonato (1894); Fambri, in Rassegna Nazionale, vol. 77 (1894) 268 et seq.

PESHITTA, the earliest Syriac translation of the Bible, the name meaning "simple" or "direct," and indicating that it conforms closely to the Hebrew. The exact date and authorship of this translation are unknown, but it was in existence as early as the 2nd cent. C.E. Christian tradition ascribes it to the request of Abgar, king of Edessa, and the stories about this monarch are so akin to those about the royal family of Adiabene that it is probably that they are a reworking of the conversion of Izates and his family at Adiabene to Judaism. Thus the translation might have been begun in the 1st cent. C.E. and continued in the next, as it is apparently the work of more than one hand. By the 4th cent. the entire Bible was extant in Syriac.

The Peshitta has not been preserved in its original form. Syriac renderings made from the Septuagint, and especially from the text of the latter given in Origen's Hexapla, found their way into it, especially in Genesis and the Minor Prophets. Scholars disagree as to the religion of the translators; some hold that they were Jews and that the work was composed for the use of synagogues, while others think that they were Jewish Christians and Syrian Christians. It is clear from a number of renderings that have a distinctly Jewish tinge that Jews must have participated in the work, whether they were the sole translators or merely assistants. The Targum used by Jews for Proverbs was borrowed by the Jews from the Peshitta.

The Peshitta was first published in the Paris Polyglot Bible of 1645; it was printed separately by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1823.

Lit.: Seligsohn, Max, in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 653-55; Margolis, Max, The Story of the Bible Translations (1917) 45.

PESIK, see CANTILLATION.

PESIKTA. The designation Pesikta is derived from the root pasaḳ, "to cut," "to divide," or "to end," and refers to three different Midrashic works—Pesikta de Rab Kahana, Pesikta Rabbathi, and Pesikta Zutarta. The works are appropriately entitled Pesikta because they are not a continuous homiletic commentary on any one Biblical book, but are a series of separate homilies on different Biblical chapters, or because the chapters expounded in the Pesikta are the Haftarahs, the weekly Biblical reading which usually closes or ends the scriptural reading in the synagogue. The significance of the title is further carried out by calling each individual chapter, Piska ("section" or "division").

The Pesikta de Rab Kahana is an early Midrash attributed to Rab Kahana by early rabbinic authorities. The book was lost during the Middle Ages and was known only from scattered quotations. About the middle of the 19th cent. the great scholar Leopold Zunz collected all the quotations from this Pesikta which were scattered throughout the early literature and brilliantly reconstructed the entire work. In 1868 Solomon Buber published the entire Pesikta on the basis of manuscripts which he found in various libraries.

This Pesikta contains thirty-two sections which include the scriptural readings and Haftarahs for important Sabbaths and holidays. It was written probably in Palestine, for all its Haggadists are Palestinians. Moreover, the collection has an abundance of Greek words, which also points to its Palestinian origin. It was written not later than the end of the 7th cent.

The Pesikta Rabbathi is much younger than Rab Kahana's, and is called "Rabbathi," the larger one, because it contains sixteen more sections than Rab Kahana's. It was written, according to the author's statement in his book, in 845 C.E.

These two Pesiktas have been confused and incorrectly cited because of their similarities and duplication of material. They have, however, literary differences which differentiate them from each other. The author of the Rabbathi ofttimes reproduced whole sections from Rab Kahana's Pesikta, but he rewrote them in his own words, enlarged upon them, and translated the original Aramaic into Hebrew. The Rabbathi also contains excerpts from other Midrashim, such as the Yelammedenu and the Tanhuma.

The Pesikta Zutarta (small one) was written by a Rabbi Tobias, who lived in Germany about 1100. This Pesikta is a commentary on the Bible and the five Megilloth collected from the Talmud and Midrashic literature. This Pesikta is called also Midrash Lekah Tob, probably because each section begins with a verse containing the word "Tob" (good), which is also a play on the author's name, Tobias. BENJAMIN BERNFELD.

Lit.: Buber, S., Pesikta de Rab Kahana, Introduction (1868).

PESSIMISM, see OPTIMISM AND PESSIMISM.

PESTSZENTERZSÉBET, city in Hungary with a Jewish population of 4,500 in a total of 67,000. In the 1870's ten Jewish families settled in what was then called Erzsébetfalva, an industrial town at the outskirts of Budapest. It was largely due to the growth of the Jewish community and the industries and businesses founded by its members that Erzsébetfalva in the 1920's was given city autonomy under the name of Pestszenterzsébet. Stages in the development of the Jewish community were marked by the creation of the following institutions: synagogue (1901); Talmud Torah school (1903); an office for communal administration, divided into cultural, ritual, economic and youth divisions (1921); public school attended by over one hundred pupils (1922); home for the aged established by the Hebra Kadisha (1927).

From 1920 on Rabbi Béla Krishaber was at the head of the community, which distinguished itself by the high standards and intensity of its cultural endeavors. The anti-Jewish laws of 1938 to 1942 caused a sharp decline in the prospering community.

PESUKE DEZIMRA, see PSALMS, LITURGICAL.

PETACH TIKVAH, see COLONIES, AGRICULTURAL.

PETER, the chief apostle among the twelve apostles of Jesus. His original name was Simon Kefas (kefa in Aramaic means rock; the word was translated into Greek as petros, the Latinized form of which is Petrus, in English Peter). Like his brother, the apostle Andrew, Peter was a fisherman. According to John 1:44, the brothers were from Beth-saida, according to Mark 1:16-31 and Matt. 8:5-17, from Capernaum; the two brothers became disciples of Jesus at the same time. According to Matt. 16:18, Jesus gave him the surname Kefas (Petrus) when Peter hailed him as Messiah. This narrative, however, bears the imprint of the beginnings of the Catholic church, therefore it is certainly of later origin.

Peter is the most prominent figure among the apostles in the Gospels, even though he is represented at times as rash, at other times as despondent and, despite his name of rock, of little steadfastness. After the death of Jesus, it was Peter, next to the brothers James and John, the sons of Zebedee, and next to James, the brother of Jesus, who had the greatest authority in the original Christian community. In the gospel history his attitude toward missions to the heathens and toward the observance of Jewish law was less rigid than that expressed in the epistles of Paul. He seems to have wavered at first in his attitude toward the apostle to the heathens and to have been downright negative subsequently. In Jewish Christian tradition Peter is the real apostle of the heathens who follows the false apostle from country to country, eventually disgracing him at Rome. In pagan Christian circles, however, it was related that the two apostles jointly founded the Christian communities at Antioch, Corinth and Rome and that they ended by dying martyrs' deaths under Emperor Nero at Rome.

The Catholic church, on the basis of the three papal enunciations (Matt. 16:18, "Thou art Peter;" Luke 22:31; and John 21:15, "Feed my lambs," and on that of the conferring of the power of the keys, made Peter the first bishop of Rome. It has not been proved that Peter ever was in Rome, much less that he was crucified there. The two epistles by Peter in the New Testament are from the first half of the 2nd cent. The Peter apocalypse and the Gospel of St. Peter, an apocrypha, date from the same century. Ever since the 2nd cent. the church of Rome considered Peter its founder and the head of Christianity. His successors in the chair of Peter, the popes, inherited this dignity from him.

Lit.: Jacobus, M. W., edit., A Standard Bible Dictionary (1909) 656-65; Mastermann, The First Epistle of St. Peter (1900); Archbishop Leighton, Practical Commentary (1748); Pearson, On the Creed (1662); Swete, The Apostle's Creed (1905); Zahn, Einleitung (English trans. 1908); Bigg, in International Critical Commentary, Gunkel, H. (I Peter) and Hollmann, G. (II Peter), in Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments; Dietrich, A., Nekyia, Beiträge zur Erklärung der neu-entdeckten Petrus-Apokalypse; von Harnack, A., Das Evangelium und die Apokalypse des Petrus (1893); Brandes, Georg, Petruslegende (1926).

PETER, 12th cent. rabbi and Tosafist, d. about 1147. He lived in Carenton, department of La Manche, France. Peter was a distinguished pupil of Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam) and of Jacob Tam. He is mentioned in the Tosafoth to Git. 8a and A.Z. 74b, and in several other places. While officiating at the funeral of a Parnas, Peter was killed by participants in the Second Crusade.

Lit.: Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 3 (1927) 355; Ephraim bar Jacob's report, edited by Stern and Neubauer (1892) 63.

PETER THE GREAT, see RUSSIA.

PETERDI, ANDOR, poet, b. Sopornya, Nyitra county, Hungary, 1881. In 1942 he was living at Budapest. His poetry struck the note of compassion with the humble and suffering. He also devoted many short stories to the idealized figure of the small town Jew. Many of his poems, wistful and musical, were inspired by the Palestine revival. Peterdi published many articles in various Hungarian publications, including the organ of cultural Zionism, Mult és Jövő.

He published his Jewish stories under the title A sárga folt (The Yellow Badge, 1922); his volumes of poetry include Szivem (My Heart, 1904); Gyermekversek (Children's Poems, 1904); Lina könyve (Lina's Book, 1905); Uj versek (New Poems, 1906); A mélységből (De Profundis, 1909); A sátor alatt (Under the Tent, 1912); A pacsita énekel (The Lark Warbles, 1913); Válogatott versei (Selected Poems, 1913); Katonák (Soldiers, 1915); Napos mezőkön (Sunny Meadows, 1915); Háborus versek (War Poems, 1916); Peterdi Andor költeményei 1904-1918 (The Poems of Andor Peterdi, 1904-1918; 1918); Éneklő zarándok (The Singing Pilgrim, 1926).

PÉTERFI, TIBOR, biologist, b. Dés, Transylvania, Hungary, 1883. He received the M.D. degree from the University of Kolozsvár, and was an assistant at the biological institute of the University of Budapest. During the first World War he joined the staff of the Kaiser Wilhelm institute of research at Berlin-Dahlem. Péterfi published a textbook on histology (in Hungarian, 2 vols, 1909-11); Die Beziehungen zwischen den Muskelfasern und Sehnenfasern (1913); Die Muskulatur der Harnblase (1914); Die Präparier-Wechselkondensoren (1926).

He edited Wissenschaftliche Biologie (1927-33), and compiled the bibliographies for the Jahresbericht über die gesamte Physiologie und experimentelle Pharmakologie (1926-33). He wrote "Mikrophotographie" (1933) for Alfred Hay's Handbuch der wissenschaftlichen und angewandten Photographie (1931-33).

PETERS, MADISON CLINTON, non-Jewish preacher and author, b. Lehigh County, Pa., 1859; d. New York city, 1918. He was educated at Franklin and Marshall College, in Pennsylvania, and at the Heidelberg Theological Seminary, Tiffin, Ohio. He entered the Christian reformed ministry in 1880, serving for more than two decades pulpits in Philadelphia, New York, Brooklyn, and Baltimore. In 1907 he retired to become a free preacher and was, until his death, frequently in demand throughout the country. During Peters' entire life he was a champion of the rights of the Jews, often lecturing on the subject. His best book was Justice to the Jew (London, 1889; New York, 1908; 2nd ed., 1921).

Among his many other pertinent works were Wit and Wisdom of the Talmud (1900), The Jew as a Patriot (1901), The Jews in America (1905), Haym Salomon (1911), The Mission of Masonry (1913), The Jews Who Stood by Washington (1915), Genius and Success (1916), and Americans for America (1916).

Lit.: The New York Times, Oct. 13, 1918; Cohen, Jews in the Making of America, 102.

PETHAHIAH MOSES BEN JACOB HALABAN, known also as Pethahiah of Regensburg, 12th cent. traveler, b. Prague. His travels, which started at Regensburg, or Ratisbon, took place between 1175 and 1190. Pethahiah went eastward through Poland and Russia, turned south to Crimea, visited Armenia, Media, Persia, Babylonia and Syria, and returned to Bohemia via Palestine and Greece. His recorded experiences were compiled by Judah ben Samuel Hahasid under the title of Sibbub (the work was known also as Sibbub Haolam and Sibbub Rabbi Pethahyah). The first edition was published at Prague in 1595; the book was then issued in Latin (1687), in Yiddish (1792), in German (1844), in French and Hebrew (Paris, 1831), and in Hebrew and English as The Travels of Rabbi Pethahyah (London, 1856). Pethahiah told of the existence of dark-skinned Jews in India, who knew nothing more of Judaism than the observance of the Sabbath and circumcision; he described Karaite Jews in Crimea, who were ignorant of the existence of the Talmud. The thriving Jewish communities of Mosul, Baghdad and Damascus and the splendor and influence of Samuel ben Ali, Gaon of Baghdad, were seen by Pethahiah, and he noted the arrival in Baghdad of heathen ambassadors from Armenia to obtain Jewish teachers to instruct their people in the tenets of Judaism. He also gave an account of the rivalry of two Jewish factions in the city of Susa, each wanting possession of the alleged miracle-working remains of the prophet Daniel.

Lit.: Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 3 (1927) 421, 435-36, 440; Dubnow, S., Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes, vol. 4 (1926); Zunz, L., Gesammelte Schriften, vol. 1, pp. 165-66; Güdemann, M., Geschichte des Erziehungswesens, vol. 1, p. 112; Wininger, S., Grosse Jüdische National-Biographie, vol. 5 (1931) 11.

PETLIURA, SIMON, champion of the Ukrainian national idea and anti-Bolshevist president of the short-lived Ukrainian republic, non-Jew, b. Poltava, Ukraine, 1880; d. Paris, 1926. He was an active member of the revolutionary movement of the Ukrainian Democratic Party. After the first revolution of 1905 to 1907 he became an exile in Galicia, but returned to Moscow shortly before the outbreak of the first World War. Immediately after the Russian revolution of 1917 he undertook the organization of a new Ukrainian army with which he attempted to reestablish the autonomy of the Ukraine. Having ousted the Germans who occupied the Ukraine after the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, Petliura established a government which he headed for a short time. When the Bolshevik Red Army appeared to recover the territory for Russia, he joined the anti-Bolshevist leader, Denikin, then allied himself with Wrangel. During this period (1918-20), the pogroms suffered by the Jews in the Ukraine were comparable to the persecutions of the Chmielnicki era. A program of annihilation was instigated.

Upon the dispersion of his army, Petliura fled to Poland and later to Galicia, where he mobilized a new army of refugees from Little Russia. Early in 1920 he joined Joseph Pilsudski, Polish army commander, and relinquished all claims on Eastern Galicia in favor of Poland, rousing hatred and distrust in his own people. Subsequently Petliura fled to Paris as a political émigré.

According to the documents in the Ost Jüdische Historische Archive in Berlin, it is evident that Petliura personally instigated and supported the massacre of thousands of Jews in Ukraine and Poland. Petliura was shot by Samuel Schwartzbard, a Jewish watchmaker, on May 26, 1926, in Paris. Schwartzbard was acquitted on the basis of Petliura's atrocities.

Lit.: Resotsky, "Petliura," Reflex, vol. 1, pp. 87-93; Margolin, The Jew of Eastern Europe (1926) 126-42; Torrès, Henry, Les procès des pogromes (1928).

PETRA, Greek name of Sela, capital of ancient Edom and later of the Nabateans. It was situated southeast of Jerusalem, in the mountains of Seir, east of the depression between the Dead Sea and the Elanitic Gulf, in a valley which the Arabs now call Wadi Musa (Vale of Moses) and where there is a traditional "spring of Moses." A mountain peak in the vicinity is called Nebi Harun (The Prophet Aaron) and is generally held to be the same as the Mount Hor of the Bible. Arab legend identifies one of the mountains near Petra with Sinai.

As a result of its situation, Petra was an important junction-point for the trade between South Arabia and Egypt, and became very rich. This is proved by the extensive ruins which have been found there, including sepulchres, shrines, streets, bridges, aqueducts and other public works. These are for the most part hewn in the rock and adorned with magnificent façades. The number of high places and shrines is remarkably large; however, it is by no means certain that all these places were actually sacred. All the sanctuaries shed light upon the cults of Semitic peoples in general and upon the sacred antiquities of the Bible in particular. However, nothing specifically Jewish has been found, and the inscriptions are generally in Nabatean or Greek, never in Hebrew. The monuments of Petra belong to the age of its prosperity, first under the Nabateans (1st cent. B.C.E. to 2nd cent. C.E.), and then under the Romans (2nd and 3rd centuries C.E.). The extensive and imposing ruins, discovered by Burckhardt in 1812, were visited and studied by many scholars and travelers; excavations were begun by Horsfield in 1929.

Lit.: The Biblical dictionaries under Sela, Rekem and Petra; Brünnow and Domaszewski, Die Provincia Arabia (1904-9); Musil, Arabia Petraea (1907-8); Dalman, G., Petra und seine Felsheiligtümer (1908); idem, Neue Petra-Forschungen (1912); Publications of the Princeton University, etc. (1907 et seq.); Kennedy, Petra (1925); Robinson, The Sarcophagus of an Ancient Civilization (1930); Baedeker, Palestine and Syria.

PETROGRAD, see LENINGRAD.

PETRONIUS ARBITER, see ROMAN WRITERS ON JEWS.

PETSCHEK, family of Bohemian industrialists originating in Kolín, Czechoslovakia. They were three brothers: Isidor, Julius and Ignaz. The two older ones lived in Prague, the third one in Ústí (Aussig). The main industrial products of their factories were charcoal, paper, glass and chemicals. Their domain extended into Czechoslovakia, Poland and Germany. In 1920 they founded a banking-house, one of the largest private houses of this kind in Czechoslovakia. The house of Petschek supported Jewish and non-Jewish social and cultural institutions in Czechoslovakia. The sons of Isidor were Friedrich (1890-1941), who, in 1939, emigrated to South America, and Hans (b. 1895), who, in 1942, was living in New York city as a banker. Walter (b. 1899), the son of Julius, was also living in the United States in 1942.

PEYRÈRE, ISAAC DE LA, Bible student and critic, presumably of Marrano origin, b. Bordeaux, France, 1594; d. Paris, 1676. According to his own profession, he was at first a Calvinist, later a Catholic. Peyrère was one of the first who publicly denied the Mosaic origin of the traditional Pentateuchal text. Characteristic is his following doctrine of the "Pre-Adamites" based on Rom. 5:13: The time preceding the rule of the Law is that of the men created long before Adam, whose creation is mentioned in Gen. 1; the heathen peoples are pre-Adamitic. Adam, who, as narrated in Gen. 2, was the product of a special creation, is the ancestor only of the Jews. The Mosaic Law, which was annulled by Jesus, has merely a particularistic importance; however, the law of salvation which applies to all mankind goes back to Adam.

By means of such teachings Peyrère intended to explain away the intrinsic difficulties of the first several chapters of Genesis. At the same time, these doctrines furnished him with points of support for his conviction regarding the selection of Israel and its future political restoration. He regarded Israel's restoration to political power in its own land, of the early achievement of which he was fully convinced, as connected with the profession by Jews of a Christianity freed from dogma.

Peyrère's writings include: Du rappel des Juifs (Paris, 1643); Prae-Adamitae (1655); Systema theologicum, ex Präadamitarum hypothesi (1655); and Deprecatio Isaaci Peyrerii (1658).

Lit.: Lettres choisies de M. Simon, part 2; Strauss, Leo, Die Religionskritik Spinozas als Grundlage einer Bibelwissenschaft (1930) 32 et seq.

PEYSER, JULIUS I., lawyer, b. Washington, D. C. 1875. He received his law degree from Georgetown University in 1899 and was admitted to the bar in the District of Columbia the same year. In 1900 he received an LL.M. from George Washington University and in 1901 a D.C.L.

Julius I. Peyser

Peyser was made professor of equity practice and judge of the equity moot court at the National University Law School in 1917, and in 1942 still held this post. Among his secondary interests was banking; he was, in 1942, chairman of the Security Savings and Commercial Bank, a position he had occupied since 1915. During the first World War Peyser was a captain in the U. S. Army, working in the office of the Secretary of War as chief of the Division of Health and Housing. Later he was advanced through the ranks to a lieutenant-colonelcy. Peyser was awarded the memorial gold medal of the Union of Gladiators of Macedonia by the Greek military authorities and also the cross of the Order of the Compassionate Heart.

In 1924-25 Peyser was a member of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia and was for a time also president of the District of Columbia Public School Association. He was a deputy commander of the American Legion and a vice-president for the United States of the international organization Fidac. Peyser was president of the United Jewish Charities of the District of Columbia in 1936.

Among Peyser's published studies were: Case Book on Equity; Influence of Mosaic Code on Early Settlers in the United States and Life Affairs of Judah P. Benjamin.

Lit.: American Hebrew, vol. 107, p. 31.

PEYSER, THEODORE A., public official, b. Charleston, W. Va., 1873; d. New York city, 1937. After spending his childhood and adolescence in his native State, Peyser went to Cincinnati at the age of twenty. Here he was a traveling salesman. In 1900 he moved to New York and became an especially successful life insurance agent.

Peyser was elected to the United States House of Representatives in 1932, from Manhattan's "silk stocking" district, a section known for its conservatism and Republicanism. Peyser, however, was elected on the Democratic ticket, in the vote that swept Franklin Delano Roosevelt into power, after the Republican incumbency during the depression. He supported the Roosevelt policies and also served on the Military Affairs Committee and the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. Among his activities in Jewish communal life were his affiliation with the Federation for the Support of Jewish Philanthropic Societies and with several welfare institutions.

PFEFFERKORN, JOHANN JOSEPH, apostate, b. Moravia, 1469; d. after 1521 (place of death unknown). He served a prison sentence for burglary and then left his birthplace. In 1505, together with his wife and children, he was converted to Roman Catholicism in Cologne, and became thereafter the protégé of the Dominicans of the city and a willing tool for the persecution of the Jews and their writings. Although a butcher by trade and entirely uneducated, he published (1507-9) several libelous writings, not of his own composition, entitled Der Judenspiegel, Die Judenbeichte, Das Osterbuch and Der Judenfeind, in which he insisted upon the perniciousness of the Jews and the harmfulness of the Talmud, and demanded the destruction of the latter. Upon the application of Duchess Kunigunde of Bavaria, sister of Emperor Maximilian, the emperor, in 1509, issued an edict empowering Pfefferkorn to seize from the Jews all Hebrew books and to destroy those which seemed to him to be dangerous.

Pfefferkorn began his work in Frankfort, but the Jews there obtained from the archbishop of Mayence the prohibition of any cooperation of the clergy in the confiscation of books. They also took their complaint to the emperor, the archbishop at the same time objecting to Pfefferkorn because of the latter's ignorance and worthlessness. Pfefferkorn, provided with a letter from the duchess, again went to the imperial court to secure a new mandate. On his way he visited the famous non-Jewish scholar and expert on Hebrew, Johann Reuchlin, in order to secure his cooperation for the confiscation; but Reuchlin refused.

After a new imperial mandate was issued, the confiscation of Hebrew books was renewed in Frankfort and other places, and this resulted in numerous complaints to the emperor. Thereupon the emperor issued another mandate in 1510, requiring that authoritative opinions on the character of the Jewish writings be obtained from the German universities and from Reuchlin, as well as from the inquisitor Hoogstraten and the apostate Victor of Carben. Reuchlin's very learned opinion, in which he spoke of the Jews as fellow-citizens of the Holy Roman Empire, was favorable to the Talmud and against the plans of the Dominicans and their tool Pfefferkorn. The Dominicans then published in Pfefferkorn's name a libelous article, in order to disparage Reuchlin in the eyes of the populace and to weaken the force of his expert opinion. Reuchlin retorted in 1511 in a German counter-pamphlet, Der Augenspiegel, in which he exposed the motives of the Dominicans and Pfefferkorn in their entire malevolence and falsehood. Pfefferkorn replied in the pamphlets Der Brandspiegel (1512) and Die Sturmglocke (1514). The battle which thus began as a quarrel between the Dominicans and Reuchlin developed into one between the friends of free knowledge, the humanists, and the enemies of enlightenment. The latter were completely ridiculed in 1515 in Melanchthon's famous Epistolae Virorum Obscurorum.

ARNOLD TÄNZER.

Lit.: Geiger, Ludwig, Johann Pfefferkorn (1871); Kracauer, Isidor, Geschichte der Juden in Frankfurt am Main, vol. 1 (1925); Freudenthal, Max, "Dokumente zur Schriftenverfolgung durch Pfefferkorn," Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland, No. 4 (1931) 227-32; Spanier, Meier, "Zur Charakteristik Johann Pfefferkorns," ibid., No. 4 (1936) 209-29; idem, "Pfefferkorns Sendschreiben von 1510," Monatsschift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, Nov.-Dec., 1934, pp. 581-87; Hirsch, S. A., A Book of Essays (1905) 73-115; idem, The Cabbalists (1922) 197-215.

PFEIFFER, IGNÁC, chemist and communal worker, b. Szentgál, Hungary, 1867. From 1907 on he was professor extraordinary and from 1912 on full professor of applied chemistry at the Budapest Technicum. In 1911 he visited the United States where he studied the use of earth gas in industry. His theoretical and practical research was mainly in the field of lighting and heating for home and industrial purposes. In 1920, when the numerus clausus law barring the masses of Jewish students from Hungarian colleges was enacted, Pfeiffer resigned his teaching post in protest, and from then on served in private industry.

He was closely affiliated with Jewish communal and cultural endeavors, serving as chairman of the Hungarian Palestine Foundation Fund and as president of the "Pro Palesztina" League. In 1938 he was inscribed in the Golden Book of the Palestine Foundation Fund.

PFORZHEIMER, CARL HOWARD, civic and communal worker, b. New York city, 1879. He entered the brokerage business in 1897 and organized his own firm in 1901. Subsequently the firm became known for its brokerage of oil securities. In addition to his activities in the Westchester County branches of various Federal undertakings, Pforzheimer held several national organizational posts; among these was the post as treasurer of the National Municipal League (1921-) and as trustee of the National Institute of Public Administration. In Jewish affairs, Pforzheimer was a trustee of the Jewish Publication Society of America and of the Montefiore Hospital in New York. Known for his interest in the collection of rare books and manuscripts, Pforzheimer was the owner of a library which he made the subject of his The Carl H. Pforzheimer Library, English Literature: 1475-1700, in three volumes (1940). Pforzheimer was also one of the benefactors of the Jewish division of the New York Public Library.

PHANUEL, see ANGELS.

PHARAOH (Egyptian pero, "the great house"), term used in the Bible for the rulers of Egypt. Properly speaking, Pharaoh originally meant the royal court, the government, and in this sense it was retained up to the time of the New Kingdom; after that it was joined to the name of the ruler.

It is noteworthy that the earlier Bible stories speak only of the Pharaoh, never giving the name, as in the case of the rulers mentioned in the stories of Abraham, Joseph (perhaps Amenophis IV), the oppression and the Exodus (possibly Ramses II and Mernepthah) and Solomon (presumably Siamon Pisebehaennu). Others are mentioned by name as follows: Shishak (Egyptian, Sheshonk), who plundered Palestine (10th cent. B.C.E.); Zerah (Osorkon), who was defeated by Asa of Judah; Tirhakah, whose help was sought by Hezekiah; Necho, who slew Josiah and put Jehoiakim on the throne; Hofra, mentioned in Jeremiah.

See also: EGYPT.

Lit.: The Biblical dictionaries and the histories of Egypt.

PHARISEES, the name of a party among the Jews, applied to them chiefly during the two centuries before and after the beginning of the Common Era. The principles held by this party, which are not indicated clearly if at all by the name Pharisee, were older than the date indicated above, and have continued to be held down to the present day. The name Pharisee, which has come into the English language through the Latin translation of the New Testament and represents the Greek word Pharisaios, goes back directly to the Aramaic word Parisha, the equivalent, in popular speech, of the Hebrew Parush, from the verb parash. The root meaning of the verb is "to separate." The name Pharisee would seem to indicate persons who were separated. But opinions differ as to the exact nature and occasion of such separation. On the whole, the most probable explanation is that the name was given to, or taken by, those Jews who in the 2nd cent. B.C.E. adopted a way of life more strict in regard to dietary laws, ritual purity, and the like, than that of the ordinary Jew, and who thereby separated themselves from the less observant portion of the population. A less probable explanation is that the name refers to the separation which marked off the Pharisees from the Sadducees. The name, however, was probably known and used before that separation took place. A third theory connects the name with the facts that the Pharisees built their whole system upon interpretation of the Scripture, and that one meaning of parash is to interpret. But the form of the name Pharisee is not what this theory would require. The name, whatever it really means, is probably nothing more than a party epithet having no close connection with the principles of those to whom it was applied.

The Pharisees, as a party, were those who most steadfastly followed the lead of Ezra (444 B.C.E.), and the Early Scribes (known collectively as the Men of the Great Synagogue) in developing the idea of the Torah as the full revelation which God had made to Israel, and the consequent duty of learning what was taught therein and of obeying what was commanded. In the Pharisaic tradition Ezra was regarded as—after Moses—the real founder of Judaism; and his work is summed up in saying that he raised the Torah to the supreme place in Jewish life and thought which it has held ever since. To Ezra, the Torah was first and foremost the written text of the Five Books of Moses; and the scribes of his own and succeeding times (he was a scribe himself) made it their business to teach and interpret the sacred text so as to make available the revelation contained therein.

At some period after Ezra, which can not be precisely determined, a divergence of opinion began upon the question as to what exactly was implied in the obligation to obey the precepts contained in the Torah. What was to be done when a case arose for which no provision could be found in the written text? The older theory, resting on the immemorial practice of the priests, held that only the written test of the Torah was binding, and that where further directions were needed these were to be given by the priests on their own authority, according to the express warrant of the Torah itself (Deut. 17:9-11). But the effect of this theory was that the written Torah tended more and more to become obsolete, as the occasions multiplied on which additional directions were needed. Therefore a second theory began to be held, to the effect that along with the written text there was, and always had been from the time of Moses, an unwritten tradition which supplied what was wanting in the written text. Acceptance of the Torah and the obligation to obey it meant therefore acceptance of the Torah written and unwritten, and more particularly the recognition of the Torah as the full revelation made by God, not final as limited to the written text, but always unfolded into greater clearness as the meaning therein contained was gradually drawn out. The tendency of the older theory was to make Judaism a mere memory of what had once been a living religion. The actual effect of the other theory was to keep Judaism as a living religion. Those who maintained the older theory were the Sadducees; the exponents of the newer theory were the Pharisees.

This explains the true historical importance of the Pharisees. They were the strongest guardians of the religious vitality of the Jewish people. They had the deepest and clearest insight into the meaning of the religion which was based on the Torah, and they had the greatest influence in making that religion effective in the common life. The actual number of avowed Pharisees was probably at no time more than a few thousands; but they were looked up to with reverence by the mass of the people, who did not accept their discipline. The two closely allied institutions of the synagogue and the school became in their hands, whether or not founded by them, powerful instruments for the development of the religious and moral life of the people, especially as the Pharisees appear to have been the only party working toward that end.

The primary concern of the Pharisees was to make the Torah the supreme guide of life, in thought, word and deed, by study of its contents, obedience to its precepts, and, as the root of all, conscious service of God Who had given the Torah. This was their ideal for themselves, and for all whom they could influence. It follows that the Pharisees were never a political party, although, being in various ways affected by the political events of their time, they were compelled to take such action as was in keeping with their principles. Thus, in the two great struggles with Rome, under Vespasian (68-70 C.E.) and Hadrian (132-35 C.E.), the Pharisees were the party of non-resistance, although their efforts were made vain by the fury of the Zealots.

It was again through their devotion to the religion based on the Torah, and their thorough understanding of what was implied in it, that they were able to carry it safe through the disaster of the fall of Jerusalem (70 C.E.) and the disruption of the Jewish state (135 C.E.). In the synagogue they had developed a type of religion which was independent of the Temple and unharmed by its destruction. And in the schools, more particularly those where the leading teachers (rabbis) studied and taught the Torah, they insured the continuity of the Jewish religion, both as theory and practice, in spite of all outward disasters. The Jewish religion as it is today traces its descent, without a break, through all the centuries, from the Pharisees.

Their leading ideas and methods found expression in a literature of enormous extent, of which a very great deal is still in existence. The Talmud is the largest and most important single member of that literature, and round it are gathered a number of Midrashim, partly legal (Halachic) and partly works of edification (Haggadic). This literature, in its oldest elements, goes back to a time before the beginning of the Common Era, and comes down into the Middle Ages. Through it all run the lines of thought which were first drawn by the Pharisees, and the study of it is essential for any real understanding of Pharisaism.

Rabbinic literature, in all its length and breadth, goes to show that the Jewish religion as interpreted by the Pharisees was continuous with the forms of the religion represented in the older parts of the Hebrew Scriptures, more particularly with the teaching of the prophets. There was no cleavage between the prophets and the scribes; there was a difference of method, and the main result of that difference was to make the teaching of the prophets far more effective than ever it had been in their own time. The religion of the Pharisees, who inherited all the treasure of the older Scriptures, was the attempt to realize in practice the teaching of the prophets, as part of the all-inclusive Torah. In some respects the Pharisees advanced beyond the position represented in the Hebrew Scriptures, as, for instance, in their strong insistence on the belief in a future life. Indeed, on very many subjects of their teaching they went beyond what was to be found in the older Scriptures, but always by way of natural development, not by way of sudden break, still less by decisive rejection.

By Arthur Szyk

CROSSING OF THE RED SEA

Pharisaism, as a religion which lays the chief stress on obeying the declared will of God, and doing in the right way what was commanded, offers peculiar temptations to those who were content to do the outward act and took no thought for the inward motive. In other words, Pharisaism by its very nature laid itself open to the charge of hypocrisy, on the part of those who did not know and did not care to understand its real nature and intention. Hence the abuse of the Pharisees to be found in the Gospels, and echoed through Christendom ever since. There have been hypocrites among the adherents of every religion, and there is no ground in fact for singling out the Pharisees in particular to be the objects of the charge.

While the general principles of the Pharisees have continued to be held down to the present day, the name Pharisee, as the designation of the party, passed out of common use in the 2nd cent. C.E. The word perishuth was used in the ethical literature of the Middle Ages to denote "abstinence," nearly equivalent to "asceticism." R. TRAVERS HERFORD.

Lit.: Herford, R. Travers, The Pharisees (1924); Moore, G. F., Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era (1928); Lauterbach, J. Z., in Kohler Festschrift (1913) 176-88 (English); Finkelstein, Louis, The Pharisees (2 vols., 1938); Abrahams, Israel, Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels (2 vols., 1917 and 1924); Lightley, Jewish Sects and Parties in the Time of Christ (1925); Elbogen, I., Die Religionsanschauungen der Pharisäer.

Sociological Background. The ritualistic and ceremonial controversies between the Pharisees and the Sadducees seem to have originated as differences of local custom. Conditions in Jerusalem appear to have been the background of Pharisaic observances, and provincial conditions that of the Sadducean observances. Thus, for example, the Pharisaic interpretation of Sukkoth as a period of judgment for rain may naturally be associated with the fact that toward the end of September the water supply in Jerusalem began to fail. The festival suggested prayers and rituals connected with the new rains, which were needed to fill the cisterns. Similar differences seem to have led to the controversies regarding the precise time for the observance of Shabuoth. The Pharisees, dissociated from the soil, held that Shabuoth commemorated the historical event of the Revelation, and therefore occurred at a fixed time, namely on the fiftieth day after the first day of the Passover. The Sadducees held that the festival should be celebrated on the fiftieth day after the Sunday of Passover week. This denial of a fixed date for the festival tended to emphasize its character as an agricultural celebration marking the completion of the wheat harvest. The other ritualistic controversies between the sects suggest similar explanations.

It would be an error to presume, of course, that all the Pharisees were of urban origin, and that all the Sadducees were provincials. Indeed, it is known that the Sadducees drew their major following from the high priestly aristocracy in Jerusalem. The rural associations of Sadducism are doubtless due to the fact that this aristocracy was to a large extent land-owning, and followed the provincial customs. The urban associations of Pharisaism depended on the fact that so many of the Pharisaic leaders were scholars by avocation, and artisans or traders in the marketplace of Jerusalem by vocation.

From the beginning, however, Pharisaism included within its midst many who sympathized with it merely because they were dissatisfied with the Sadducean high priestly rulers. As an opposition group, Pharisaism attracted men from all sections of the people. Hence it came about that Pharisaism even in the earliest times—during the Maccabean wars—had at its head two scholars, one drawn from the aristocracy, the other from the masses. This system of dual leadership continued among the Pharisees and, following them, among the Talmudic authorities until the time of the compilation of the Mishnah, at the beginning of the 3rd cent. C.E. The division among the Pharisees accounts also for the curious division of opinion in its midst between the rival schools of Shammai and Hillel, and, after the disappearance of these schools, between those of Ishmael and Akiba. The schools of Shammai and Ishmael tended to be conservative and to take provincial and aristocratic sides of various controversies; those of Hillel and Akiba tended toward the side of the urban-minded artisans.

The analysis of the controversies between these schools, from this point of view, has only begun. It must be continued and studied in the light of our increasing knowledge of conditions in Palestine during the period of the rise and flowering of Pharisaism.

While these investigations into the historical and human background of Pharisaism, and its divisions, are of interest and significance, the student must be cautioned to bear in mind the basic fact that Pharisaism was an outgrowth of the prophetic tradition and its impact on the mind of the Judeans during the Hellenistic and post-Hellenistic periods. There were conflicts between agricultural and urban communities in various parts of the world. Only in Jerusalem did these conflicts lead to the emergence of such a phenomenon as Pharisaism, which had a far-reaching significance for the whole of mankind; and only in Jerusalem did this conflict take the form of an effort to understand more clearly, through mutual discussion, the meaning of spiritual, moral and religious values. It was because of the nature of their differences, and the spirit in which they approached these differences, that the Pharisees were entitled to believe that the Shekinah (Divine Presence) guided their discussions. LOUIS FINKELSTEIN.

Lit.: Bokser, B., Pharisaic Judaism in Transition (1935); Ginzberg, Louis, Meḳomah shel Hahalachah Behochmath Yisrael (1931); Lauterbach, Jacob Z., "A Significant Controversy between the Sadducees and the Pharisees," Hebrew Union College Annual, vol. 4 (1927) 173-207; Loewe, Herbert, "Pharisaism," Judaism and Christianity, vol. 1 (1937) 105-92 (edit. W. O. E. Oesterley); idem, "The Ideas of Pharisaism," ibid., vol. 2; Tscherikower, V., Hayehudim Vehayevanim (1931) 259-69; Zeitlin, Solomon, "Hatziddukim Vehaperushim," Horeb, vol. 3 (1937) 56-89: idem, "The Pharisees and the Gospels," Essays and Studies in Memory of Linda R. Miller (1938) 235-86; Finkelstein, Louis, Akiba, Scholar, Saint and Martyr (1936); idem, The Pharisees, The Sociological Background of their Faith (2nd revised ed., 1939); Allon, G., "The Attitude of the Pharisees toward Roman Rule and the Herodian Dynasty," Zion, vol. 3 (1937-38) 300-22.

PHASAEL, elder son of Antipater and brother of Herod the Great. His father appointed him governor of the city of Jerusalem in 47 B.C.E., and he distinguished himself for his leniency and generosity. Mark Antony named him a co-governor of Jerusalem with Herod in 41 B.C.E.; when Jerusalem was captured by the Parthians he was betrayed and taken prisoner. The following year, in order to escape the vengeance of the Hasmonean king Antigonus, who in the battle against the tetrarchs and Hyrcanus had called on the Parthians for aid, he committed suicide. Herod the Great founded the city of Phasaelis and built the still extant Tower of Phasael in Jerusalem in his honor.

Lit.: The Jewish histories for the period.

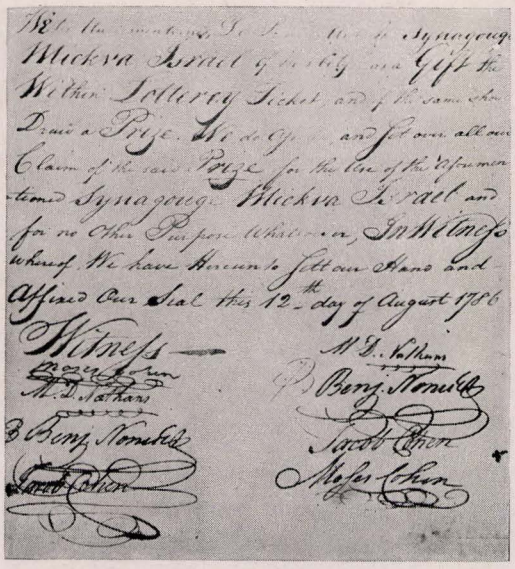
PHILADELPHIA, the largest city in Pennsylvania. Its population in 1940 was 1,931,334, of whom approximately 235,000 were Jews. Until the 19th cent. Philadelphia was culturally, commercially and politically a dominant community in the new world, and among its inhabitants Jews were early and important members. Its situation as a port made Philadelphia a point of departure for traders, and Jews were among those who from Philadelphia set out to penetrate the territory to the west even before William Penn's advent in 1682 was to give it the name of Pennsylvania. It is recorded that one Jonas Aaron lived in Philadelphia in 1703. An apostate, Isaac Miranda, was in 1727 made deputy judge of the court of vice-admiralty.

The granting of land to Nathan Levy in 1740, to be used as a Jews' Burying Ground, gave evidence of the existence of a Jewish community at that time. In September, 1751, there appeared in the Pennsylvania Gazette a notice by Nathan Levy, warning against shooting at the walls of the Jews' Burying Ground. The original cemetery space (30 by 30 feet) was increased, once by an addition granted to Mathias Bush (1765) before it was taken over by Congregation Mickvé Israel. It was this cemetery which eventually became the resting place of Rebecca Gratz, Haym Salomon and others.

Families which assumed an important role in the history of American Jewry for a century or more settled in Philadelphia during the last few decades of the Colonial period. Barnard and Michael Gratz came from Upper Silesia in 1754. The usual occupation of these Jews, not only in Philadelphia proper, but in the territory of Pennsylvania, was trading. They participated fully in the social life of the city, which was the most colorful in the country. A City Dancing Assembly, formed in 1748, had among its charter members David Franks, Samson Levy and Joseph Marks.

The merchandising in which the Jewish settlers engaged obviously had many links with the mother country, for when the Non-Importation Resolutions were drawn up, in 1765, pledging the signatories not to have goods shipped from Great Britain until the Stamp Act was repealed, nine Jews from Philadelphia were among the signers: Mathias Bush, David Franks, Barnard Gratz, Michael Gratz, Benjamin Levy, Hyman Levy, Jr., Samson Levy, Abraham Mitchell and Moses Mordecai. Some of these men were engaged in developing the western territories.

Despite the evidences of Jewish settlers in Philadelphia at the very beginning of the 18th cent., if not earlier, no organized religious worship is recorded until considerably later. While some sort of communal unity is shown by the grant of land for a cemetery, nevertheless the founding of Philadelphia's first and oldest congregation, Mickvé Israel, did not occur until 1745. The congregation worshipped in a small house in Sterling Alley. An increased Jewish population, produced by the arrival of immigrants from the West Indies and other centers of Sephardic settlement, made the building of a synagogue seem imperative, but no move was made until the beginning of the Revolution. The synagogue removed to a new house in Cherry Alley in 1776, and in 1782 the congregation finally dedicated its own building.



An early document from the archives of Congregation Mickvé Israel, Philadelphia

The Revolution, followed by the capture of New York by the British, caused many of the Jews from that city to seek refuge in Philadelphia. Among the temporary residents in Philadelphia was Gershom Mendez Seixas, rabbi of Shearith Israel congregation in New York, who arrived in Philadelphia in 1780, after a period of refuge in Connecticut. Seixas was made the first rabbi of Mickvé Israel, and remained with the congregation until his return to New York in 1784.

Another Jew who found his way to Philadelphia after several years of duress was Haym Salomon; it was from Philadelphia that he carried on many of his financing operations.

Within a short period Mickvé Israel had outgrown its second quarters, and it was with Salomon's contribution of £125 that the £600 necessary for building its own synagogue was raised. Dedicated in 1782, this building, on Cherry Street, was the home of the congregation until 1825. At the time of the dedication of the building in 1782, there were about forty members or electors, and about sixty contributors and seat holders (all men). Jonas Phillips was president, and the other officers were Michael Gratz, Solomon Marache, Solomon Myers Cohen and Simon Nathan. Among the guests at the dedication of the building was the governor of Pennsylvania.

By far the larger part of the Jewish community joined the Revolutionary party. Among the few who were Loyalists was David Franks (in 1748 a member of the Provincial Assembly of Pennsylvania), who lived in England for a while, but eventually returned to spend his last years in the United States. His daughter, Rebecca Franks, was one of Philadelphia's belles, particularly during the British occupation, when she is known to have been a guest at the "Meschianza" fête in General Howe's honor. Other members of the Franks family, however, were officers in the Revolutionary army: Isaac Franks, of Philadelphia, was a colonel and aide-de-camp to George Washington, and David Salisbury Franks was also a colonel. In the American military service were Major Benjamin Nones, Major Solomon Bush, Philip Moses Russel and Michael Levy, whose son was Uriah P. Levy, commodore in the United States Navy. Considerable financial assistance to the Revolutionary cause was rendered not only by Haym Salomon, but also by Aaron Levy and Isaac Moses.

With the coming of peace, the Jews from New York returned to their own city. This resulted in such a decrease in the Jewish community of Philadelphia that the existence of the one synagogue was threatened. A lottery for the benefit of the synagogue was held in 1788. A public appeal, addressed by the congregation to "their worthy fellow-citizens of every Religious Domination," was signed by Benjamin Franklin, then president of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania, who contributed five pounds; by David Rittenhouse, the celebrated astronomer; and by William Rush, William Bradford, Charles Biddle, and other representative Christians. Jacob Raphael Cohen had become minister of Mickvé Israel when Seixas returned to New York, and remained its minister until 1811.

The first charitable organization in Philadelphia was the Ezrath Orhim, a travelers' aid society, established in 1783 by Mickvé Israel. In 1785 a subscription was raised for the benefit of Jewish strangers who were for some reason detained on a boat from Hamburg in the Philadelphia harbor, and were threatened with detention over the high holy days.

In 1783, when Congress left Philadelphia, an address of loyalty was submitted to it by the leading citizens of the city. Among the signers of the address were Haym Salomon, Jonas Phillips, Isaac Levy, Isaac Moses, Solomon Marache, Moses Levy, Jacob Sampson, Moses Cohen, Seymour Hart and Isaac Franks.

When the United States Constitution was adopted on July 4, 1788, Raphael Jacob Cohen, minister of Mickvé Israel, marched in the procession in honor of the occasion. A contemporary writer wrote:

> The Clergy formed a very agreeable part of the procession. They manifested, by their attendance, their sense of the connection between religion and good government. They amounted to seventeen in number. Four and five of them marched arm in arm with each other, to exemplify the Union. Pains was taken to connect Ministers of the most dissimilar religious principles together, thereby to show the influence of a free government in promoting Christian charity. The Rabbi of the Jews, locked in the arms of two ministers of the gospel, was a most delightful sight. There could not have been a more happy emblem contrived, of that section of the new constitution, which opens all its power and offices alike, not only to every sect of Christians, but to worthy men of every religion.

There were, at the close of the Revolution, some 500 Jews in Philadelphia, whose community was bound closely with other Jewish communities in the country. Mickvé Israel, together with Shearith Israel in New York and the congregations of Newport and Richmond, delivered an address of congratulation to George Washington in 1790 after he had assumed the presidency.

During the yellow fever epidemic (1793) in Philadelphia, which was then the capital of the country, Washington lived in Germantown, in a house owned by Isaac Franks.

The First Half of the 19th Century. Mickvé Israel had followed the Sephardic ritual from the time of its founding. At the beginning of the 19th cent. there were enough German and other Ashkenazic Jews in Philadelphia to warrant the organization of a second synagogue, and in October, 1802, the Hebrew German Society Rodeph Shalom, which later became Congregation Rodeph Shalom, was organized. The place of worship was on Pear Street, between Walnut and Spruce streets. The first cantor, Jacob Lippman, elected in 1819, continued to serve until 1833.

With the gradual growth of the Jewish community —to an estimated 2,500 in about 1850—philanthropic and cultural needs began to be felt. A group of women, among whom were Rebecca Gratz, Mrs. Aaron Levy and Hannah Levy, formed the Female Hebrew Benevolent Society in 1819. It was as the result of the initiative taken by this group that the first Sunday school in the United States was formed, in 1838. Rebecca Gratz, who was the prime mover in this venture, and who became secretary of the society, was the original of the character of Rebecca in Scott's Ivanhoe. The Hebrew Sunday School Society undertook to lay the groundwork of a Jewish education by giving free instruction in Jewish history and cognate subjects to Jewish children. Branches were established throughout Philadelphia.

In the meantime, Isaac Leeser had become rabbi of Mikveh Israel (1829), following Abraham Israel Keys. (The congregation changed the spelling of its name at about this time.) Leeser's presence in Philadelphia was of great importance to the Jews of the entire country, because of his broad learning and enterprising spirit. Both during his incumbency as rabbi of Mikveh Israel (until 1850) and later, until his death in 1867, the activities which he inaugurated marked cultural progress for the American Jews.

During the world-wide excitement aroused by the Damascus blood accusation (1840), Leeser prompted participation in the protests. A meeting was held in the synagogue, at which John Moss presided and which was attended not only by members of the Jewish community, but by Christian ministers. The Occident and Jewish Advocate, founded by Leeser in 1843, was edited by him until his death. Out of a suggestion made by Mordecai M. Noah in The Occident, and supported by Leeser, grew the Hebrew Education Society, organized in 1847. Solomon Solis was its first president. Under its auspices a secular day school was opened in 1851, where twenty-two pupils received instruction. After 1878 the Society narrowed its functions to giving only Hebrew and industrial courses. Leeser's initiative was effective also in the formation of the Jewish Publication Society in 1848, with Abraham Hart as president. Eleven books were published by the Society, but in 1851 most of its property was destroyed by fire and the Society passed out of existence. The Jewish Publication Society of America, which was functioning in 1942, was organized in 1888 at the suggestion of another rabbi, Joseph Krauskopf, who was then serving Congregation Keneseth Israel.

Between 1810 and 1850 the synagogal life of Philadelphia underwent considerable expansion and change. Mikveh Israel retained its original Orthodox tradition. But Rodeph Shalom veered toward Conservatism; it was not to assume the character of a Reform congregation until later. The third congregation to join the synagogue roster of Philadelphia was Beth Israel, founded in 1840 by a group of German and Polish Jews. In 1849 it moved into its own building on Crown Street. Beth Israel began as an Orthodox congregation, but later it joined the Conservative ranks. Gabriel Papé, succeeding Samuel E. Cohen Noot, who officiated in the beginning, was its rabbi until his death in 1872.

Congregation Keneseth Israel, organized in 1847, was one of the first American congregations to adopt the Reform ritual. B. H. Gotthelf was the first rabbi. Until 1854 the members worshipped in various halls. Then the congregation purchased a church on New Market Street. L. Naumburg became rabbi in 1850, and continued to serve for ten years, latterly as reader. In 1858 Solomon Deutsch assumed the pulpit.

The Civil War Period and After. So far developed was the Jewish settlement in the United States in the second half of the 19th cent. that the need for a theological seminary was manifest, and the Hebrew Education Society of Philadelphia and the Board of Delegates of American Israelites, a standing committee of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, cooperated in planning such a seminary. The institution, Maimonides College, was opened in Philadelphia in 1867, with Leeser as provost. His associates on the faculty were Sabato Morais, who had taken Leeser's place at Mikveh Israel, Marcus Jastrow, Aaron S. Bettelheim, L. Buttenwieser and William H. Williams. The board of trustees was under the chairmanship of Abraham Hart, with Mayer Sulzberger as secretary. The college functioned only until 1873.

The Jewish population of Philadelphia grew rapidly; by 1880, when the influx of immigration from Russia began, it was estimated that there were about 12,000 Jews in the community. Such growth demanded increased welfare and social activity. In 1855 the Jewish Foster Home was established, dedicating its own building that same year, on Eleventh Street, above Jefferson. Until 1874 the Foster Home was maintained under the auspices of a committee made up entirely of women representing the various synagogues; in 1874 the women transferred control to a group of men, and themselves remained as an associate board. In 1881 the home was transferred to a new building in Germantown.

Hospitalization facilities for the Jewish community presented a problem also, in view of the increasing population. In 1864 plans for the construction of a Jewish hospital were initiated by Abraham Sulzberger. The following year the hospital was incorporated, and opened in West Philadelphia. A Home for the Aged and Infirm was added in 1866. In 1873 the hospital moved to new quarters on Old York Road. Subsequently, at the end of the 19th cent., it became one of the most complete hospital units in the country.

A second child welfare group, the Orphans' Guardians, was organized in 1868, under the stimulation of Samuel Hirsch, rabbi of Keneseth Israel. Unlike the Foster Home program, the plans of the Orphans' Guardians called for the placement of children in homes, and thus the latter group pioneered in child placement and adoption.

In 1869 the Society of the United Hebrew Charities, comprising six organizations, was founded. In 1873 the Jewish Maternity Association was established. The Young Men's Hebrew Association in Philadelphia was formed in 1875, with Mayer Sulzberger as president. As early as 1843 there was some coordinated effort, among the welfare societies of the Philadelphia Jewish community, to raise their funds jointly. Balls or dinners were given for this purpose. Beginning with 1855, the Hebrew Charity Ball Association gave an annual ball, and until the formation of the Federation of Jewish Charities, in 1901, Philadelphia employed this means of contributing to the subscription funds of several philanthropic groups simultaneously. The B'nai B'rith established a lodge in Philadelphia in 1852. The social life of the Jewish community was furthered by the organization, in 1853, of the Mercantile Club, which was incorporated in 1869. After the discontinuance of The Occident in 1869, there was no Jewish periodical in Philadelphia until 1874, when The Jewish Record, a weekly, appeared, continuing until 1886.

Sabato Morais, who was rabbi of Mikveh Israel from 1851 to 1897, was active in Jewish and general communal life. Rodeph Shalom had several changes of rabbis: Naphtali Kahn and Louis Solomon (1847), Bernard Illowy (1853-54), Henry Vidaver (1860-65). Marcus Jastrow, who became rabbi in 1866, to remain in active service until 1892 and from then until his death (1903) as emeritus, contributed his scholarly ability to the Conservative cause. Keneseth Israel also had several rabbis between 1850 and 1880; two of the most influential in the Reform cause were David Einhorn (1861-65) and Samuel Hirsch (1866-86). The congregation had moved into a new building in 1847. Hirsch was responsible for the organization of a branch of the Alliance Israélite Universelle in Philadelphia, which was later of great aid to the settlement of Russian immigrants in the 1880's. M. Elkin was rabbi of Beth Israel from 1872, when Papé died, to 1881.

Isaac Leeser became rabbi of the newly-founded Beth-El Emeth in 1857, and remained until his death in 1868. George Jacobs succeeded Leeser, and when he died, in 1884, the congregation dissolved. A new congregation of this period was Adath Jeshurun (1858), with S. B. Breidenbach as rabbi; in 1864 it moved into a synagogue formerly occupied by Keneseth Israel, and in 1874 it moved into a building previously occupied by Rodeph Shalom. In 1875 B'nai Israel, which was to remain Orthodox, was formed, although it was not until 1885 that a rabbi—Benjamin Block—was engaged. Chevra Thilim was founded in 1880; Benjamin Block was also rabbi there, retaining both pulpits. A synagogue was built on the grounds of the Jewish Hospital in 1873; the synagogue had been organized earlier at the insistence of Leeser, who had been on the Jewish Hospital Committee.

Jacob Frankel of Philadelphia was a chaplain in the United States hospitals during the Civil War, having been appointed by President Abraham Lincoln. The list of Jews from Philadelphia who served in the Civil War included: Isaac M. Abraham, Morris J. Asch, Jacob Solis-Cohen, Max Einstein, who achieved a colonel's rank, Jonathan Manly Emanuel, Lyon Levy Emanuel, Frank Marx Etting, Max Friedman, Abraham Hart, Aaron Lazarus, Benjamin J. Levy, Alfred Mordecai, Jr., Israel Moses, Joseph L. Moss, William Moss, Adolph G. Rosengarten, Joseph G. Rosengarten and Justus Steinberger. Elias Leon Hyneman, a sergeant, fought at Gettysburg and in the Battle of the Wilderness, and died after his voluntary reenlistment. Albert Leopold Snowberger died of wounds received at Fredericksburg in 1862, when he was only seventeen years old.

On the occasion of the Centennial Exhibition in 1876, marking the independence of the United States, a statue by Sir Moses Ezekiel, representing religious liberty and dedicated to the people of the United States, was presented by the B'nai B'rith and the Israelites of America, and placed in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia.

The Immigration from Eastern Europe. The persecutions of the Jews in Russia, which became aggravated at the beginning of the 1880's, eventually brought the same changes to the Jewish community of Philadelphia that they brought to Jewish communities everywhere in the United States. Although there were already Jews, among the 12,000 resident in Philadelphia in 1880, who were neither of Sephardic descent nor descendants of settlers in the Germanic countries, and although Beth Israel, when it was founded in 1840, was scoffingly called the "Polish Shul" by those who had a priority in citizenship, the real influx of Eastern European Jewry began with the heavy immigration in the 1880's. As was true in other cities, the Jewish community promptly came to the assistance of those who fled from Russia. In Philadelphia the Alliance Israélite Universelle appealed to the presidents of the various congregations to raise money for relief. The central office of the Alliance in Paris permitted the Philadelphia group to disburse the funds as they saw fit. Eventually $25,000 was raised. The first group of 325 refugees to arrive in Philadelphia had a total of $150 with them. The Association of Jewish Immigrants, with Alfred T. Jones as president, was formed in 1884, and cooperated with the national immigration societies which were formed for the purpose of facilitating the settlement of Jews from Europe in the United States.

The new immigration introduced new viewpoints and interests into the Jewish community of Philadelphia. A number of Orthodox congregations sprang up in the southern section of the city, where most of the new arrivals settled. B'nai Abraham, the first of these, was founded in 1882. Its dedication services, that same year, were attended by Marcus Jastrow, Sabato Morais, Victor Caro and other representative Conservative and Reform leaders. Eleazar Kleinberg, who served from 1889 to 1890, was its first regular rabbi. Baer L. Levinthal came in 1891, to begin a long period of service. B'nai Jacob was organized in 1883. A Hasidic congregation, Hebra B'nai Reuben Ansche Sfard, was organized in 1883, and two years later moved into its own synagogue on Minster Street.

Increasing industrial activity in the city drew many of the new immigrants. With spreading industry came the first attempts at unionization of the manual trades, including those of the dress industry, where Jews were particularly active. The first cloakmakers' strike in Philadelphia, in 1889, which affected several hundred Jewish workers, was lost after two days. A strike which lasted throughout the whole summer of 1890 was finally lost too. Sabato Morais attended almost every meeting the strikers held.

In cultural, fraternal and philanthropic endeavors the new arrivals established their own organizations. A group of young people from among them founded the Russian Hebrew Association in 1884; subsequently it became the Hebrew Literature Society, and retained as its purposes the promotion of Jewish cultural interests and their stimulation among the immigrants from Russia and Eastern Europe and their descendants. B'rith Achim, a fraternal organization, was founded in 1889. A Hachnasath Orechim, or Wayfarers' Lodge, was founded in 1890, and a Moshav Zekenim, a women's organization undertaking the provision of care for the aged, was founded the same year. In 1892 the Talmud Torah, which later became the Central Talmud Torah, was established. Yiddish was the language of most of the newcomers, and as early as 1886 an attempt was made to publish a Yiddish weekly, Dos Licht, which survived for thirty-five numbers. In 1893 Moses Freeman succeeded in establishing another weekly, Die Yiddische Presse, which continued into 1894. Another short-lived publication was the Folksvechter.

During most of the twenty-year period Sabato Morais remained in the pulpit of Mikveh Israel, and aided in keeping the congregation close to the traditional Judaism he advocated as against the Reform influence that was becoming more potent in the other synagogues of the city. In 1887 Leon H. Elmaleh succeeded him, to serve until 1927. Jastrow remained the rabbi of Rodeph Shalom, to be joined, in 1892, by Henry Berkowitz. It was under Berkowitz that Rodeph Shalom became Reform, and it was Berkowitz who augmented the affiliated activities of the synagogue and founded the Jewish Chautauqua Society. Under the rabbinate of Victor Caro, Beth Israel turned further toward Conservatism. Keneseth Israel brought Joseph Krauskopf to its pulpit in 1887, and during his incumbency, which lasted until 1923, it became the largest congregation in the city, as well as the dominant Reform congregation. Krauskopf extended his interests beyond the purely synagogal limits. It was largely as the result of his initiative that in 1888 the Jewish Publication Society was established, and he founded the National Farm School at Doylestown, Pa., in 1897. Adath Jeshurun dedicated its own synagogue in 1886.

Gratz College, the oldest institution in the United States for the training primarily of Jewish religious school teachers, owes its existence to Hyman Gratz, who left to Mikveh Israel a residuary trust fund which came into the possession of the congregation in 1893. In the latter part of 1895 the first course of lectures under the auspices of the trustees of the fund was delivered by Solomon Schechter, and the college was formally opened for regular instruction in 1897. Henry M. Speaker was the first principal; Julius H. Greenstone was principal in 1942.

The Hebrew Education Society, which dedicated its own building, Touro Hall, in 1891, through its industrial courses given both at day and evening sessions, was of great help in aiding the Russian Jewish immigrants to equip themselves for a new mode of life. The National Farm School, backed at first by Keneseth Israel, introduced the means for agricultural training.

In 1888 the Jewish Publication Society of America was organized, starting the presentation of Jewish books in English; Philadelphia thus retained what had been its function during the early days of the Republic—service as a Jewish cultural center. Jacob Solis-Cohen, Jr., was president of the Society in 1942. The Jewish Chautauqua Society, for which Henry Berkowitz was responsible, was organized in 1893 and chartered in 1898, and carried Jewish education by direct lectures to all parts of the country.

The Young Women's Union, organized in 1885, under the auspices of the Hebrew Education Society, undertook the provision of kindergarten instruction for the Jewish children in the southern section of the city. Other features, including a day nursery and shelter, were added, and in 1900, when it occupied a building on Bainbridge Street, it became a full-fledged social settlement. The Young Men's Hebrew Association moved into a new building in 1892. During the last two decades of the 19th cent. branches of several national social and fraternal organizations were established in Philadelphia; among them was the Philadelphia section of the National Council of Jewish Women (1893).

In 1887 the Jewish Exponent, a weekly, replaced the Jewish Record as the English publication of the Philadelphia Jewish community. There was also a publication called the Jewish Woman, which appeared as a monthly in 1892 to 1893, and a German weekly, Die Gegenwart, which lasted from 1895 to 1899.

The 20th Century. The impetus which the Russian immigration had given to the population increase of Philadelphia was carried into the 20th cent. with added vigor. In 1905, there was an estimated number of between 75,000 and 100,000 Jews in Philadelphia; in 1918 there were 200,000. Thereafter the rate of increase slackened.

Within the Jewish community, the first two decades of the century were a period of expansion and ramification. Later the change became rather one of stabilization, with considerable geographic expansion as the city spread. The religious life of the city was enhanced by the addition of numerous synagogues. Among the older congregations, Mikveh Israel hewed to a straight Orthodox line ritually and effected amazingly few changes in rabbis. Leon H. Elmaleh, who succeeded Morais, in 1898, remained in service until 1926, and was followed by Abraham A. Neuman. When the congregation celebrated completion of its second centenary, in 1940, Neuman, the incumbent, was the eighth rabbi the congregation had. Isaac Edrehi was associated with Neuman in the rabbinate of Mikveh Israel in 1942.

Rodeph Shalom, after the rabbinate of Henry Berkowitz (1892-1923) came to an end with his death, was under the direction of Harry W. Ettelson, who had joined the congregation as assistant rabbi in 1919, and Ferdinand Isserman, who had come in 1922. In 1925 Louis Wolsey became rabbi, to be joined in 1937 by Eugene J. Sack as associate. Beth Israel moved into its new synagogue in 1908, during the rabbinate of Marvin Nathan (1905-30). Abraham E. Millgram succeeded Nathan, and subsequently Aaron Decter, who was serving in 1942, became rabbi. Keneseth Israel, remaining in the building it had entered in 1892, which had been somewhat enlarged and improved, was under the rabbinical direction of Joseph Krauskopf until his death in 1923. William H. Fineshriber, who succeeded Krauskopf, was rabbi in 1942. Keneseth Israel also had a long list of assistant rabbis who subsequently became leaders of large and influential congregations in other cities. Among them were Joseph Leonard Levy, associate rabbi (1892-1902), Isaac Landman, who served from 1906 to 1916, and James G. Heller (1916-20). Joseph Klein and Malcolm H. Stern were assistant rabbis in 1942.

Among the older Orthodox synagogues, Congregation B'nai Israel (1875) and Chevra Thilim (1880) merged in 1933, adopting the name Chevra Thilim-B'nai Israel. Benjamin Block was rabbi (1925-). Baer L. Levinthal was rabbi of B'nai Abraham in 1942, having assumed the pulpit in 1891. Joseph H. Snapir, who came to Congregation Kesher Israel (1890) in 1939, was serving in 1942. The Henry S. Frank Memorial Synagogue at the Jewish Hospital used the Orthodox ritual; its building was constructed in 1901, a gift of Mrs. Rose Frank in memory of her husband. Morris Shoulson became its rabbi in 1934, and occupied the post in 1942.

One of the Conservative synagogues to be founded early in the 20th cent. was Shaare Shomayim, established in 1907. The following year it moved into a building which had been rebuilt from a church. Aaron Decter was rabbi from 1938 to 1940, when he left for Beth Israel, and he was succeeded at Shaare Shomayim by Salamon Faber. Max Klein was rabbi of Adath Jeshurun. Among the newer Orthodox congregations was Lenas Hazedek of West Philadelphia, founded in 1917 to provide a religious center for the western expansion of the Jewish population. David B. Swiren, who became its first rabbi in 1921, was still serving as its rabbi in 1942. Its synagogue was built in 1920. B'rith Israel, organized in 1922, following the Conservative ritual, called Abraham Joseph Levy to the pulpit in 1923; in 1942 he still held the position. Its synagogue was erected in 1930.

Philadelphia saw the construction of several synagogue centers in the period after 1920. The West Philadelphia Jewish Community Center, organized in 1923, and housed in its own building from 1927, was one of the most complete of these centers. Its synagogue, following the Conservative ritual, was, in 1942, under the rabbinical direction of C. David Matt, who came in 1929; among the auxiliary activities were a school and a library. Another Conservative synagogue founded during the westward expansion of Philadelphia was Har Zion Temple of Wynnefield, founded in 1923. The synagogue, which housed a school, library and other affiliated activities, was built in 1924, when Simon Greenberg assumed the rabbinate (1924-).

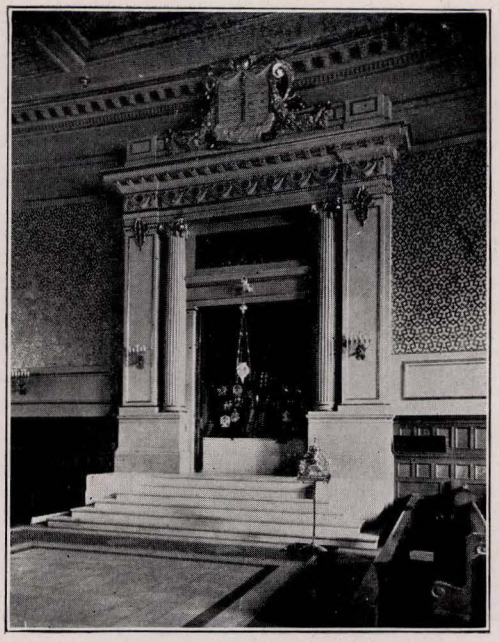
In the Strawberry Mansion section, Congregation Aitz Chaim Vzichron Jacob (Orthodox) was founded in 1924, moving into its own building the same year. Jacob Yerasalimsky was rabbi from 1926 to 1940, when David Pruzansky assumed the pulpit. One of the newest Reform temples was Temple Judea (1930), which dedicated its own building in 1939. Meir Lasker, who had previously served in Havana, Cuba, became rabbi in 1941. Elihu Michelson was, in 1942, the rabbi of the two student houses in Philadelphia, one affiliated with the University of Pennsylvania, where it had been established in 1925, and the other with Temple University, where it had been opened in 1932.

Education. According to a bequest in the will of Moses A. Dropsie (1821-1905) that there be established "a college for the promotion of and instruction in the Hebrew and cognate languages and their respective literatures and in the rabbinical learning and literature," a charter was granted to Dropsie College, Inc., in 1907. Cyrus Adler, called from his post with the United States National Museum and the Smithsonian Institution, became its first president. The college gives instruction leading to the degree of doctor of philosophy, and issues publications within the scope of its studies. Its building at Broad and York Streets was dedicated in 1912; Abraham A. Neuman, who succeeded Adler at the latter's death in 1940, was head of the College in 1942.

After 1900 the elementary and secondary Jewish religious schools increased considerably. Many of the synagogues had their own schools. The first Yeshiva in Philadelphia, Yeshivah Miskan Israel, was founded in 1902, and was combined with the Central Talmud Torah (1892) in 1925. Subsequently the Yeshivah Ohel Moshe was established. The Associated Talmud Torahs of Philadelphia, a union of Talmud Torahs, became affiliated with the Federation of Jewish Charities in 1919. The Associated Talmud Torahs maintained eight educational centers throughout Philadelphia, and also undertook the publication of various books and monographs on Jewish pedagogy. A Council on Jewish Education was one of the subsidiary activities of the Federation. In addition, there were in Philadelphia, in 1942, many private religious schools for children, and branches of the schools maintained by the Workmen's Circle.

Adult education was continued into the 20th cent. by the Hebrew Literature Society, which in 1900 moved into a building on Catherine Street, the site having been procured through the generosity of Joseph Fels. There was also, among the Russian elements, the United Workers Educational Organization, subsequently the Labor Institute, which was an enterprise of the Workmen's Circle, Hebrew Trades and the Socialist Literature Society. The Institute had its inception in 1913, at the initiative of the Workmen's Circle,

Temple Keneseth Israel in Philadelphia



The ark in the synagogue of Congregation Mikveh Israel, Philadelphia

The Jewish Hospital in Philadelphia. From a copyright photograph by J. F. Morsello and in 1926 dedicated its own building, where recreational, musical, dramatic and educational activities were conducted.

Mutual Benefit and Welfare Organizations. A girls' boarding club, the Rebecca Gratz Club, was organized in the winter of 1905 to 1906 at 718 Christian Street. Two years later it moved to larger quarters at 719 North 6th Street; later an adjoining house was added. In 1929 a new building of the Rebecca Gratz Club, including the Ida Hirsch Silverman Memorial Garden and Pool, was dedicated at 534 Spruce Street. The Young Women's Union, which in 1900 dedicated a building at 428 Bainbridge Street for use as a day nursery and shelter, maintained it for these purposes until 1918. Then the name of the building was changed to Neighborhood Centre, and it continued to function as a full-fledged community house. In 1925 the Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association moved into a modern building at Broad and Pine Streets; the facilities and functions accommodated in the building included all phases of communal activity.

Welfare Institutions and Hospitals. The Jewish Hospital, during the 20th cent., became a hospitalization and welfare center of wide scope. In 1901 Meyer Guggenheim presented the institution with $80,000 for the construction of a private pavilion. Later other units were added, including a training school for nurses, the gift of Mrs. Sarah Eisner. Affiliated institutions on the hospital grounds were a Home for the Aged, a Dispensary and a Home for Incurables. Among the other hospitals which were primarily of Jewish origin were Mt. Sinai Hospital, founded in 1900 and dedicated in 1911, Northern Liberties Hospital, organized in 1922, and the Psychiatric Hospital, formally organized in 1941, when it moved into its own building.

Child care continued to receive special attention after 1900. The Juvenile Aid Society was formally organized in 1902, as a Jewish child-placing agency. An Orthodox home for the care of young children, the Hebrew Sheltering Home, was established in 1903. The need for coordinating the admission of Jewish children to the various orphanage and family welfare institutions, as well as to the private placement homes, led to the creation of the Bureau for Jewish Children in 1912, which operated under the Federation. The Orphans' Guardians was merged with the Jewish Welfare Society in 1941. In addition to the Home for the Aged which stands on the grounds of the Jewish Hospital, a Moshav Zekenim (Orthodox) was dedicated in 1908.

The raising of funds for philanthropic purposes in the Jewish community was taken over, in 1901, by the newly-formed Federation of Jewish Charities, of which Jacob Gimbel was the first president. In the subsequent years there was a considerable growth in the budget appropriations. In 1900, prior to the existence of the Federation, the total budget from memberships, donations, and the Hebrew Charity Ball for ten organizations was approximately $95,000. In 1903, after the Federation was in operation, the allotment to the same organizations was about $100,000.

The constituent agencies of the Federation of Jewish Charities in 1942 were: The Associated Talmud Torahs; Association for Jewish Children; Community Health Center, founded in 1921; Downtown Hebrew Day Nursery (1911); Eagleville Sanatorium for Consumptives (1909); Employment and Vocational Bureau (1941); Female Hebrew Benevolent Society (1819); Hebrew Education Society (1848); Hebrew Sunday School Society (1837); Jewish Hospital Association (1865); Jewish Seaside Home for Invalids (1893); Jewish Sheltering Home for the Aged (1890); Jewish Welfare Society (1869); Jewish Youth Community (1939); Mount Sinai Hospital (1900); National Council of Jewish Women, Philadelphia Section (1893); National Farm School (1896); Neighborhood Centre of Philadelphia (1885); Philadelphia Psychiatric Hospital (1941); Rebecca Gratz Club (1904); Strawberry Mansion Hebrew Day Nursery (1925); Vacation Bureau (1923); Willow Crest for Convalescents (1920); Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association of Philadelphia. The local Philadelphia constituent agencies of the United Jewish Appeal were: Army and Navy Committee (1917); Central Talmud Torah (1892); Yeshivah Mishkan Israel (1902); Dropsie College (1907); Employment and Vocational Bureau; Folks Shulen, maintained by the National Workers' Alliance; German Jewish Children's Aid (1935); Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society (1884); Jewish Students' Houses; Philadelphia Anti-Defamation Council (1938); Philadelphia Refugee Resettlement Committee (1937); National Council of Jewish Women, Philadelphia section; Psychiatric Hospital; Strawberry Mansion Yeshiva and Talmud Torah; United Workers Educational Organization, which itself consists of twenty constituent agencies fostering cultural programs among Jewish working people in Philadelphia and the alleviation of distress abroad; Young Judea.

The various national fraternal organizations were represented in Philadelphia, including the B'nai Brith, Free Sons of Israel, B'rith Abraham, B'rith Sholom, Knights of Joseph, Judaic Union, True Sisters, in addition to those already mentioned. The first Hadassah chapter was established in 1913. There was, from the beginning of the American Zionist movement, an active Zionist group in Philadelphia. Louis E. Levinthal, president of the Zionist Organization of America in 1942, was originally from Philadelphia.

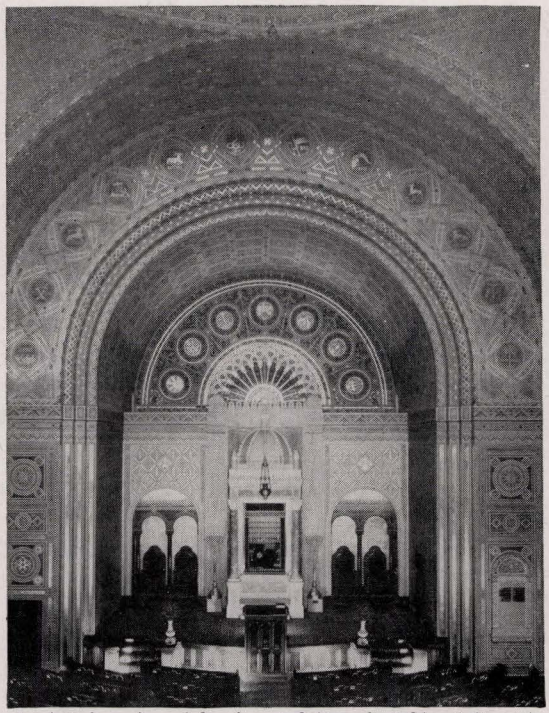
Immigration to Philadelphia was renewed after 1933, with the departure of Jews from Germany and the neighboring countries as they were overrun by Nazis. Approximately 6,000 European Jews arrived in Philadelphia before 1942. Aid and advice were provided, when necessary, by the Jewish Welfare Society, and vocational assistance was given under supervision of the Employment and Vocational Bureau.

Periodicals. The Jewish Exponent, which had been established in 1887, was appearing in 1942 as a weekly paper of the Philadelphia Jewish community. Its editor and publisher was Felix N. Gerson. There were also the Jewish Times, a weekly established in 1925, and the Jewish Current News, a bi-weekly which made its appearance in 1928. The Jewish World, established in 1914, was a daily appearing in Yiddish and English. In 1910 the new series of the Jewish Quarterly Review began to be published from Philadelphia, and continued to appear there; the Jewish Social Service Quarterly (founded in 1924) and Jewish Education (founded in 1928) have had Philadelphia as their publication offices because of the connection of several Philadelphians with their editorial boards.

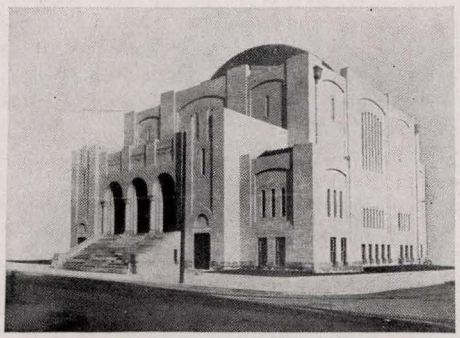
Outstanding Citizens. Philadelphia Jews participated in the civic life of the community from the early periods of Philadelphia history; they were part of the military as well as of the civil forces that did effective work for the American government. In the military, some Jewish officers were prominent. David Salisbury Franks and Isaac Franks attained the rank of colonel in the Revolution, and Isaac Franks later was chief clerk of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court (1819-22). Uriah P. Levy, who became a commodore in the United States Navy, was from Philadelphia.

In the civil government, Isaac Miranda, the apostate Jew, held a judicial post in 1777. The first Jewish practitioner in law in Pennsylvania was Moses Levy, a native Philadelphian, who was admitted to the bar in 1778, became a county judge in 1788 and was elected to the state legislature in 1789. He was made county recorder in 1802, and from 1822 to 1825 he was presiding judge of the district court of the city. Early office holders in the civil government were John Moss, who became a member of the city council in 1823, Alexander Reinstone, who served in the Philadelphia common council from 1875 to 1888, Theodore M. Etting, who served in the common council from 1885 to 1894. Among the first Jews to hold state offices were Jacob Gratz, a member of the state assembly (1835-37) and the state senate (1837-39), and Emanuel Furth (state assembly, 1888-92). Lewis C. Levin was elected to the United States Congress in 1845, serving until 1851, and Myer Strouse served from 1862 to 1867.

The 20th cent. brought rapidly increasing activity of the Jews in the political life of the city. Edwin Wolf was a member of the Board of Education of Philadelphia from 1903 to 1920, and its president from 1915 to 1920. Dr. Solomon Solis-Cohen and Leon J. Obermayer were also members of this board. The roster of state officials included the following members of the state assembly: Benjamin Golder, Max Aaron, H. K. Hecht, Isidore Stern, Simon B. Bransky, Ben Balden, S. J. Gans, and Philip Sterling. Harry Shapiro, Herbert S. Levin and Isadore Stiefel were state senators. Herbert H. Lansburgh was state secretary of labor from 1924 to 1927, and was succeeded by Peter Glick, who served until



An interior view (showing pulpit and Ark) of Temple Rodeph Shalom in Philadelphia



Temple Beth Israel in Philadelphia

The Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association in Philadelphia

1930. Alice Liveright was secretary of the state department of welfare from 1931 to 1935.

In the judiciary there were Mayer Sulzberger, court of common pleas, Horace Stern, court of common pleas and State Supreme Court; Henry N. Wessel, court of common pleas; Theodore Rosen, municipal court and court of common pleas; William M. Lewis, city council and municipal court; Louis E. Levinthal, court of common pleas, Harry E. Kaldoner, court of common pleas and United States District Court judge; Joseph Sloan, court of common pleas; Joseph Moss, court of family relations, and Joseph L. Kun, court of common pleas. Charles Edwin Fox was district attorney (1911-25). A member of the United States Congress in 1942, Leon Sacks (1936-), was a Philadelphian.

The various secular colleges in Philadelphia have had several Jews on their faculties. Sigmund Samuel Greenbaum and Stanley P. Reiman were in 1942 on the medical faculty of the University of Pennsylvania, where David Riesman had earlier been professor of clinical medicine. Ephraim A. Speiser was professor of semitics at the same University; Isaac Husik had been professor of philosophy there. Samuel N. Kramer was at the Museum of the university in 1942, pursuing there his original and important work in the reconstruction of ancient Sumerian literature. Victor Robinson and Ernest Adolf Spiegel were on the medical faculty of Temple University. The Curtis Institute of Music had many Jews among its teachers; the various musical organizations in the city, such as the Philadelphia Orchestra, also had notable Jewish participants. Other citizens of the city who achieved fame and endowed the city with particular benefits were A. S. W. Rosenbach, the book collector; Joseph Fels, the single-tax advocate; his brother Samuel S. Fels, who gave a $300,000 planetarium to Franklin Institute; Edwin Adler Fleisher, whoh organized the Symphony Club and was the donor of the Fleisher Music Library to the city; his brother, Samuel Stuart Fleisher, who founded the Graphic Sketch Club, which in 1942 provided free art instruction to more than 3,000 students; and Jules Mastbaum, who gave a Rodin Museum to Philadelphia. CHARLES S. BERNHEIMER.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, Nos. 9, 19, 22, 23 and 26; Bernheimer, Charles S., The Russian Jew in the United States (1905); Solis-Cohen, Solomon, Hebrew Sunday School Society (1888); Fifty Years' Work of the Hebrew Education Society of Philadelphia (1898); Fifty Years' History of the Jewish Foster Home and Orphan Asylum of Philadelphia (1905); Morais, Henry S., The Jews of Philadelphia (1894); Rosenbach, A. S. W., Historical Sketch of Congregation Mikveh Israel (1909); Rosenbach, H. P., The Jews of Philadelphia Prior to 1800 (1883); Freeman, Moses, Fuftzig Yor Geshichte fun Yiddishen Lebben in Philadelphia (2 vols., 1929-34); Cohen, Mary M., An Old Philadelphia Cemetery (1920).

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF JEWISH MINISTERS, see RABBINICAL ASSOCIATIONS IN AMERICA.

PHILADELPHIA RABBINICAL CONFERENCE, see CONFERENCES, RABBINICAL.

PHILADELPHIA, JACOB, 18th cent. physicist, b. of Jewish parents Philadelphia, Pa., 1720 (the date of his birth is also given on an engraved portrait as August 14, 1735). After receiving a fair education, he began the study of the higher mathematics and the mechanic arts. Assuming the name of his native city, Philadelphia embarked for England, where he enjoyed the patronage of the Duke of Cumberland. After the Duke's death, in 1758, he made a lecture tour of England, illustrating his learned discourses by experiments. He thereupon visited Portugal and traveled through various countries in Europe, where he lectured before learned bodies and attracted wide attention. In January, 1777, Philadelphia was engaged to lecture at the University of Göttingen, but refused to appear after the town had been placarded with posters which ridiculed him as a performer of miracles and extraordinary feats of magic.

While in Nuremberg, in 1778, a local artist engraved his portrait, now in the possession of the Pennsylvania Historical Society. His last lectures are said to have been delivered in Switzerland, in 1781. Two years later, Jacob Philadelphia appeared as applicant for the post of international agent and promoter of trade relations between Prussia and the United States. In his letter of application the writer anticipated the treaty which Frederick II made the following year, wherein was embodied the principle that "free ships make free goods." Many legends cluster about the name of Jacob Philadelphia, who was looked upon as a magician by the uneducated. The last years of his life are shrouded in mystery; neither the year nor place of his death is definitely known.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, vol. 16, pp. 73-94.

PHILANTHROPIN, Jewish school of higher learning in Frankfort, Germany, founded (1804) through the initiative of Siegmund Geisenheimer, an accountant in the employ of Mayer Amshel Rothschild. The first three pupils of this philanthropic institution for orphan boys received only special lessons in Hebrew, writing and "behavior." But as early as 1806 two classes were formally opened at the Philanthropin. The institute was expanded after the "Stattigkeits und Schutzordnung" of 1807 dictated the maintenance of a "general" school to the Jewish community, and it obtained recognition as a public school. The elementary school classes were organized as a trade school for poor children, while a high school (Realschule) served the education of the economically higher classes. Girls' classes were added in 1810.

In 1845 the Philanthropin received its first own house in the center of the Jewish quarter. In the 1870's attendance attained its peak with 900 pupils. The girls' classes were changed into a girls' lyceum in 1908, and in the following year the Philanthropin moved into a modern schoolhouse.

The Philanthropin was for almost half a century under the direction of Dr. Michael Hess. Among his successors were H. Baerwald and S. Adler. The second director as well as several members of the faculty were at all times non-Jews. Michael Creizenach, Isaak Markus Jost, Josef Johlson, Jakob Auerbach, Albert Bielschowsky, Harry Bresslau, Isidor Kracauer, and other outstanding educators were on the staff of this institution. In its religious teachings it was reformist.

In 1941 the Philanthropin was still in existence.

Lit.: Baerwald, Hermann, and Adler, Salo, Festschrift zur Jahrhundertfeier der Realschule der israelitischen Gemeinde zu Frankfurt am Main, 1804-1904 (1904).

PHILANTHROPY. Although philanthropy, meaning love of humanity, is commonly looked on as being a modern word, replacing the archaic and more patronizing words such as charity or alms-giving, it comes closer to the Jewish concept of rendering aid to one's fellow men in distress than either of the other terms. The Jewish attitude, as expressed both in the prophetic and legal portions of the Bible and in the exegetic and codifying literature that followed, was based on the responsibility of man toward his fellow men. The assumption was not that the rich had a special duty to perform, but that each man was a borrower from the wealth that was God's; rich and poor alike, therefore, were responsible for each other's welfare. Two words are used in Hebrew to denote philanthropic acts: tzedakah and gemilath hasadim. Tzedakah means righteousness, and gemilath hasadim works of love, or deeds of loving kindness. In the terminology itself is expressed the ethical attitude, the "ethical fervor" (Encyclopaedia Britannica, "Charity and Charities"), of the Jews in relation to the sharing of worldly goods.

The Mosaic legislation provided for the feeding of the "poor and the stranger" by barring to the private owner the use of harvest gleanings, of the produce from the corners of the field, of the forgotten sheaf, and of the harvest of every seventh year. The second beating of the olive tree was also reserved for the "stranger, for the fatherless and for the widow" (Lev. 19:9-10; 23:22; Deut. 24:19-21). Deut. 15:7-11 discusses the brotherhood of rich and poor alike, and at the same time emphasizes the recurring idea that through giving one obtains blessing and salvation for oneself.

Defections from the observance of such laws were probably frequent, and it was for the prophets to voice a poetic and exalted reproach. Here is found, at almost every mention, the frank statement that philanthropy is only an attempt to rectify social injustice, and that the poverty of one man is due to the greed of another.

Isaiah's "It is ye that have eaten up the vineyard; The spoil of the poor is in your houses; What mean ye that ye crush My people, And grind the face of the poor?" (Isa. 3:14-15) is only one of many such outbursts. Amos 4:1-2 promises fierce retribution upon those who "oppress the poor, that crush the needy," and again (8:4-10) makes the swallowing of the needy and the destroying of the poor the primary reason for vengeance on all mankind. The verse from Proverbs, "Righteousness delivereth from death" (Prov. 11:4), became in later interpretations the source of parables and legends illustrating how tzedakah, willingly and secretly given, was the saving grace. In the Apocrypha, Sirach (4:1-6, 8-10), proceeding from the dictum of Proverbs, "Say not unto thy neighbor, 'Go, and come again, And tomorrow I will give,' when thou hast it by thee," enters into detailed instructions for the prompt administration of justice to the weak and the needy. Tobit, a tale of tribulations, nevertheless points out that the continuous practice of generosity toward one's fellow men ultimately brings a reward, though it may for a while seem unrecognized. In even larger scope, this is the lesson of Job.

In the Talmud, the moral scheme on which philanthropy is based is amplified with parables, many of them harking back to the argument that the practice of tzedakah serves as a penance for the givers, and not only confers spiritual benefit on them, but even saves them from death. Akiba explained the injunction that one must sit long at table to prolong life by suggesting that a poor man might eventually come in, and that the food given to him would prolong the life of the giver.

Of Akiba's own daughter it was told that she averted the predicted fate of dying on her wedding day by unwittingly piercing the eye of a reptile in her room—an accident made possible by the fact that she had earlier in the day given her own marriage gift to a beggar (Sab. 156b). To residents of a town where all died young, Meir said: "Go, occupy yourselves with charity, and you will be worthy of reaching old age." Even the poor must not withhold aid. "Even the beggar who is maintained by charity must himself practise charity" (Git. 7b). The Talmud (Sab. 118a) offers a scale of assistance for vagrants, specifying what they should be given if they stop overnight or over the Sabbath. Both the Bible and the Talmud emphasize the importance of gemilath hasadim, works of love or loving-kindness. Hospitality to wayfarers and friends, visits to the sick and to mourners, dowries for poor brides, care of orphans—all these are included in the roster of the virtues that comprise philanthropy.

Around the early synagogues grew up the first practice of relief commonly provided for and commonly shared. There is some evidence that in the Temple there was a room called Lishkath Hashaim (Chamber of Whispers), in which donations were left anonymously and picked up with equal anonymity. After the Temple was destroyed, such special rooms for the distribution of assistance seem to have existed in every house of worship. The synagogue seems also to have provided shelter for wayfarers, housing them in rooms within its own confines. The Gabbai Tzedakah, or special administrator of philanthropy, was a post of honor in the synagogue. This was the seed of the system of organized philanthropy which was later adopted by the Christian church and still later by agencies representing private and state endeavor. In both the Mishnah and the Tosefta there are references to indicate systematized philanthropy.

Peah 8 goes into details regarding aid to the needy. Professional beggary is discouraged consistently, although earlier concepts had justified even impostors on the ground that they aided givers in obtaining grace. The giving of relief is recommended on a basis that takes into consideration the social status to which the recipient has been accustomed. Constructive relief is the ideal form: "He who advances a loan is greater than he who gives charity" (Sab. 63a). The Jewish ideal of work, work of any kind, is never forfeited. A man is told to skin a carcass on the street for pay, and not to claim relief on the basis of his scholarship (Pes. 113a).

Consideration of the poor, which includes recognition of their equality with the rich in all aspects except the temporality of wealth, is the Jewish principle. Consideration eliminates the attitude of largesse, and assumes the recognition of brotherhood. According to Ephraim Frisch, in his An Historical Survey of Jewish Philanthropy (1924), there are two main thoughts underlying all Jewish discussions of philanthropy, wherever they are found. The first is that the "poor and dependent are the special wards of God and are therefore commended to the conscience and tender solicitude of the well-to-do by their common Maker," and the second is that "all goods in the last analysis come from and belong to God, the Source of all things, human possessors being merely custodians of this trust-fund who must share with those in want." To give assistance is an obligation. The Haftarah for Yom Kippur (Isa. 57:14 to 58:14) includes a passage calling for the freeing of the oppressed, the feeding of the hungry and the clothing of the naked. Consideration of the poor, therefore, is one of the greatest forms of justice, and justice is the expression of religion.

The practice of philanthropy, however, is not in itself enough; the graciousness, the willingness, the promptitude and the secrecy with which it is done give it its real classification from the ethical point of view. Maimonides, in his Yad Hahazakah, codified the comparative degrees of philanthropy. Arranged from the least to the highest degree, his eight points are as follows:

1. He who gives reluctantly.
2. He who gives less than is proper, but in a pleasant manner.
3. He who gives after he is asked.
4. He who gives without being asked.
5. The case where the poor man knows from whom he takes but the giver does not know the recipient.
6. He who knows to whom he gives, without the poor knowing from whom he receives.
7. He who gives charity to the poor, without knowing to whom he gives and without the poor knowing from whom he takes.
8. A high degree, than which there is no higher, is that of one who takes hold of an Israelite who has become impoverished and gives him a gift or a loan or goes into partnership with him or finds work for him, in order to strengthen his hand so that he be spared the necessity of appealing for help.

Later, Jacob ben Asher (d. 1340), in the Arba Turim, discussed the duty and the measure of philanthropy, stressing the urgency of immediate aid and the ephemerality of material possessions. Joseph Caro (1488-1575) in his Shulhan Aruch, still further delineated the concepts and the practices of material assistance as exemplified by philanthropy. There were several later and minor codifiers.

Throughout the Middle Ages, the underlying concepts of philanthropy had been applied to whatever forms the conditions of life had demanded. Jewish prisoners had been ransomed, Jewish wayfarers aided, education provided, and the settlements in Palestine supported. As the modern age developed, the exigencies of communal existence brought further adaptations of the philanthropic attitude. Refugees from the various persecutions were given hospitality by the Jewish communities in the countries where they sought havens, the institutions in Palestine were supported on a larger scale, and gradually a system of collections for local and overseas needs was set up. Out of this grew the program of Social Service.

See also: CHARITY; MENDICANCY; SOCIAL SERVICE.

Lit.: Frisch, Ephraim, An Historical Survey of Jewish Philanthropy (1924); Feinberg, Louis, "Section on Charity from the Shulhan Arukh," Studies in Social Work (1925); Cronbach, Abraham, Philanthropy in Rabbinical Literature; idem, Jewish Philanthropic Institutions in the Middle Ages; Abrahams, Israel, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages (1896) 307-23.

PHILIP, son of Herod the Great and of Cleopatra of Jerusalem, d. 34 C.E. After his father's death in 4 B.C.E., he became tetrarch of the districts of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, Gaulanitis and Panias, by decision of Emperor Augustus, and ruled until his death. Philip married Salome, daughter of Herodias, but had no children by her. He was a just man, moderate in his personal conduct and in his government, and his reign was mild and peaceful. A consistent friend of the Romans, he was the first Jewish ruler to impress upon his coins the image of a Roman emperor, i.e. Augustus and Tiberius. Philip rebuilt Panias, at the source of the Jordan River, and renamed it Caesarea Philippi, in honor of the emperor, and changed the name of Bethsaida to Julias in honor of the emperor's daughter.

Lit.: Schürer, E., A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, division 1, vol. 2, pp. 10-17; Brann, M., Die Söhne des Herodes (1873) 77-87; Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 2, pp. 138, 177, 245.

PHILIPP, ISIDORE (EDMOND), pianist and composer, b. Pest (Budapest), 1863; he was living at New York city in 1942. Philipp studied music at the Paris Conservatory under Georges Mathias, Stephen Heller and Camille de Saint-Saens. He founded a society for chamber music with Remy, Berthelier and Loeb, performing modern French chamber music. From 1903 on he was professor of the Paris Conservatory; he also served as a member of its council and as chairman of the association of conservatory professors. He gave many concerts in European capitals and made his first appearance in the United States in 1934. He taught at the Fontainebleau American Conservatory and gave master classes in Boston and New York (1934-35).

In addition to arranging numerous classical and modern compositions for two pianos, Philipp composed several works for piano and orchestra including Suite fantastique and Serenade humoristique. His educational compositions are many, including Exercises for the Independence of the Singer and School of Octave Playing (2 vols.) were published in New York city. His musicological essays appeared in Ménestrel.

PHILIPPI, FELIX, critic and dramatist, b. Berlin, 1851; d. Berlin, 1921. Like Adolf L'Arronge, Gustav Kadelburg, Paul Lindau, Hugo Lubliner and others, he was a member of a group of writers who, after the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71, created a rather superficial but highly theatrical type of society plays and comedies, for example Hasemanns Töchter, Dr. Klaus, Der Andere and Im weissen Rössl. These plays touched social problems without an attempt to solve them.

Philippi was educated in Berlin and Munich, and traveled extensively through Greece, France and Italy. He settled in Munich as correspondent for several German and French papers from 1875 to 1891, when he returned to Berlin. During his stay in Bavaria he published (1884) the historical essay Die Münchener Oper und das Münchener Schauspiel, and became famous as the first advocate in Germany of Henrik Ibsen, whose Ghosts and Rosmersholm were produced by Philippi at Augsburg in 1884.

He himself wrote his first play, Der Advokat, in 1886. Highly successful were his Wohltäter der Menschheit (1895) and Das Erbe (1899), which deals with Bismarck's fall. Of more than twenty other plays by Philippi, Der goldne Käfig, Das grosse Licht (1901), Das dunkle Tor (1902) and the comedies Meeresleuchten and Gaudeamus igitur, both written in 1887, are noteworthy. During the last years of his life he wrote many novels, including Schattenspiele (1906); Monica Vogelsang (1913); Hotel Gigantic (1915); and Liebesfrühling (1920).

The synagogue at Manila in the Philippines

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, largest island group in the Malay Archipelago, having a population of 16,356,000 (1940), including about 500 Jews in 1933. The Joint Distribution Committee reported the number of refugees in the Philippines in 1941 as 1,250. The Philippine Islands were discovered by Magellan (1521) and conquered by Spain (1565). They were ceded to the United States by the Treaty of Paris (1898). The Tydings-McDuffie Independence Act passed by Congress, signed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt on March 24, 1934, and passed by the Philippine Legislature on May 1, 1934, provided for Philippine independence after a ten-year transitional period. In 1942 the islands were captured by the Japanese.

In 1593 George Rodriguez and Domingo Rodriguez, natives of Spain and Portugal respectively and residents of Manila, were persecuted by the Inquisition as Judaizantes. Between 1593 and 1677 at least eight Marranos residing in the Philippine Islands were accused before the Inquisition. Nearly all were tried in Manila and punished in Mexico City.

The Jews who settled in the Philippines about 1840 came mainly from Alsace, and engaged for the most part in the jewelry trade. In later years, especially after the islands came under the control of the United States, there was increased Jewish immigration from Europe, while a number of Oriental Jews who were familiar with the Spanish language settled in Manila, Cebu, Iloilo and other places where they opened small businesses. In addition, some Jewish business men from the United States came to the islands.

In 1917 there was a resident colony of about 500 Jews, which included about 300 Russian Jews who came mainly from the United States and about fifty each from Germany, France and Austria. Commerce and trade claimed the attention of the majority. There was a Jewish bank director, and several Jewish teachers in the schools and universities of the Philippines. Socially and financially the colony ranked well, but there were no Jewish organizations or organized Jewish activities. On holidays, services were held by a rabbi brought from the Chinese coast.

It was not until 1924 that the first synagogue was built, the Emile Temple, situated in Manila. The service was strictly Orthodox and the synagogue was maintained by dues levied in accordance with the ability of members to pay. In the period following 1933 the synagogue became a center of activity for refugees fleeing Central Europe. Classes in English were organized and every effort was made to adapt the newcomers to their surroundings. The Manila congregation in 1942 had 175 members, and represented the only organized Jewish communal life in the islands.

The majority of refugees were admitted to the Philippine Islands, following 1938, as participants in a program of selective immigration started in the fall of that year. Under a system of temporary immigration established in 1940, other refugees were admitted. In the summer of 1938, Paul V. McNutt, who was United States High Commissioner to the Philippines, suggested the possibility of refugee immigration into the islands. The Jewish Refugee Committee of Manila, with Alexander Frieder as president, was founded and conducted a survey to determine the vocations and professions insufficiently represented in the Philippine Islands. A list of these was sent to the Refugee Economic Corporation in New York city which arranged for the migration from central Europe of persons considered qualified. The corporation established a fund with the Manila committee for the purpose of making loans to the new arrivals.

For those refugees who did not fall into the selected categories, arrangements were made for temporary visas. Each refugee obtaining the two year residence visa was required to deposit a sum of money sufficient to support himself during the period. Refugees of both types made use of a farm property near Manila donated to the Jewish Refugee Committee by Manuel L. Quezon, President of the Philippine Commonwealth.

In 1939 the Refugee Economic Corporation, at the suggestion of the Philippine government, investigated the large-scale settlement possibilities of the island of Mindanao, second largest of the Philippine Islands. A commission of experts was selected and after a three months survey reported favorably on the possibilities of settlement in Mindanao. It was planned to colonize 10,000 refugees but the project was delayed because the requisite immigration legislation was pending for many months in the Philippine National Assembly. When the bill finally became law, the Far Eastern crisis was increasingly menacing. By the time terms of refugee settlement had been determined, the Japanese had attacked Pearl Harbor, the United States had entered the second World War, and the fulfillment of the project had to be postponed. ALEXANDER FRIEDER.

Lit.: Kohut, G. A., "Jewish Heretics in the Philippines in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Century," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 12 (1904) 149-56; Report of Refugee Economic Corporation (1942).

PHILIPPSON, ALFRED, geographer, b. Bonn, Germany, 1864; d. 1939. He was the son of Ludwig Philippson. He traveled in Greece and Asia Minor, became an instructor at the University of Bonn (1892), professor of geography at the University of Bern (1904), and subsequently in Halle (1906) and Bonn (1911). His numerous books include: Der Peloponnes (1892); Thessalien und Epirus (1897); Beiträge zur Kenntnis der griechischen Inselwelt (1901); Forschungsreisen in Westlichen Kleinasien (1903); Das Mittelmeergebiet, seine geographische und kulturelle eigenart (1904); Europa (1905; 3rd ed., 1928); Das fernste Italien (1925); Das südliche Jonien (1936); Das byzantinische Reich als geographische Erscheinung (Leyden, 1939). From 1921 on he published Grundzüge der allgemeinen Geographie, in several volumes. He was awarded the great gold Richtofen medal by the German Geographical Society (1933).

PHILIPPSON, FRANZ, banker and communal leader, b. Magdeburg, Germany, 1852; d. Paris, 1929. He was a son of Ludwig Philippson and came to Brussels at the age of fourteen to be employed in the banking house of Errara. He later founded his own bank which he directed for more than fifty years.

Philippson was a member of the governing board of Jewish communities in Belgium and of the Belgian central consistory whose president he became in 1918. In 1896 he represented the Brussels Jewish community in the administrative council of the Jewish Colonization Association whose vice president he became in 1901, and its president in 1919. He took a deep interest in Jewish social and cultural enterprises and contributed to Jewish colonization in Argentine and Brazil.

PHILIPPSON, LUDWIG, rabbi and author, b. Dessau, Germany, 1811; d. Bonn, Germany, 1889. The son of Moses Philippson, head of the Freischule at Dessau, he received his Ph.D. degree from the University of Berlin (1833). In the same year he was called as preacher and rabbi to Magdeburg, where he remained for twenty-eight years, until eye sickness forced him to resign. From 1862 on he lived in Bonn.

A firm champion of humanitarian and liberal ideas, Philippson was an eager spokesman for Jewish rights. He strengthened and solidified the legal standing of the Jews in Prussia, and intervened in behalf of the Jews in Russia and Turkey. He took a leading part in the rabbinical conferences and the Jewish synod of Leipzig (1869), in the creation of which he was instrumental. He was one of the founders of the Deutsch-Israelitischer Gemeindebund, the association of the German Jewish communities, and of the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, the college for Jewish knowledge in Berlin. Philippson founded a Bible society to rid the German Jews of missionary Bibles, and called into being the Institut zur Förderung der israelitischen Literatur (1855), a society for the promotion of Jewish literature which functioned for eighteen years and enriched Jewish literature with a number of valuable works, including seven volumes of Graetz' Geschichte der Juden.

The Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums, which Philippson founded in 1837 and whose editor he was until his death (1889), was the organ of the Reformers and assimilationists; it gave adequate expression to the manifold social and cultural interests of the German Jews. His translation of the Bible, with German commentaries and illustrations by Gustave Doré, furnished German Jewry with a model Bible for home reading (1839-53). He founded a magazine for Jewish homiletics, Israelitisches Predigt- und Schulmagazin (1834-36), the first of its kind. In the strife between the Orthodox and the radical Reformers he advocated moderate reforms.

His numerous writings include: Die Entwicklung der religiösen Idee im Judentum, Christentum und Islam (1847; 2nd ed., 1874); Die Religion der Gesellschaft und die Entwicklung der Menschheit zu ihr (1848); Reden wider den Unglauben (1856); Israelitische Religionslehre (3 vols., 1861-65); Haben wirklich die Juden Jesum gekreuzigt? (1866; 2nd ed., 1901); Saron (six volumes of poetry and stories, 1843-70); Sepphoris und Rom (a historical novel, 1866); Gesammelte Abhandlungen (essays, 2 vols., 1911).

Lit.: Kayserling, Mayer, Ludwig Philippson (1898); Philippson, Martin, "Ludwig Philippson," Jahrbuch für jüdische Geschichte und Literatur (1911); Elbogen, Ismar, Ludwig Philippson (a lecture, 1912); Kornfeld, Joseph S., "Ludwig Philippson," Central Conference of American Rabbis Year Book, vol. 21 (1911); Elbogen, Ismar, "Der Streit um die positivistische Reform," Festgabe für Claude G. Montefiore (1928) 24-29.

PHILIPPSON, MARTIN, historian, b. Magdeburg, Germany, 1846; d. Berlin, 1916. He was a son of Ludwig Philippson. In 1871 he became lecturer of history at the University of Bonn, then assistant professor at the University of Brussels (1875), and was appointed full professor of history in the same year. He also became a member of the Belgian Academy of Sciences. In 1890 he was elected rector of the university, but retired because of anti-German propaganda.

In Berlin, where he settled subsequently, his academic career was hampered by the strong anti-Semitic sentiment. Therefore Philippson devoted himself exclusively to Jewish activities. In 1896 he succeeded Samuel Kristeller as chairman of the German-Israelite Union of Communities, in which capacity he served till 1912. Among the institutions he helped to found were a settlement of workmen at Weissensee, a central office for aid to transients, an institution for feeble-minded children at Beelitz, the archives of German Jewry and other institutions. He initiated the founding of the Verband deutscher Juden (1904), and served as its first president.

Upon his initiative the Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Wissenschaft des Judentums was founded, which he headed until his death. Commissioned by this organization, Philippson published his Neueste Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes (3 vols.). As successor of Gustav Karpeles he directed for seven years the Verein für jüdische Geschichte und Literatur. His numerous historical works were often and sharply criticized, for instance by Hans Delbrück in the Preussische Jahrbücher. His only larger work on Jewish history, the Neueste Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes, was also questioned by a number of Jewish and non-Jewish historians.

Lit.: Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie; Täubler, in Mitteilungen des Gesamtarchivs der deutschen Juden, vol. 6, pp. 98-104; Philipson, David, "Martin Philippson," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 26 (1918).

PHILIPPSON, PHÖBUS, physician and author, b. Dessau, Germany, 1807; d. Klötze, Altmark, Germany, 1870. He was the brother of Ludwig Philippson. He practised medicine as a country doctor for thirty-five years. Philippson contributed an essay on the expulsion of the Jews from Spain and Portugal to his brother's Predigt- und Schulmagazin, and a novel, Die Marannen, to the Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums. The novel appeared in book form in 1855, and was translated into other languages. He collaborated with his brother on the latter's translation of the Bible into German, and in 1859 he wrote a biographical novel, Der unbekannte Rabbi, which was translated into English.

Lit.: Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums, vol. 34, No. 17; Biographisches Lexikon hervorragender Ärzte (1932).

PHILIPSON, a Jewish family which came from Hamburg to Philadelphia in the late 18th cent. Subsequently, interest in new territories impelled them to travel westward, and three brothers trekked separately to St. Louis, where they settled. The family was musical and otherwise cultured.

JACOB PHILIPSON (d. 1858) reached St. Louis in 1808. He had been a business partner of his brother Joseph in Philadelphia; in St. Louis he opened a dry goods store. But he retired from business in 1811. Philipson was known to have spent the last decade of his life in teaching English, German and French to the children of the growing community.

JOSEPH PHILIPSON (d. 1844) came to St. Louis in 1810. He bought a brewery and was prosperous until 1820, serving on the boards of the Bank of Missouri and the Bank of St. Louis—the first two banks in the city. The economic debacle of 1820-22 impoverished Philipson, and he earned his living for the rest of his life by teaching and playing the piano.

SIMON PHILIPSON (d. 1841) arrived in St. Louis in 1822. He was an observant Jew, and his home—a virtual farm—was the center of discussions and artistic activities for the community. Two of his six children, Louis Philipson and Amanda Philipson, were accomplished pianists.

Lit.: Ehrenreich, Bernard A., "Three Brothers," The Modern View, 1935.

David Philipson

PHILIPSON, DAVID, rabbi, author, and historian of Reform Judaism, b. Wabash, Ind., 1862. His parents moved to Columbus, Ohio, while he was a child, and it was from this city, in 1875, that Philipson, at the urging of Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise, president of the newly founded Hebrew Union College, in Cincinnati, entered that institution as a boy of thirteen. In 1883 he graduated from the University of Cincinnati, and in that same year was one of the four who formed the first class ever graduated from the Hebrew Union College. In 1942 Philipson, still residing in Cincinnati, was the sole surviving member of this class, having been given the honorable title of "Dean of the American Reform rabbinate" many years before that.

After ordination he taught for several months in the preparatory department of the College, instead of accepting a pulpit, but again at the urging of Wise, who was anxious to see a graduate of the College occupy an Eastern pulpit, he accepted the position of rabbi of Har Sinai Congregation, Baltimore, in 1884, serving to 1888. From 1884 to 1886 he carried on post-graduate studies in Assyriology and other Semitic languages at Johns Hopkins University, in Baltimore. In 1888 he was called to the pulpit of Bene Israel Congregation, Cincinnati, which he served until his voluntary retirement as rabbi emeritus in 1938. As rabbi of Bene Israel Congregation, Philipson, as early as 1894, foresaw the trend of population away from the downtown centers of Cincinnati to the suburbs, and advocated the erection of a new temple in the outlying districts; this was consummated in 1906 with the dedication of the new Bene Israel Temple at Rockdale and Harvey Avenue, Avondale, on September 14, 1906.

Philipson served also as an instructor at the Hebrew Union College, teaching Biblical exegesis, Arabic and Assyrian from 1889 to 1891. He was then appointed professor of homiletics, serving from 1891 to 1906. After that year he was a lecturer on the history of Reform Judaism at the College. In 1886 he was the first graduate of the Hebrew Union College to be awarded the D.D. degree.

Philipson's standing as one of the leading Reform rabbis of the United States was unquestioned, and he represented Reform Judaism at numerous sectarian functions, as well as on official government occasions. He participated in the important Reform Jewish rabbinical conference at Pittsburgh in 1885, which drew up the famous "Pittsburgh Platform" containing the principles of Reform Judaism. A staunch advocate of Americanism and of the thoroughgoing compatibility of Americanism and Judaism, he remained throughout his life an opponent of Jewish nationalism of any sort, particularly of Zionism, which he regarded as incompatible with Americanism. He published his views on this subject in the tract The Jew in America, issued by the Tract Commission of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. Much of his writing and speaking was directed against the proponents of theories which contradicted his own concepts of Judaism. He was, however, intensely sympathetic toward Palestine as a place of refuge for the oppressed Jews of European lands and as a center of Jewish culture and learning.

Philipson was a staunch advocate of clean municipal government in Cincinnati, and ardently favored in word and deed the reform of the corrupt boss-dominated government of that city. Many of his lectures dealt with this subject. In 1905 he was appointed a member of the Honest Elections Committee, and this reform movement eventually succeeded in eliminating the corrupt political rule to which Cincinnati was subjected and in setting up a reform charter administration decently and economically run.

Philipson was president of the National Conference on Jewish Activities at Universities, and of the Hebrew Sabbath School Union of America (1894-1903). In 1903 he urged the merging of the latter with the Union of American Hebrew Congregations; later, when, with the aid of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the merger was effected and the Joint Commission on Jewish Education was established for the publication of Jewish religious and educational textbooks and other important Jewish works, Philipson was elected chairman, a position which he held until he was elected honorary chairman for life. He was the first to introduce a fruit and products harvest festival for the festival of Sukkoth (Tabernacles). He served as president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis from 1907 to 1909, and as honorary president from 1929 to 1934. In 1889 he became a director of the Associated Charities of Cincinnati, still holding that post in 1942. He was a charter member and for many years vice-president of the American Jewish Historical Society, a member of the Board of Governors of the Hebrew Union College (from 1892 on), a member of the publications committee of the Jewish Publication Society of America, a member of the American Jewish Committee, and of other national organizations. In 1903, at a convention of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, he suggested the formation of an all-embracing organization of American Jewish educational, religious and philanthropic groups for the discussion and solution of the problems confronting American Jews; three years later he was appointed one of the seven members of the committee which worked out the plans for the establishment of the American Jewish Committee.

Philipson was a member of the board of editors of the new Bible translation published by the Jewish Publication Society of America, was still chairman (1942) of the board of editors of the Hebrew Union College Annual, and was a contributor to the Jewish Encyclopedia and to the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia. He was outstanding as a historian of early American Jewry, especially in the Ohio Valley, in which field he was the pioneer.

The books written by Philipson include: The Jew in English Fiction (1889; 6th ed., New York, 1919); Old European Jewries (1894), the record of a trip which he made in 1892 to the various old centers of Jewish population in Europe; The Oldest Jewish Congregation in the West (1894; new edition, 1924); A Holiday Sheaf (1898), sermons; The Reform Movement in Judaism (1907; new edition, New York, 1931); Max Lilienthal—American Rabbi (1915); Centenary Papers and Others (1919); History of the Hebrew Union College (1925). His autobiography, My Life as an American Jew, was published at Cincinnati in 1941. He edited the Selected Writings of Isaac M. Wise (1900); Reminiscences of Isaac M. Wise (1901, in collaboration with Rabbi Louis Grossmann, of Cincinnati); and The Letters of Rebecca Gratz (1929). He contributed many papers and essays to the Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, especially a lengthy article on the life and work of the famous American Jewish sculptor Moses Jacob Ezekiel (No. 28, pp. 1-62).

Philipson was awarded the honorary LL.D. degree by the University of Cincinnati (1914) and by Lincoln Memorial University (1922), the D.H.L. degree by the Hebrew Union College (1925), and the honorary D.D. degree by the Jewish Institute of Religion, in New York (1938).

ABRAHAM I. SHINEDLING.

Lit.: My Life as an American Jew (1941; an advance printing of a chapter from this autobiography was published in the Contemporary Jewish Record, vol. 4, 1941, pp. 395-407); National Cyclopaedia of American Biography, vol. B (1927) 302-3; Who's Who in America (1942-43) 1748; American Hebrew, Aug. 8, 1932, p. 231; Dr. David Philipson's Fortieth Anniversary (1888-1928) (1928); Dr. Philipson's Jubilee 1888-1938 (1938).

PHILISTINES, a people which settled in the southwestern part of Canaan about the same time as the Israelites; their country was known as Philistia (Hebrew, pelesheth) and this name, in the Greek form Palestina, was ultimately extended over all of Canaan. All the literature and monuments of the Philistines have perished, and what information about them remains is derived from the records of their enemies, such as the Egyptians, the Assyrians and the Israelites.

The Philistines were among the group of "sea peoples" mentioned in Egyptian records from about 1500 B.C.E. on. The center of their civilization was in Crete, a country of sea power, whose independent cities sent forth fleets to ravage the coasts of Asia Minor and northeast Africa. About 1200, according to Egyptian records, which call them Purasati, they attempted a large-scale invasion of Egypt, but were beaten back by Ramses III. The monuments which portray Philistine captives show them as a tall well-formed people, with features greatly similar to those of the Hellenes.

Philistine settlers may have come to Canaan about the same time as the Israelite invasion (the "Philistines" encountered by Abraham and Isaac were really Canaanites who at that time occupied the area later known as Philistia). Shamgar, one of the judges, is said to have slain a number of them (Judges 3:31), but the historicity of this report is doubtful. They became a serious menace to the Israelites only in the latter part of the period of the judges (about the middle of the 12th cent. B.C.E.). This coincides with the fall of Crete to Hellenic invaders and suggests that the dislocated Cretans may have sought to settle in Asia Minor and Palestine. According to the Bible the Philistines came from Caphtor, which may be either Crete (Egyptian, Keftiu) or Cappadocia, in Asia Minor, as the Septuagint suggests. The Philistines apparently came in such large force that they were able to battle successfully against the tribes, especially in view of the fact that their iron weapons, particularly chariots, were much superior to the bronze spears of the Israelites. They struck first at the tribe of Dan and drove it out of the southwest of the country to the far north. They established themselves in five cities: Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath and Ekron, each of which was headed by a seren (perhaps the same word as the Greek tyrannos, "absolute ruler"), joined into a loose confederacy. They allied themselves to the Canaanites, who still occupied the coastal plain; they probably adopted the Canaanite language and at least a part of the Canaanite religion.

The next advance of the Philistines was against the hill country of Ephraim. This tribe was crushed at Aphek and Eben Haezer; the sanctuary at Shiloh was destroyed, and the Ark fell into the hands of the Philistines, to be sent back later when an attack of plague convinced its captors that it was dangerous to meddle with. The Philistines extended their sway into the heart of Canaan, drafting the Israelites into their armies, setting up resident governors or garrisons at such places as Gibeah and Bethlehem, and established a monopoly over the iron industry (I Sam. 10 to 13).

The Philistines might have gone on to still further victories but for the wise action of the prophet Samuel, who secretly anointed Saul, of the as yet untouched tribe of Benjamin, as a leader against the Philistines. Saul gradually gathered an army of volunteers, which he trained against the enemies of Israel to the east before attempting to confront the more formidable enemy. His son Jonathan began the war by attacking the Philistine garrison at Geba. A battle at Michmash, during which the Israelite mercenaries of the Philistines revolted, gained Saul a victory which checked the Philistines for a time. For the next two decades there were only minor skirmishes which left the situation at a deadlock; the Philistines were supreme in the plain, the Israelites in the hills. Eventually, after David, one of Saul's chief captains, had quarreled with his king and had accepted the service of Achish of Gath, the Philistines made a new effort. They outflanked Saul by marching north around his mountain rampart, and crushed him and his army at Mount Gilboa (about 1020 B.C.E.). Their armies pressed forward as far as Beth-shean and were masters of virtually all of Canaan.

This was the extreme limit of the Philistine power. David, after the death of Saul, hastened to Hebron and became king of Judah, and after a civil war of several years, succeeded in becoming acknowledged as king by all Israel. The Philistines, who had apparently been paying no attention to this development, were startled into action only when David besieged Jerusalem, the city of their allies, the Jebusites. They were too late. The Israelites now possessed a real army, far superior in number to that of their enemies; David defeated the Philistines in two battles and drove them as far as Gezer. Subsequently the Philistines were completely subdued by David and were glad to take service with him as mercenaries (the Cherethites, Pelethites and Gittites), who rendered valuable service at the time of the rebellion of Absalom.

The Philistines remained subjects of the Israelites until the division of the kingdom (about 935 B.C.E.) when they apparently became independent, as two kings of Israel are reported as besieging Gibbethon (I Kings 15:27; 16:15). They are later reported as waging war with the kings of Judah, such as Jehoram, Uzziah and Ahaz. Hezekiah conquered them and replaced their ruler in Ekron by one of his own choosing. However, soon afterwards the land of Philistia was overrun by the Assyrian armies and became a tributary to that empire. Little is heard after that of the Philistines. They became successively parts of the Egyptian, Babylonian and Persian empires. Alexander the Great besieged and captured Gaza in 332 B.C.E. and he and his successors settled the regions with Greek immigrants, with whom the Philistines became merged.

The Bible mentions two Philistine deities, Dagon, probably a god of grain, and Baal-zebub, more probably Baal-zebul, "lord of the heavenly mansion." These were probably Canaanite deities. The Philistines are reported in the Bible to have produced noted giants, such as Goliath and his brethren. Excavations show that their art was considerably in advance of any other people in Palestine. By an ironic twist of fate the name Philistine, applied by German students to townsmen, has come to mean "uncultured," and in the English language it designates one deemed antagonistic to artistic or poetic persons, or opposed to progressive ideas.

See also: ASHDOD; ASHKELON; BEELZEBUB; DAGON; EKRON; GATH; GAZA. SIMON COHEN.

Lit.: Macalister, The Philistines (1914); Olmstead, History of Palestine and Syria (1931); Cambridge Ancient History; Biblical dictionaries and commentaries to Samuel, Kings and other books.

PHILLIPS, AARON J., actor and theatrical manager, b. Philadelphia, 1778 (or 1779); d. New York city, 1846. He was the son of Jonas Phillips. Phillips was most successful in grotesque comic roles, being essentially a comedian, particularly during the latter part of his career. He appeared in support of the elder Booth and other distinguished stars of his time. In 1829 and 1830 Phillips managed the Arch Street Theatre in Philadelphia. Mordecai M. Noah, who was his nephew, wrote a play called The Grecian Captive, in which Phillips appeared as a Turkish commander mounted on a live elephant. Another nephew, MOSES S. PHILLIPS (b. Philadelphia, 1798; d. New York city, 1854) son of Naphtali Phillips, was also identified with the American stage, making his debut at the Park Theatre in New York, 1827, and serving as theatrical manager in various cities.

Lit.: Daly, Jews in North America, pp. 102-3, 120; Morais, H. S., Jews of Philadelphia, pp. 374-6; Odell, George C. D., Annals of the New York Stage, vol. 2 (1927) 441; 451; vol. 3 (1928) 5 et seq., 49 et seq.

PHILLIPS, BARNET, journalist, b. Philadelphia, 1828; d. New York, 1905. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1847 and then went to Europe to continue his studies, specializing in chemistry and physics at the University of Paris and of Giesen, Germany. When he returned to the United States he wrote some interesting papers on toxicology in collaboration with Dr. S. Weir Mitchell. In the Civil War he placed his scientific attainments at the service of the Confederate Government. Although after the war Phillips became a cotton and rice factor, in 1870 he left the commercial world for the field of literature. Among his books are The Struggle and Burning Their Ships. He was on the literary staff of the New York Times for over thirty years, and active in the American Jewish Historical Society.

Lit.: Levi, Isidor, in Publications of American Jewish Historical Society, vol. 16, pp. 195-197.

PHILLIPS, SIR BENJAMIN SAMUEL, civic official and communal worker, b. London, 1811; d. London, 1889. Phillips was president of the Institution for the Relief of the Jewish Indigent Blind, president of the Hebrew Literary Society, a member of the Board of Deputies for thirty years and vice-president of the Anglo-Jewish Association.

Together with other Jewish communal leaders of his time, he was active in the struggle to pass the Jewish Disabilities Removal Act and thus to enable Jews to hold public office. In 1846, one year after the act was finally passed, Phillips was elected to the Common Council, becoming the first Jew to hold office under the new law. Previous electees had been refused admission. He was re-elected to the Council every year until 1857 when he was made alderman. In 1859 he was sheriff and in 1865 he was chosen Lord Mayor of London, a post to which Sir David Salomons had been elected in 1855. Phillips was knighted by Queen Victoria and also decorated with the Order of Leopold by the King of the Belgians. He was the father of Sir George Faudel-Phillips.

Lit.: Jewish Chronicle (London), Oct. 18, 1889; The Times (London), Oct. 10, 1889; Roth, Cecil, History of the Jews in England (1941) 253.

PHILLIPS, SIR CLAUDE, jurist and art critic, b. London, 1846; d. London, 1924. He was the son of Robert Abraham Phillips, court jeweler, who, according to Lord Redesdale's Memoirs, "was really the first to introduce the artistic feeling of the 16th century into the modern jeweller's craft"; his mother was a sister of Joseph Moses Levy, founder of the Daily Telegraph. Phillips' education was gained largely in France and Germany. After receiving his B.A. degree from London University, he was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1883. Some of his greater lawsuits necessitated his paying long visits to Rome and Naples. He thus became an authority on international law, and acquired a considerable knowledge of Italian art. Step by step Phillips visited almost all the important galleries of Europe and became one of the best experts on pictures, although his interest in painting was not so much a technical as an emotional one. According to Phillips, the keynote to the art of modern times was "revolt against surrounding circumstances."

Phillips was interested also in music and literature. He contributed to the knowledge of Wagner and Berlioz, and of the French drama, especially Molière. He published studies on Reynolds, Watteau and Titian. For a long time he was London correspondent of the Gazette des Beaux Arts. In 1897 he joined the staff of the Daily Telegraph. In the same year he was appointed keeper of the Wallace Collection. In 1911 he was knighted.

Lit.: Brockwell, Maurice W., preface to Phillip's Emotion in Art (1925); The Burlington Magazine, vol. 45 (1924).

PHILLIPS, ELLEN, social worker and philanthropist, b. Philadelphia; d. Philadelphia, 1891. She was associated with Rebecca Gratz in the administration of the Hebrew Sunday School Society of Philadelphia and officiated as superintendent of the society from 1871 to 1886. Miss Phillips contributed to numerous charities and benevolent institutions, including the Jewish Theological Seminary, the Female Hebrew Benevolent Society and the Hebrew Education Society. Upon her death she bequeathed a large sum to worthy causes, naming ten non-sectarian institutions among her beneficiaries. She also left a large art collection (inherited from her brother Henry M. Phillips) to the Commissioners of Fairmount Park, Philadelphia.

Lit.: Wolf, Simon, The American Jew as Patriot, Soldier and Citizen, 440; Morais, H. S., The Jews of Philadelphia, 150-51, 157, 190.

PHILLIPS, GEORGE, Jamaican government official, b. 1811; d. Kingston, Jamaica, 1886. He was one of the most influential Jews of the 19th cent. Phillips was appointed a member of the Privy Council of the Island in 1861. He was Custos Rotulorum (justice of the peace and keeper of the rolls) for St. James (1862) and for thirty years a magistrate consul for Germany, Spain and Sweden. During the period of insurrection in the 1860's and 1870's, Phillips became known for his calmness at government councils and was credited with having averted disasters by his demeanor. He was buried in the Ashkenazic Cemetery on Elletson Road, Kingston.

Lit.: Jamaica Falmouth Gazette, Dec. 31, 1886; Jewish Chronicle (London), Feb. 4, 1887.

PHILLIPS, HAROLD MEYER, lawyer and chessmaster, b. Kalvaria, Lithuania, 1874. He was brought to the United States in 1887. After receiving his B.S. from the College of the City of New York in 1896, Phillips studied law at Columbia University and entered practice in New York city in 1899. He organized and in 1907 became attorney for the New York Taxpayers' Association, and subsequently held other posts as counsel for organizations.

Winning the New York Sun chess tournament in 1895, Phillips was thereafter a participant in various local, national and international matches. He was champion of the Manhattan Chess Club in 1902, and president of the Club from 1933 to 1941. In 1942 he was on the board of directors of the Club. In 1916 Phillips was also president of the Intercollegiate Chess League, to which he was the donor of the Harold M. Phillips trophy. In 1933 the National Chess Federation of the United States appointed him chairman of the committee which chose the winning team for the tournament held at Folkestone, England.

Phillips was co-author of the Book of the Warsaw Tournament (1935). He served for a time as chairman of Scripta Mathematica, a journal devoted to mathematics and science, and was also a director of Yeshiva College.

PHILLIPS, HENRY, author and numismatist, b. Philadelphia, 1838; d. 1895. He was the son of Jonas Altamont Phillips. Although admitted to the bar of Philadelphia (1859), Phillips never engaged in active practice. Instead he devoted himself to archeology, philology and numismatics, attaining high rank as an authority on these subjects, and becoming known in Europe, as well as in America. Learned societies conferred honors upon him and he was the recipient of two gold medals as awards for his writings. In 1862 he was made the treasurer of the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia and became its secretary in 1868. He was also the secretary of the American Philosophical Society, from 1880 on, and its librarian from 1885 until his death. Phillips was author of important works on early American money, the first books to appear on the subject. They include the History of American Colonial Paper Currency (1865) and History of American Continental Paper Money (1866). The latter work was cited by the United States Supreme Court in legal tender cases.

Phillips also wrote Pleasures of Numismatic Science (1867), and made translations into English of various foreign works of literature, including Poems from the Spanish and German (1878) and Chamisso's Faust (1881).

Lit.: Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography, vol. 4, p. 759; Morais, H. S., The Jews of Philadelphia, 340-41.

PHILLIPS, HENRY MYER, American lawyer and Congressman, b. Philadelphia, 1811; d. Philadelphia, 1884. Admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1832, he first served as clerk in the Court of Common Pleas, and attained high rank in his profession. Later he turned to politics, and in 1856 was elected as a Democrat to Congress, serving one term. He then resumed his legal practice and became interested in various civic and general welfare movements. He was president of the Philadelphia Academy of Music from 1872 to 1884, and an active member of Congregation Mikve Israel.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 22, pp. 139-46; Morais, H. S., The Jews of Philadelphia (1894) 402-4; Appletons' Cyclopaedia of American Biography, vol. 4, p. 759; Biographical Dictionary of the American Congress (1928) 1409.

PHILLIPS, ISAAC, lawyer, son of Naphtali Phillips and Rachel Hannah Seixas, b. New York city, 1812; d. New York city, 1889. He filled several positions of public trust. President Pierce appointed him Appraiser of the Port of New York, which office he occupied for fifteen years. Educational matters claimed his attention in his capacity as Public School Commissioner and trustee. He took an active interest in the affairs of the Congregation Shearith Israel, serving as clerk of the vestry for many years. He was also Grand Master of the Freemasons (1849-54) and an active and influential member of the New York Chamber of Commerce. He should not be confused with Isaac Phillips of Philadelphia, who came from London in 1800 and was the first representative in the United States of the house of Rothschild.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 10, p. 114; No. 16, p. 195; No. 19, p. 98; Markens, Hebrews of America, p. 180.

PHILLIPS, JAY CAMPBELL, portrait painter, b. New York city, 1873. He studied art in New York city and began his work as an illustrator at the age of fifteen. Phillips first exhibited at the National Academy in 1892. Some of his studies and landscapes won various prizes and were purchased by leading American galleries: The First Born by the Corcoran Gallery (1914) and Paradise Bay by the Cleveland Museum of Art. Phillips' first work had been in negro and plantation life; a collection of his plantation scenes was acquired by the New York Public Library. He was the author of Plantation Sketches (1899).

Later Phillips specialized in portraits. Among his subjects were Mayor William J. Gaynor of New York (1914; City Hall); William G. McAdoo and Carter Glass (United States Treasury Building, Washington); Nicholas Murray Butler (Lotos Club, New York); Bernard M. Baruch; Stephen Smith (Metropolitan Museum of Art); Mrs. James Roosevelt; Mischa Elman; Lily Pons, and Edward Johnson, director of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

PHILLIPS, JONAS, American merchant, patriot and founder of the Phillips family in America, b. Germany, 1736; d. Philadelphia, 1803. After living in London for a time with his family, Phillips emigrated to America, arriving in Charleston, South Carolina, in November, 1756, and entering the employ of Moses Lindo, who had brought him over from England. He soon moved to Albany, where he engaged in business, and several years later came to New York city. In 1759

Jonas Phillips. From a painting ascribed to Charles Willson Peale in the collection of the American Jewish Historical Society

Phillips was made a freeman of the State of New York, and he is listed as a freemason as early as 1760.

Phillips appears as one of the signers of the Non-Importation Agreement (1770), a protest against British taxation. When the Revolutionary War broke out, he urged members of the Congregation Shearith Israel in New York city to close the doors of the synagogue during the British occupation of the city. Phillips himself, like many other New York Jews, moved to Philadelphia where he received a printed permit to trade (Sept. 24, 1778). In response to a call for volunteers to swell the ranks of the Continental army, he abandoned his business activities to enlist (Oct., 1778) in a company of the Philadelphia militia, which was subsequently mustered into the field.

Phillips was one of the active founders of the Congregation Mickve Israel in Philadelphia, serving as president at the consecration of its synagogue in 1782. The letter of invitation to George Washington, asking Washington to attend the dedication exercises, bears his signature. Toward the close of the war Phillips returned to New York. But soon afterwards he went back to Philadelphia where he continued in business and also his active interest in Jewish congregational affairs. By his marriage (1762) to Rebecca Mendez Machado (daughter of a rabbi of the Jewish congregation in New York), Phillips became father of twenty-one children and the ancestor of numerous descendants who included notables in various walks of life. Mordecai M. Noah and Uriah P. Levy were among his grandsons. Although Phillips died in Philadelphia, his remains were transferred to New York city and interred in the cemetery on Oliver Street belonging to the Shearith Israel congregation.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 2, pp. 51-61, 107-10, 177-80; London, H., Portraits of Jews, p. 23; Morais, H. S., Jews of Philadelphia (1894) 28-29.

PHILLIPS, JONAS ALTAMONT, lawyer, b. Philadelphia, Pa., 1806; d. Philadelphia, 1862. His maternal great-grandfather was Mathias Bush, a signer of the Non-Importation Act of 1765. After receiving his degree of Master of Arts from the University of Pennsylvania, he studied law in the office of his father, Zalegman Phillips, one of the city's noted criminal lawyers, and was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1826. The son too became a prominent practitioner, and from 1841 to 1854 was solicitor for the city's Board of Health. In 1847 he ran unsuccessfully for mayor on the Democratic ticket. Subsequently President James Buchanan offered him a judgeship in the United States District Court, but Phillips declined.

Phillips was an active board member of Congregation Mickve Israel, as had been his father, and his grandfather (Jonas Phillips), one of the early presidents of the congregation.

PHILLIPS, JONAS B., playwright and lawyer, b. Philadelphia, 1805; d. 1869. He was the son of Benjamin J. Phillips and Abigail Seixas. Among his plays are: The Evil Eye, a melodrama first performed at the Bowery Theatre, New York, April 4, 1831, which proved successful and had a long run; Camillus, a tragedy first produced at the Arch Street Theatre in Philadelphia, Feb. 8, 1833. Both of these were printed, as was also his Zamira, a dramatic sketch and other poems, in New York (1835). He also wrote and produced a melodrama called Cold Striken (1838), with Emanuel Judah in the cast; but it failed to achieve success. In later years Phillips turned to the study of law and became assistant district attorney for the county of New York, filling that office under several district attorneys through successive administrations.

Jonas B. Phillips had a brother, HENRY B. PHILLIPS, (b. Charleston, South Carolina, 1819), an actor of skill and intelligence, remembered for his impersonation of Isaac of York in a dramatization of Ivanhoe. He enacted many roles and also engaged in managerial ventures in various cities.

Lit.: Daly, Jews in North America, pp. 145-46; Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 30, pp. 276, 290, 304; Odell's History of the Theatre in New York.

PHILLIPS, JONAS N., son of Naphtali Phillips and Rachel Hannah Seixas, b. New York, 1817; d. New York, 1874. He was for many years chief of the volunteer fire department in New York city; also president of the Board of Councilmen and acting Mayor in 1857. He figured prominently in the affairs of the Congregation Shearith Israel and was a trustee of its new synagogue in 1860. He married Esther Peixotto, raised a large family and has numerous descendants.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 21, p. 197; No. 27, pp. 113, 123, 157.

PHILLIPS, LAWRENCE BARNETT, artist, inventor and author, b. London, 1842; d. London, 1922. Privately educated, he was the inventor of the rocking bar keyless work for winding watches, a device which was widely adopted. He also devised simplifications of the mechanism for chronographs, perpetual calendars and calculating machines. At the age of forty Phillips turned to art, subsequently exhibiting at the leading galleries in London and the English provinces, and became an associate of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers. He patented improved sketching boxes and palettes.

Phillips was the author of Autographic Album (1866); Horological Rating Tables (1871) and The Dictionary of Biographical Reference, which contained 100,000 names of celebrities and 250,000 references (1873).

PHILLIPS, SIR LIONEL, South African mining magnate, b. London, 1855; d. Cape Town, South Africa, 1936. At the age of twenty Phillips went to Kimberley, South Africa, where he started by keeping accounts and sorting diamonds for (later Sir) J. B. Robinson. In 1881 he became director of the Griqualand West Diamond Company. He was very successful in dealing with the Kaffir workers and improving their workmanship. In 1889 Alfred Beit, who became Phillips' friend and lifetime partner, invited him to enter the firm of Hermann Eckstein and Co., of Johannesburg, as mining adviser.

On the death of Hermann Eckstein, then the most prominent man on the Rand, Phillips became head of the firm. He was elected chairman of the Chamber of Mines, and was acknowledged leader of the industry. Phillips was also leader of the opposition to President Paul Krüger, and participated in the preparation of the Jameson raid. After Jameson's defeat, Phillips was sentenced to death, but later on the sentence was mitigated, and Phillips was fined £25,000 and banished. He went to England. After the South African War, Phillips returned to Africa, and from 1910 to 1915 served as member of the Union Parliament. In 1913, during the Rand strike, he was shot and severely wounded. In the first World War, Phillips served in the ministry of munition. From 1924 on he resided in London. He published Transvaal Problems (1905) and Some Recollections (1924). He was created a baronet in 1912.

LADY PHILLIPS (Dorothea Sarah Florence Alexandra Ortlepp, d. Cape Town, 1940) was a patroness of South African writers and artists. She was instrumental in the founding of the Michaelis Gallery in Cape Town and in the establishment of an art gallery in Johannesburg. She published Some South African Recollections (1899).

Lit.: Phillips, Lady, Some South African Recollections (1899).

PHILLIPS, MARION, jurist and member of the British Parliament, b. Melbourne, Australia; d. London, 1932. After her graduation from the University of Melbourne, she went to London, where she won a research scholarship at the London School of Economics (1905-6). She was awarded the degree of Doctor of Science in economics (1908). Later she became organizing secretary of the Women's Trade Union League (1912) and general secretary of the Women's Labor League (1913).

One of the first women to be appointed Justice of the Peace, Marion Phillips was for a time a member of the London Advisory Committee of Magistrates. In 1918 she became the chief woman officer in the Labor Party, and was given the task of organizing women workers for that party. She was elected a member of Parliament at her first candidature (1929), when she became senior Labor Member, and became secretary of the standing joint committee of Industrial Women's Organizations.

A prolific writer on subjects of interest to women and on industrial questions, she edited the Labour Woman, a monthly publication, and wrote a number of works on industrial questions, including: A Colonial Autocracy (1907); A Working Woman's House (1919); Women and the Labour Party (1918); and Women and the Miner's Lockout (1927).

In 1930 her advocacy of the assimilation of Jews into the general populations of the countries in which they live aroused a storm of controversy.

Lit.: American Hebrew, March 7, 1930; Phillips, Marion, A Colonial Autocracy (1907).

PHILLIPS, MORRIS, journalist, b. London, England, 1834; d. New York city, 1904. He first essayed the legal profession, entering a prominent New York law firm. But his literary talent lured him to journalism at an early age. In 1854 he entered the employ of George P. Morris, editor of the New York Home Journal (later Town and Country). Upon the death of Morris, Phillips became associate editor under the editorship of N. P. Willis. Willis died in 1866, whereupon Phillips succeeded him as editor and subsequently became proprietor of the publication. He continued his journalistic career to the end of his life.

Phillips traveled extensively and was a prolific contributor to the leading magazines and newspapers, especially known for his travel sketches. He is credited with having introduced new features into modern journalism, particularly in the publication of society news. His sprightly book, Abroad and at Home (1893), offered practical hints to tourists.

Lit.: Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography, vol. 4, p. 762; American Jewish Year Book, vol. 6, p. 165; Markens, Hebrews in America, pp. 241-2.

PHILLIPS, NAPHTALI, journalist, b. New York city, 1773; d. New York city, 1870. He was the eldest son of Jonas Phillips and Rebecca Mendez Machado. As a child, he was taken to Philadelphia by his father. Young Phillips, who became a devoted admirer of George Washington, continued to live in Philadelphia until 1801, when he removed to New York city for permanent residence.

Upon reaching maturity, Naphtali Phillips entered upon a career in journalism, securing his first employment with the leading Philadelphia newspaper, Clayphole's American Advertiser. In 1801, soon after his removal to New York, he became the owner of the National Advocate, the city's leading journal of that day, which he directed for many years. He then entered the service of the New York Custom House until his failing sight compelled him to go into retirement.

Naphtali Phillips took an active part in Jewish congregational affairs and wrote an historical sketch on the early settlement of the Jews in New York, together with an account of the Congregation Shearith Israel. He was also prominent in politics as a member of the Tammany Society, to which he belonged for nearly seventy-five years. He was married twice; both his first and second wife belonged to the distinguished Seixas family, and left numerous descendants.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 21, pp. 172-74.

PHILLIPS, NAPHTALI TAYLOR, lawyer and public official, b. New York city, 1868. His grandfather was Jonas Phillips. A member of the firm of Phillips, Leibell and Fielding, he pursued a successful legal career in New York.

He was elected to the New York State Legislature in 1898, serving until 1901. He then became one of the organizers of the Greater New York Democracy which put Mayor Seth Low into office in 1901; the next year he was appointed deputy comptroller of New York and was twice reappointed. From 1902 to 1910 he served as secretary of the Sinking Fund Commission of New York city.

Phillips became actively associated with numerous social and educational institutions, chief among them the American Jewish Historical Society, of which he was a founder and, from 1904 to 1918, treasurer. As a student of colonial New York history, Phillips contributed numerous papers to the Publications of the Society. Among these were: "The Levy and Seixas Families of Newport and New York" (No. 4, 1896, pp. 189-214); "Items Relating to the History of the Jews of New York" (No. 11, 1903, pp. 149-61). He was likewise active in the New York Historical Society.

A leading factor in the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, Phillips was for many years its clerk and at one time president. In 1942 he was still engaged in the practice of law.

Rosalie S. Phillips, his wife, was also descendant of an old American family. Her father was Adolphus S. Solomons, an intimate of Abraham Lincoln. Rosalie Phillips was prominent in political and social activities and, like her husband, contributed to the Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society.

PHILLIPS, NATHANIEL, lawyer and communal worker, b. Kalwarier, Lithuania, 1884. He was brought to the United States the following year and was educated in New York city, receiving his A.B. from City College in 1903, his LL.B. from New York University in 1907 and his LL.M. from the same University in 1908. Although Phillips began to practice law in New York city in 1907, he was a teacher in the public school system from 1903 to 1911. As a lawyer, Phillips soon became interested in the field of citizenship and in the problems of the foreign-born citizen. In 1913, he was one of the founders of the National League for American Citizenship, of which he was, in 1942, still the president—a post to which he was named at the inception of the organization.

Phillips also served, at various times, as chairman of the Mayor's Citizenship Committee, as a director of the New York State Commission for Active Citizenship, and as honorary vice-president of the National Citizenship Council. Among Phillips' activities in Jewish communal life was his membership on the lawyers' committee for the department of jurisprudence of the Hebrew University.

PHILLIPS, PHILIP, public official and jurist, b. Charleston, S. C., 1807; d. Washington, D. C., 1884. Admitted to the bar in 1829, he became a leader in this profession and held numerous public and political offices. In 1832 he was a member of the nullification convention. Two years later he was elected to represent his district in the South Carolina state legislature, but resigned in 1835 and moved to Mobile, Ala., where he resumed the practice of law. In 1837 he was chosen president of the Alabama state convention. Elected to the state legislature of Alabama in 1844, he was reelected in 1852, and served as a Democratic member of Congress from Alabama from 1853 to 1855, the first Jew to be elected to the United States Congress. He was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court in 1850 and succeeded in having Congress establish the first court of claims in the United States in 1859. He then took up his residence in Washington, D. C.

The outbreak of the Civil War induced Phillips to move to New Orleans, but he returned to Washington in 1867, where he continued to reside until his death. Among his published works are a Digest of Decisions of the Supreme Court of Alabama and Statutory Jurisdiction and Practise of the United States Supreme Court.

Lit.: Elzas, B., The Jews of South Carolina (1905) 212-13; Encyclopedia Americana, vol. 21, p. 763; Garrett, Reminiscences of Public Men in Alabama, 405-7.

PHILLIPS, SAMUEL, actor and writer, b. London, 1814; d. London, 1854. Even in his childhood he showed his talent for mimicry and recitation. The Duke of Sussex became interested in the boy's development and provided him with a teacher in declamation. At the age of fourteen he acted a part in a performance of Richard III in the Covent Garden Theatre. But he was forced to renounce a career on the stage because he was suffering from consumption. In 1844 Phillips published his novel Caleb Stukely. In the same year Lord Stanley (later Lord Derby) called Phillips to the staff of the Morning Herald, which he soon left to join the editorial staff of the Times. Alderman Salomons aided Phillips in his efforts to edit a paper owned by himself, and provided him with the means to purchase the John Bull. But Phillips was not successful as editor-in-chief. In 1853 he became literary director of the Crystal Palace, and rendered excellent services to the exhibition, whose catalogue he composed.

PHILLIPS, SIDNEY, London physician. He received his medical training at the University College School and Hospital and acted as consulting physician to various London hospitals. He was a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians and from 1924 to 1938 served as its treasurer. For a time Phillips acted as examiner for the Royal College of Physicians, for the War Office and for the University of London, he also held the rank of colonel in the Medical Corps. Phillips wrote the article on typhoid fever for the Cyclopaedia of Medicine.

PHILLIPSON, COLEMAN, professor of law, b. Leeds, England, 1877. He was educated at the University of Leeds, then Yorkshire College, Victoria University, Manchester and the University College, London. In 1907 he was admitted to the bar.

During the first World War Phillipson did confidential work for various Government departments, and later accompanied the British delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. He also prepared the Handbook on War Indemnities for the British plenipotentiaries. From 1920 to 1925 Phillipson was professor of law at the University of Adelaide, Australia.

Among Phillipson's many published works were The International Law and Custom of Ancient Greece and Rome, in two volumes (1911); International Law and the Great War (1915); The Question of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles (1917); Alsace-Lorraine (1918) and The Trial of Socrates (1928). He was also editor of various new editions of standard books on English and international law. In 1942 he was living in England.

PHILLIPSON, IRVING JOSEPH, army officer, b. Dowagiac, Mich., 1882. He was graduated from the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1904. In 1906 and 1907 he saw action in the Philippines. In the Meuse-Argonne engagements of the first World War he commanded the 142nd and 143rd infantry regiments; he was promoted from lieutenant colonel to colonel, and was awarded the victory medal with two bronze stars and the croix de guerre with gold star. Afterwards he attended the school of the Line (1921-22), the General Staff School (1922-23), and the following year the Army War College.

In 1935 Phillipson was put in command of the 30th Infantry Presidio in San Francisco, Calif., and three years later, as a brigadier-general was transferred to the command of the second brigade, first division, of the Second Corps Area. In that post he remained until 1940, when, within the space of a few months he was made chief of staff of the Second Corps Area, at Governor's Island, New York, and then, replacing Lieut. Gen. Hugh A. Drum, commandant of the Second Corps Area, which comprises the states of New York, New Jersey and Delaware. In 1941 he was advanced to the rank of major-general.

During his stay at Governors Island, Phillipson often appeared at public functions; as grand marshal he led the New York city army day parade on April 4, 1942. In that month he received orders transferring him to Washington, D. C., to succeed Major Gen. William N. Haskell as executive director of Army Emergency Relief. Phillipson, who had served on the general staff as chief of budget and legislative planning in the years 1930 to 1935, had long been especially interested in the care of soldiers' dependents. Such relief had always before been afforded soldiers' families in time of peace. But, with the outbreak of the emergency which eventuated into the second World War, Phillipson had concentrated on plans for giving all necessary aid (supplementing Red Cross activities) to army families during actual wartime. These plans were then realized in the set-up of the National Army Emergency Relief which he was called to Washington to administer.

PHILO, Jewish philosopher of the Hellenistic period, b. about 20 B.C.E. He lived in Alexandria, Egypt. Almost nothing is known about his life. In 40 C.E. he was the leader of a deputation sent by the Alexandrian Jewish community to the emperor Caligula at Rome, appealing to him to stop his persecutions of the Jews and their religion. It is known also from his writings that he made at least one journey to Palestine. His education was that of Greek families of the upper classes. He was well acquainted with the classic philosophers and dramatists, possessed a satisfactory knowledge of mathematics and natural science, and was admirably trained in the art of rhetoric; on the other hand, he does not appear to have been well versed in the study of history. He seems to have gained his knowledge of Judaism not from any definite course of instruction, but rather from attending services in the synagogue. Here he learned the Bible in the Septuagint translation—he apparently did not understand Hebrew—as well as certain psalms and passages from the prophets, also the allegorical method of interpretation, which had been in use long before his time, as well as the etymology of the Biblical names, upon which this allegorizing was based. His acquaintance with religious customs was derived both from the life of the Alexandrian Jewish community and from his visit to Jerusalem.

Writings. Philo wrote a number of philosophic treatises, probably when he was still a young man. These deal with problems of metaphysics, such as theodicy and eternity of the world; of ethics, such as free will and the discussion of the contemplative life; or of psychology, such as the reasoning power of animals. Some scholars hold that a number of these writings are spurious. In his old age Philo wrote his Against Flaccus and Embassy to Caius, in which he depicts the anti-Jewish excesses in Alexandria, relates what followed when the embassy came to Rome, and defends Jews and Judaism against their attackers.

The greater part of Philo's writings, however, is devoted to the interpretation of the Torah or the presentation of its content. These may be summarized as follows:

1. The allegorical commentary on Genesis, covering chapters 2 to 31, inclusive, with some gaps. It consists of a number of essays, couched in the form of homilies, which entirely disregard the literal meaning of the text and concern themselves solely with its allegorical interpretation.

2. A systematic presentation of the teachings of the Torah. To this belong his important work on the Creation, his narrative of the lives of the Patriarchs as the living embodiments of the "original unwritten law," and the exposition of the precepts contained in the Torah, logically arranged under the Ten Commandments. In these, literal and allegorical interpretation stands side by side. Philo intended this work for both Jewish and Greek readers.

3. Questions and Answers on Genesis and Exodus, a work which originally was perhaps longer, the later parts now being lost. This gives a succinct collection of interpretations by both methods.

4. The Life of Moses, intended primarily for non-Jewish readers. It depicts Moses as the model lawgiver.

Philo is known to have written other books, of which we know only from citations in other authors' works.

Ideas. Philo is a foremost example of the group of eclectic philosophers. Like them, he combats superstition, materialism and skepticism. Like them, he uses as his basis the ideology of Plato, which affirms religion and ethics, and that of the stoics; but at the same time he borrows from purely popular beliefs.

The Greek philosophers found that contradictions arose in their philosophical systems because of the combination of so many heterogenous elements in their speculations; in the case of Philo, there were additional causes for contradictions because he was compelled to stress the religious viewpoint rather than the scientific, was bound to retain the basic concepts of Judaism, and was required to interpret the Scriptures.

From a scientific point of view, it is not correct to speak of a "system" in Philo's philosophy. Certain basic ideas, however, are clearly discernible and can be enumerated: The existence of a Supreme God is established by a teleological deduction. We may praise Him for His goodness, purity and perfection, but we can not determine His essence by means of attributes. He formed the world from eternal matter, following as model the world of ideas. He influences this world in indirect fashion, primarily through the mediation of the Logos, but sometimes by means of angels, demons and the stars. Man is able to gain a comprehension of Him not so much through reason and logical deduction as through the growth of the God-bestowed essence of the spirit, the "man within man," into intimate connection with its Original Source, as is possible in earthly life through prophecy and ecstasy, and will be possible likewise after death. From the practical point of view, this "growth and interconnection" is the goal of ethics, and one should endeavor to effect it through struggling against the lusts of the senses and other similar disturbances of spiritual peace, as well as (he suggests this in a number of places) by ascetic flight from the world. However, this union with the divine, like every greatness, is to be regarded as the gift of the grace of God, "Who sows good in the soul."

Relationship to Judaism. Philo holds that the Bible is a valuable aid to attaining the desired union with God, and that it is the source from which the wisest Greeks derived their finest teachings. He wavers between allegorical and literal interpretation of the Scriptures, without realizing the dilemma. For the most part, he prefers the allegorical method. Thus he says that everyone should strive to escape from Ur of the Chaldees, i.e. the body or (according to another interpretation) sensuality; and from Egypt, i.e. disturbances of spirit; "circumcise" the extravagant impulses of his heart; honor the sanctity of the number seven; and make a distinction between "clean and unclean animals," i.e. between proper and improper ways of life. On the other hand, Philo takes all the stories about Moses in the literal sense, and maintains the permanence of the Biblical commandments for the observance of circumcision, the Sabbath, and the dietary laws. While agreeing with the Messianic future hope of his people, Philo regards Israel as the destined proclaimer to the nations of the true God, the God already acknowledged by science.

Predecessors and Effects upon Later Thought. But few of the ideas expressed in the writings of Philo can lay claim to originality. He owes the philosophic form of his ideas to the Greeks, especially to Plato and the Stoics, and particularly to Posidonius in the latter group. He seems to have been affected by popular mysticism. It was from the synagogue that he derived most of his exegetical ideas and his knowledge of the Midrashic expansions of the Biblical narratives. Much of his Haggadah is paralleled by the Palestinian Haggadah; on the other hand, he was almost entirely ignorant of the Halachic tradition. His familiarity with Haggadah and Halachah has been overrated.

Philo's ideas and writings had only an extremely small influence upon later Jewish ideas. It is doubtful whether his influence is to be seen in the Gospel of John and the Epistle to the Hebrews. On the other hand, he had a powerful effect upon such men as Clement and Origen. ISAAK HEINEMANN.

Lit.: Editions: Cohn, L., and Wendland, P., edit., Philo, Opera quae supersunt (7 vols., 1886-1930); Mangey, T., Philo, Opera quae reperiri potuerant omnia (2 vols., 1742). English translations: Colson, F. H., and Whitaker, G. H., in Loeb Classical Library (Philo's works are issued in 9 vols., 1929 et seq.); Yonge, C. D., The Works of Philo Judaeus (4 vols., 1854-55). See also: Bréhier, Les idées philosophiques et religieuses de Philo (1908; 2nd ed., 1925); Heinemann, I., Philos griechische und jüdische Bildung; Goodenough, I. R., An Introduction to Philo Judaeus (1941); Boughton, J. S., The Idea of Progress in Philo Judaeus (1932); Stein, E., Die allegorische Exegese des Philo aus Alexandria (1929); Allon, G., in Tarbitz, vol. 5, pp. 28-36, 241-46; further literature in Marcus, R., "Recent Literature on Philo," Jewish Studies in Memory of George Alexander Kohut (1935) 463-91; Wolfson, H. A., "Philo on Free Will," Harvard Theological Review, vol. 35, pp. 131-69.

PHILO THE ELDER, Greek epic poet, who lived about 200 B.C.E. He is the author of Peri Ta Hierosalyme, an epic poem on Jerusalem in Greek hexameters. Only three fragments of this work were preserved by Alexander Polyhistor, and embodied by Eusebius in a collection of extracts, entitled Praeparatio Evangelica (IX, 20, 24, 37). The poet extolls the greatness and fertility of Jerusalem and enhances the sanctity of the Temple by pointing out that it stands on Mount Moriah, on the summit of which Abraham was about to sacrifice his son Isaac. Josephus refers to Philo as the Elder, in enumerating heathen writers who treated Jewish history (Against Apion, book 1, chap. 23).

There is no direct evidence that Philo was a Jew, but from the tenor of his poem it can scarcely be doubtful. Moreover, Huetius (Demonstrata Evangelica, 62) was of the opinion that Philo the Elder wrote the apocryphal Book of Wisdom and therefore considered him a Hellenistic Jew who, unskilled in Hebrew, had it translated and disseminated among his compatriots.

Lit.: Schürer, E., A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, division 2, vol. 3, pp. 222-24; Ewald, History of Israel, vol. 5, p. 388 (1885); Delitzsch, Zur Geschichte der jüdischen Poesie (1836) 24, 209; Freudenthal, Alexander Polyhistor, 34, 100, 170; Smith, Dictionary of Classical Biography.

PHILO VERLAG, Jewish publishing house in Berlin (1919-38). It was founded by Ludwig Holländer, the then director of the Central-Verein deutscher Staatsbürger jüdischen Glaubens, and he chose Lucia Jacoby as managing editor.

During its twenty years of existence the Philo Verlag became well-known in the Jewish world. Its tendency was fixed by its connection with the Central-Verein: it stood for emancipation, for Judaism, against assimilation and anti-Semitism, and was, from a religious point of view, neutral. Fiction and non-fiction, periodicals and booklets, voluminous scientific works and small essays written by Jewish and non-Jewish authors were published. The last catalogue shows more than one hundred authors and publications, among them famous names such as Leo Baeck, Julius Bab, Eduard Baneth, Simon Bernfeld, Raphael Breuer, Lujo Brentano, Ignaz von Döllinger, Edmond Fleg, Eugen Fuchs, Max Grunwald, Alexander Guttmann, Friedrich Hertz, Jacob Horovitz, Rudolf von Ihering, William James, Moritz Lazarus, Thomas B. Macaulay, Esra Munk, Paul Nathan, Franz Oppenheimer, Franz Rosenzweig, Alfred Wiener and Max Wiener.

The best writers of the younger Jewish generation in Germany and their teachers who, even after the Nazis' rise to power, believed in the merits of emancipation were gathered around this house. Two well-known periodicals were published: Julius Goldstein's Der Morgen (1925-38), later edited by Hans Bach and Eva Reichmann-Jungmann; and Historische Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland (1929-38), under the editorship of Ernst G. Loewenthal and with the collaboration of Ismar Elbogen, Aron Freimann and Max Freudenthal. The fiction series Die kleine Philobücherei was started. The publication of the Philo-Lexikon, a handbook of Jewish learning (1935; edited by John F. Oppenheimer together with Emanuel bin Gorion, Alfred Löwenberg and Otto Neuburger), achieved the greatest success of any Jewish book of its kind; 30,000 copies were sold and four editions printed by 1938.

The series was continued by Eugen Tannenbaum's Philo-Zitatenlexikon, a collection of slogans originating with Jews and described in their meaning and origin, and by Ernst G. Loewenthal's and John F. Oppenheimer's Philo-Atlas, a handbook for Jewish immigrants which was the last Jewish book printed in Germany (November 8, 1938).

Two days later the premises of the Philo Verlag were destroyed during the pogrom, many books were burned and the offices were closed by the Gestapo. In 1942 Lucia Jacoby lived in Berlin, under threat of deportation to Poland.

PHILO-SEMITES. Jewish history, so replete with details of anti-Jewish persecution and propaganda, records also many instances of pro-Jewish expression by non-Jews. In critical moments, Gentile neighbors and friends have often rendered aid and comfort to communities and individual members of the martyred people. Hundreds of documents and literary works extant reveal that many choice spirits among non-Jews espoused the cause of justice for the Jew.

This appears all the more noteworthy when we bear in mind that it usually requires a particularly high degree of intellectual independence and moral courage to express sympathy with the Jew. The atmosphere of Western society has been hostile to Israel for more than twenty centuries. The classical authors of Greece and Rome circulated infamous libels against the Judeans, who refused to accept their pagan culture. This animosity became intensified with the bitter Jewish rebellions against the tyranny of Rome, and was carried into the European legacy by Gentile Christianity. Fifteen hundred years of anti-Jewish propaganda, repeated in the sanctified pages of the New Testament and in the inspired lines of Shakespeare as in the vulgar legends of the folk, left their mark on the mental habits of men.

This explains why Schiller, who could articulate with matchless beauty Europe's ecstasy over the Swiss Alps, which he personally had never seen, could also pen his defamatory essay on Judaism ("The Mission of Moses"), of which he was lamentably ignorant. It explains why Turgenev, following his country's literary traditions and models, produced such a venomous tale as "The Jew"; yet, when he later came to know the character and lot of the real Russian Jew, his heart was moved with profound pity for the unfortunate people whom he had automatically helped to vilify. Goethe, Jokai, Masaryk and others depicted graphically how the minds of Europeans are generally conditioned from early infancy to fear and hate the Jew, and how they themselves struggled to free themselves from these poisonous superstitions.

We have no magic key to unlock the minds of Hiram of Tyre, Cyrus of Persia, Alexander of Macedon, Julius Caesar, Emperor Julian, and other notables of antiquity, and to discover their true motives in befriending the Jews. We assume that they had political and economic reasons as well as personal predilections. We do know, however, that where normal human relations were permitted to function, leading Jews and non-Jews came into intimate material and cultural contact, and that many prominent as well as humble persons even embraced Judaism. We have a few instances on record of whole nations, or at least of their ruling families—such as Adiabene and the Khazars—merging themselves altogether with the people and destiny of Israel.

Economic considerations prompted a number of medieval bishops and princes to extend hospitality and clearly defined "privileges" to Jews. The charters granted by Rüdiger Huotzmann, Bishop of Speyer, in 1084, by Frederick Barbarossa, emperor of Germany, in 1157, by Richard Coeur de Lion, king of England, in 1190, by Duke Frederick II of Austria in 1244, and by Casimir the Great, king of Poland, in 1334, are examples of such political liberality, prompted by material necessity, which afforded the Jews of particular provinces temporary respite but did not exempt them from the recurrent extortions and massacres of the age.

The dictates of humanity, and the intercession of influential dignitaries, led some popes and princes of the church to protest occasionally against the slaughter of innocent Jewish communities, the destruction of synagogs, and the ritual blood libel. St. Bernard of Clairvaux, Cardinal Ganganelli, and Popes Gregory the Great, Innocent III, Gregory IX, Innocent IV, Gregory X, and Paul III belong to this class of defenders. However, their sense of humanity and of obligation to the ancient heritage of the Jew did not extend so far as to include respect for the integrity of Jewish personality or to condemn the somewhat less cruel forms of anti-Jewish discrimination.

The Renaissance and the humanistic movement brought the first expressions of abstract tolerance in Europe. Giovanni Boccaccio included the parable of "The Three Rings" in his Decameron, published in 1348, the terrible year when Jews were accused of and butchered for the Black Death. Two years after the death of Boccaccio, William Langland published in distant England his Vision of Piers Plowman, in which the English poet dared to suggest that Christian prelates might learn from Jews the virtue and art of charity. A century later we find the intellectual leaders of Europe engaged in a diligent study of the Hebrew language and literature, deriving particular satisfaction from the mystic poetry of the Cabala; and some of them, notably Johannes Reuchlin and Ulrich von Hutten, protesting with scorn and force against the Dominicans' passion for burning rabbinic books. Reuchlin's work was condemned by Pope Leo X in 1520, the year when Luther was excommunicated, and three years before the hero of the Reformation published his essay "That Jesus Was Born a Jew."

Luther, who in 1523 condemned bitterly the "papists" for their historic brutality against the Jews and extolled almost enviously the glory of belonging to the Jewish race, himself turned hatefully against the people of the Bible when they refused to be converted to his newly proclaimed form of Christianity. The 16th and 17th centuries are indeed among the darkest periods in the annals of Jewish martyrdom. Nevertheless, the seeds of cosmopolitan culture, scientific objectivity, Biblical reference, religious criticism and political groping were germinating in the soil of Europe and preparing men for the revolutions of the modern age.

It was then that Hans Sachs in Germany, Luis de Camoens in Portugal, and Jean Baptiste Racine in France based some of their finest compositions on Scriptural themes which reflected the pathos and patriotism of the Jew. Henry More attributed all the wisdom of the Greeks, and the philosophy of Descartes, to the inspiration of Judaism. Blaise Pascal enumerated the "Advantages of the Jewish People." Bishop Bossuet of Meaux, preceptor of the Dauphin, and Abbé Fleury, confessor of Louis XV, as well as Jacques Saurin, the Protestant preacher, wrote of Jewish virtue and nobility. Another French Protestant theologian, Jacques Basnage, wrote a history of the Jews, in which he deplored the fact that "In the decay and dregs of centuries men have adopted a spirit of cruelty and barbarism towards the Jews," and noted with satisfaction that "They still live in spite of the contempt and hatred which follow them everywhere, while the greatest monarchies have fallen."

While these men praised the more or less abstract Jew, their words could not fail to carry a wholesome influence into the realm of practical affairs. Roger Williams and John Locke made clear and specific mention of the Jew in their classical pleas for toleration. Holland, Poland and Turkey offered concrete examples of humane treatment accorded to the Jew. In 1556 Solyman the Magnificent, who had reposed confidence in brilliant Jewish statesmen, addressed an ultimatum to Pope Paul IV for the immediate release of Ottoman Jewish merchants whom the latter had condemned to torture. Exactly 100 years later, in 1656, King Charles II, moved by the exigencies of an expanding empire, addressed the Jews of Amsterdam, inviting their capital and initiative to participate in the unfolding colonial trade. In encouraging the admission of Jews into England, he followed not only the wish of Oliver Cromwell but also the counsel of his Dutch competitors. In 1615 Hugo Grotius, founder of the science of international law, had published his "Remonstrances in favor of the Settlement of Jews in Holland and West Friesland," and many refugees from the Inquisition and Iberian expulsions had indeed found a haven in the Netherlands. Practical business considerations explain such documents as the charter of "Privileges" granted to the Jews of Surinam in 1665, and the "Dutiful Petition" addressed to the emperor by the Knights of Pyritz in 1687, begging him to introduce Jewish merchants into their territory in order to break the merciless monopolies and usurious practices of Christian tradesmen.

With the emerging capitalism and liberalism there persisted also the age-old dream of pious Christians to see Jesus' brothers in the flesh embrace the faith of the church; and while this dream led some zealots to exasperation, it induced others to follow a policy of friendship and benevolence. Both Hugo Grotius, in his work on "The Truth of the Christian Religion," and his contemporary, the English philosopher Thomas Hobbes, in his work on "Liberty," wrote with tender feeling about the Jewish people, "the Offspring of Holy Men, whom God often visited by his Prophets and his Angels," "not only the freest, but also the greatest enemy to human subjection, by reason of the fresh memory of their Egyptian bondage." The desire to see this noble race attracted to Christianity inspired many a zealous humanitarian in succeeding centuries to champion the cause of Jewish emancipation.

The 18th cent. saw a galaxy of brilliant rebels against the Old Order, condemning the brutalities of the hierarchical and political powers, and clamoring for "liberty, fraternity, equality," for the "rights of man." These rationalists and humanists stressed the fact that the Jew was a human being, and as such had to be included within the category of the above-mentioned slogans. Addison, Toland, Harrington, Chesterfield and Cumberland in England, Dohm, Kant, Herder and Lessing in Germany, Montesquieu, Rousseau, Voltaire, Mirabeau and Abbé Grégoire in France, Pestalozzi in Switzerland, Vico in Italy, Hahn in Holland, Kosciuszko in Poland, and Washington in the new republic of the West, are among those who attacked the persecution of Jews, or extolled their Biblical tradition and contemporary character, or pleaded eloquently for the amelioration of their economic and political lot. Those who saw evil characteristics in the Jew attributed them to the evil conditions under which the Jew had been compelled to live, and preached the removal of all disabilities. Their common belief was that the Jew had become a wholesome citizen of the new national states.

The struggle continued throughout the 19th cent., in parliaments, at international congresses, and in courts of law, where victims of anti-Jewish plots and libels had to defend their faith and lives. The century began with the emancipation of the Jews in France and The Netherlands, followed by the manifesto of Jerome Napoleon in 1808, the edict of Frederick William III of Prussia in 1812, and the consistent defense of the rights of the Jew by Prince von Hardenberg. While legislators, such as Thomas Kennedy in Maryland, fought for the full enfranchisement of the Jews in America, Macaulay, Peel, Russell, Hazlitt, Daniel O'Connell, Elizabeth Fry and others championed the cause of political equality for the Jew in England. American, British and French statesmen interceded in behalf of oppressed Jewish minorities in Eastern Europe and in Mohammedan lands; and each outburst of revolting persecution, such as the czarist massacres and the vicious legislation of the 1880's and 1890's, raised a storm of indignation and protest among the social and political leaders of the West.

Literature of the 19th cent. reflected the growing liberalism of the age. Byron sang his "Hebrew Melodies"; Scott created his Rebecca; Moore, Wordsworth, Edgeworth, Coleridge, Goldsmith, Andersen, Hugo, Hebbel, Gutzkow, Longfellow, Whittier and Field treated Jewish themes sympathetically; Browning and Aldrich attacked medieval bigotry; Alexis, Lenau, Swinburne thundered against contemporary malevolence; Wergeland pleaded for the admission of Jews into Scandinavian countries; Ségur, Schleiden, Renan wrote of the contribution of Jews to civilization; Mickiewicz, Orzeszkowa, Szymanski articulated the pathos of Jewish life and extolled their patriotism. National heroes, such as Jefferson in America, Cavour in Italy, Kossuth in Hungary, espoused in their letters and conversation the cause of full Jewish participation in the life and opportunities of their countries.

When the monster of anti-Semitism raised its ugly head in France, Germany, Austria and elsewhere, the finest intellects recoiled against it in unmistaken language. To mention only a few of the men who came out in open repudiation of the madness and disgrace of Jew-baiting and anti-Semitism during the century, we think readily of Arndt, Bebel, Bismarck, Blind, Bunsen, Freytag, Fontane, Humboldt and Nietzsche, Frémont, Laffitte, Leroy-Beaulieu, Michelet, Painlevé, Quinet, Saulcy and Thiers, Carlyle, Farrar, Gladstone, Huxley, Kipling, Lecky, Meredith, Mill, Stevenson and Webb, Andrassy, Bethlen, Jokai and Liszt, Matthew Arnold, Henry Ward Beecher, Oliver Wendell Holmes, William James, Sidney Lanier, James Russell Lowell, William Osler, Carl Schurz, Mark Twain, and Zebulon Baird Vance, Pirogov, Soloviov and Tolstoy, Castelar, Perez Galdos, Ruiz Zorilla and Sawa, Bonghi, Ferrero and Moleschott, Bjoernson and Ibsen. At the close of the century, the voices of Clemenceau and Zola and of Masaryk resounded in their valiant defense of Israel at the celebrated trials of Dreyfus and Hilsner.

However, the laurels for the finest manifestation of friendship for the Jew during the 19th cent. must go to none of these men but to an Englishwoman, a sublime novelist and poetess, George Eliot. The above-named defenders of Israel were moved by a spirit of pity for the persecuted and underprivileged, or by the logic of their social ideologies, or by a common hatred against bigoted clerics and unscrupulous politicians who were responsible for the misery of Jews as well as for the enslavement of other men. We can not avoid the feeling, for example, in reading the Czech story, "Moralistni Bestie," that Machar's philo-Semitism was essentially anti-clericalism, or in observing that the Jewish heroes in the works of the distinguished Ruthenian poet and novelist, Ivan Franco, are always victims of an otherwise sordid Jewish environment, or that the Jewish hero of Freytag's novel Soll und Haben is in no way distinguishable as a Jew. In fact, many statesmen and authors, like Kossuth and Mommsen, made it clear that their fervor for Jewish emancipation was contingent on the readiness of the Jews to abandon their distinctive culture and to assimilate within the national and racial life of the dominant peoples.

George Eliot was a friend of the Jews in a far more intimate and spiritual sense. She portrayed the Jew as a Jew, pleaded for his freedom to be himself, and eloquently presented the arguments for the restoration of his ancient homeland and the revivification of his indigenous culture. Jean Henri Dunant, Alexandre Dumas fils, Laurence Oliphant and others shared her enthusiasm for a Jewish Palestine, but George Eliot's profound respect for Jewish personality and her absolute faith in Israel's survival value, as well as the force and beauty of her art, earned for her a unique place in the heart of the modern Jew.

The 20th cent. began with the gradual organization of humanitarian sentiment throughout the world against the Jew-baiting policies of czarist Russia and of Roumania. Liberals of all lands, including Russia, hailed the abrogation of the Russian trade treaties by France and the United States, denounced the pogroms and the ritual murder trials staged by the St. Petersburg government, and approved of the pressure brought by European and American statesmen on the authorities in Bucharest. The first World War produced insincere proclamations of devotion to Israel by the opposing high commands of Russia and the Central Powers, and the significant Balfour Declaration. All the four molders of the Versailles peace, Clemenceau, Lloyd George, Wilson and Orlando, were friends of the Jews, and helped to secure constitutional guarantees for the civil and religious rights of Jewish minorities in the Succession States. The revolutionary leaders of Russia, both Social Democratic and Communist, have been likewise sympathetic with the Jews, enacting the only legislation in the world which renders anti-Semitism an offense against the state, although the Soviet policy is opposed to the spiritual traditions of Israel as it is to religion and bourgeois culture.

The rise of the Ku Klux Klan in the early 1920's led many prominent Americans to express their repugnance to anti-Semitism and their sense of fellowship with the Jews. Among those who thus expressed themselves were Woodrow Wilson, William Howard Taft, Theodore Roosevelt, Charles Evans Hughes, Robert Lansing, William Jennings Bryan, Newton D. Baker, Edwin Markham, and Cardinal Gibbons. Similar protests burst out throughout the world, by distinguished statesmen and intellectuals everywhere, against the policy of boycott and humiliation pursued by the social and governmental leaders of the new Poland. But the fullest measure of sympathy for the Jew and appreciation of his tragic role in history came with the rise of Adolf Hitler to the position of supreme authority in Germany. The gruesome spectacle of a helpless and glorious minority condemned to extermination, the shameless perversion of all the standards of truth, justice and honor, and the ruthless mobilization of all the instrumentalities of society and civilization for the crushing of the spirit of democracy inherent in the Judeo-Christian tradition, called forth the stubborn resentment of all lovers of liberty and decency on earth. Amidst the poignant suffering endured by Jews, they were heartened by the knowledge that intellectuals like Thomas Mann preferred exile with the Jewish refugees to security with the Nazis, that Christian spokesmen like Pope Pius XI chose to decorate themselves with the title Semite, and that even from the distant fields of India came the voice of solace from Mohandas Gandhi.

Finally, mention must be made of another group of friends of Israel who, while interested primarily in the quest for truth, have by their diligent research and scientific methodology helped to remove much of the superstition and falsehood which sustained Judeophobia through the ages. Brilliant historians, biographers, literary critics, anthropologists and social psychologists gathered indispensable information regarding the true character of the Jew, and of his role in civilization, and have demolished forever the possibility of anti-Semitism among real scientists and among those who believe in scientific criteria of knowledge. The number of these teachers and scholars is legion, and it would be idle to attempt to name them. But specific mention must be made of men like Hermann L. Strack in Germany, R. Travers Herford in England, George Foot Moore in the United States, and their numerous colleagues and disciples, who have manifested the courage to review even sacred literature and Christian and Jewish tradition, and to apply the scientific technique to all the channels of information which would yield the true facts and the true understanding of human relations in the past and present. In the light of and through the process of such investigations, these objective scholars have proved to be the greatest friends of Israel, and perhaps ultimately the most formidable enemies of the disease called anti-Semitism.

See also: BETTER UNDERSTANDING; CHRISTIAN WRITERS ON JEWS.

JOSEPH L. BARON.

PHILOSOPHY, ALEXANDRIAN, more properly Judeo-Alexandrian philosophy, a name given to the metaphysical and theological ideas developed by the Jews in Alexandria during the period from about 250 B.C.E. to about 40 C.E. The writings in which these ideas are found are in Greek and embrace the Septuagint translation of the Pentateuch and the other books of the Bible, the Apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon, the spurious Letters of Aristeas, the fragments of Aristobulus, the Pseudo-Phocylidean poem and the works of Philo. There is no system of philosophy to be found in these writings until we come to Philo, from whose works, though not systematic in character, a connected and fairly complete theological and theosophical doctrine may be extracted. All that it is necessary to do here is to give a brief characterization and resumé of the subject.

George Wolf

Judeo-Alexandrian philosophy represents the combination of Greek philosophy and the Hebrew Bible. This syncretism was brought about by the Jews who lived in Alexandria in a Hellenistic environment by which they were influenced. The Greek translation of the Pentateuch was the first product of the Hellenization of the Alexandrian Jews, and the process continued until it reached its culmination in Philo. The earliest attempts in this direction were confined to a toning down of the anthropomorphisms in the Bible and an ethical rationalization of the ritual, ceremonial and dietary laws of the Pentateuch. Guided by a consciousness of the unity of all truth, they were led to a belief that the Bible and the Greek philosophers taught the same thing, and their belief in the revealed character of the Bible suggested the notion that the Greek philosophers borrowed their ideas from the Bible. Then in order to find these ideas of the Greek philosophers in the Bible they had to resort to a method of regarding the narratives in the Biblical books as allegories with an ethical, psychological or metaphysical content. This allegorical method of interpretation was fully developed by Philo, who was the precursor and model of all such interpretations of sacred writings, Jewish, Christian and Mohammedan, in the Middle Ages.

Another characteristic of Judeo-Alexandrian philosophy is the conception of God as a transcendent Being, and the corollary thereof, the introduction of intermediate beings or powers between God and the world. We find the beginning of this in the Wisdom of Solomon, where Wisdom is the intermediate power, and this tendency finds its culmination in Philo, whose theory of the Logos is the essential contribution of this school. Subsequent Jewish philosophy in the Middle Ages rejected the Logos doctrine which was adopted by Christianity, although in the doctrine of the Active Intellect as developed by Gersonides we have an analogue to Philo's Logos. ISAAC HUSIK.

Lit.: Drummond, Philo Judaeus or the Jewish-Alexandrian Philosophy (1888); Bentwich, Norman, Hellenism (1919); idem, Philo Judaens of Alexandria (1910); Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen, vol. 3, part 2.

PHILOSOPHY, JEWISH. Biblical Judaism did not produce a philosophy of its own. The Bible is the expression of a continuous and, in the philosophic sense, naive religious consciousness, and not a work of philosophic theory. Not even the post-Exilic periods of reflection bear any philosophic character. Wherever the Bible does touch upon fundamental religious questions, this arose from the need of the religious consciousness to orientate itself as regards troubling inner religious problems and difficulties, and not out of any philosophic impulse.

Contact with the Hellenistic world of thought first gave rise to a Jewish philosophy. However, its stricter form, which originated in Alexandria and achieved literary presentation only through Philo, has remained an episode in the history of Judaism. Only scattered and individual elements of it, at best, penetrated into Talmudic Judaism; these ideas, when severed from their systematic context, lost their philosophic character. If medieval Judaism was influenced thereby, non-Jewish sources were its agents.

A continuously developing Jewish philosophy first originated in the Middle Ages, within Islamic cultural circles. It was completely under the influence of Islamic philosophy, which in turn was decisively determined by Greek philosophy. Even those trends which were considered by Islam as its real philosophical and not its theological ones were only reworkings and transformations of Greek systems. From the 8th to the 10th centuries numerous philosophical writings, along with a considerable number of works of Greek mathematicians, astronomers, and physicians, were translated into Arabic through the intermediation of the Syrians; among these writings were especially the works of Aristotle, those of his commentators, several extracts of Neo-Platonic literature, and several of Plato's works. The philosophical movement in Islam may be said to have originated from these sources; in addition, the development of Islamic theology itself led to philosophy. Partly perhaps through Jewish or Christian influence, dogmatic disputes arose comparatively early in Islam and were due primarily to the doctrine of predestination in the Koran and to its strong anthropomorphic God conception.

A purely philosophical treatment of the underlying controversial questions arose from these dogmatic disputes in the Arabian philosophy known as Kalam; this later developed into a philosophic rationalization of religion. No matter how much the dependence of the Kalam on Greek thought may be disputed in single instances, the influence of Greek philosophy is as a whole markedly evident in Islam's transition from dogma to philosophy. Islam's contact with the manifold other religious forms which thrived in the empires which it had subjugated served as a further stimulus to the cultivation of philosophic speculation. After the conquest of the Neo-Persian empire, the Zoroastrian religion was added to the Jewish and Christian religions, which had already been subdued. All these religions, together with the many extant Gnostic religious sects of the ancient period then drawing to its close, asserted their claims to exclusive authoritativeness. The conflict among the various positive religions led now and then to unbiased views out of which there arose a concept of a universal religion underlying all of them. This general religion was at times conceived as an ethical religion based on reason, and at other times as a mystical form of religiousness. But at the same time the positive religions themselves were compelled to defend their claims to authoritativeness; this they did by attempting to demonstrate the genuineness of their traditions and the truthfulness of their contents.

All these tendencies of Islamic thought penetrated into the realm of Judaism. The Arabic language spread rapidly among the Jews of the entire sphere of Islamic culture; thus they early participated in the literary and cultural life of Islam. The Jewish poets who had already enriched Arabic literature in pre-Islamic times were now joined by scholars who were especially active in medicine and astronomy. Thus philosophical literature, particularly where it was independent of the postulates of Islam, penetrated into Jewish circles; after dogma had been superseded by the religio-philosophic tendency in the Kalam, works on the philosophy of religion gained admittance into Judaism.

The same forces which disturbed the religious life of Islam stirred Judaism. As in Islam, numerous sects sprang up in Judaism from the end of the 7th to the beginning of the 9th cent.; these compelled Talmudic Judaism to vindicate its basic principles. Even the Biblical bases of Judaism became the target for severe and radical criticism. Hiwi (more properly, Hayawaihi) al-Balkhi, who wrote in the middle of the 9th cent., was the best-known advocate of such Biblical criticism. He tried to prove the inferiority of Biblical ethics and of the Biblical conception of God. In its essential points his criticism came close to the objections brought against the Bible by the theologians of the Zoroastrian religion; this fact clearly shows how the skepticism developed through constant contact with other religions entered Judaism. Thus the need arose in Judaism for philosophic apology, which in turn became the strongest incentive toward the development of specific religio-philosophical thinking. A purely philosophical interest was also evident; this transcended specific religio-philosophical problems and resulted in participation in the general metaphysical interests of Islamic philosophy.

The first literary expressions of these endeavors are encountered at a relatively late date. The first Jewish philosophers known to us appeared at the beginning of the 10th cent. Their works, however, especially those of Saadia, indicate that a considerable philosophic development must have preceded them. Saadia repeatedly disputed certain doctrinal opinions which were supported with Biblical proofs by their champions and which, therefore, must have been of Jewish origin. He mentions a dispute between Jewish and Mohammedan scholars on the subject of the possibility of abrogating a divine law. This presupposes an understanding in Jewish circles of the philosophical concepts of the Kalam. Thus we can set the naissance of philosophic thought among the Jews of the Islamic sphere of culture at about the middle of the 9th cent.; the systematic treatment of philosophic problems, however, can not be traced with certainty beyond the beginning of philosophic literature.

Jewish philosophy was entirely dependent in its general philosophical fundamentals upon Islamic philosophy. Most of the Jewish philosophers expressed this externally in that they were content to treat particular problems of philosophy of religion. The only larger works of general philosophic character up to the end of the 12th cent. were those of Isaac Israeli, the earliest Jewish philosopher, and of Solomon ibn Gabirol. Later in the Middle Ages such works were met with more frequently, especially commentaries and supercommentaries on the Aristotelian writings. In the main, however, Jewish philosophy remained theology, and treated philosophical problems from purely religio-philosophical points of view. This concentration upon problems of philosophy of religion, though undoubtedly acting as a hindrance to the development of Jewish philosophy, did not prevent it from being independent as much as it might appear at first glance. The originality of the Middle Ages in philosophy developed primarily through religious problems; thus the restriction of such problems to the domain of the philosophy of religion denoted a concentration upon those problems which were of the greatest importance for the Middle Ages.

Like Islamic philosophy, Jewish philosophy successively passed through the phases of the Kalam, Neo-Platonism, and Aristotelianism. However, these several tendencies in Islamic philosophy did not follow a course whereby the older tendencies were simply replaced by the newer ones; on the contrary, the later tendencies remained side by side with the earlier ones for a considerable period. This was especially true of Jewish philosophy, at least as far as the relation of the Kalam to Neo-Platonism was concerned, because both trends of thought were already present in Islam at the time when Jewish philosophy came into existence. Israeli, the first Jewish philosopher, was entirely Neo-Platonic; after Gabirol, the most consistent Neo-Platonist, various combinations of the Kalam and Neo-Platonism appeared. However, the main line in the development was marked by the succession of these three tendencies.

1. The Kalam in Jewish Philosophy. The philosophic treatment of the basic religious questions, which developed out of the dogmatic controversies in Islam, was designated in Arabic by the term "Kalam," which originally meant "speech"; later on it assumed the meaning of the logical and dialectical treatment of a problem. From this it was finally carried over to the systems of philosophy of religion which proceeded in accordance with this logical and dialectical method and the followers of which were called "Mutakallimun" (dialecticians). The Mutazilites (those who "separated"; it was formerly explained as "freethinkers," but more recently as "ascetics") represent the oldest school of the Kalam. This rationalistic tendency in Islamic theology, which was split up into many groups and schools, proceeded primarily from the dogmatic problems of the anthropomorphisms in the Koran's conception of God and of the belief in predestination which appears repeatedly in the Kalam. The contrast between the anthropomorphic way of thinking and the monotheistic idea of God was early perceived, and efforts were made to explain away these anthropomorphic traits and eliminate them from the God conception. However, this was still a part of the sphere of dogmatics.

Two motives in the doctrine of God characterized the transition within Islam from dogma to philosophy. First, through the influence of Neo-Platonism, the consistency of the unity of God with a multiplicity of attributes was questioned. This questioning led the Mutazilites to an intense spiritualization of the concept of God, from which they attempted to remove all plurality. However, they resisted the Neo-Platonic notion that God is absolutely indeterminable and indefinable, and retained the supposition of certain fundamental attributes of God. These attributes, the Mutazilites taught, are not separate from the divine being, but are at one with it, and indicate only its various manifestations.

The second point which indicated the new philosophic character of their doctrine of God was their endeavor not merely to accept the existence of God as a religious doctrine, but to prove it by means of logic. Their arguments, always identical in their main features, at least among the later representatives of this school, aimed to prove the creation of the world, and therefore the existence of a Creator. Thus they proceeded from theology to the study of cosmology and created a system of metaphysics which, although originating in religious motives, embraced the entire world. Individual tendencies of Islamic dogma had already pointed to the doctrine of predestination in the Koran as being incompatible with divine justice, which could not reward or punish human beings for their conduct in the absence of freedom of will. However, other passages in the Koran, more favorable to the theory of self-determination, induced them to represent this doctrine of the freedom of the will as the true teaching of Islam.

The Mutazilites, by examining the principles underlying the relation between God and morality, gave to this problem a philosophical interpretation. They did not stop at the claim of divine justice, but sought to prove that divine conduct must be in accord with the law of justice, because this law of justice, like the laws of morality in general, represents a law of reason which is binding also upon God. Proceeding on the basis of the belief in retribution which thus resulted, they endeavored to rationalize the doctrine of the survival of the soul after death. Upon this teaching they laid considerable stress. Thus their doctrine became an ethical rationalism based on the belief in God, in freedom of the will, and in the immortality of the soul. Against this Mutazilite direction of the Kalam there later appeared another form which, remaining closer to the Orthodox conception, opposed Mutazilite rationalism both in the problem of the divine attributes and in ethical questions. In an ethical respect especially, it emphasized the absolute sovereignty of the divine will.

Only in its Mutazilite form did the Kalam gain followers in Judaism. The doctrine of the freedom of the will, which in Islam could be represented only in opposition to the prevailing conception of the Koran, unquestionably overbalanced in the Bible all the contradictory tendencies and beliefs, and in the Talmud also it is expressly formulated as a fundamental conviction of Judaism. In addition, the rational understanding of morality was strictly in accord with the Biblical and Talmudic conceptions of the internal evidence of the divine commandment. The opposition to the anthropomorphic conception of God also found support in the Bible and Talmud; among the Mutazilites, an abstract attenuation of the God conception had to be kept within limits consistent with the doctrine of a divine creator.

SAADIA BEN JOSEPH AL-FAYYUMI, the great founder of Jewish medieval knowledge, was the most important and influential exponent of the Kalam in Jewish philosophy. Although Saadia adopted many individual teachings of the Aristotelian system, he followed the Kalam in his chief philosophic work Sefer Haemunoth Vehadeoth (Beliefs and Views), which even in its outward form is modeled after the manuals of the Kalam. He followed the Kalam also in his commentary on the Sefer Yetzirah and the numerous philosophical parts contained in his Biblical commentaries. In agreement with the Mutazilites, Saadia taught that reason and revelation have to harmonize with each other, and that the fundamental truths received through the divine revelation must therefore be accessible to reason, i.e. must be able to be proved philosophically. Thus he saw but one purpose in revelation, to make truth in itself, and independently of revelation, accessible to those who have neither the schooling nor the ability for philosophic study, and to free them from the doubts and uncertainties in which human research may easily become involved.

In his basic arguments concerning the relation between reason and revelation Saadia explained that to the believing philosophers philosophy need only clarify the contents of the doctrine of revelation, and that it does not have to prove the truth of the doctrine from the philosophic point of view, because that truth has already been established through revelation. In contradiction to the foregoing, he stated in another chapter that consistency with reason constitutes one of the criteria by means of which it must be judged whether a doctrine which purports to be a revelation is actually of divine origin.

However, even on the basis of his first premise, which must be regarded as Saadia's real conviction, there was more latitude for reason than would appear at first glance. For, according to Saadia, those expressions in the Bible the tenor of which seems to contradict reason must receive an interpretation which will eliminate such contradiction. Even when reason must accept revelation as an actual truth, reason still remains the decisive factor, because in all vital questions it dictates the interpretation of the contents of the revelation itself. Saadia himself rarely, and then only cautiously, made use of this principle. His own philosophic point of view did not force him into any essential reinterpretation of Jewish doctrines. In the further course of this development, however, this reinterpretation became the basis for considerable adaptations of the Jewish conception to that of philosophy.

Historic demonstration must prove the actuality of revelation proper. Herein there was revealed a contest among the various religions, each of which claimed divine origin and endeavored to prove its own divine origin and to weaken the assertions of all the others. The aim of such demonstration was to make the actuality of revelation a historic fact. In the belief in revelation reason was opposed by a conviction founded upon the general criteria of historical knowledge, not by an inwardness of religious consciousness. On this point, too, Saadia fixed the rules for proof, which remained authoritative for Jewish philosophy of religion. The presence of the entire people at the decisive revelation assured the divine origin of the Jewish doctrine. Deception in this would be inconceivable, because an occurrence which an entire nation is alleged to have witnessed could not have been invented without arousing opposition among the people. The later prophets of Israel too were attested to through carefully tested miracles. In characteristic manner Saadia emphasized the fact that no revelation is to be accepted without such attestation. In the emphasis that is here laid on miraculous proof there is revealed a rationalism which refuses to acknowledge an unverifiable assertion of an inner vision, but will recognize only confirmable miraculous proof.

Metaphysical discussions proper set in with the presentation of evidence concerning the existence of God. In this respect, too, Saadia closely followed the method of proof typical of the Kalam. He evolved four proofs in favor of the temporal genesis of the world. As the first proof he set forth the terrestrial limitation of the world, and deduced therefrom that only a finite force or power can reside in it, a force which can maintain itself only for a finite period. In his second proof he concluded from the composite nature of all the things of the world that there is a being who composed and united them. According to his third proof, the world must have had a beginning, for everything in it is charged with accidental circumstances which appear and disappear, hence anything which bears such changing accidents must itself be temporal. In his final argument he showed that time must be finite, for an infinite period of time never comes to an end, and a moment which must have been preceded by such an unending period of time can never come to pass. The genesis of the world presupposes its creation, since it could not have come into being without the agency of a creator existing outside of it. Saadia confirmed this result by successively refuting all opposing theories concerning the origin of the world. In so doing he evidenced a comprehensive knowledge of Greek philosophy, but was rather awkward in the arrangement of his ideas.

From this conception of a Creator Saadia developed, again in close agreement with the Mutazilites, his concept of God. God as creator is inconceivable without the attributes of life, wisdom, and power. But the unity of the divine being, a doctrine which Saadia makes basic in his theory of God, remains unimpaired by these attributes. For these attributes imply a plurality only to our way of thinking; in themselves, however, they are not to be separated the one from the other, since they merely express the concept of the creator from different points of view. Saadia arrived at the same conclusion as did the Mutazilites, without making any use of their doctrine that God in His essence is wise, living, and powerful. The energy wherewith he denied all plurality in the divine essence had a polemical motive in addition to philosophical ones. Saadia aimed to refute and weaken the speculative proofs of the Christian doctrine of the trinity. His proofs for the unity of God assumed the form of a similarly clear polemic against the dualism of the Zoroastrian religion, which still openly represented a living force in his surroundings.

In addition to the problems of the divine unity, Saadia was primarily concerned with those ethical questions the starting-point for which in the Kalam was formed by the problem of divine justice. Nowhere is Saadia's rationalism more clearly and definitely expressed than here. With regard to these very ethical laws he made agreement with reason in the previously mentioned passage as the criterion for every doctrine which claimed to be of divine origin. Proceeding from this conception, he introduced into Jewish philosophy of religion the distinction between the commandments of reason and the commandments of obedience which were given in the revelation as additional commandments. The practical application of this ethical rationalism is still extremely elementary; it provides a basis for the necessity of the moral laws in an essentially utilitarian sense, but even despite this basis it remains superficial. This utilitarian conception of reality is rather directly connected with the Biblical idea of "command" (thou shalt). The externality of such speculation becomes most evident in those of Saadia's arguments in which he attempted to prove the necessity for a revelation of the moral laws despite the rational character of reality.

To the previously mentioned general point of view, which makes revelation necessary together with reason, he adds that reason in the domain of ethics must be supplemented by revelation, because reason can determine only the principles of the moral, not the manner of their application. Thus reason can prohibit adultery and theft, but it can not specify the conditions which are required for the valid consummation of marriage or for the valid acquisition of property. In all such matters reason is compelled to be supplemented by revelation. However, Saadia's failure to make any distinction between the ethical and the legal sphere is obvious. In the general field of ethics Saadia's system scarcely goes beyond the establishing of a few general moral laws. But the precepts of proper conduct, which he mentions in another passage, are much more profound. They predicate a harmonious and versatile cultivation of all the powers possessed by man. The commandments of obedience which revelation adds to the commandments of reason are mainly intended to provide us with the opportunity for obedience to God, and in return therefore to be rewarded with a greater share of blessedness. Saadia, however, does not confine himself to this formal conception, but adds that these laws too have a rational meaning, and that they serve to perfect mankind. If we fail to attain to this meaning, it is only because our reason does not always grasp it.

Not until Saadia came to treat of the problem of divine justice which, seen from another point of view, coincides with the problem of retribution, did he develop the decisive consequences of his conviction regarding the rational character of morality. As a natural result of his conception of the moral, he concluded that divine conduct too is bound by the laws of morality. The entire second half of the Emunoth Vedeoth is devoted to proof that the divine world order is in harmony with these laws, and that it appears as a theodicy which is conducted from this point of view. Although he comprehended the world as the work of the divine goodness, he set the motive of justice in the foreground. His first step in this direction was his claim that man possesses freedom of will. This doctrine is the necessary hypothesis for the responsibility of man and for the idea of retribution.

The theoretical discussion of the problem of freedom of will proceeds, in Saadia's writings, as in the whole of medieval philosophy, from the relation of freedom of will to the omnipotence and omniscience of God. Saadia took pains to point out that the omniscience of God does not limit man in the exercise of his freedom to determine his conduct. The idea of free will justifies that of retribution, which is the fundamental basis of theodicy. All happiness is to be regarded as reward, all misfortune as punishment. Wherever this rule is not applicable, as in the case of animals or of children who die during their minor years, the demand for divine justice must be satisfied through some form of compensation for the sufferings which one has innocently undergone. The belief in a life after death, which brings with it real reward or punishment, was the inevitable consequence of the doctrine of retribution. However, Saadia evidenced no readiness or originality in the detailed presentation of his ideas. The difference between the pious person whom God rewards and the evil person whom He punishes consists in the fact that in the case of the former, good deeds were in the majority, and in the case of the latter, evil deeds. The idea that personality is a unity was not yet attained in Saadia's teachings, whereas the moral evaluation of personality was carried out by means of a mere mechanical adding up of man's individual actions. The doctrine of immortality, which was rendered indispensable because of the idea of retribution, was theoretically justified by Saadia in his treatment of the problem of the soul.

It was the goal of Saadia's investigation to prove the substantiality of the soul, and hence its immortality. Saadia again evidences an extensive knowledge of Greek philosophy in his criticism of the various theories of the soul. In the details of his views on the soul he frequently aligned himself with Plato and Aristotle. However, in the basic definition of his concept of the soul he remained far behind the theory of the immateriality of the soul developed by Aristotle and Plato, for he characterized the soul as a delicate and light-like substance. For the most part, however, Saadia followed Talmudic sources in his doctrine of retribution. This becomes especially clear through the importance he attached to the idea of resurrection. Retribution, he said, sets in only after the reunion of the body and the soul. Saadia followed the Talmud likewise in his phantastic embellishments of the doctrine of retribution and of that of eschatology. These elements are increasingly evident in the subsequent books of his work. In the main, however, Saadia's system, to judge by its basic character, remained one of ethical rationalism, in which the fulfillment of the commandment in connection with the belief in divine retribution constituted the essential of religion.

David ibn Merwan al-Mukammas, contemporaneously with Saadia, or perhaps somewhat earlier, was likewise a protagonist of the Kalam. Although the greater part of the Arabic original of Mukammas' principal work, the Ishrun Maḳalat (Twenty Chapters), was discovered at the end of the 19th cent. (1898), the main source for information regarding his doctrines still consists of the Hebrew extracts incorporated by Judah ben Barzillai in his commentary on the Sefer Yetzirah. In addition to brief explanations, revealing Greek influence, of the development of the sciences, these extracts contain Mukammas' teaching about God. Whereas in its formulation Mukammas came even closer to the doctrine of the Mutazilites than did that of Saadia, his interpretation thereof approximated more nearly the Neo-Platonic concept of God. Wisdom and life, and similar attributes which we ascribe to God, must not be regarded as being different from the essence and nature of God; on the contrary, the unity of the divine essence requires that they coincide with it. God is wise through His essence, living through His essence, and so on. It further follows, however, that all these attributes must also be identical among themselves, otherwise through them plurality would be carried into the divine essence. But these attributes are merely various designations for the essence of God which is in itself absolutely simple. They thereby lose their wonted positive meaning. Their real function is to exclude from God every imperfection from all possible points of view. Thus Mukammas arrived essentially at the Neo-Platonic idea that all our knowledge concerning God is of a negative character, i.e. the knowledge of God by way of negation. He agrees, in its essentials, with Saadia's doctrine of retribution, without, however, conceiving of reward and punishment as an end in itself, but only as the means for directing man to the fulfillment of the divine commandments.

The influence of the Mutazilite teachings was not confined to the philosophers in the real sense of the term. As an element of enlightenment it penetrated into all those places where Jewish culture existed. This influence was a considerable factor in the Biblical exegesis of Gaon Samuel ben Hofni, one of the last heads of the academy at Sura, who lived and labored at the beginning of the 11th cent. Even Gaon Hai of Pumbeditha, a savant who devoted himself solely to the study of the Talmud, was affected by the doctrines of the Mutazilites. In addition to these last Talmudic authorities of the East, Nissim ben Jacob, who lived at Kairwan, in North Africa, one of the founders of the study of the Talmud in the West, adopted Mutazilite views and employed them also in his Talmudic writings.

Mutazilite teachings prevailed among the Karaites to an even greater degree than they did in Rabbinite Judaism. The influence of the Mutazilite doctrines upon the Karaites must certainly date back to the 9th cent. However, their first systematic presentation appeared at the beginning of the 11th cent. in the writings of Joseph ben Abraham al-Basir, who as a rationalist was considerably more consistent than Saadia. He regarded as impossible the knowledge of a revelation which was independent of all philosophy, because the external confirmation of the revelation can not guarantee the truth of the doctrine of the revelation until the truthfulness of the being which reveals itself is established. This, however, can be ascertained only through philosophic inquiry. Thus the philosophic knowledge of the existence and the nature of God must necessarily have preceded all knowledge of the revelation. However, in the citation of proof for the existence of God and in the development of his God conception al-Basir essentially followed the path marked out by Saadia; but in the details he more closely followed the Kalam. Thus he followed the Kalam as regards the atomic conception of the world, a theory rejected by Saadia.

Moreover, his rationalistic principles were applied to ethical doctrines as well. He energetically opposed the view, represented by the Orthodox school of thought of the Kalam, that the moral laws have no internal necessity, but are merely arbitrary commandments of God. Against this view he directed the argument, previously mentioned, that the trustworthiness of the revelation presupposes the truthfulness of God. If all differentiations of moral values be considered as pure arbitrariness on the part of God, then we can not be certain that God is truthful in His revelation and that we may trust such revelation. Above all, however, he relied upon the inner evidence of moral consciousness, which grasps the difference between good and evil independently of all revelation and which feels an inner urge to do good without regard to reward or punishment. In this way he came as near to the conception of autonomous morality as it was possible to attain to with a medieval outlook on life. Thus the purpose in the creation of the world could only be ethical; it consisted not in the justice of God, but in His goodness. As al-Basir remarked in his opposition to the extreme application of the principle of justice, God was not obliged to create the world; it was His goodness that induced Him to do so and that had the welfare of His creatures in mind. Once the world was created, however, the commandment of justice became binding likewise as regards God's conduct towards His creatures.

In the essential points of view al-Basir's pupil, Jeshua ben Judah, agreed with him. Jeshua ben Judah cited in great detail the proofs adduced in the Kalam in favor of creation. But he presented them in a peculiarly complicated form and in close combination with the atomistic doctrine of the Kalam. He followed his teacher also in his arguments concerning the rational character of the moral, also in his idea that the authenticity of the revelation presupposes a rational knowledge of God.

The Kalam held sway among the Karaites even at the time when Jewish philosophy tended predominantly toward Neo-Platonic and Aristotelian thought. In the middle of the 12th cent. Judah Hadasi took over the Kalam in his encyclopedic presentation of Karaite doctrines. Even the great work on Karaite philosophy of religion, the Etz Hayim (Tree of Life), which was composed in 1346 by Aaron ben Elijah of Nicomedia and which purported to be a sort of counterpart to Maimonides' Moreh Nebuchim, endeavored to maintain the point of view of the Kalam against Aristotelianism, although it was compelled to make considerable concessions to the latter. As the adherents of Aristotelianism had maintained that the nucleus of the Aristotelian teachings was of Jewish origin and that these doctrines had reached the Greeks only through the agency of the Jews, so Aaron ben Elijah construed the Kalam as the doctrine of ancient Israel, whereas, he claimed, Greek philosophy was contradictory to the spirit of Judaism. He tried hard to re-establish the validity of the moral conception of religion as against the speculative conception represented by Aristotelianism. Furthermore, his teaching regarding God and his doctrine of providence oppose the Aristotelian point of view. This polemic compelled him to make an independent and thorough study of the Kalam. However, his book, as regards its basic doctrines, remained throughout dependent on the earlier Karaite philosophers of religion, from whom he took over much material.

2. Jewish Neo-Platonism. Neo-Platonism, the last great system which Greek philosophy produced, remained the predominant tendency in Greek philosophy until it reached its close. Even after the decline of Greek philosophy, Neo-Platonism apparently continued to flourish among the Syrians, whence we can trace it in a continuous line to Arabian Neo-Platonism, in which it shared the field with Aristotelianism from the very beginning. With the first penetration of Greek philosophy into the Islamic world, the Stoics and Plato exerted considerable influence upon Islam. Neo-Platonism, however, was the system by means of which the actual doctrinal beginnings of Arabian philosophy were achieved, and it was only gradually that Neo-Platonism was replaced by Aristotelianism.

The world-view of Neo-Platonism was based upon the same fundamental principles which, produced by a blending of Greek and Oriental views, dominated the last few centuries of antiquity and appeared now under a more religious form, now under a more philosophic form. The world, according to this theory, emanates through a gradual process of evolution from a perfect, divine primary or original being. This process of development, however, is at the same time a gradual descent from divine perfection to the lowliness and baseness of the sensual world. Man is entangled in this world of the senses, but he still carries in his soul a spark of the divine. The way to redemption lies in his turning away from the sensual and in his return to the source of the soul; this return can be effected by the contemplation of God and through ecstasy. Neo-Platonism gave this world-view its strongest speculative expression in the forms of Greek philosophy. It conceives of the evolution of the world from God as a logical process in which the uniform primary truth gradually developed into the fullness of its consequences.

The contrast between the higher and the lower worlds thus coincides with the antithesis between the ideal and the sensual. Therefore the world of the senses is not only the antipode to the divine world, but also its reflection. Although the absolute unity of the divine is no longer accessible to human thought, that unity is nevertheless logically demanded as the starting-point of all manifoldness in thinking; it is the logical in its original form, which is no longer attainable to discursive thinking. Philosophy is the only way to salvation, and even ecstasy, which is primarily thinking, is the highest form of philosophic consciousness.

The opposition of this conception to monotheistic religiousness is obvious. In its essence it is the same contrast as that existing between Arabian Aristotelianism, in which Neo-Platonic elements are strongly intermingled, and monotheistic religiousness. However, in Islam, as in Judaism, the contrast with Aristotelianism was sensed much more keenly than that with Neo-Platonism. In the main it was settled by means of a compromise or agreement with Aristotelianism. The reason for this is manifest in the fact that the Aristotelian conception appeared with greater abstract definiteness and scholastic precision. The difference between the fundamental religious motives was frequently not perceived in Islam as well as in Judaism, and the philosophers of both religions often adapted their basic religious attitude to that of Neo-Platonism. In the metaphysical interpretation of the world the consciousness of the difference for the first time became more pronounced. Here Neo-Platonism, too, substituted for the doctrine of a temporal act of creation the theory of an eternal emanation of the world from God. However, the doctrine of the eternity of the world is not emphasized as pointedly here as it is in the writings of Aristotle. The doctrine that the world necessarily emanated from God, though intrinsically Neo-Platonic, was far more impressively developed by the Arabian Aristotelians than it had been in Neo-Platonism proper. In the more popular forms of Arabian Neo-Platonism, in which greater stress was laid upon the religious than upon the philosophic aspect of the Neo-Platonic body of ideas, and which were frequently adapted to the prevailing religious views, these aspects of the Neo-Platonic system were completely kept in the background. A long list of Jewish Neo-Platonists who still clung in all respects to the traditional Jewish views and tried to work the Neo-Platonic motives into them also adopted these ideas. Only a few of the Jewish Neo-Platonists grasped the full meaning and profoundness of the system, but even among these, as far as it can be seen, the religio-philosophical conclusions regularly remained veiled.

As has been previously mentioned, ISAAC BEN SOLOMON ISRAELI (832-942), the first of the medieval Jewish philosophers, was a protagonist of Neo-Platonism, although he combined therewith many of the views of Aristotle and Galen. His works, Kitab al Istiḳsat (Book of Elements) and Kitab al-Hudud (Book of Definitions), are hardly more than compilations made on the basis of preceding works. Although he was held in high esteem as a physician during the entire Middle Ages, he exercised practically no influence at all on the development of Jewish philosophy. Only in Christian scholasticism was he frequently referred to as a philosopher. To judge by his philosophic position, he deserves inclusion not in the history of the philosophy of religion, but in that of general philosophy. Nowhere in these two works of his did he treat of particular Jewish problems; even general problems of the philosophy of religion are altogether subordinated to metaphysical problems and problems of natural philosophy. He accepted the Neo-Platonic idea of emanation only in that he represented the lower beings as having proceeded from the higher. He also adopted the Neo-Platonic scheme essentially as regards the enumeration of the beings thus following upon each other in this process of emanation. But he represented the idea of emanation as applying only to the emanation of the created beings from one another; however, the origin of the entire succession from God he perceived not in a process of emanation, but rather in an act of creation which had to be carefully differentiated from all other forms of becoming. He did not consider as necessary any justification or explanation of his breach of the principle of emanation, but with utter unconcern combined the doctrine of creation with the theory of emanation. In entire accord with the monotheistic doctrine of creation, he regarded as the reason for creation the goodness of God which always bears the welfare of His creatures in mind. Similarly, he taught that God's mercy communicates to mankind also His will, in order that men may follow the path leading to eternal blissfulness. Thus, although he clothed his views in the phraseology of Neo-Platonism, he followed the traditional ideas of Judaism as regards the doctrine of retribution. The Neo-Platonic doctrine of retribution was in principle akin to the conception of the monotheistic religions in this regard; this accord contributed considerably to facilitating his reconciliation of the two systems.

SOLOMON IBN GABIROL (about 1020-50), about a century later, with incomparably greater energy, mastered and developed the Neo-Platonic world of ideas. His "Fountain of Life," the Arabic original of which is lost and of which we possess only a Latin translation Fons Vitae and a Hebrew extract Meḳor Hayim, had hardly an equal for speculative energy either among the Islamic or the Jewish Neo-Platonists. His little treatise Tiḳḳun Middoth Hanefesh (The Improvement of the Moral Qualities) is of far lesser importance. Even Ibn Gabirol's "Fountain of Life" is not a work of the philosophy of religion, but of metaphysics. It treats metaphysical problems without any relation to the special religious hypotheses of Judaism. Even the religious motives resident in Neo-Platonism itself recede into the background in Ibn Gabirol's writings, for his interest lies chiefly in the logical and dialectical development of the system.

To Ibn Gabirol too the world was a graduated succession of essences or beings which emanated from the unity of the divine and gradually descend to the multiplicity and compositeness of the corporeal world. In typically Neo-Platonic fashion he too posited intellect, soul and nature as the series of intelligible essences or beings existing between God and the corporeal world. However, he did not accept the theory of the continuous emanation of the many from the one as something to be taken for granted, but his speculations were always centered around the deduction of this principle. He sought with the utmost sagacity to bridge over the basic antithesis between the spiritual and the corporeal and to comprehend the transition from the spiritual to the corporeal only as the last step in the development leading from unity to plurality. Although he was concerned here only with the understanding of the logical motives of the Neo-Platonic doctrine, he nevertheless developed them in detail and in his own free style in his doctrine of matter and form. According to Ibn Gabirol, both material objects and intelligible substances are composed of matter and form. All manifoldness of things is resolved into these two fundamental factors. It is only through the identity of these basic factors that the thoroughgoing coherence of the world appears in its full clearness.

The real meaning of this conception of Ibn Gabirol's becomes clear to us only when we revert to its motives. Wherever a majority of substances possess common basic elements, there must also be a common substratum underlying them to which that common element belongs, whereas its difference is attributable to a new, differentiating principle. The common substratum is matter, which is differentiated through form. Thus a common, corporeal primary matter, to which the particular form-distinctness of the elements is then added, forms the basis for all the various elements into which all temporal bodies are dissolved. The same duality applies also to the spiritual substances, in which the general character of substantiality must be differentiated from the particular distinctness of every individual substance.

It is clear how the logical relationship of the concepts is here transposed into a real relationship, and how its logical sequence presents itself as a succession of metaphysical essences. But this tendency, typical of all Neo-Platonism, appears in unique form in Ibn Gabirol's system. As the basic principle in the construction of the world he asserts the relation between the general and the particular, in place of the relation between unity and plurality. General matter and general form continuously become differentiated with ever-increasing distinctiveness and concreteness. In this process, however, the relation between matter and form is reversed in peculiar fashion as over against the original Aristotelian understanding of these concepts. To Aristotle, form is the abstract and categorical essence of things, which becomes individualized only through its connection with matter; to Ibn Gabirol, matter is the general substance which, although not individualized through form, is differentiated thereby. This change in relationship has its definite purpose and sense. The general is at the same time the indefinite, and differentiation is progressive definition. Matter, conceived of as the indefinite both in Aristotelianism and in Neo-Platonism, simultaneously becomes the absolute universal which has the same relation to the forms which it bears as the species has to the classification. The superiority which, viewed from the standpoint of mere universality, attaches to matter, receives its most pregnant expression in Ibn Gabirol's idea that in the gradation of substances the function of matter is attributed to the higher substance, and the function of form to the lower. That Ibn Gabirol likewise assumes an ultimate duality of universal matter and universal form has its beneficent significance. In the development from the general to the particular a differentiating moment is necessary in addition to a fundamental and general principle, because the transition to the particular is not derivable from the general itself, and the alternation of these two elements must repeat itself anew at every step in this evolution.

Ibn Gabirol too yields to dialecticism in his conceptions of matter and form. Although matter, viewed from the standpoint of mere universality, is logically superior to form, nevertheless, in its indefiniteness, it remains the shapeless, the merely potential, to which form first lends shape and reality. Thus the conception prevailing in Aristotelianism and in earlier Neo-Platonism concerning the relation between these two factors is re-established; it goes so far as to establish matter as multiplicity to which form imparts unity. Especially the derivation of the corporeal from the spiritual is consummated from this point of view. In quantity, which is the constitutive characteristic of bodies, the unity of form is explained through the substratum which underlies it. However, not even the dialecticism of Ibn Gabirol could master or eliminate this contradiction in terms. It was particularly evident in his system, because he followed out these concepts to their ultimate and logical conclusion, and then validated and systematically developed the usually rejected point of view.

Through the resolution of all reality into the duality of matter and form, Ibn Gabirol again saw himself face to face with the fundamental difficulty of Neo-Platonism, i.e. that of explaining the transition from unity to plurality, since the duality of these factors is in direct opposition to the unity of God. His doctrine of the will was intended to solve this difficulty; it was included either by Ibn Gabirol himself or by unknown predecessors of his as a new element in the Neo-Platonic system. In certain of its features this doctrine resembled Philo's doctrine of the Logos; it probably owed its existence to the influence of the Logos theory, which must certainly have reached the Arabians. The actual exposition of this difficult doctrine was to have been reserved for a separate work, but even from the scattered allusions to it in the "Fountain of Life" its motives at least are discernible to some extent.

The change which the concept of form underwent in the philosophy of Ibn Gabirol, together with the necessity, previously mentioned, of deriving duality from matter and form, led to his acceptance of the will.

Form„ which is the principle of activity in contrast to the passive substratum of matter, lost this function in Ibn Gabirol's system, for it is now assumed by the will. However„ it is difficult to comprehend in abstract manner the essence of this will. It is supposed to be identical with the divine essence, and, again, to be differentiated as something derived therefrom. Ibn Gabirol sought to solve this difficulty by differentiating between the divine will per se, which is identical with the divine essence, and the will which determines upon action, which latter proceeds from the divine will. However, all the efforts to set up a principle of duality without sacrificing the absolute unity of God are futile; nevertheless, Ibn Gabirol attempted to demonstrate a principle of motion in the immobility of the divine being. Here, too, Ibn Gabirol's futile struggle gives expression to the final inner difficulty of the Neo-Platonic conception of God. With the introduction of the will as the principle of creation, Ibn Gabirol hoped to conquer the idea that the world necessarily emanated from God. The idea of divine self-determination, by which the process of the creation of the world was initiated, is, it is true, far removed from the Biblical idea of the creation. But the idea of a divine spontaneity in which the world has its origin takes the place of the idea of the necessary emanation of the world from God.

In psychology and ethics Ibn Gabirol displayed considerably less originality. The individual soul has its origin in the universal soul. After its descent into the sensual world the knowledge originally inherent in it becomes obscured. But out of the knowledge of the world of the senses it can regain the knowledge of the spiritual essences which form its basis. It is the aim and task of the soul to free itself from the bonds of the sensual and to regain in the knowledge of the intelligible world its lost unity with it.

Although Ibn Gabirol developed his ideas in his chief philosophical work likewise without any reference to the Bible, several examples of his interpretation of the Bible, cited by Abraham ibn Ezra, indicate that he too employed the method of allegory in order to show that his system was to be found in the Bible. In the paradise story he saw the emanation of the world from God portrayed as the evolution of the lower world out of the higher world. Thus he perceived no contradiction between religious and philosophical conviction, and could intone in his Kether Malchuth a hymn to Neo-Platonic piety which is also the innermost expression of his Jewish belief.

BAHYA IBN PAKUDA can be included among the Jewish Neo-Platonists only with certain qualifications. He is to a certain extent only remotely concerned with the speculative problems of Neo-Platonism. His Hoboth Halebaboth (Duties of the Heart) is primarily devoted to ethics, and even in this field religious exhortation takes precedence over theoretical knowledge. The problem of God, the only metaphysical problem he discusses at rather great length, is treated only in part from a Neo-Platonic point of view. In his proofs for the existence of God Bahya followed the Kalam, and formed his own idea of creation on the basis of the Kalam. It was in the doctrine of the nature of God that he first adopted Neo-Platonic ideas; here God is defined as the primary, original One, and even the predicates of unity, existence and eternity are defined as merely negative definitions of God. In his ethical and religious attitude, too, he was not an outspoken Neo-Platonist. His ethics, which has its basic motive in gratitude towards God and its goal in the love of God, is primarily dominated by the motives of Biblical and Talmudic morality. This fact was responsible for the great popularity of his work. However, his ethical system represents a peculiar modification of Jewish morality. His psychology is dominated by the contrast between the sensual and the spiritual; man's most important moral task is to conquer the sensual. The elevation of the soul to God means release from the bonds of earthly life; subjective morality is relegated to a position far behind that of devout meditation on God and absorption in His contemplation. The contemplative religiousness of Neo-Platonism thus transformed into Jewish piety, but only to the extent of adding a new aspect to the basic Jewish motives. The final standpoint in Bahya's ethical system is the love of God and its attendant bliss, not Neo-Platonic ecstasy, which aims to be at one with God.

Greater Neo-Platonic influence is evident in the Maani al-Nafs (Nature of the Soul), a product of the 11th or 12th cent. and erroneously ascribed to Bahya ibn Pakuda. It follows Neo-Platonic doctrines both in psychology, which is the real theme of the work, and in the doctrine of the gradation of the essences and their origin in God. However, it is dominated by the popular form of Neo-Platonism previously described rather than by strictly philosophic Neo-Platonism. The procedure of the world from God is designated as emanation, but its theory of emanation is so obscurely phrased that its difference from the theory of creation is completely wiped out, and the gradated evolution of the world from the simple to the complex is the only feature of it that remains.

That part of the work which is devoted to the doctrine of the soul is a rather mechanical reproduction of the teachings of Neo-Platonic psychology. But an interesting feature of this work is its predilection for treating the phantastic embellishments of Neo-Platonic psychology in its presentation of the descent of the soul from the higher to the lower sphere, and especially in the depiction of the fate of the soul after death. The remarkable feature of this work consists primarily in the fact that it reveals how this popular Neo-Platonism manifested itself in Jewish circles.

ABRAHAM BAR HIYYA, who wrote at the beginning of the 12th cent., was another follower of the same line of thought. Though an eminent savant in astronomy and mathematics, he was of little significance as a philosopher. His Hegyon Hanefesh (Meditation of the Soul), our chief source for his views on philosophy, bears more the character of a homily interspersed with philosophic reflections than of a systematic philosophic didactic work. What he took over from Neo-Platonism represents only a few isolated didactic fragments rather than the systematic ideas upon which the unity of the system is based. In typical Neo-Platonic fashion he divides the world into the higher and the lower sphere; he gives a detailed description of the various kinds of forms and their different relations to matter, but of the Neo-Platonic theory of emanation nothing remains in his system. Not only does he substitute the idea of the creation for the theory of emanation without presenting any reasons for the change, but he maintains also that both matter and form were directly created by God.

In his teaching regarding the soul, too, the Neo-Platonic groundwork serves essentially as support for the religious idea of retribution, which, however, in its details, is frequently made to conform to the forms dominant in philosophic literature. Thus his thinking is essentially theological. The individual ideas which he borrowed from Neo-Platonism are included, without a thorough harmonization of the two contrasting modes of thought, in his own general conception which involves quite a different orientation.

JOSEPH IBN ZADDIK, who belongs to the middle of the 12th cent., was a more consistent thinker. His Sefer Haolam Haḳatan (Microcosm) develops in detail the idea, always indigenous in Neo-Platonism, that man is an image of the universe, and deduces therefrom the conclusion that in the knowledge of himself man possesses the key to the knowledge of the world. The world picture developed from this point of view also is Neo-Platonic in its basic features. Intellect proceeds directly from God; from this intellect the universe evolves by degrees. The human soul has its origin in the universal soul, and returns to it after its separation from the body, provided, however, that it has succeeded in freeing itself from the fetters of sensuality during its earthly existence. Ibn Zaddik accepts also Plato's idea that knowledge is cognition. Again in a Neo-Platonic sense, he conceives of God as an absolute unity, and rejects emphatically the compromise formulas of the Kalam which, despite the unity of God, attempt to retain the idea of divine attributes.

In addition to these popular Neo-Platonic ideas, there are in his work individual ideas reminiscent of Ibn Gabirol, such as the doctrine that spiritual essences also are composed of matter and form. Other reminiscences of Ibn Gabirol are to be found in his extremely unclear arguments concerning the divine will and its relation to the divine essence. Ibn Zaddik avails himself of these detailed arguments only in order to come a step closer to the Biblical conception of creation than Ibn Gabirol did, and also to justify the idea of the temporal creation. Thus, despite his usual opposition to the Kalam, he is able to employ its proofs for the creation in his own system. Despite the Neo-Platonic construction of his metaphysics, he thus recovers God as the creator and with it the ethical conception of God which enables him to subscribe to the ethical doctrines of the Kalam. As regards the basic religious problems he adopts in the main the personal conception of Judaism, without, however, perceiving its contrast with Neo-Platonism.

Jewish philosophy was preparing for the change from Neo-Platonism to Aristotelianism in the days of Joseph ibn Zaddik. The Aristotelian influence on Ibn Zaddik himself extended primarily to problems of natural science, in which the Arabian Neo-Platonists also frequently followed Aristotle. In Ibn Zaddik's contemporary Judah Halevi, however, the transition from Neo-Platonism to Aristotelianism is already clearly perceptible. Although Judah Halevi in many instances adopted Neo-Platonic views, nevertheless in the controversy between religion and philosophy which constitutes the real theme of his Kuzari, he regarded Aristotelianism predominantly as the representative of philosophic thought. Judah Halevi must, therefore, be treated only in connection with Aristotelianism.

However, the gains made by Aristotelian motives within Jewish Neo-Platonism markedly assert themselves in the writings of ABRAHAM IBN EZRA (1097-1167). For the knowledge of his philosophic views we must rely mainly upon the philosophical digressions and remarks in his exegetical and grammatical writings; neither as a thinker nor because of his mode of presentation can he be classed as a philosophical systematizer. Nevertheless, the basic features of his philosophic thought are clearly discernible. In accord with Neo-Platonism, he conceived of God as the ultimate unity from which the world emerged; however, he did not assume a temporal creation, but saw the world as an eternal emanation from God. In Ibn Ezra we meet also with Ibn Gabirol's analysis of the spiritual essences into matter and form. However, both in his doctrine of God and that of creation Aristotelian elements are combined with these Neo-Platonic elements. He too designates God as the thought of Himself, and while he characterizes creation as a delimitation or definition, he hints unmistakably that the divine creating is only a shaping and a delimiting of a primary matter independent of God. This inclination toward Aristotelianism allows the contrasts between the religious and the philosophical conception to appear in the same form as that which is peculiar to Arabian Aristotelianism. The knowledge that God has of Himself includes also a knowledge of the world which emanates from Him. However, this divine knowledge applies only to the universal and eternal lawfulness, and not to the changing individual objects, which owe their individualization to matter.

Ibn Ezra attempted also to make the doctrine of providence conform to the Aristotelian conception; he states that the idea of individual providence is valid only within the limits to which it shows itself intelligible from the Aristotelian point of view as well. This more independent and daring attitude of his toward Biblical tradition extends also to the Neo-Platonic elements of his teachings. He is fully aware of the pantheistic character of his doctrine of God, and repeatedly designates God as The All (Haḳol). Thus already in Ibn Ezra we meet with all the problems by which the history of Jewish Aristotelianism is dominated, even though he merely alludes to them rather than develops them.

3. Jewish Aristotelianism and Its Opponents. The difference between Aristotelianism and Neo-Platonism in Islamic and Jewish philosophy is less fundamental than gradual. Although Neo-Platonism in the Jewish and Islamic world absorbed many new Aristotelian additions, far beyond the Aristotelian elements already inherent in Neo-Platonism from its inception, the Aristotelian system was remodeled in a Neo-Platonic sense. If the independence of the individual object constitutes a fundamental principle in the Aristotelian system, which conceives of the world as a perfectly arranged system of such individual objects, this system having its apex in God but not its origin, now, in the Neo-Platonic sense, every individual object is derived from the ultimate divine being. The Neo-Platonic theory of emanation was also appropriated by Islamic Aristotelians for the derivation of the individual. As a consequence of this monistic feature, at least some of the Islamic Aristotelians now proceeded to overcome the Aristotelian duality of matter and form and to represent matter as having emanated from form. While Avicenna (Ibn Sina) had already reverted to Aristotelian dualism, it was Averroes (Ibn Roshd) who restored dualism in all its purity. But even he retained the theory of emanation for the world of forms, although he abandoned all intermediaries between unity and plurality.

Logical and religious interests were equally responsible for this remodeling of the Aristotelian system. The logical interest in a coherent knowledge of the world demanded that the grandiloquent system of species and classifications into which Aristotle had arranged reality be derived from ultimate abstract elements and that the world of abstract forms be conceived as the evolution of an ultimate law of form. The religious interest, however, sought to break down the theory of the world's eternal co-existence with God and to understand all existence only as the expression and evolution of the divine. Thus the barriers between God and mankind, like those between God and nature, were removed. Union with God becomes the goal of men, and knowledge the means of attaining this goal. The Aristotelian ideal of the individual who attains to perfection in knowledge is changed into the ideal of intellectual community with God. The knowledge of the empirical world is no longer an end in itself, but the means for the attainment of metaphysical knowledge, which is understood in this religious sense. Despite the various changes, however, the original Aristotelian tendencies of the system can not altogether be displaced. The only way to the comprehension of the supernatural is solely through a systematic knowledge of the world of the senses; this knowledge always awakens an independent interest in the subject. Above all else, however, the Aristotelian idea of an eternal and inviolable order of nature remains unchanged. Hence the emanation of the world from God can be conceived only as an eternal and necessary process. This is in thorough accord with the original Neo-Platonic concept of emanation.

Although frequently obscured in Arabian Neo-Platonism, the idea of emanation was rigorously upheld by the Arabians after its inclusion in the Aristotelian system. Thus the world-view which, in its basic principles, was common to medieval Neo-Platonism and to Aristotelianism, derived its most pronounced stamp from the latter and, consequently, here for the first time, as has been said before, its antithesis to the fundamental ideas of the monotheistic religions was brought out in all its acuteness.

This conception of the world, from its theoretical aspect, represents a dynamic and teleological conception of reality. The effective causes of all accidents are the forms, i.e. the categorical substances of things, which make their impress in matter which is per se indefinite. These forms, however, are at the same time purposive and active forces which actualize their usefulness in all accident. The individual forms which determine mundane accident have their origin in the supernatural form-substances which in turn emanate from God. God is the final primary force which, in the process of the formation of the world, develops into a succession of derived forces from which there finally proceeds the plurality of effective individual forms. All accident is therefore teleologically determined, but it does not follow the teleology of a purposeful will, but rather that of an impersonal cohesion of forces. In the thus defined purposive accident a stringent necessity is inherent. Both the development of the divine force into the individual forces and the cohesion of the individual forces which are already conceived of as given are dominated by this necessity.

If the question of the origin of the ultimate primary matter is put aside and this ultimate primary matter is accepted as something given, then this necessity rests upon a reciprocal relationship between matter and form. The individual form-forces emanate from the supernatural form-substances, and communicate themselves to matter. However, the hypothesis for this is that matter has the disposition to absorb them. If this is so, the effect of force must enter in, or else it is impossible. An especially characteristic illustration is the realization of knowledge. The form-substance nearest to us, the so-called active intellect, communicates its inherent abstract knowledge to the individual human intellect, which in itself possesses only the potentiality of abstract knowledge, but solely to the extent to which our intellect is prepared and destined to absorb it. Knowing, too, is such a cohesion of forces through which the individual intellect attains to its connection with the higher world of intellect.

This interpretation of the world is parallel in its entire structure to the conception of the monotheistic religions. For it, too, the world has its origin in God, who is at the same time the origin of all purposefulness of reality. It is acquainted also with the idea that divine truth is communicated to the human intellect, it sees in the spirit or intellect the nobler and more divine part of man, who is destined for community with the divine, and promises him immortality. But despite this parallelism there is a thoroughgoing and complete antithesis between the two conceptions, the contrast of the dynamic interpretation of the world on the one side, and that of the voluntary conception of the world on the other. The dynamic teleology of Aristotelianism finds a place for all the fundamental concepts of the monotheistic religions, but imparts to all of them an altered meaning by taking away their character of voluntary agency and interpreting them as elements of an impersonal combination of purpose.

At another juncture this contrast presents itself as one between the natural and the supernatural. In this, as it must be clear from the preceding discussion, the sphere of the natural is not restricted to the empirically given reality, as would be the case from the standpoint of the modern conception of nature. Included in it there is also the world of the spiritual substances, which are in continuous effective relation with the empirical world. The boundary between the natural and the supernatural lies rather between the necessary relation of the sensual and supernatural world on the one side and the free spontaneity of divine effect on the other. In order to harmonize Islam and Aristotelianism, the Islamic Aristotelians attempted to give to all the fundamental religious concepts of Islam naturalistic interpretations, and thus simultaneously sought to justify them from a metaphysical point of view.

In the God conception, however, the Neo-Platonic concept of God as the ultimate one who is exalted above all definition alternates with the Aristotelian identification of God with the highest intellect. But it is precisely on the ground of the latter conception, which per se is closer to the monotheistic concept of God, that a transformation of this concept of God became perceptible. According to Aristotle, the thinking of God is only the thought of Himself; it includes, however, the thought of the effects emanating from God. But even this extension applies only to the general essence of things, and not to the individual thing in its individuality. To this conception of the divine thinking the monotheistic doctrine of divine omniscience must be adapted. The doctrine of creation is likewise understood as an eternal and necessary emanation of the world from God. In the intra-worldly relation itself the natural explanation of the basic religious concepts becomes especially clear in the problems of providence and revelation. Providence is identified with the natural, purposive order emanating from God; this purposive order is realized through the system of effective forms. Its validity is therefore limited to the general categorical determination of accident.

Revelation coincides with the process, previously mentioned, in which knowledge is communicated to the human individual intellect from the super-individual active intellect. In the prophets this universal relation increases to the extent to which it is realized also in the purely abstract knowledge of the philosopher. But the special knowledge of the prophet is conditioned in a natural manner by the peculiarity of his talents, and is therefore to be conceived as a necessary consequence of a natural relation. The particular intimacy of the relation of such chosen humans with the higher world makes them to an especial degree the bearers of their powers. This results in a sort of compensation for the idea of individual providence, but even in this extension the interpretation of the concept of providence remains naturalistic and within the limits circumscribed thereby.

The doctrine of immortality of Arabian Aristotelianism varies with the interpretation of the moot Aristotelian doctrine of the human intellect. That conception of immortality which had the greatest influence on Jewish philosophy of religion makes immortality dependent in this respect, that the human intellect, which is altogether a mere predisposition, arrives at realization through activity in learning. Thus immortality is not only limited to the thinker, but is a natural consequence of the process of thinking. Eternal bliss ceases to be a free gift of divine mercy and becomes the necessary consequence of perfection which is attained in thinking.

This remodeling of the religious world of ideas reveals itself at this point as an adaptation to the altogether different religious motives which penetrated into the Aristotelian world of thought from Neo-Platonism. In place of a moral community with God there is substituted the union with God which is perfected through knowledge; the concept of religion is correspondingly remodeled. Only in the popular form of religion is religion the realization of the divine commandment. Its innermost and most profound meaning is the metaphysical knowledge which is at the same time union with its object. For the thinker, moral purification is only the indispensable means of attaining to this goal.

Even before Aristotelianism had met with any literary expression in Jewish philosophy, JUDAH HALEVI, who lived in the first half of the 12th cent., criticized it in his Kuzari. He perceived with exceptional keenness its antithesis toward the religion of the Bible. From the metaphysical point of view, Judah Halevi sees in Aristotelianism the system of necessity in which God is presented as the highest world cause and in which His direct connection with the world is replaced by the idea of emanation, together with its manifold intermediaries. In a religious respect, he characterizes Aristotelianism as a rational religion which takes the place of a historic religion, and bases the religious relation of man to God on the activity of the human reason instead of on the revelation of God which is communicated to man. The consciousness of this antithesis induced him to abandon the rational conception of the relation of religion and philosophy generally current in Jewish philosophy of religion and to align himself with the Arabian philosopher Ghazzali in the latter's polemic against rationalism. He followed Ghazzali especially in the refutation of the allegedly cogent metaphysical proofs of Aristotelianism, but, like Ghazzali, he reached no definite conclusions as regards the question of the possibility of metaphysical knowledge in general.

In the endeavor to oppose philosophy's rationalistic conception of religion by means of an interpretation of religion based on the facts of religious life itself, Judah Halevi again followed Ghazzali. However, he differed with him entirely in the carrying out of this idea. Judah Halevi's definition of the concept of religion was by far his most original and important contribution. It depicts the peculiar character of Jewish piety more vividly than did any other Jewish philosopher of the Middle Ages. Despite his polemic against philosophy, he too was influenced by it. But the ideas he adopted were more frequently Neo-Platonic ones than Aristotelian. He too thought of the God conception in the Neo-Platonic sense, and although he opposed to the philosophic God conception a religious one, he retained the Neo-Platonic idea of God as the basis for this religious God conception, which went beyond the philosophic conception only in the comprehension of the divine influences. However, even in his doctrine concerning the divine influences he employed the philosophic categories to a far greater extent than his fundamental attitude toward philosophy would permit one to expect. To him, too, the nature of matter determines what formes God communicates to it. He represents superrational relationship to God as being dependent on a particular predisposition of the human soul which only the Jewish people possesses. Thus it seems that he has merely added another step to the gradated system of the philosophers, but in this he firmly adheres to the idea of the free spontaneity of the divine influence. He conceives of creation as an act of divine spontaneity and considers God as the master of the world who can at will interfere in its course. Although he himself makes no effort to reconcile these antitheses, his intention as a whole must be understood to be an attempt to overcome the basic idea of necessity in Aristotelianism through his theory of the free, divine spontaneity, and to comprehend with the aid of philosophical categories the regulated coherence of the world and the manner in which divine influence reveals itself in this regular course of the world.

ABRAHAM IBN DAUD (d. as a martyr about 1180) was the first Jewish Aristotelian. His Emunah Ramah (Exalted Faith) is an expression of his conviction that between religion and philosophy absolute harmony exists. Only superficial philosophic thought can lead to religious doubts; a more profound and thorough knowledge of philosophy must confirm the truth of religion. His book is devoted to the exposition of this thesis. He indicates in detail the harmony between Judaism and Aristotelian philosophy, the basic concepts of which he briefly develops before treating the problems of philosophy of religion proper. Here Ibn Daud reveals himself as a clear and sound thinker and displays a thorough knowledge of Aristotle; however, he fails to show any consciousness of the depth and importance of the antitheses which have to be bridged over. He employs the Aristotelian argument, which deduces a primary mover from the fact of motion, to prove the existence of God. However, whereas this proof enables God to be recognized only as the originator of motion, Ibn Daud makes it serve to trace the existence of the world back to God. Into the Aristotelian system he incorporates the idea of the temporal creation of the world, without harmonizing it with the Aristotelian conception of the eternity of the world and its necessary emanation from God, and without discussing the difficulties arising out of the basic concepts of the system in opposition to the idea of creation. He adopted the Arabian Aristotelians' conception of philosophy, but combined with it the Biblical idea of prophecy as a mission, without effecting an inner harmonization of the two contrasting conceptions. In his treatment of the problems of immortality and the soul, Ibn Daud easily harmonized the Jewish conception with the Aristotelian; for he followed Ibn Sina's interpretation of Aristotle which regarded the rational part of the soul as immortal in accordance with its very essence, and thus arrived at the assumption of general immortality. It may perhaps be considered a greater concession on his part to Aristotelianism when, in order to retain human freedom of will unimpaired, he denied that God possesses knowledge in advance concerning human conduct, without professing his belief that such divine knowledge is limited to the general order of things. On the whole, the problems with which Aristotelianism confronted Jewish philosophy remained latent in Ibn Daud, and thus this first Jewish Aristotelian did not become the founder of Jewish Aristotelianism.

Moses Maimonides (1135-1204) was the actual founder of Jewish Aristotelianism in its deeper sense. His Moreh Nebuchim (Guide of the Perplexed) treats clearly all those problems which remained latent in Ibn Daud's philosophical work, and recognizes in its uttermost acuteness the antithesis between the dynamic and teleological system of Aristotle and the personal religiousness of Judaism. In his Moreh Nebuchim he laid the foundation for the entire later development of Jewish philosophy, even where it differed with his own solution of these problems. Maimonides' solution can be reduced to this simple formula: Maimonides incorporates the Aristotelian conception into the Jewish by presenting the dynamics of Aristotelianism and the explanation of accident as the result of the mutual relationship between matter and form as being valid for the inner-worldly relationship; however, as regards the relation of the world to God, he rejects the validity of this mode of thought, thus maintaining for the final interpretation of the world the ethical personalism of Judaism. Thus the bounds between the natural and the supernatural sphere are marked out. He prepares the way for this solution by seeking to prove, in his discussion of the problem of creation, that the Aristotelian categories in reality are not applicable to the derivation of the universe, but are valid only with regard to intra-worldly relations. Indirectly he testifies to the correctness of the idea of creation through his criticism of the doctrine of emanation. Having thus gained a fundamental point of view, he can now do justice to the demands of Biblical religiousness in all such individual problems as those of divine knowledge, miracles, providence, and prophecy. His treatment of the problem of prophecy is especially characteristic; he recognizes the natural explanation of prophecy as given by Aristotelianism, but leaves room for the Biblical idea of prophecy as a mission which rests upon the free and spontaneous selection of the prophet by God.

In two points, however, the Aristotelian and Neo-Platonic conception triumphed over the Jewish. Even Maimonides could not escape from the Neo-Platonic conception of God as the absolute One. Maimonides gave the most classic formulation in the history of Jewish philosophy to the doctrine that no positive assertion concerning God is possible, and that our knowledge of Him is confined to the fact of His reality and to the comprehension of the effects emanating from Him. Not more than his Jewish predecessors could Maimonides escape the compelling force of the argument which maintained that the unity of God could be understood only in the sense of the absolute abstract oneness. However, in the continuation of his system he escaped the consequences of this God conception; the voluntary character of the relation between God and the world re-establishes the personal conception of God. He is also influenced against the Jewish conception by the speculative and mystical tendency of religiosity in Arabian Aristotelianism. With Maimonides, too, knowledge is the way whereby man attains to community with God; his endeavor to validate herein the ethical religiousness of Judaism fails of decisive results. This becomes especially clear in his doctrine of immortality, in which he followed the rather radical formulation of Arabian Aristotelianism. In his opinion, immortality is acquired through thinking, and the blessedness of eternal life is the eternal blissfulness of knowledge.

The effect of these ideas was extremely great immediately after the appearance of the Moreh Nebuchim. Aristotelianism had already become the philosophy of the educated classes among the Jews also, and for these the Moreh Nebuchim had actually become the guide which showed them the way to harmony in their religious and philosophical consciousness. Thus it became the basis for Jewish Aristotelianism, and exercised such powerful influence that philosophic activity was at first limited to popularizing and enlarging upon Maimonides' ideas. The translation of the Moreh Nebuchim into Hebrew extended its influence far beyond the confines of the Jewish Islamic world, and carried it especially into Provence and Italy. Nowhere, perhaps, did the Moreh Nebuchim make a more powerful impression than in Provence, which, under the influence of a strong Spanish Jewish immigration, had begun to participate in Jewish Islamic culture and was preparing to amplify it by means of literary productions. Samuel ibn Tibbon was the translator of the Moreh Nebuchim in Provence, and also a propagator of its ideas. His successor and son-in-law, Jacob Anatoli, was of like mind; he was called as a translator to the court of the Hohenstauffen Emperor Frederick II, and succeeded in interesting him in Maimonides. His Malmad Hatalmidim (Teacher of the Disciples), a collection of philosophical homilies for all the Sabbaths and festivals of the year, represents an enlightenment essentially in the spirit of Maimonides. However, a radical enlightenment which denied the religion of revelation or considered it as being of value only to the uneducated masses, appeared under the guise of Maimonides. This radicalism is expressed in the words put into the mouth of Samuel ibn Tibbon by the enemies of philosophy, i.e. that the narrations of the Torah are legends and its religious prescriptions folk-customs. This radicalism caused the Orthodox stubbornly to oppose philosophy, and resulted in the impassioned conflicts concerning philosophy which deeply stirred Jewish intellectual life in the 13th cent. and at the beginning of the 14th cent.

While these conflicts as such do not belong within the province of Jewish philosophy, the basic contrasts which reveal themselves therein are extraordinarily characteristic of the position of philosophy in the whole of Jewish intellectual life. It is characteristic of the commanding position occupied by Maimonides that the struggle which raged about philosophy was carried on essentially as a struggle around Maimonides. The leaders of the opposition to philosophy were rabbis who, remote from all philosophic thinking and unaffected thereby, tenaciously and naively adhered to their belief in all the anthropomorphisms of the God conception as portrayed in the Bible and Talmud and to the sensual portrayal of the idea of the hereafter as contained in the Haggadah of the Talmud. They reproached Maimonides for having spiritualized and idealized these notions.

Besides these Orthodox opponents, there were men well versed in philosophy; these were more profound in their sensing of the antitheses, and accused Maimonides of being guilty of lack of thoroughness in that he failed to do justice either to religion or to philosophy. They objected particularly to Maimonides' attempt to interpret some of the Biblical miracles rationally, on the ground that such an attempt lacked purpose from the point of view of philosophy also. For, they asserted, once the principle of miracles is recognized, it is of little consequence whether their number is greater or smaller.

The antithesis assumed its most acute poignancy in the last great conflict, at the beginning of the 14th cent. The opponents of philosophy accused the Jewish adherents of philosophy at that time of having appropriated completely the Aristotelian idea of the absolute necessity of all accident, and of having dissolved the historic contents of the Holy Scriptures into a system of general concepts through their unbounded use of allegory. However, the defenders of philosophy refuted both contentions as completely unfounded. And, in reality, the writings of Levi ben Abraham of Villefranche, who was especially attacked, indicate that he did not essentially proceed beyond the point of view of Maimonides, although in his restriction of the possibility of miracles he somewhat exceeded Maimonides. Even his allegorizing of the Biblical narrations is not intended to destroy their historic content, but rather to attribute to the historic events a still deeper import. Nevertheless, it appears that the more radical tendency, too, was widely disseminated.

At the same time, however, these conflicts indicate how deeply the philosophical enlightenment had penetrated into Jewish life. It is safe to assume that the community of Provence, where lectures on the works of Jacob Anatoli were held every Sabbath and were participated in by nearly all the members of the community, was not an isolated case. Even the opponents of philosophy betray its influence in their entire mode of thought. The religious life of the Spanish and Provençal Jews of the later Middle Ages everywhere shows this influence of Jewish philosophy of religion, which, transcending its scientific significance, thus became a decisive factor in the history of the Jewish religion.

The entire radical movement which manifested itself in the religious struggles may perhaps be ascribed to the increasing influence in Jewish circles of Averroes' philosophy which, although formally remaining on Islamic ground, nevertheless abandoned itself entirely to Aristotelianism objectively. There were few followers of Averroes in philosophic literature until the end of the 13th cent. HILLEL BEN SAMUEL of Verona (second half of the 13th cent.), in his work Tagmule Hanefesh (Retribution of the Soul), defended the point of view of Maimonides against Averroes' daring reinterpretation of the Aristotelian doctrine of the human intellect which leaves no room for individual immortality. Hillel ben Samuel systematically developed the position merely alluded to by Maimonides himself. Only his younger contemporary, ISAAC ALBALAG, approached the position of Ibn Roshd. He owned to the doctrine of the eternity of the world. Above all, however, Albalag advocated the so-called doctrine of the twofold truth which, although not found in Ibn Roshd himself, belonged to his school. According to this doctrine, a final and unremovable contradiction between religious and philosophic truth is possible. At the beginning of the 14th cent. the influence of Ibn Roshd increased. Moses of Narbonne, a keen commentator of Maimonides, who wrote commentaries on many of the works of Ibn Roshd, frequently adopted the views of the latter and criticized Maimonides on the ground of his standpoint.

The greatest influence of Ibn Roshd, however, is evident in GERSONIDES (Levi ben Gershon, 1288-1344). This philosopher, who in the basic principles aspired to exceed Maimonides, was the only one among all the Jewish Aristotelians who could be compared with Maimonides in speculative power. In his Milhamoth Adonai (The Wars of the Lord) he subjected the new form of Aristotelianism, as portrayed in the philosophy of Ibn Roshd, to a thorough analysis. Though he refused to yield to Ibn Roshd entirely, Gersonides always proceeded on the basis of the former's formulation of the problem. What Maimonides accomplished with the Aristotelian forms which were available to him, Gersonides attempted to do with the formulation of the Aristotelian system evolved by Ibn Roshd. In this, however, he adhered essentially to Aristotelianism more closely than to Maimonides, and arrived at an understanding with Judaism not so much through the fundamental reconstruction of the metaphysics of Aristotelianism as through the dialectical adjustment of individual philosophic and religious attitudes to one another.

In one point, however, Ibn Roshd suggested to Gersonides a possibility of coming closer to the Jewish point of view than had his predecessors. As in many other points, Ibn Roshd, in his definition of the God conception too, had given up the Neo-Platonic views dominant in the earlier Arabian Aristotelianism and had reverted to the original teaching of Aristotle. To Ibn Roshd, God was no longer the indefinable One, but He was the highest intellect, as in Aristotle. In an impressive analysis and discussion of the Neo-Platonic conception of God he attempted to prove that the unity of the divine being is not destroyed by the assumption of positive definitions of the essence of God. Here Gersonides followed in his footsteps; he too again assumed positive attributes in God, but freed them from the compulsion of changing all our assertions concerning God into mere negations.

But this highest intellect, wherewith Aristotle defined God, differed essentially from the Biblical conception of God; it was precisely this adherence to the Aristotelian idea of God which became the root of all the concessions which Gersonides had to make to the Aristotelian system. This is evident above all in the problem of creation. To Aristotle God is the highest form. Out of this form the other forms may be derived. Matter, however, can never emanate from form. Thus Gersonides saw himself confronted with the necessity of putting side by side with God an eternal, uncreated matter; although he greatly reduced the importance of matter and stressed its inherent characteristic of mere potentiality, it nevertheless represented a basic acknowledgment of Aristotelian dualism. With this dualism, however, Gersonides now sought to combine the idea of creation. The forming of matter into the world is not to be conceived as a process of eternal necessity, but as a free act of creation. Directly favoring this theory is the purposefulness of the world, which points to a plan of creation; indirectly in its favor is the impossibility of reconciling the idea of the eternity of the world with the Aristotelian doctrine of the impossibility of an infinite magnitude.

In the doctrine concerning the divine knowledge the consequences of this basic position reveal themselves anew. Gersonides, like Maimonides, conceived of the knowledge of God as a creative knowledge which preceded the existence of its objects in abstract form. However, there results from this that God can know only the forms which emanated from Him. God's knowledge does not extend to matter, and hence not to the individual object, which receives its particular impress only after matter has received form. Only the world of forms constitutes an abstract system which can be encompassed in a coherent act of knowledge, whereas infiniteness of the individual object is incapable of any abstract unity. By restricting divine knowledge only to that which is general Gersonides attempted to smooth out the contradiction between divine omniscience and human freedom of will. The conduct of man belongs in the sphere of the individual which is not comprehended by the divine knowledge. But Gersonides did not intend to remove the individual from the sphere of the divine knowledge; the individual, he stated, is known by God insofar as it is a link in the lawful order of things or perhaps, more exactly, insofar as it is a special case of the general law of form.

From this point of view Gersonides treated also the problems of prophecy and providence. The knowledge of the active intellect, from which the prophet receives his revelation, comprehends the individual only insofar as it is a link in a determined general order. It does not know the individual or its fate as such; its knowledge extends only to the consequences resulting from a definite general structure of the individual. Hence prophetic revelation, in accordance with its origin, is of a general nature; it first assumes its individual character in the intellect of the prophet. Providence, in accordance with its nature, is likewise general. It becomes individualized only in its effect upon human individuals, each of whom, in proportion to his close attachment to the world of the spiritual, has a greater or lesser share in it. This connection of the individual intellect with the world of the spiritual is conceived by Gersonides in principle in a manner similar to Maimonides; the result of his extraordinarily subtle discussion of the problem of immortality essentially agrees with Maimonides. Ibn Roshd's interpretation of the problem of immortality, which goes much beyond Maimonides' interpretation and in which individual immortality is completely rejected, is rejected by Gersonides also. But in this matter Maimonides previously had entirely adopted the Aristotelian point of view and had departed considerably from the traditional Jewish conception. In the doctrine of immortality as well as in all other doctrines, Gersonides fundamentally adhered to the teachings of Arabian Aristotelianism. He even followed it in its method of interpreting the ideas of monotheistic religiosity in the sense of the Aristotelian system; only in the application of this method did he effect an approximate approach to the traditional religious concepts.

Hasdai ben Abraham Crescas (d. 1410) aspired in his Or Adonai (The Light of God) to overcome Aristotelianism completely and basically. He examined the antithesis between Aristotelianism and Judaism not only in accordance with their metaphysical aspects, but also from the point of view of the contrast in values. He endeavored to establish the validity of the Jewish conception in both directions. Even the external construction of his work discloses this tendency. He arranged the individual doctrines according to the dogmatic significance attached to them from the Jewish point of view. His attitude was frequently compared with that of Ghazzali and Judah Halevi, by whom he was influenced in many points. However, the validity of this comparison is only a conditional one. Indeed, in a methodical respect, Crescas disclosed a tendency to dispute the certainty of metaphysical knowledge, and in various individual questions he even attempted to prove the impossibility of a metaphysical solution. This skeptical attitude, however, is only of secondary importance; for it was his real purpose to undertake a transformation of the metaphysical concepts so as to make them conform to the basic Jewish convictions. Even in a religious respect Crescas followed a path which was different from that of Judah Halevi, and he was hardly influenced by Judah Halevi's differentiation between religious and knowing consciousness and by the theory concerning the basic superrational and supernatural character of the relationship between man and God. In return, however, he endeavored to develop the moral nature of the religious concepts in all directions.

Crescas' opposition to Aristotelianism extended also to its picture of nature, a picture which, from the religious point of view, is an indifferent one. The basic doctrines of the Aristotelian physics, and especially its concept of space and its doctrine of the spacial finiteness of the world, are subjected by Crescas to penetrating criticism in which he anticipated the space concept of modern natural science and the doctrine of the spacial infiniteness of the world. The especial aim of this criticism, however, was to discredit the Aristotelian proof for the existence of God; in its stead Crescas offered a purely ontological proof which, independent of the Aristotelian world-picture, concluded the existence of a necessarily existent being from the abstract accidentality of the world.

Crescas' religio-philosophical differences with Aristotelianism began with the God conception. On this question he followed the path of Gersonides and Ibn Roshd. First he proved the impossibility of the Neo-Platonic exaggeration of the concept of unity, which forbids every positive definition of the divine being. With extraordinary acuteness he criticized this theory. Thus he pointed out that the allegedly merely negative definitions, to which Maimonides reduced the meaning of our assertions about God, in reality infer a positive content; his criticism dealt with the difficulties of the ultimate, fundamental categories upon which is based the Aristotelian as well as the Neo-Platonic doctrine of being. His own theory concerning the relation of unity and plurality in God shows Crescas' lack of the means of expression to secure the views gained through his criticism. But whereas Ibn Roshd and Gersonides substituted for the Neo-Platonic God conception the Aristotelian idea of God as the highest thinking, it is just here, according to Crescas, that the religious inadequacy of Aristotelianism reveals itself. The thinking of God, which is based on itself, can never render the idea of creation intelligible. Only when we conceive of God as the principle of the good can we understand His activity as creator on the ground of His being. The good, or, as Crescas expresses it, love, thereby becomes the fundamental attribute of the divine being. Only love can render intelligible the blessedness of God. The Aristotelian theory, according to which the blessedness of the highest knowledge is ascribed to God, overlooks the fact that the joy of knowledge does not rest upon its possessions, but rather on its acquisition, and is, therefore, not applicable to the eternal knowledge of God. Crescas considered the elevation of knowledge to the position of greatest value as the basic error of Aristotelianism, and it was his main purpose to show the ethical value of love as the ultimate and original value.

From this point of view all the difficulties which beset Maimonides as regards the question of the ultimate purpose of the world, questions which he declared unanswerable, are solved for Crescas. After love has become the essence of God, the meaning of the divine creation is rendered directly comprehensible. The realization of the good is the final purpose which is furthered by the very essence of God Himself. God and the world are connected in the concept of the good; thus there is no longer any difficulty in conceiving of the world as having emanated from God, because it is bound up with Him through an inner community of natures.

Crescas applied the same way of thinking to man. For man, too, the final purpose is in community with God. This union, however, is effected through love of God, not through knowledge. In the Aristotelian system the moral sphere had been subordinated to the logical because all moral conduct is directed only towards intra-worldly purposes. Crescas admitted this statement as regards conduct, but differentiated from it the moral disposition, which represents the loftiest aim of man and forms the basis for his connection with God. Accordingly, immortality too can not be the result of knowledge. Crescas subjected the Aristotelian doctrine of immortality to thorough criticism from the logical point of view also. In this criticism, partly in addition to the inner discussions of Aristotelianism, he revealed the difficulties of the Aristotelian doctrine of the intellect. Crescas himself conceived of the soul as independent of the body by its very nature, and even though in the formulation of this idea he touched on the interpretation given to this Aristotelian doctrine by Ibn Sina, he departed from it in his refusal to recognize the intellect as the highest force of the soul, even psychologically.

Crescas' chief aim, in all these efforts, was to reestablish the Jewish conception in all its purity. However, even in his own system Crescas betrayed tendencies that were remote from the traditional conceptions of Judaism. At any rate, he declared that the Torah demands the acceptance of a temporal creation which must therefore be recognized by every Jew; not even from the Jewish point of view, however, did he see an inner necessity for this acceptance. The only essential of religion is the acknowledgment of the fact that the world owes its origin to the divine will. However, this conception is possible also if we conceive of the world as the eternal effect of an eternal divine will to create. It almost appears from the esoteric meaning of his doctrine that the world originated from this eternal will, and that in place of logical necessity, the process by means of which the world is derived from God in Aristotelianism, there comes his own theory of the necessity of will, which has to realize the good. This assumption is favored by his attempt, in the question of man's will, to understand the idea of morality and of divine retribution from the point of view of determinism too. Here, too, however, Crescas was restrained from adopting this deterministic point or view out of consideration for the statements of the Torah. When he finally rejected the idea of the necessity of will there is no doubt that the inner impulses of his system strongly inclined him toward making this decision. For the intellectualistic conception of Aristotelianism he substituted a voluntaristic. However, even from the voluntaristic point of view, the problem of the necessity of world coherence manifested itself again with undiminished force.

4. The Close and After-Effects of Jewish Philosophy of the Middle Ages. With Hasdai Crescas the period of independent thought within Jewish philosophy of religion in the Middle Ages came to a close. All that the 15th cent. brought forth were reproductions of the extant systems or combinations of the individual doctrines of the various philosophers. Even Joseph Albo (1380-1444), who studied with Hasdai Crescas, hardly contributed anything new to philosophy in his widely read Iḳḳarim (Principles). This work was nothing more than a blending, and not always a consistent one, of certain ideas of Maimonides and Crescas. Its seeming originality rests essentially upon the fact that Albo, to an even greater extent than Crescas, puts in the foreground those questions dealing with the basic doctrines of the Jewish religion and subordinates the entire philosophical material to the points of view at which he arrives in these questions. It is true that he borrowed these points of view from his older contemporary Simon ben Zemah Duran. However, inasmuch as Albo gave them their historic effectiveness and made them the basis for his entire work, they may be treated in connection with his philosophy. That these dogmatic problems attained to such great significance at that time must be ascribed to the internal and external condition of Judaism then. The violent convulsion which Spanish Judaism experienced by reason of the catastrophe of 1391, the ensuing period of persecution, and the constant attempts at conversion necessitated a dogmatic conflict with Christianity. Its basis had to be the fixed laying down of the Jewish dogmatic doctrines.

In addition, the development of Jewish philosophy itself created the necessity for such a fixing of the Jewish doctrines. The most important dogmas of Judaism had, through this development, become the object of philosophical controversies and had been subjected to considerable transformation. Even the most radical exponents of Jewish philosophy had recognized the authority of the Torah and had sought to understand it in the sense of their respective philosophic views. But as a result there arose the question whether every convenient interpretation of the Torah was admissible from the religious point of view, or whether there were definite and generally valid principles of Jewish belief which would set fixed limits to the interpretation of the Torah. The thirteen articles of faith laid down by Maimonides could not satisfy this need, because the principle underlying their choice was not discernible. Crescas attempted to establish such a principle by accepting revelation as a fact and by designating those assumptions without which revelation would not be possible as the necessary basic doctrines of Judaism. Duran and Albo followed Crescas in principle, but deviated from him in their application of his principles. In conjunction with the formulation which Ibn Roshd had given to older Islamic doctrines, they laid down three fundamental principles of every revelational religion: belief in God, belief in divine revelation, and belief in the retributive justice of God. Each of these basic doctrines or dogmas contains a number of logical consequences which likewise are indispensable for every revealed religion.

However, what they thus developed were the principles of revealed religions in general, not of that of Judaism in particular. As previously in Crescas, several special Jewish dogmas were added, but these bore no organic relation to the principle of their dogmatics. But even the basic doctrines derived from the concept of revelation suffice to differentiate between alleged and real revelation. Contradictions to these principles are to be found both in Christianity and in Islam. Above all, however, the proof demanded by reason of the concept of revelation for the fact of revelation can be adduced only for Judaism. Similarly, these principles provided Albo with the possibility of refuting the radical reinterpretations of the content of the revelation. In his special arguments on the three basic principles Albo endeavored essentially to reject their reinterpretation in the Aristotelian sense of the dynamic conception of the world and to prove that this reinterpretation is incompatible with the religious meaning of these principles.

Whereas Albo still succeeded in setting his own personal impress on the traditional ideas current up to his time, in the course of the 15th cent. philosophic learning increasingly took the place of philosophic thought. The continued existence of the various philosophic tendencies is characteristically displayed by the Shemtob family. Shemtob ben Joseph ibn Shemtob renewed the old attacks against philosophy with great vehemence, and did not even bow to the authority of Maimonides. His son, Joseph ben Shemtob, endeavored to harmonize religion and philosophy, but completely subordinated philosophy to faith. However, his son, SHEMTOB IBN JOSEPH, the renowned commentator of the Moreh Nebuchim, was again in complete accord with Maimonides. Even the prolific literary productions of ISAAC ABRAVANEL (1437-1508), the last distinguished Jewish statesman in Spain, possess no real originality, despite their erudition and dialectic skill. In the main, they reflect the point of view of Maimonides, but endeavor to reestablish the traditional Jewish views where Maimonides deviated from them. The following will serve to characterize his method: in a writing dealing with the dogmas he spiritedly and in detail defended Maimonides' point of view against the attacks of later philosophers; however, he concluded with the statement that Judaism does not permit the setting up of any individual basic doctrines, because the entire content of the Torah is of equal importance because of its divine origin.

In the new philosophical movement that set in at the close of the Middle Ages the Jews hardly participated at all. If the Jews still possessed any philosophic consciousness, it was satisfied with the cultivation of their medieval traditions. Thus at the close of the 15th cent. Elijah Delmedigo acquainted his pupil, Pico della Mirandola, with the philosophy of Ibn Roshd, without, however, himself being influenced by the new tendencies of Italian philosophy. Soon after, Judah Abravanel (1470-1530), who was the son of Isaac Abravanel and who became well-known under the name of Leone Hebreo (Leo Hebraeus), was profoundly influenced by the Neo-Platonism of the Renaissance, especially as taught in the school of Pico della Mirandola. His Dialoghi di Amore (Dialogues of Love), written in Italian, breathes forth the enthusiastic spirit of this tendency, and fuses aesthetic and religious motives in its spirit. However, this beginning was hardly followed out. Although Italian Judaism frequently came into contact with the humanistic tendencies of the Renaissance, essentially it stood remote from active participation in the Renaissance philosophic movement. Joseph Solomon Delmedigo (1591-1655), a descendant of Elijah Delmedigo, as a pupil of Galileo absorbed the main doctrines of modern natural science and recognized its incompatibility with the world-view of medieval philosophy; however, despite his essentially enlightened nature, he felt no inner urge towards an independent philosophic examination and understanding of Judaism.

Even the Spanish Jews who took refuge in Holland continued for the most part to live in accordance with the medieval traditions of their old homeland. Men like Manasseh ben Israel, it is true, absorbed the philological learning of Late-Humanism in Holland, but they never proceeded beyond the external appropriation of this material. They were, at any rate, hardly affected by the philosophic problems which motivated Dutch scientific pursuits. This held true at least for those groups which remained internally united with Judaism. It is difficult to estimate the extent to which the various liberal-minded elements within the Jewish community of Amsterdam were subject to the after-effects of the medieval enlightenment, or how much they were influenced by contemporary tendencies. Their strong attachment to the traditions of medieval philosophy is clearly shown in Spinoza. He utilized for the theological and exegetical arguments in his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus the material which Jewish philosophy and Biblical exegesis of the Middle Ages offered him, and also evidenced his relation to the Judaism of the Middle Ages in his philosophy.

If his philosophy is completely rooted, from the point of view of method, in the world of concepts of modern science, the metaphysical view of the world which he expressed through these means was akin to that of Arabian and Jewish Aristotelianism. However, the radical form into which he developed these views destroyed their relation to Judaism, and his system therefore has no place in the history of Jewish philosophy. Among strictly Jewish thinkers, however, there was no such productive continuation of the traditional ideas. Medieval philosophy, at best, continued to be handed down as a traditional heritage, but no efforts were made to develop it further or to bring it into relation with the many and varied problems of modern philosophy.

Not until the days of Moses Mendelssohn, when Judaism's gradual incorporation into the modern European cultural world was consummated, did Jews come to participate actively in the work of modern philosophy. But whatever was achieved in philosophic labors by the Jews at that time, in accordance with its objective content, bore no relation either to Judaism or to Jewish problems, and was accomplished solely in connection with the philosophy of the various European nations. Even Moses Mendelssohn's philosophy of religion treated the religio-philosophical problems in an altogether general manner, and, in keeping both with its purpose and its nature, formed a part of the philosophy of the German Enlightenment, and not of Jewish philosophy of religion. Only his "Jerusalem" can be considered a philosophic treatment of Judaism, but basically its aim was to show there is no special Jewish philosophy of religion.

Not until the fourth and fifth decades of the 19th cent. did thinkers like Salomo Ludwig Steinheim, Solomon Formstecher, and Samuel Hirsch appear with new attempts at a Jewish philosophy of religion, attempts which had their basis in the various systems of German philosophy. However, these attempts, despite certain valuable contributions, remained merely a passing episode; they had no influence whatsoever upon the inner development of Judaism, and were not continued by subsequent thinkers. A period of historical research followed which completely forewent every philosophic comprehension of Judaism. It was only the increasing philosophic need of the last few decades which awakened in Judaism, too, the desire for philosophic self-consciousness. This beginning of modern Jewish philosophy of religion, which reached its climax in the achievements of Hermann Cohen, is still of the present, and can not as yet be subjected to historical evaluation.

See also: ANGELS; ARABIC LITERATURE OF THE JEWS; ARISTOTLE; ATTRIBUTES OF GOD; BIBLE EXEGESIS; COSMOLOGY; CREATION; DOGMAS; FREE WILL; GOD; JUDAISM; LITERATURE, HEBREW; METAPHYSICS; MYSTICISM; NEO-PLATONISM; PLATO; PREDESTINATION; PROPHETS AND PROPHECY; THEODICY; THEOLOGY; and the articles on the individual philosophers.

JULIUS GUTTMANN.

Lit.: Munk, Salomon, Mélanges de philosophie juive et arabe (1859); Eisler, Vorlesungen über die jüdischen Philosophen des Mittelalters (1870-83); Neumark, David, Geschichte der jüdischen Philosophie des Mittelalters; idem, Jehuda Halevi's Philosophy in Its Principles (1908); Husik, Isaac, A History of Mediaeval Jewish Philosophy (1916); Schmiedl, Studien über jüdische, insbesonders jüdisch-arabische Religionsphilosophie (1869); Guttmann, Julius, Die jüdische Religionsphilosophie des Mittelalters (1930); Schreiner, Der Kalam in der jüdischen Literatur (1895); Guttmann, Jakob, Die Philosophie des Salomo ibn Gabirol (1889); Wittmann, Die Stellung Avencebrols (Ibn Gabirols) in der Entwicklung der arabischen Philosophie (1905); Kaufmann, D., Die Theologie des Bachja ibn Pakuda (1874); Wolfsohn, Harry A., Crescas' Critique of Aristotle (1929); Tänzer, Die Religionsphilosophie Josef Albos nach seinem Werk Ikkarim systematisch dargestellt und erläutert (1896); the literature cited under individual philosophers.

PHINEHAS, name that occurs in the Bible and was frequently borne by Jews in later times; modern forms are Pinchas and Pinkus. It may perhaps be the same as the Egyptian Pe-Nehasi, which means literally "negro," but it probably did not indicate a member of a negro race as much as a person of swarthy complexion. The principal characters of this name in the Bible are:

1. high priest, son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron. He is praised for his zealous conduct in killing Zimri of the tribe of Simeon and a Midianite woman at the time when the Israelites sinned at Shittim, whereby he saved Israel from being overwhelmed by a plague; for this God rewarded him by declaring that he would be high priest and that the high priests would be his descendants (Num. 25). He is later reported to have been sent as emissary of the tribes west of the Jordan to those east of the Jordan (Josh. 22:13-34) and to have been serving as high priest at the time of the war of the other tribes against the Benjaminites (Judges 20:28). His residence is given as Ephraim (Josh. 24:33).

The rabbis expatiate on the merits of Phinehas in his zeal for God. Twelve miracles were said to have been wrought for him at Shittim. Since both he and Elijah are praised for their zeal, it was natural that Elijah should be regarded as the reincarnation of Phinehas or Phinehas himself (Pirḳe de Rabbi Eliezer 47). Mattathias cited Phinehas to his sons as an example of heroism (I Macc. 2:54), and Sirach gives him a place in the list of famous men (45:23-24).

2. son of Eli, priest at Shiloh. He was regarded as unworthy, and was slain with his brother Hophni in battle with the Philistines. His son, born at the same time, was called Ichabod (I Sam. 4).

Lit.: The Biblical commentaries and histories; Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 18-19.

PHINEHAS BEN JAIR, Tanna of the fourth generation, who lived in the 2nd cent. C.E. He was a son-in-law of Simeon ben Yohai and a contemporary of Judah Hanasi. Not a single legal opinion of his is reported, but he was renowned for his piety and famed as a miracle worker. He was extremely scrupulous about tithes, and blamed every misfortune upon failure to seperate them; his mule was said to be so imbued with its master's spirit that it refused to eat untithed grain. He was noted also for the fact that he never accepted an invitation to dine with another; this was true even of his own father after Phineas had reached the years of maturity. He laid great stress on right intention in religious conduct, drawing up the following chain of virtues: "Observance of the Law leads to carefulness; carefulness, to diligence; diligence, to cleanliness; cleanliness, to separation; separation, to purity; purity, to fear of God; fear of God, to humility; humility, to fear of sin; fear of sin, to saintliness; saintliness, to the Holy Spirit; the Holy Spirit, to the resurrection of the dead" (A.Z. 20b; cf. Sotah 9:15). To Phinehas is ascribed the authorship of Midrash Tadshe, which is therefore known also as the Baraitha of Phinehas ben Jair.

Lit.: Bader, G., The Jewish Spiritual Heroes, vol. 1 (1940) 439-42; Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 20-21.

PHINEHAS OF KORETZ (Schapira), one of the earliest Hasidic leaders, with the surname of "The Holy," b. Sklow, Poland, 1726 or 1728; d. 1791, while on a journey to Palestine. Phinehas of Koretz regarded himself more as a friend than as a pupil of Israel Baal Shem Tob, the founder of Hasidism. For a while he devoted himself to teaching in the towns of Korec and Ostroho. He was one of the Zaddikim who, favoring moderation in the practice of Hasidic asceticism and frowning on anything ecstatic, believed that they could attain more by means of music than through prayer. He declared that melody preceded repentance. Some of his sayings are cited in Hasidic collections.

Lit.: Minkin, Jacob S., The Romance of Hassidism (1935) 307; Newman, Louis I., The Hasidic Anthology (1934) 316, 327 et seq.

PHOCYLIDES (Phokylides), pseudonym of a poet, probably a Jewish Hellenistic one, who was the author of a didactic poem in 230 verses. The name which he assumed, that of an ancient Gnomic lyricist of Miletus of the 6th cent. B.C.E., led to the poem's acceptance, up to recent times, as the work of the Greek poet. The moral precepts which it advocates are in close harmony with the spirit, and sometimes even with the letter, of the Bible. For this reason it obtained high popularity in Christian scholastic circles in the Middle Ages, and has been preserved in many manuscripts.

The claim was occasionally made that the author of the poem was a Christian. However, since the critical investigation made by Jacob Bernays, the majority of scholars are inclined to the view that the poet was Jewish. While the ethical doctrines which the poem preaches are those common to both Judaism and Christianity, there is no mention of the theological principles of either faith, beyond an incidental reference to such basic Jewish concepts as belief in the One God and in future retribution. A few phrases in the poem appear to indicate interpolations made by the hand of a Christian enthusiast, and there are also gaps and changes in the text. There can be little doubt that the poem was written by a person who wished to teach the morality of the Old Testament to a pagan world.

The date of the poem may be assumed to be before the end of the 1st cent. C.E., and possibly much earlier.

Lit.: Ludwich, A., Quaestionum pseudophocylidearum hartungiana (1904); Bernays, Jacob, Über das phokylideische Gedicht (1856; also in his Gesammelte Abhandlungen, vol. 1, 1885, pp. 191-261); Paiema Nouthetikon or the Preceptive Poem, trans. J. Hart (1744); Phocylides, Poem of Admonition (1879; Feuling and Goodman); Bergk, Poetae Lyrici Graeci, vol. 2 (1866) 450-75; Fürst, J., Bibliotheca judaica, vol. 3, p. 96 et seq.; Schürer, E., Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, division 2, vol. 3 (1909) 313-16.

PHOEBUS, JOEL BEN SIMEON, 15th cent. calligrapher and illustrator, b. Cologne, Germany. He carried on his work in many cities, and was one of the few Jewish artists whose accomplishments and life can be traced through a series of works preserved under his name. The earliest of these is a Haggadah, which seems to have originated in Brünn, Moravia, and found its way to the German Museum in Nuremberg. This Haggadah is decorated with medallions, depicting Biblical scenes, details of daily life and signs of the zodiac, done on a brown sepia background. Two of his Haggadahs are now in the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. One is embellished with animal figures, the second with extraordinarily fine decorative drawings, framing the text and alternating flowers and the profiles of male heads in marginal squares. A detailed statement is found in this Haggadah, saying "I, the scrivener Joel ben Simeon, called Phoebus Ashkenazi of the City of Cologne on the river Rhine, have written, punctuated and illuminated this Haggadah."

Phoebus is the familiar humanistic form of the Jewish name Feibusch. The style of the second New York Haggadah shows definite traces of northern Italian influence, and the artist had been in that region. At the Royal Library in Turin there is a Mahzor which bears his signature; according to a note, it was done in Cremona in 1452-53. Still another Mahzor with his signature is in the Library at Parma, and a Haggadah in the British Museum has unusually interesting illumination. Phoebus evidently left Brünn at the threatened arrival of the Franciscan John Capistrano (1451), whose fanatical provocations led every where to the persecution and burning of Jews. When Capistrano died in 1456, Phoebus probably returned to Germany, where he continued his trade as itinerant illustrator, in Ulm.

MAX OSBORN.

Lit.: Fooner, Michael, "Joel Simeon, Illuminator of Hebrew Manuscripts in the 15th Cent.," Jewish Quarterly Review, New Series, vol. 27, p. 217 et seq.; Marx, Alexander, ibid., New Series, vol. 19, p. 14; Landsberger, Franz, "Jewish Artists before the Period of Emancipation," offprint from Hebrew Union College Annual, vol. 16, pp. 253-357.

PHOENICIANS. The Phoenicians were the inhabitants of the land known to the Greeks and Romans as Phoenicia, a designation of uncertain origin, though generally believed to come from the Greek phoinix, "palm," because palms form a characteristic feature of the coastal plain of Syria. In the second millennium B.C.E. the Phoenicians called their land Canaan (cuneiform, Kinakhna), and themselves Canaanites. This name survived in Phoenicia itself into the Greek period, and was inherited by the Carthaginians; "Punic" is equivalent to Phoenician. For political purposes, however, the name "Canaanite" was replaced, toward the end of the second millennium B.C.E., by "Sidonian," after Sidon, the most important Phoenician city in later times. This designation was adopted by the Israelites, and is the only general Biblical term (cf. Deut. 3:9; Judges 3:3; I. Kings 11:5); the kings of Tyre are called "king of the Sidonians" both in the Phoenician inscriptions and in the Bible. In post-Exilic times the name "Tyrian" begins to appear; so Neh. 13:16 and often in Josephus.

1. Geography. The territory of the Phoenicians varied at different times, according to the power of the individual city-states. In general, however, it may be said to have extended from Carmel north to the region of Tartus, on the mainland opposite the island of Arvad (modern Ruad). All the Phoenician cities of importance were seaports, but Mount Lebanon, with its almost unlimited store of timber and its hardy population, formed the real foundation of Phoenician power. Without the strong human support derived from the rugged mountaineers, the ancestors of the modern Libanese, and without the cedar, fir and cypress of the mountains for ship-building and for export, Phoenicia could hardly have attained her importance in Biblical times. The narrow coastal plain, never more than a few miles wide, and often vanishing entirely, where the mountains project as promontories into the sea, however fertile and well-watered it might be, was entirely inadequate to form the base of a great commercial empire. It is thus not accidental that the period of greatest Phoenician power begins with the increase of human settlement in the mountains of Lebanon, made possible by the increasing use of cisterns at the start of the Iron Age (12th cent. B.C.E.).

Phoenicia was poor in natural resources, outside of its timber. The only metal which seems to have been mined in Lebanon was iron, referred to in a Babylonian text from the time of Nebuchadrezzar, and probably also in Deut. 8:9. Wine, oil and fruit were abundant in Phoenicia, but grain was almost entirely lacking. The Phoenicians were, therefore, obliged to import practically all their grain, as well as a large part of their wine and oil, from the eastern hinterland, mainly from Israel and Aram (Damascus). The most important Phoenician cities were from south to north: Acco (Acre), Achzib (ez-Zib), Tyre, Zareppath (Sarepta), Sidon, Berytus (Beirut), Gebal (Byblos or Byblus; modern Jubeil), Arka, Simyra (Biblical gentilic, Zemari), and Arvad. Tripolis, between Byblos and Arka, was founded by the Greeks in post-Biblical times. Tyre and Arvad were built on islands; Tyre became a peninsula after the erection of a great causeway by Alexander the Great. Several of the cities were moved out to islands or peninsulas from original more inland sites; this is true of Acco, Tyre and Arvad. Only one, Arka, is situated inland, and its foundation certainly antedates the beginning of Phoenician sea-power.

2. History. Our knowledge of the early history of Phoenicia was until recently extremely limited. The excavations of the French at Jubeil (Byblos), under the direction of Montet and Dunand, have happily enlarged our horizon, and we are now able to follow the development of civilization in the oldest of the Phoenician cities with some degree of precision. Byblos became at a very remote age, not later than the First Egyptian Dynasty, the base for the exportation of cedar to Egypt. In fact, there is much reason to believe that Byblos was an Egyptian colony, though its name Gubla (Egyptian, Kupna) is in any case not Egyptian. As we shall see below, its religion was a curious blend of Egyptian and Syrian elements, and the syncretism affected Egypt itself almost as much as it did Phoenicia. The principal temple of Byblos, discovered by Montet and studied in detail by Dunand, was built originally in the Old Empire, and continued in use, with many restorations, down to the Roman period. In it were found many broken monuments and votive offerings, the oldest dated object going back to the Second Egyptian Dynasty, though several undated ones are probably even older. During the Old Empire it would appear that Byblos was directly dependent on Egypt, politically as well as culturally. In the Middle Empire (2000-1800 B.C.E.) Byblos became again subject to Egypt, but with local autonomy, under its own princes of Canaanite race, some of whose names are known: Yakin-ilu, Abi-shemu, Yapi-shem-abi, and others. Several of the royal tombs of Byblos belonging to this age have been discovered; the richness of their contents gives a vivid idea of the wealth which came to Byblos through the cedar trade. From the Middle Empire (about 2000 B.C.E.) we have also broken vases from Egypt, covered with inscriptions calling down curses on rebels against Egyptian authority; among the rebel cities are Byblos and Arka. During the Hyksos period we know nothing directly about Phoenicia, but the fact that Tyre and Sidon emerge as important places in the following age suggests that Phoenicia played a part in the eventful but little-known 17th cent. B.C.E.

In the late Canaanite Age (1600-1200 B.C.E.) Phoenicia remained an Egyptian dependency with local princes. A vivid picture of their intrigues is given in the Amarna Letters, belonging to the reigns of the Egyptian kings Amenophis III and IV, between 1411 and 1358 B.C.E. Because they were situated between Egypt, Mitanni, and the Hittite empire, and exposed to every invasion from the east, it is not surprising to find the position of the Phoenician cities very precarious. During this period it would seem that they were not able to send out colonies of their own, but served mainly as harbors for the powerful maritime states of the Aegean. Phoenicia already possessed the alphabet, as we know from the tomb of Ahiram (Hiram) of Byblos, whose sarcophagus bears the oldest inscription of any length in the Canaanite (Hebrew) language and alphabet, dating from about 1250 B.C.E. It is true that there was a rival alphabet, adapted from cuneiform, but used to write Canaanite, discovered by Schaeffer at Ras esh-Shamra, and partially deciphered by Bauer.

The irruption of the so-called Sea-peoples, about 1200 B.C.E., put an end to the domination of Mycenean (early Greek) power in the Eastern Mediterranean, at the same time that the decay of Egypt prevented the latter from further invasion of Asia. The stage was thus set for a rapid expansion of Phoenician power, the material for which came from the increasingly dense population of Mount Lebanon, a race of hardy mountaineers well suited to bear the Phoenician name to all parts of the known world. Unfortunately, we know little of the detailed history of this period, but it would seem that Byblos and Sidon at first divided the hegemony, until Tyre gained the ascendancy under its famous king Hiram, the contemporary of David and Solomon. At this time Phoenicia was absolutely independent, and possessed a fresh energy which enabled her sailors, merchants and warriors to carry Phoenician colonization to the remotest parts of the Mediterranean, while her merchants pushed on beyond the Pillars of Hercules, to search for the natural resources of Western Africa and Western Europe. Among the colonies which were probably founded about the 10th cent. B.C.E. were Utica, in North Africa, and Gades, near Tartessus (Tarshish), in Spain. It is true that a number of scholars recently denied that Phoenician influence in Spain goes back so far, but we must certainly follow Eduard Meyer in opposing such undue scepticism toward our sources. In the 9th cent. B.C.E. Phoenician sea-power was at its zenith; colonies were founded in North Africa, in the islands of the Mediterranean, Sicily, Sardinia, Malta, and especially in Cyprus, while trading stations were established in the heart of the Aegean. But Phoenicia was no longer politically independent. Between 920 and 870 B.C.E. it was forced to submit to Egyptian suzerainty, under the energetic Bubastite kings Shishak and Osorkon I.

After 870 B.C.E. Phoenicia found new, and much more exacting masters in the kings of Assyria. Tiglath-pileser I had occupied Phoenicia about 1100 B.C.E. but his immediate successors were too much engaged in a life-and-death struggle with the Arameans to interfere in the affairs of the Syrian coast, so it was not until the time of Ashur-nasirpal II (882-858 B.C.E.) that the Assyrian peril began to be felt. Assyrian oppression began to affect Phoenician commerce seriously about 800 B.C.E., after Shalmaneser III and Adad-nirari III had destroyed the power of Aram (Damascus). Ruinous taxation forced the Phoenician mother-cities to increase their demands upon their colonies, which, one by one, like Carthage, severed their connection with them. Repeated revolts led in the 7th cent. B.C.E. to the abolition of their autonomy and the erection of Assyrian provinces, although several local dynasties were permitted to hold nominal sway under the control of Assyrian residents. Meanwhile, the Greek cities had reentered the commercial arena, and soon swept the Phoenicians from the Northern Mediterranean, while Carthage took possession of all Phoenician colonies and interests from Sicily to the west.

In the 6th cent. B.C.E. Babylonia followed Assyria, after a short interval of Egyptian domination, as suzerain of Phoenicia; Babylonian oppression rested heavily on Tyre, which revolted and was captured after a long blockade (cf. Ezek. 26 to 28), after its commercial strength had been exhausted. Sidon then took the place of Tyre, and held it through nearly the entire Persian period, until its revolt and subsequent destruction by Artaxerxes Ochus (about 350 B.C.E.). It was now again the turn of Tyre, whose brief period of renewed prosperity was brought to an end by Alexander the Great, who captured it in 332 B.C.E. Thereafter the Phoenician cities followed the fortunes of the diadochs, first of the Ptolemies, later of the Seleucidae.

In the Hellenistic-Roman period Phoenicia was on the whole very prosperous, but early lost all national feeling. Culture and religion were completely Hellenized, while the Phoenician language seems to have been entirely replaced by Aramaic before the Roman period outside of the cities, while Greek and Aramaic were spoken in them.

3. Civilization. The only period when Phoenicia can be said to have had its own civilization is in the Early Iron Age, between the 12th and the 7th centuries B.C.E. This civilization is best known in the artistic objects, especially of metal and ivory, of Phoenician or Syrian provenance, which have been found in regions as far apart as Assyria and Italy, dating mainly from the period 900 to 600 B.C.E. The technical skill shown in execution is generally very high, the decorative sense excellent, but the art is so strangely composite that it fails to impress the modern student. It is from Egypt that the Phoenician artists obtained most of their inspiration, including most of their technical processes as well as practically their entire decorative repertoire. They were, however, influenced in composition, as well as in detail, by the so-called Syro-Hittite art of the late second millennium, an art which drew its inspiration mainly from Mesopotamia, but partly from Asia Minor. Early Greek art was deeply influenced by Phoenician, as is becoming increasingly evident.

Israel was almost completely under the sway of Phoenician art, as is, of course, particularly evident in the case of the Temple of Solomon, built by Phoenician craftsmen. It is practically certain that the new type of stone masonry which appears in Palestine in the 10th and 9th centuries B.C.E. was introduced from Phoenicia. The dynasty of Omri in Israel was also under very strong Phoenician influence, as shown both by the Biblical account as well as by the results of excavation. Since the Phoenicians were preeminent in all the arts and crafts, notably in the textile and metal industries, the Israelites must have been profoundly under their influence. It is, in fact, maintained by some that they took a very active part in Phoenician industry, trade and colonization. This is doubtless true in large measure of the northernmost tribes, especially Asher, whose territory, as described in Joshua, lies almost entirely within the later borders of Tyre. From all parts of Israel adventurers must have gone in large numbers to join the ranks of Phoenician colonists and merchants (cf. Jonah 1:3). There can be little doubt that the recently expressed view is correct that Gen. 10, with its list of peoples and countries, is dependent upon Phoenician prototypes. We must never forget that the Phoenicians spoke a language and wrote in a script which were practically identical with that of Israel; the Hebrew of Samaria as found in the ostraca, although somewhat different from the Hebrew of Jerusalem, is indistinguishable from the language of the older Phoenician inscriptions.

4. Religion. Phoenician religion is of particular interest to the Biblical student for two reasons, first, because it is the most direct survival of the Canaanite religion which the Hebrews found in the land on their arrival and which influenced them profoundly, and secondly, because it exerted a direct influence itself on Israel, especially during the time of Solomon and Ahab. It was, like all Western Asiatic religion, primarily a cult of the reproductive powers of nature, as expressed in the plant, animal and human spheres. A few great deities were worshipped everywhere, under various names, and with slightly different forms of cult. The male factor in nature, appearing sometimes as the god of the storm (Hadad, Rimmon), sometimes as the sun-god (Shemesh, Baal-hammon), or as the god of the earth and the underworld (Reshep, Makkal), was the head of the pantheon, and was generally called by an honorific name, such as Baal or Adon, "Lord," or Milk, "King."

It must be emphasized that Baal was not only storm-god or sun-god, but that he was generally both at once; the Assyrians identified the principal Syrian god indifferently with their own sun-god or storm-god. The god of heaven (Baal-shamem) might also be the god of the underworld, and so on. The same fluidity of conception is found in the case of the great mother goddess, who embodied the feminine element in nature. She was both the great mother, the patron of fecundity, and the virgin goddess. The most important names given to her were Ashtart (in the plural Ashtaroth, meaning not "the Astartes," but "the goddess embodying the totality of all forms of Astarte") and Anath.

The most popular of the Phoenician cults were those of Adonis (Adon, "Lord"), which centered in Byblos, and Eshmun, localized at Sidon. The cult of Adonis at Byblos combined Egyptian and Babylonian elements with native Byblian. From the recent discoveries at Byblos we now know that the original figure was the god of the cedar which formed the principal wealth of the city. This god met his death annually with the death of all vegetation in the summer, but was reincarnated annually in the cedar tree. His consort was Ashtart, called Baalath Gubl, the Lady of Byblos. Adonis was very early identified with the similar Egyptian figure of Osiris, and the two myths were so thoroughly amalgamated that numerous Phoenician elements appear in the Egyptian myth itself. But Adonis was also identified at a very early date with the Babylonian Damu or Tammuz, whose cult spread to Israel through Phoenicia. The cult of Eshmun developed from a variant of the Adonis cult to one emphasizing the healing function of the god, identified by the Greeks with Aesculapius. Aesculapius, and almost certainly Eshmun before him, had as his special emblem a serpent coiled around a rod or staff, which is naturally the same as the Biblical Nehushtan (II Kings 18:4).

Cult, ritual and religious terminology were in many respects similar to the Hebrew. The Temple of Solomon was unquestionably modelled from Phoenician prototypes, as may be seen in the plan of the building, in the pillars of Jachin and Boaz, in the bronze sea, the portable lavers, the bronze altar, and especially in the decoration. The Phoenicians employed the same terms in cult and ritual, as we know from such monuments as the sacrificial tariff of Marseille, of Punic origin. The tithe was also a Phoenician custom. However, there were just as great differences. The Phoenician temples possessed an elaborate retinue of eunuch priests and female priestesses or temple prostitutes which played a great role in the orgiastic worship which was characteristic of them. It was this type of worship which was introduced by Solomon and especially by Ahab, and which was so abhorrent to the Hebrew prophets. Human sacrifice was also a vital element in Phoenician cult, and proved very hard to eradicate from Israel, where it persisted down into the 7th cent. B.C.E. WILLIAM F. ALBRIGHT.

Lit.: Pietschmann, Geschichte der Phönizier (1889); Baudissin, Adonis und Esmun (1911); Cooke, G. A., A Text-Book of North-Semitic Inscriptions (1903); Montet, Byblos et l'Égypte (1929); Harris, Zelig S., A Grammar of the Phoenician Language (1936).

PHOENIX, see ANIMALS, FABULOUS.

PHOENIX, capital of Arizona, with a population in 1940 of 65,414, of whom about 1,000 were Jews. The Jewish population more than doubled between 1920 and 1940. In 1942 there were two congregations in the city. Beth El Congregation, following an Orthodox and Conservative ritual, was organized in 1926; its rabbi was Nathan A. Barack, who was elected in 1939. The building in which the synagogue was housed was bought in 1930. Affiliated with the Congregation was the Phoenix Hebrew School. Beth Israel, following the Reform ritual, had A. Lincoln Krohn for its rabbi; his predecessor was Philip W. Jaffa. There was (1942) a Jewish Community Council, organized in 1940. Herman Lewkowitz was assistant United States attorney for Arizona in 1917 to 1918, and city attorney for Phoenix in 1935. Barnett Ellis Marks was assistant United States attorney for Arizona in 1927 to 1928.

PHRASES, BIBLICAL. The Bible, as the sacred book of both Judaism and Christianity, has exerted its influence in every country to which these religions have penetrated. For many centuries it was the only book which was familiar to the people, and for others it was often the first book of instruction. It is natural, therefore, that phrases and expressions from the Bible and its translations found their way into popular speech and are still in frequent use. Some of these, such as the expressions "apple of one's eye," "scapegoat" and "three score and ten," are regarded as Biblical because they are found in the English Bible; actually they are due to the translators and do not represent the phraseology of the original. In most cases, however, these expressions arise from the genius of the Biblical writers. In a few instances the Biblical phrases have acquired a connotation different from that of their original meaning.

Many of the characters of the Bible have become so familiar to the general public that their names are used metaphorically to indicate character. Thus the name Ananias has come to be synonymous with liar, David and Jonathan with bosom friends, Delilah with a temptress, Goliath with a hulking giant, the Good Samaritan with a friend in need, Methuselah with one of great age, Nimrod with a sportsman, Samson with a strong man, and Solomon with a wise judge. The story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife furnishes metaphors for one who resists temptation and for a temptress, while a cabman was familiarly known as a Jehu "because he drives furiously" (II Kings 9:20).

The following are some of the more familiar phrases from the English Bible that have become a part of the literary language:

A brand from the burning (Zech. 3:2).
A drop in the bucket (Isa. 40:15).
A little child shall lead them (Isa. 11:6).
A soft answer turneth away wrath (Prov. 15:1).
Aaron's rod (Ex. 7:10-12).
Avenger of blood (Num. 35:19 and frequently).
Bricks without straw (Ex. 5:10-11).
Brother's keeper (Gen. 4:9).
Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? (Jer. 13:23).
Cast thy bread upon the waters (Eccl. 11:1).
Coat of many colors, Joseph's coat (Gen. 37:3; used humorously for a ragged, patched coat).
Egyptian darkness (Ex. 10:22).
Escaped by the skin of my teeth (Job 19:20).
Eye for eye, tooth for tooth (Ex. 21:24; used erroneously to indicate vengeance).
Feet of clay (Dan. 4:12).
Fig leaf (Gen. 3:6).
Fleshpots of Egypt (Ex. 16:3).
Go to the ant, thou sluggard! (Prov. 6:6).
Heap coals of fire upon his head (Prov. 25:22).
Hope deferred maketh the heart sick (Prov. 13:12).
How are the mighty fallen! (II Sam. 1:19).
Is Saul among the prophets? (I Sam. 10:11; 19:24; used to indicate surprise at wisdom from an unexpected source; in the Bible it means just the opposite).
It is not good for man to be alone (Gen. 2:18).
Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked (Deut. 32:15).

Job's comforter (Job 3 et seq.).
Job's messenger (Job 1).
Joseph's coat (see under Coat of many colors).
Judgment of Solomon (I Kings 3).
Letter of Uriah (II Sam. 11:14-15).
Like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land (Isa. 32:2).
Look not upon the wine when it is red (Prov. 23:31).
Man does not live by bread alone (Deut. 8:3).
Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward (Job 5:7).
Many waters can not quench love (Song of Songs 8:7).
Mark of Cain (Gen. 4:15; also "brand of Cain").
Mess of pottage (Gen. 25:34).
Money-changers in the Temple (Matt. 21:12 and parallels).
O that mine adversary would write a book! (Job 31:35; used humorously, in a sense different from Bible context).
Out of the mouth of babes (Ps. 8:2).
Peace, peace, and there is no peace (Jer. 6:14; 8:11).
Plough with another's heifer (Judges 14:18).
Pride goeth before destruction (Prov. 16:18).
Put not your trust in princes (Ps. 146:3).
Selah (frequently in Psalms).
Shibboleth (Judges 12:5-6; originally used in its original metaphorical sense of "test," it has acquired the additional connotation of "party slogan").
Sleep of the just (Prov. 24:15).
Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19).
Spear that knows no brother (Ex. 32:27).
Stone that the builders rejected (Ps. 118:8).
Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird (Prov. 1:17).
Sweat of thy face (Gen. 3:19; generally cited as "sweat of thy brow").
Tell it not in Gath (II Sam. 1:20).
The Lord hath given and the Lord hath taken (Job 1:21).
The race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong (Eccl. 9:11).
The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau (Gen. 27:22).
The wicked flee when no man pursueth (Prov. 28:1).
There is nothing new under the sun (Eccl. 1:9).
To the writing of books there is no end (Eccl. 12:12).
Valley of the shadow of death (Ps. 23:4).
Vanity of vanities, all is vanity (Eccl. 1:1).
Vengeance is mine (Deut. 32:35).
Way of all flesh (Gen. 6:12, 13).

See also BIBLE IN LITERATURE. SIMON COHEN.

Lit.: The dictionaries of phrases; Buchmann, G., Geflügelte Worte, chapters on Bible.

PHRASES, POPULAR. The long sojourn of the Jews in various countries in which they formed a minority, the constant study of literature written in Hebrew, a natural fondness for picturesque speech, and in some cases a desire for concealment, have produced hundreds of phrases which Jews have used and often still use within the vernaculars that they employ. These phrases are drawn from all sources and exhibit characteristic modifications in pronunciation; they vary from country to country, and even from locality to locality. Some have been adopted into the slang of non-Jews, while others have acquired a recognized status in literature and drama. Still others appear derived from phrases current among non-Jews.

The following list gives some of the typical phrases that are current among Jews in the 20th cent.:

Ad Meah Shanah (Hebrew, "to a hundred years"), a general expression of wishes for a long life.

Adam's Ale, water.

Adam's Apple, the male larynx, particularly if it protrudes in the throat. Derived from a popular superstition that when Adam ate the fruit of the forbidden tree (Gen. 3) a part of it lodged in his throat.

Adam's Costume, nakedness.

Alef-Bes (Hebrew, Aleph Beth), alphabet; metaphorically, the simplest knowledge.

Alev Hasholem (Hebrew, 'alav hashalom, "upon him be peace"), added after mentioning the name of a deceased person. Also pronounced Olev Hasholem.

Armageddon, a final battle between the forces of good and evil. Derived from the Hebrew for Mount Megiddo, conceived as the place of a Messianic struggle (cf. Rev. 16:16).

Ausheben, the liturgy of removing the scroll of the Torah from the Ark prior to reading from it. Its return to the Ark is called Einheben.

Azes Ponim (from the Hebrew 'azuth panim, literally, "hardness of face"), boldness, shamelessness, impudence.

Beezrath Hashem (Hebrew, "with the help of God"), equivalent to "God willing," deo volente; used in expressing an intention.

Behemah (Hebrew, "animal"), a stupid person.

Bekoved (a hybrid formation from the Hebrew word kabod, "honor"), distinguished, respectable.

Bes occurs frequently in compounds derived from Hebrew, such as Bes Hakevores, Bes Hakevure, "cemetery," Bes Hamedresh, "academy," Bes Hamikdesh, "Temple," Bes Hakisse, "privy."

Beschreien, see Unbeschrieen.

Bilbul (Hebrew), confusion, disorder. The phrases Sheker Bilbul, "lies and confusion;" is possibly the origin of the slang phrase Ish Kabibble, current in the early years of the 20th cent. in the sense of "I should worry!"

Bobe (Russian), grandmother; Bobe Meisses is equivalent to "old wives' tales."

Bosheth Panim (Hebrew; popular pronunciation, Boshes Ponim), a bashful, hesitant person. A variant is Beishan (Hebrew, bayeshan).

Ch: for phrases beginning with German ch, see under H.

Covenant of Abraham, circumcision.

Dabar Aher (Hebrew, literally "another thing"), euphemism for such objects as swine, idolatry, leprosy and the like. A common form is Dovor Acher.

Daiges (from the Hebrew de'agoth, "cares"), worries, anxieties. There are numerous variations, such as Deiges, Deinges, Daages and Danges.

Dalfen, a poor starving wretch. The term seems to have been derived from Dalphon, one of the sons of Haman who was hanged (Esther 9:7), chosen because it recalls the Hebrew word dal, "poor."

Dalles (from Hebrew daluth, "poverty"), lack of money.

Davke (Aramaic, "exactly"), to be sure, nevertheless.

Efsher (Mishnaic Hebrew), maybe.

Einheben, see Ausheben.

Esheth Hayil (Hebrew, "woman of valour"; Prov. 31:10), wife who conducts a business that supports the family.

Gallah (Hebrew, "shaven"), a Catholic priest or member of a monastic order, from the tonsure.

Gam Zu Letovah (Hebrew, gam zu letobah, "this, too, is for the best"), phrase used in resigned acceptance of misfortune.

Ganef (Hebrew, gannab), thief, or rascal in general. This phrase passed into the underworld argot as "gun." Webster mistakenly regarded the word as a corruption of "gone off."

Gezerah (Hebrew, "decree"), anti-Jewish law or persecution, conceived of as the divine decree.

Goy (Hebrew, "nation"), non-Jew. Feminine, Goyete or Goya; plural, Goyim.

Goyim Naches (connected with the Hebrew nahath, "ease," "pleasure"), frivolous and unworthy amusements, not consonant with the serious view of Judaism.

Halevai (Aramaic, "would that"), added to a wish or hope.

Halilah (Hebrew), perish the thought! Often used in the form Has Vehalilah, in the same meaning.

Hammer (Hebrew, hamor, "ass"), stupid, stubborn person.

Hanoah (Hebrew hana'ah), satisfaction over some event.

Has Vehalilah, see Halilah.

Has Vesholem (Hebrew has veshalom, "quiet and peace"), God forbid!

Hattes (Hebrew, hattath, "sin"), worthless person, good-for-nothing. Also used in the form Hatteskopf.

Hazak ("be strong"), uttered upon completion of a task.

Hazer (Hebrew, hazir, "swine"), 1. swine's flesh; 2. food forbidden by the dietary laws; 3. a greedy person.

Hutzpa (Aramaic), impudence. Hotzef or Hutzpa Ponim, an impudent person.

Kaas (Hebrew), anger, Kaasan, Kaasnik, irascible person.

Kashe (Aramaic, "difficulty"), question, problem.

Kedoches (Hebrew, ḳadahath, "fever"), extreme poverty.

Kelev (Hebrew, ḳeleb), dog; also used as an epithet.

Kibitzer, onlooker who gives unsolicited advice, as at a card game. Said to have been derived from a German expression addressed to a talkative person: "Kiewitz ist kein Vogel."

Kinnesinne (Hebrew, ḳin'ah, "jealousy," and sin'ah, "hate"), violent enmity.

Koilen (Middle High German), ritual slaughtering.

Kotzen (Hebrew, ḳatzin, "chief"), rich and prominent member of the community.

Kozev (Hebrew, ḳozeb), liar.

Lauchevitz (Hebrew, lo hafetz, "undesirable"), scamp, rogue.

Lehachis (Hebrew, "to provoke"), out of spite. Often corrupted to Lehachlis; sometimes the word ponim is added.

Lehavdil (Hebrew, lehabdil, "to distinguish"), equivalent to "Pardon my mentioning this subject in the same breath as that!"

Lehayim (Hebrew, "for life"), the customary toast when drinking.

Lekoved (Hebrew, lichebod), in honor of.

Litvak, Lithuanian Jew.

Lo Alechem, see Nebbich.

Makkes (Hebrew, makḳoth), a beating.

Mamzer (Hebrew, "bastard"), rascal, underhanded. Mamzerkopf, a clever person.

Massematten (Hebrew, massa umattan), business.

Mazal, luck. Derived from the idea that fortune comes from a favorable constellation (Hebrew, mazal). Variant form, Mazel; adjectives, Mazelig, Mazeldig. Shlimazel (from the German schlimm, "bad"), misfortune. Mazeltov, a wedding, since this is the greeting to the couple at the end of the ceremony.

Mazuma (Hebrew, mezuman, "provision"), money. This term has passed over into general slang.

Mechulle (Hebrew, mechulleh, "destroyed"), bankrupt.

Mechutten (Hebrew, mehuttan), related by marriage, such as the parents of a bridegroom to those of the bride.

Medine (Hebrew, medinah), country, neighborhood.

Meisses (Hebrew, ma'asiyoth, "events"), events or narratives.

Menubbel (Hebrew, menuval), ugly.

Menuchah (Hebrew), peace, rest, quiet.

Meshugga (Hebrew), crazy.

Meshummad (derivation disputed), convert, especially to Christianity.

Metziah (Hebrew, "find"), bargain.

Mies (Aramaic me'is), repulsive, worthless. Mius, ugliness, repulsiveness, uselessness.

Mishpoche (Hebrew, mishpahah), family, tribe.

Mithah Meshunnah (Hebrew, "a different death"), generally pronounced Missemeshunne, violent or untimely death.

Naches (Hebrew, nahath), ease, satisfaction.

Nebbich (Yiddish, nie bei euch, "may it not happen to you"), phrase used after mentioning the name of an unfortunate individual or an unfortunate event. The corresponding Hebrew expression is Lo Alechem.

Nekome (Hebrew, neḳamah, "revenge"), revenge, satisfaction over the misfortunes of another. Nekomenyik, a vengeful person.

Olev Hasholem, see Alev Hasholem.

Oser (Hebrew, 'asur, "forbidden"), a decided negative.

Parnosse (Hebrew, parnasah), livelihood.

Peloni Almoni (Hebrew, cf. Ruth 4:1), used to supply the place of a name; also, a nobody.

Pleite (Hebrew, peletah, "escaped remnant"), also Pletah, bankruptcy.

Ponim (Hebrew, panim), face.

Poritz (Hebrew paritz, "powerful"), Polish nobleman, landholder.

Poshe Yisrael (Hebrew, poshe'a beyisra'el, "sinner in Israel"), epithet applied to a Jew who violates the traditional ritual law.

Rishus (Hebrew, rish'uth, "wickedness"), anti-Semitism. Roshe, or Rishus-ponim, anti-Semite.

Selig (German, "in bliss"), uttered after the name of a person deceased.

Shegetz, non-Jewish young man. Shiktzah, non-Jewish girl.

Shikker (Hebrew, shikḳor), drunkard.

Shlemiehl, an unlucky wight. The term appears to be derived from the Talmudic identification of Zimri, who was killed by Phinehas (Num. 25:6-10, 14), with Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai (Num. 7:36).

Shmuss (Hebrew shemu'oth, "reports"), gossip, rumors.

Shnorrer(derivation uncertain), a plausible beggar.

Shtuss (Hebrew, shetuth), nonsense.

Solid (German solider), used in the sense of substantial, as of a person of means. Has been taken over into the slang of "swing" music as an expression of commendation.

Tachlis (Hebrew, tachlith), purpose, end in view. Baal Tachlis, a practical man.

Tinnuf (Hebrew), trash.

Tzelem (Hebrew, "image"), crucifix.

Tzores (Hebrew, tzaroth, "straits"), distress, trouble.

Unbeschrieen (German, "no evil omen"), an expression used after uttering a word of praise or boasting. It is based on the idea that too much good fortune is unnatural, and that to speak too freely of it would bewitch (beschreien) it. A similar expression is Unberufen.

Yihus (Hebrew), distinguished ancestry. Meyuhas, one of distinguished ancestry.

See also: GREETING AND WISH FORMULAS; KALLAH; KOSHER.

SIMON COHEN.

Lit.: Bernstein, I., Jüdische Sprichwörter und Redensarten (1908); Strack, H. L., Jüdisches Wörterbuch (1916); Mencken, H. L., The American Language. Many books by Jewish authors contain glossaries of unusual phrases.

PHRASES, TALMUDIC. Talmudic words and phrases have become integrated into the Yiddish language, and are extensively employed in spoken and written Yiddish. The Talmud was the source book of Jewish living, and the primary subject of public study groups, religious discourses and Jewish education. It was usually translated into Yiddish, but whenever there was a lack of an adequate or appropriate Yiddish word, or whenever the Talmudic idiom was very expressive and did not lend itself to translation, the original Talmudic phrase was employed. Thus, many of the Talmudic expressions were introduced into the folk language. These Talmudic words are more adequate and expressive than their Yiddish equivalents. They are idiomatic, defying translation, and are succinct, sometimes expressing an entire sentence in a word. Many Talmudic proverbs and phrases are sometimes quoted in their original form and translated into Yiddish.

A few examples of Talmudic phrases follow:

'adderabba—"quite to the contrary."

nafḳe minah—"difference."

'efsher—"maybe," "perhaps."

bererah—"choice," "alternative."

yesh 'omerim (literally, "there are [others] who say")—"There is another (or different) opinion."

meyaash sein—"to give up hope," "to resign oneself."

ḳashe—"question" or "contradiction." It also refers to a question which can not be solved, and is used in the phrase, "Bleibt a Kashe" ("So it remains a question").

lo miduvshach velo me'uḳtzach—"I do not want your honey, nor do I want your sting." This phrase is quoted also in its Yiddish translation.

lo dubbim velo ya'ar—"There are neither any bears nor a forest." This phrase means to imply that the topic or subject under discussion is non-existent, and is mere fantasy.

lo hayu debarim me'olam—"It is not true," "It never existed."

BENJAMIN BERNFELD.

Lit.: Bloomgarden, Solomon, and Spivak, C. D., A Yiddish Dictionary containing all the Hebrew and Chaldaic elements of the Yiddish language, illustrated with proverbs and idiomatic expressions (1911).

The traditional phylacteries

PHYLACTERIES (tefillin; the origin of the word is obscure; it is perhaps derived from the Hebrew word tefillah, "prayer") (the word "phylacteries" is derived from the Greek phylakterion, which is a derivative of the verb phylatto, "to guard," "to protect"). The phylacteries are small leather boxes or cases which contain four sections from the Torah written on parchment. To these boxes leather straps are attached. The phylacteries, which originally and properly were to be worn constantly, are now put on the left hand and on the head only at the Morning Service (Shaharith), with the exception of the Sabbath and the five principal festivals. They are worn also at the Afternoon Service of the Ninth of Ab.

The four sections of the Torah are: Deut. 6:4-9; Deut. 11:13-21; Ex. 13:1-10; Ex. 13:11-16. The first of these four sections tells of the basic requirement of Judaism, i.e. the unconditional love of the One God; the second tells of the rewards for the observance of God's commandments and of the punishments for disobedience to them; the third and fourth treat of the everlasting recollection of the redemption of Israel from Egyptian bondage (the Exodus), for which the Israelites ought to be deeply grateful to God, and tell how the love of God and responsibility before the Eternal Judge ought to lead to faithful and devoted obedience to His commandments.

The custom of putting on the phylacteries, or "laying Tefillin," as it is popularly called, is derived from the literal interpretation of the words of Deut. 6:8, "And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes," words which were originally intended only in a purely symbolical or figurative sense. Similar statements, with only slight variations, are found in the three other sections, i.e. Deut. 11:18; Ex. 13:9 and Ex. 13:16. The phylacteries are put on the left hand, over against the heart, and on the forehead; thus the wearing of the phylacteries is usually interpreted, in an enlarged symbolical sense, to mean: Put your head, heart and hand at the service of your God, or Everything which you think, feel and do ought to be hallowed by love of God, by reverence for your holy Judge, by profound gratitude toward your redeemer and benefactor from the very beginning (cf. the prayer hinneni mechavven, "Behold I direct myself," which is uttered before the phylacteries are put on).

The four small sections from the Torah are written on four pieces of parchment in the head phylacteries (tefillin shel rosh), but in the hand phylacteries (tefillin shel yad) all four of them are written on one strip of parchment. The difference in the order of these sections in the leather box or case led to the making of two different kinds of phylacteries, those of Rashi and those of Jacob ben Meir Tam (Shulhan Aruch, Orah Hayim 34).

It is quite in keeping with the ethical and religious significance of the phylacteries that they are regarded as a protection against sin (Ber. 30b; Men. 43b). At an early age, however, presumably under the influence of the belief in demons, they were frequently considered to be a protection against all evils (Ber. 6a; 23b; Targum to Song of Songs 8:3; cf. the Greek term phylacteries, employed in the New Testament, in the sense of protection or means of guarding, Matt. 23:5). This conception is not in accord with the original one, and it has absolutely no basis either in the Biblical passage above mentioned or anywhere else in the Bible.

It is hardly probable that the above-cited Biblical verse, Deut. 6:8, and the parallel passages on which the custom of laying Tefillin is based are to be understood literally. A concrete commandment would have been described in greater detail (cf. the commandment regarding the wearing of the fringes (Tzitzith) in Num. 15:37-41). The passages cited give in all four places, especially in Ex. 13:9 and 16, the impression of pictures by means of which the lofty significance of the love of God, of reverence for the Heavenly Judge, and of gratitude toward the divine liberator of Israel were to be expressly inculcated (cf. Samuel ben Meir, of the 12th cent., in his Pentateuch commentary to Ex. 13:9). The Karaites interpreted these verses purely literally, and lay no Tefillin. As far as the Talmudic period is concerned, the practice of laying the phylacteries was not generally widespread, nor was it customary among the lower classes of the people (the Am Haaretz) (Sab. 130a; Ber. 47b). Even in the responses of the Geonim (7th and 8th centuries) and still later, in the 10th cent., the complaint is made by several teachers and scholars that the people are negligent in the matter of putting on the phylacteries.

For the benedictions which must be pronounced over the phylacteries when they are put on, the manner and the time of their laying, and on the method of making and treating them, see Orah Hayim 25 to 45.

Reform Jews do not lay Tefillin, regarding the Biblical commandment as purely figurative.

MAX JOSEPH.

Lit.: Zunz, Leopold, Gesammelte Schriften, vol. 2 (1875-76) 172-76; Hirsch, Horeb.

PHYSICIANS. 1. Ancient Times. The existence of professional physicians (as well as wound dressers, midwives and pharmacists) among the Israelites of Bible times is amply proved from many passages in the Scriptures. From these it can be clearly seen that these "healers" (rofe'im) were not magicians or priests or prophets, but a separate and distinct class, which followed rational secular methods which were considered almost in opposition to reliance on divine healing (II Chron. 16:12).

In the eight centuries (300 B.C.E. to 500 C.E.) in which the Talmud was in process of formation, the medical profession among the Jews made considerable advances and won a wider recognition. The physician ('asya, rofe) was held in high esteem. Divine providence "called" him to his art and bestowed upon him a part of its wisdom (Sirach 38). The Jewish teachers called the physician "God's angel and the personification of the word of God" (Alphabet of Rabbi Akiba 4). Akiba and Ishmael are reported to have rebuked a peasant who regarded medical treatment as contrary to the will of God, Who had sent the sickness upon him (Midrash Sam. 4). Abaye forbade patients to apologize in prayer for seeking relief through the ministrations of a venesector (Ber. 60a). It was forbidden to reside in a town where there was no physician (Yer. Kid., at the end; Sanh. 17b). A frequently misinterpreted statement, "To Gehenna with the best of physicians," means only that a physician, who has to handle human lives, can not be too careful. This is borne out by the similar statement that a physician, a municipal judge, a scribe of the Scriptures, a Hazan, and a ritual slaughterer "do not deserve a share in the world to come"; if this were intended to be taken literally, it would be such a condemnation of the most exalted and essential professions that it would be absurd and sacrilegious (Aboth de Rabbi Nathan 36:5; Yer. Kid., at the end).

It is safe to assume that during the Talmudic period there were thousands of professional physicians and surgeons among the Jews, although only a few of the names of such are mentioned. The reason for this is that, while practically all the teachers of the time supported themselves by means of some occupation, it is only in rare instances that their actual profession or trade is given. Just as some teachers are given surnames which indicate that they were sandal-makers, blacksmiths or the like, so there are others who are called by such titles as 'asya, rofe and hachim, indicating that they were physicians. Others, although not distinguished by such titles, show medical knowledge in their teachings. Thus all the statements of Matthiah ben Heresh pertain to medicine, while the patriarch (Nasi) Simeon ben Gamaliel II correctly described hemophilia and noted that it was a hereditary disease of males which was transmitted to them by female ancestors. Judged by the numerous statements of other Talmudic authorities on medical subjects, these teachers must have practised medicine.

By far the greatest physician of the Talmudic period was Samuel (d. 254 C.E.). Other physicians who are known by name are Todos (Theudas), Bar Gigante (Yer. Betzah i, 60), Manyume and his sons (A.Z. 28b), Ammi (Yer. Ber. 2:3), Bar Nathan (Pes. 52a) and Hiyya (Ber. 5b).

Patients were cautioned against taking lightly any apparently mild ailment (Midrash Eccl. 3), especially one that affected the organs within the body cavity (Yer. A.Z. 2:2), and were urged to call a physician immediately (Sirach 38). Typical advice to physicians is reflected in such statements as: "A physician who treats without a fee merits no fee" and "A physician can heal at a distance as well as a blind eye can see" (B.K. 85a).

2. Middle Ages. Many of the Jewish physicians of former times were more than physicians alone. They cultivated many branches of knowledge, even those completely unrelated to their art. Down to the end of the 18th cent. Jewish physicians were so well-known for their scholarly pursuits that they are generally known to historians and biographers as philosophers, poets, Bible commentators and Talmudic authorities rather than as physicians, although they were practising physicians and derived their livelihood from the practice of that profession. The list of physicians given below is at the same time a list of the pillars of Hebrew literature and leaders of Jewry. They include rabbis of communities, codifiers of traditional laws, expounders of the Scriptures and masters of Hebrew verse.

a. In Moslem Lands. Religious fanaticism or court jealousies would sometimes result in a temporary disbarring of Jews from the medical profession; however, the Moslem world as a rule was friendly toward the Jews, and a discriminatory edict would generally be limited to a single country. Omar, the successor of Mohammed, employed a Jewish physician, Abu Hafsa Yazid (about 643). Asaph Judaeus was prominent in the 7th cent. Masarjawaih was physician to Caliph Muawiyyah I (about 883). Other early Jewish physicians who are known are Isaac ben Amram (d. 799), Sahl (Rabban al Tabari), translator of Ptolemy's Almagest, and his son Abu al Hasan (about 850), physician to the caliphs Al-Mutasim and Al-Mutawakkil, and teacher of Rhazes.

Joshua ben Nun (about 800) was professor in the medical school of Baghdad, founded by Harun al Rashid; Hibat Allah ibn Malka flourished in 1150; Ibn Zakariya died at Aleppo in 1190; Saad al-Daulah was court physician to the Mongol khan Argun (he was executed at Baghdad in 1291 after he failed to cure his royal master). The Jewish physician Shammach flourished at Kairwan in 793; Isaac ben Imran was physician to Emir Ziyadat Allah II, and a later physician of the same name held the same office with Emir Ziyadet Allah III. Sulaiman al Israeli (about 940), physician to Caliph Ubaid Allah al Mahdi, was the greatest medical authority of the time. His pupil Dunash ibn Tamin and the latter's son, David ibn Merwan, were also court physicians; al Israeli exercised a profound influence on Avicenna, the prince of Arabic medicine (980-1037), who, according to some authorities, was also of Jewish origin.

In the pre-Maimonidean epoch in Egypt there were many prominent Jewish physicians, such as Ephraim ibn al-Zafaran (d. 1068), Abu Said Al-Tabib (1050), Abu Mansur, court physician to Al-Hafis (about 1125), Nathaniel Israeli, court physician to Saladin (about 1150), the oculist al-Nakkid (d. 1189), the Karaites al-Mudawwar, David ben Solomon and al-Bayyan, and Abu al Maali, brother-in-law of Maimonides. The medical contributions of Maimonides (Moses ben Maimon, 1135-1204) were so extensive that they can be detailed only in his separate biography. His son Abraham, his grandson David, and his two great-grandsons Abraham and Solomon were all prominent as physicians. His numerous pupils included: the father of the medical historian Abu Usaiba; Joseph ibn Aknin; Abu al Hayyuj Yusuf. The celebrities of a later period include Imran al-Israili (1165-1239), Samuel ibn Abbas (about 1165), al-Barkamani, the pharmacologist al-Attar (about 1325), Simon ben Zemah Duran (1360-1444), and Solomon ben Joseph (about 1481), physician to Sultan Al-Malik al-Ashraf.

b. Spain. One of the first famous Jewish healers was Hasdai ibn Shaprut (915-70), physician and prime minister of Caliph Abd al-Rahman III; another was Jonah ibn Janah (1027-70), the grammarian. Abu Bekr ibn Zuhr and his celebrated grandson, Abu Merwan ibn Zuhr (d. 1162), are thought by many to have been Jews. Other important Jewish physicians were: the philosopher Judah Halevi (b. 1085); Sulaiman ibn al-Muallim, physician to Caliph Ali, at Seville (1106-45); the commentator and poet Abraham ibn Ezra (1092-1167); Judah al-Fachar, physician to Ferdinand III; Abraham ibn Daud (1110-80); Daniel ben Moses and his brother Solomon, at Saragossa (about 1225); Solomon David, in Madrid; the philosopher and commentator Moses ben Nahman (Nahmanides), at Gerona (1194-1267); Shemtob ben Isaac, in Tortosa (1206-66); Samuel Benveniste; Samuel ibn Wakar, physician to Alfonso XI; Levi ben Gershon (Gersonides; 1288-1344), commentator and inventor of astronomical and optical instruments; Todros Abulafia; Nissim Gerondi (1340-80); Abraham ibn Machir; the philosopher Joseph Albo (1380-1414); Abraham of Lerida, oculist to John II. The expulsion edict of 1492 forced a whole galaxy of prominent physicians to leave the country; among them were Judah ibn Tibbon, Joseph Kimhi, Simon Duran, Isaac ben Shemtob and Joshua al-Lorqui.

c. Portugal. Among the Jewish physicians who flourished in Portugal were Gedaliah the elder (about 1300), physician to King Dinitz; Moses, physician to Ferdinand I and John I; Profiat Duran, celebrated Talmudist; Gedaliah ibn Yahya, physician to Alfonso V; and Joseph and Rodriguez, who were physicians to John II and members of the commission which examined the proposals of Columbus. Garcia d'Orta, father of tropical medicine and epoch-making botanist, was also a Jew. Among the Jewish physicians of Portugal who had to leave their native land to escape religious bigotry were the celebrated Amatus Lusitanus (1511-68) and Rodrigo de Castro (16th cent.).

d. Italy, France, England and Germany. One of the earliest Jewish physicians in Italy was Sabbatai Donnolo (913-82). Hebrew was one of the languages of instruction at the medical school at Salerno, founded by Benedictine monks in the 6th cent. Among the Jewish professors known to have served there are Joseph (848), Joshua (855), Elinus and Copho (editor of the Compendium Salernitanum), who seem to have been Jews, and Hillel of Verona (1220-95). From Salerno Jewish physicians spread to all parts of Italy, where they became physicians to many popes, kings and princes. A few of these are: Faragut, physician to Charles of Anjou; Nathan Hameati (about 1279); Isaac, court physician to Pope Boniface VIII; the poet Immanuel of Rome (1265-1330); many members of the Anav, Rieti and Astruc families; and the Roman physicians Abraham and Jehiel di Mansi and Hillel and Zerahiah Hen.

Some of the outstanding universities of medieval France were founded or headed by Jews. There were even Jewish medical schools in southern France. Rabbi Abon (about 1000) was head of a Jewish medical school at Narbonne; one of his pupils founded a Jewish medical school at Montpellier (about 1025). Hebrew and Arabic preceded Latin as a language of instruction at the University of Montpellier. The known Jewish teachers and pupils included the physicians Isaac ben Abraham, his pupil Judah (teacher of Nahmanides), Jacob Hakatan (dean), Meshullam (1043-1108), Jacob ben Abba Mari, court physician to Frederick II, many members of the Ibn Tibbon family, such as Samuel, Judah (d. 1190), Moses (d. 1285) and Jacob (Profatius Judaeus), dean of the medical family in 1306. In the subsequent years there were such noted Jewish physicians as Elias of Arles (about 1407), Jacob Lunel, the surgeon Dolan Bellan (at Carcassonne), Nathan Tauros (at Tarascon), and Moses ben Joshua (Maestre Vidal Blasom) at Narbonne.

Only three Jewish physicians are known to us in medieval England: an unknown physician martyred at the massacre at Lynn in 1190, Isaac Medicus of London, and Abraham Motun of London (1260-90).

Due to the incessant persecutions of the Jews in Germany, the number of Jewish physicians there was meager. The following Jewish physicians practised under Charlemagne; Meshullam ben Kalonymus, Joseph ben Gorion, Moses ben Judah, Todros of Narbonne and Joseph Halevi. Zedekiah was court physician to Louis the Bald. A Jewish surgeon, Balavignus, was executed at Strasbourg in 1348 on a false accusation of having caused the Black Death. Solomon Pletsch was city physician of Regensburg (1394), Jossel was city physician of Basel, and Seligman was physician to Bishop John I. The Jewesses Sarah (of Würzburg) and Zerlin

(of Frankfort) practised medicine in the 15th cent. Reuchlin's teachers of Hebrew were two Jewish physicians, Jacob Loans, physician to Emperor Frederick III, and the commentator Obadiah Sforno. The surgeon of the same emperor was the Jew Michael. Anti-Jewish laws periodically excluded the Jews of the Holy Roman Empire from the study and practice of medicine.

3. Modern Times. Notwithstanding anti-Jewish laws and the imposition of disabilities, there were many prominent Jewish physicians in Italy from the 15th to the 19th cent. The most noted of these were the following: Elijah Delmedigo (1460-97); Obadiah Elias; Isaac d'Abbadi; Messer Leon and his son Messer David; Judah de Blanis (1520); Abraham de Balmes (d. 1523); Vitale and Bonajuto Alatino; T. de Sacerdoti, physician to Pope Julius III; Samuel and Isaac Zarfati, physicians to Pope Clement VII; Joseph Hakohen, physician to the doge Andrea Dorea of Venice; members of the Portaleone family; Bonet de Lattes, physician to Pope Leo X; Judah Abravanel (Leo Hebraeus), who was expelled from Spain, where he was minister to Ferdinand; Jacob Mantino, physician to Pope Paul III; Juan Rodrigo de Castel-Branco, surnamed Amatus Lusitanus (1511-68); David d'Ascoli; David de Pomis (d. 1588); Kalonymus ben Judah; Jacob Lombroso; D. H. Luria and the three Cantarinis at Padua; E. de Castro; Moses Cordovero; Jacob Zahalon (author of Otzar Hayim); Manuele di Casena, physician to Pope Sixtus V; Isaac Lampronti; many members of the Cases and Konia families; Isaac Foe; Adam Bondi and his two sons; the brothers Isaac (d. 1803) and Ephraim (d. 1799) Luzzatto; Graziadio Nepi at Cento, who was a member of the Napoleonic Sanhedrin in 1806.

Very few unbaptized Jews were allowed to practise medicine in France, yet that country saw many prominent Jewish physicians, including: Pierre de Notre Dame (1500); Joseph Colon; Mordecai and Joseph de Noves; Elias Montalto (d. 1615), court physician to Marie de Medici (who sent his embalmed body to Holland to receive Jewish burial); his son Isaac; Jean Baptiste de Silva (1686-1742), the most frequently consulted physician in Europe and physician to Louis XIV.

Many of the Jewish physicians who were exiled from Spain and Portugal settled in the Turkish Empire and there continued the golden chain of Jewish medical prominence through such names as: Solomon Almoli (about 1517); Joseph Hamon, his son Moses, physician to Suleiman the Magnificent, and his grandson Joseph; Ibn Yahya; Abraham ibn Migas; Israel Conegliano. The physician-rabbis of Jerusalem included: Elijah of Ferrara (about 1460); David ibn Shoshan (1552); Jacob ibn Amram; Jacob Aboab; Samuel Halevi (about 1625); Jacob Hayim Zemah, chief rabbi (1645).

The Netherlands took pride in the Jewish physicians Abraham Zacuto (Zacutus Lusitanus), an emigrant from Portugal (1600), the members of the Bueno family, B. de Castro, J. I. Mendes and S. de Silva. There were but few Jewish physicians in England, mostly of the families of Spanish refugees. Among them were Sabot Elias (1410); Rodrigo Lopez, court physician to Queen Elizabeth (1580); A. de Mercado (1655); J. Mendes Bravo (1675); David Nieto (1710); F. Mendez (d. 1724); S. Nunez (about 1750); the three Schombergs; I. H. Sequera (d. 1816); Abraham and Joshua van Oven; G. G. Levi'sohn; and E. Friedberg.

The list of prominent Jewish physicians in Germany is so long that only a few of the most important can be named: Joseph Solomon Delmedigo, who practised in Candia (Crete), Egypt, Lithuania and the cities of Hamburg, Amsterdam, Frankfort, Worms and Prague, where he died in 1655; B. L. Buchsbaum (d. 1715), his sons Gutman Wolf and Lipman and his grandson Amshel Gutman (d. 1743); the gynecologist R. de Castro and his sons Benedict (physician to Queen Christina of Sweden) and Daniel (court physician to Christian IV of Denmark); Benjamin Mussafia (d. 1675); Judah Carmoly (d. 1785); Joseph Geldern (d. 1796), grandfather of Heinrich Heine; Lippold (about 1535), court physician to Joachim II of Brandenburg.

4. The Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. During the short period since the beginnings of Jewish emancipation, when European medical schools gave the Jews extensive, though not unlimited, opportunities for study and research, the latter have produced a startling galaxy of scientists without whom medicine would not have attained its present state of progress. Many of them have been awarded the Nobel Prize; thousands more have immortalized themselves in every phase of medical endeavor. Only some of the most important of these can be listed here.

ANATOMISTS: F. G. J. Henle, J. Herz, S. Spitzer, Gustav Schwalbe, Robert Bárány (Nobel Prize), B. Stilling, Giuseppe Levi.

PHYSIOLOGISTS AND BIOCHEMISTS: Simon Fubini, E. F. von Marxow, Moritz Schiff, G. Magnus, G. G. Valentin, S. Mayer, J. Bernstein, the brothers Hermann and E. Munk, N. Zuntz, I. Rosenthal, Fritz Haber (Nobel Prize), Otto Wallach (Nobel Prize), Otto Meyerhof (Nobel Prize), Otto Loewi (Nobel Prize), the brothers Jacques and Leo Loeb, Karl Landsteiner (Nobel Prize), H. Kronecker, Ugo Lombroso, A. Herlitzka, Richard Kuhne.

PATHOLOGISTS: K. F. Canstatt, F. V. Birch-Hirschfeld, Karl Weigert, Ludwig Traube, P. J. Pick, A. Pribram, A. Weichselbaum, K. J. Salomonsen, B. Abrahams, L. Brieger, O. Israel, Pio Foá, Moritz Roth, Otto Heinrich Warburg (Nobel Prize), G. Klemperer, C. Sacerdotti, B. Morpurgo.

MICROSCOPISTS: G. Gluge, L. Mandl, S. Stricker, G. J. Born, A. Frankel.

EMBRYOLOGISTS: R. Remak, L. Schenk.

BACTERIOLOGISTS: L. L. Jacobson, Waldemar Haffkine, A. Marmorek, A. Neisser, Paul Ehrlich (Nobel Prize) and his associates A. Bertheim and Karl Weigert, A. Wassermann, Elie Metchnikoff (Nobel Prize), G. F. Widal.

CLINICIANS: R. Kosch, Maximilian Heine, Moritz Rapoport, D. Gruby, M. A. Unna, J. Barasch, J. E. Polak, H. Hirschfeldt, J. Freund, H. Jacobson, H. Lebert, D. M. Peixotto, W. von Winternitz, E. Zuckermandl, Anselme Weill, J. Goldschmidt, G. Hayem, I. Boas, W. Ebstein, J. Lazarus, L. Lichtheim, M. Mendelsohn, O. Minkowski. C. Posner, O. Rosenbach, H. Senator, Isaac Dembo, V. Ascoli, K. Huldschinsky.

SURGEONS: M. Asson, L. von Dittel, James Israel, A. Jeitteles, Michel Levy, Germain Sée, Lewis Oppenheim, J. Wolf, P. Güterbok, R. Kutner, J. Israel, W. Levy, L. Ewer, Mario Donati.

NEUROLOGISTS: M. H. Romberg, H. Oppenheim, E. Mendel, Albert Moll, E. J. Remak, O. S. Babarcz.

PSYCHIATRISTS: Ludwig Meyer, Max Nordau, Hippolyte Bernheim, Émile Lévy, Sigmund Freud, Alfred Adler, Wilhelm Stekel, Max Kahane, R. Reitter, Hans Sachs, Karl Abraham, Ernst Simmel, P. Schilder, M. Klein, J. B. Breuer, Barbara Low, Van d. Chijs, Ernst Blum, Sandor Ferenczi, Otto Rank, T. Reik, W. Flies, Otto Weininger, M. Levi-Bianchini, Iwan Bloch, Magnus Hirschfeld, and the Gestalt psychiatrists W. Koehler, K. Kofka, M. Wertheimer, A. Lehmann, E. Rubin, D. Katz, K. Lewin.

PEDIATRICIANS: Alois Epstein, Max Kassowitz, A. Baginsky, L. Feurst, E. H. Henoch, H. Finkelstein.

DERMATOLOGISTS: Moritz Kaposi, O. Simon, H. von Zeissl, I. Neumann, G. Behrend, F. J. Behrend, H. Kobner, O. Lassar, P. G. Unna, G. R. Lewin, A. Blaschko.

GYNECOLOGISTS: D. Hausmann, E. Fraenkel, L. Landau, J. Schottlander, P. Zweifel, B. Zondek.

OPHTHALMOLOGISTS: I. Hirschler, L. Mauthner, J. Z. Laurence, I. Schnabel, R. Liebreich, J. Hirschberg, H. L. Cohn, L. L. Laquer, M. Solomon, L. Weiss, N. Feuer, Max Mandelstam.

AURISTS: J. Gruber, S. Moos, A. Politzer, L. Katz, H. Neumann.

LARYNGOLOGISTS: J. Gottstein, J. Schnitzler, F. Semon, B. B. Lowenberg, P. Heymann, B. Frankel.

HYGIENISTS: N. H. Julius, L. A. Cohen, E. Levy, J. V. Bertensohn.

PHARMACOLOGISTS: H. Friedberg, M. Jaffe, O. Matthias, E. Liebreich, C. Koller.

FORENSICISTS: J. L. Caspar, A. Pick, A. Lesser, Salvatore Ottolenghi, Cesare Lombroso, Leone Lattes, G. Benassi.

ENDOCRINOLOGISTS: B. Zondek, R. Frank, O. Minkowski, M. Schiff.

HISTORIANS OF MEDICINE: J. L. Pagel, A. Hirsch, J. Hirschberger, J. Preuss, A. Neubauer, E. Carmoly.

United States. The first Jewish physicians to tread the soil of the American continent came with Columbus: Maestre Bernal was his ship's physician and Marco his ship's surgeon. Among the early victims of the Spanish Inquisition in America were three Jewish physicians: Juan Alvarez (Peru, 1580); Alvaro Nunez (La Plata, 1582); Francisco Maldonado de Silva (Lima, 1639).

The first Jewish physician known to have settled in North America (it is not certain whether he actually practised medicine) was Jacob Lumbrozo, who arrived in Maryland in 1656. Samuel Nunez Ribiero came to Savannah, Ga., in 1733. The early Jewish physicians in the territory which became the United States include Nathan Levi (South Carolina, 1772), Siccary and L. Levy (Virginia), J. Herz (Texas, 1832), and Moses A. Levy, surgeon-general in the army of Sam Houston (1835). Among the earliest Jewish physicians in New York were Elias Woolin and Nunez (1742), Jacob Isaacs (1752), Daniel L. M. Peixotto, president of the New York County Medical Society (1830-32) and of the Willoughby Medical College at Cleveland, Samuel Lilienthal (d. 1891), professor of nervous diseases at Hahnemann College, E. Krackowiczer (d. 1875), M. Blumenthal, who arrived in the United States in 1839, M. J. Asch, founder of the American Laryngological Association (d. 1902), L. Elsberg, professor of ear, nose and throat diseases at New York University (d. 1885), Isaac Hays, an eminent ophthalmologist (1796-1879) and Jacob Mendes de Costa (1833-1900). There were also J. I. Cohen, otologist (1801-70), and Aaron Friedenwald, eye-specialist (1836-1902), both of Baltimore, Joseph Aub (1846-88) and F. Forchheimer (1853-1913) of Cincinnati, and many others.

In the years since the arrival of the first known Jewish physician in America the Jews in the medical profession there have distinguished themselves in every branch of the art of healing. Many of them served in the wars of the United States, taught in medical schools, founded medical societies and publications, directed research institutions, published standard texts, and discovered new principles of diagnosis and therapy. The following chronological list indicates some of the contributions of Jews in America to medical knowledge or practice:

1854: A. Jacobi invents a laryngoscope.
1858: E. Krackowiczer first demonstrates the vocal cords with this instrument.
1884: Carl Koller introduces cocaine in eye surgery.
1887: W. Meyer introduces cystoscopy; M. Einhorn invents the first of many instruments for the diagnosis of gastro-intestinal ailments; Solomon Solis-Cohen discovers the syndrome of vasomotor ataxia.
1894: Simon Flexner discovers anaphylaxis.
1895: A. A. Berg performs the first operation for volvulus of the stomach.
1896: C. D. Aaron originates "Aaron's abdominal bandage."
1898: H. Koplik discovers the "Koplik spots" in measles.
1899: J. Loeb describes the theory of "tropism"; Simon Flexner discovers "Flexner B Dysentery."
1906: S. Yankauer invents sounds for the eustachian tube, followed by many additional inventions.
1908: Leo Buerger describes "Buerger's disease."
1910: N. E. Brill discovers "Brill's disease"; J. F. Schamberg describes "Dermatitis Schambergi"; E. Libman describes "Libman's disease."
1912: O. M. Schloss introduces the scratch method in the study of allergy; C. D. Aaron describes the "Aaron sign."
1913: Bela Schick discovers the "Schick test."
1914: Abraham J. Rongy introduces "twilight sleep."
1915: Alfred Gordon describes the "Gordon sign" in neurology.
1916: C. A. Elsberg describes the "Elsberg operation" in syringomyelitis.
1917: I. W. Held describes achyliagastrica.
1920: Isador C. Rubin invents the "Rubin test" for tubal patency.
1921: Reuben L. Kahn originates the "Kahn test" for syphilis; A. L. Levin designs the "Levin tube."
1922: S. M. Rosenthal introduces a liver function test; R. T. Frank demonstrates the female sex hormone in the ovarian follicle.
1923: L. Berman discovers the internal secretion of the parathyroid glands.
1928: R. F. Frank and M. A. Goldberger demonstrate folliculan in the circulating blood.
1930: R. Isaacs and C. C. Sturgis suggest desiccated hog stomach in pernicious anemia; A. S. Hyman invents the artificial pacemaker for the heart.
1931: M. H. Friedman modifies the Ascheim-Zondek test for pregnancy.

The following list gives the names of American Jews who made important contributions to various fields of medicine:

INTERNAL MEDICINE: S. Baruch, Adajah Behrend, Henry Ilioway, Alfred Meyer, Solomon Solis-Cohen, N. E. Brill, C. D. Spivak, Max Einhorn, A. A. Eshner, C. D. Aaron, J. Friedenwald, D. Reisman, Heinrich Stern, A. Friedlander, H. Adler, Maurice Fishberg, Emanuel Libman, J. Ullman, R. Weil, Isidore William Held, Leopold Lichtwitz, J. G. Brody, Alfred E. Cohn, Eli Moschcowitz, Simon Brainin, B. Lapovski, Jesse G. M. Bullowa, A. A. Epstein, A. L. Lewin, Samuel A. Lowenberg, W. W. Hamburger, R. Ottenberg, S. Strouse, M. Biesenthal, L. H. Newburgh, J. Rosenbloom, B. B. Crohn, C. R. Austrian, Max Kahn, M. A. Rothschild, A. L. Bloomfield, Morris Fishbein, A. E. Parsonnet, J. C. Aub, S. A. Levine, E. P. Boas, R. Isaacs, I. M. Rabinowitch, A. S. Hyman, B. Ratner, H. L. Blumgart, Emil Bogen, Soma Weiss, H. Joachim, B. Jablons, W. S. Collens, M. A. Kugel, Samuel Weiss, Arthur M. Fishberg, Raphael A. Bendove, G. L. Waldbott, L. Tuft, Alex Altschul, Zadok Kapner, J. Meyeroff, P. Kresky, G. A. Knopf.

SURGERY: Joseph Ransohoff (1853-1921), Willy Meyer (1858-1932), H. Lilienthal, H. W. Frauenthal, Alexis Moschowitz, C. G. Levison, Isaac Levin, L. N. Steinbach, D. N. Eisendrath, A. H. Freiberg, Max Ballin, N. Jacobson, C. Goodman, Charles A. Elsberg, A. A. Berg, Joseph Tenenbaum, A. L. Wolbarst, R. Lewisohn, M. I. Schamberg, E. Beer, Moses Behrend, Moshe Benmoshe, Henry Keller, A. Steindler, E. Sachs, Leo Buerger, B. M. Bernheim, M. Thorek, T. Blum, David John Kaliski, Leo Mayer, H. Neuhoff, Isidore Cohn, Jacob Sarnoff, L. Wolfson, Maxwell Maltz, L. Ginzburg, S. Kleinberg, R. L. Dourmashkin, J. W. Maliniak, Louis Carp, Moses Swick, Max Huhner, Elias Rapaport, A. Lightstone, A. J. Barsky.

OBSTETRICS AND GYNECOLOGY: H. N. Vineberg (1857-1926), A. Sturmdorf, L. J. Ladin, L. J. Pritzker, Joseph Bolivar De Lee (1869-1942), Isador C. Rubin, R. T. Frank, H. J. Epstein, Henry C. Falk, Abraham J. Rongy, J. Jarcho, I. F. Stein, E. M. Lazard, C. Mazer, Louis Drosin, S. H. Geist, R. Kurzrok, D. Meyroff.

NEUROLOGY AND PSYCHIATRY: Max Mailhouse, Bernhard Sachs, D. I. Wolfstein, Israel Spayer Wechsler, Simon Philip Goodhart, A. A. Brill, J. Jastrow, Boris Sidis, Joseph Frankel, G. W. Jacoby, W. Leszynski, Sydney Kuh, S. I. Schwab, A. B. Yudelson, Alfred Gordon, I. H. Coriat, Moses Keschner, E. D. Friedman, Abraham Myerson, Herschel Meyers, J. Rosett, E. E. Mayer, H. M. Adler, Ira S. Wile,

A. J. Rosanoff, C. P. Oberndorf, I. Margaretten, J. V. Haberman, J. M. Wolfsohn, B. Glueck, I. L. Meyers, B. Karpman, W. M. Kraus, H. C. Solomon, W. Malamud, S. I. Schwab, M. Neustaedter, P. Zenner, I. Abrahamson, G. B. Hassin, L. S. Aaronson, S. E. Katz, L. B. Hohman, L. Kanner, H. Meltzer, M. H. Bochroch, N. Oppenheim, G. W. Jacoby, M. M. Olkon, K. Goldstein, S. Leopold, Maybarduk, M. K. Meyers, S. Block, G. Steiner, J. H. Leiner, F. H. Levy, W. M. Kraus, J. C. Yalkin, N. W. Winkelman, C. Davison, A. M. Rabiner, S. Brock, E. A. Spiegel, P. R. Lehrman, L. S. Kubie, R. M. Brickner, K. Rothschild, H. G. Wolf, B. J. Alpers, H. S. Rubinstein, Israel Strauss, I. J. Spear, P. F. Schilder, M. Solomon, M. Levine, Abraham A. Roback, Jacob H. Cohn, L. Wender, D. A. Huebsch, S. W. Fernberger, J. B. Kantor, S. J. Beck, E. O. Bregman, S. Kahn, L. S. Selling, L. A. Schwartz, Alexandra Adler, Hugo Munsterberg, A. B. Gottlober, W. B. Wolfe, S. E. Asch, J. Morse, D. Katz, H. H. Abelson, Kurt Lewin, W. Bromberg, B. Dattner, C. Davidson, W. G. Eliasberg, I. Gerstmann, I. H. Globus, L. Hausman, Max Helfand, O. Leweinstein, S. Reback, Bettina Warburg, R. S. Cohen.

DERMATOLOGY AND SYPHILOLOGY: Joseph Zeisler (1858-1919), M. L. Heidingsfeld (1871-1918), J. F. Schamberg, N. A. Aaronstam, E. B. Tauber, Max Scheer, L. Chargin, F. Wise, U. J. Wile, R. S. Weiss, O. L. Levin, M. B. Sulzberger, H. Goodman, I. Rosen, S. Pollitzer, H. Goldberger, A. G. Nadler, R. Bernstein, F. L. Blumenthal, Louis Tulipan, E. Urbach, H. Goodman, S. M. Peck, S. Feldman, A. S. Wolf, W. Gottheil, S. Lustgarten.

PEDIATRICS: Abraham Jacobi (1830-1919), Henry Koplik (1858-1927), H. Heiman, Isaac A. Abt, A. F. Abt, H. B. Sheffield, C. Herrman, S. Amberg, A. F. Hess, I. H. Hess, Bela Schick, O. M. Schloss, A. Levinson, B. Kramer, A. T. Shol, Murray B. Gordon, S. Z. Levine, L. Fischer, E. B. Friedenwald, S. Blum, J. S. Lepold, H. Lowenberg, R. M. Pollitzer, Max Seham, I. N. Kugelmass, S. Karelitz, H. Goldstein, J. B. Pincus, A. Hymanson, S. H. Desau.

OPHTHALMOLOGY: Isaac M. Hays (1847-1925), R. Kalish, C. Koller, H. Friedenwald, M. Wiener, C. Loeb, Arthur Meyer Yudkin, J. E. Lebensohn, J. S. Friedenwald, H. L. Wolfner, Charles H. May, M. J. Schoenberg, I. Goldstein, L. Bothman, Benjamin L. Gordon, S. A. Agatson, Gavod H. Alperin.

OTOLARYNGOLOGY: Jacob da Silva Solis-Cohen (1838-1927), Emil Mayer, W. Freudenthal, R. Levy, H. W. Loeb, M. Lederman, E. Amberg, S. Iglauer, S. Yankauer, I. Friesner, H. L. Pollock, S. A. Friedberg, Samuel J. Kopetzky, M. A. Goldstein, R. Sonnenschein, W. Spielberg, A. A. Schwartz, E. M. Schwartz, S. Cohen, D. N. Husic, J. C. Beck, J. I. Klepper, G. D. Wolf, C. Hirsch, W. H. Spielberg, M. S. Eshner, J. Lempert, L. Greenberg, David I. Mirow.

ENDOCRINOLOGY: D. M. Kaplan, I. Bram, H. Goldstein, H. H. Rubin, L. Berman, Casimir Funk, H. J. Jaffer, C. Mazer, H. Ehrenrest, J. Eidensberg, G. B. Dorff, M. A. Goldberger, S. Shapiro.

PATHOLOGY, BACTERIOLOGY AND SEROLOGY: M. J. Herzog, Simon Flexner, F. S. Mandelbaum, S. M. Cone, Leo Loeb, A. Robin, Lazar Rosenthal, Jacob M. Ravid, E. J. Asnis, A. M. Pappenheimer, S. B. Wolbach, M. R. Smirnow, J. J. Bronfenbrenner, Leon S. Medalia, M. Barron, S. A. Goldberg, M. C. Winternitz, A. Zingher, Max Lederer, A. L. Garbat, B. S. Kline, P. K. Olitzky, J. D. Aronson, Reuben Leon Kahn, B. Jablons, P. Klemperer, B. S. Levine, M. Heidelberger, A. A. Arkin, I. J. Kligler, Harry Plotz, I. Weinstein, C. Weiss, M. C. Kahn, L. Gross, G. Schwartzman, B. Kwartin, Harriet Fishberg, Isaac Levin, L. G. Tedesche, A. E. Cohn, S. Levinson, D. M. Grayzel, David Perla, P. Levine, Mendel Jacobi, W. Antopol, E. Applebaum, Morton C. Kahn, G. Schwartzman.

PHYSIOLOGY AND BIOCHEMISTRY: S. J. Meltzer (1851-1924), M. E. Jaffa (1857-1931), Jacques Loeb (1859-1925), M. Gomberg, J. O. Stieglitz, P. A. Levene, S. Bookman, L. B. Mendel, A. Lachman, M. A. Rosanoff, G. M. Meyer, C. L. Alsberg, L. L. Watters, A. J. Goldforb, W. N. Berg, H. C. Brill, C. B. Lipman, Casimir Funk, G. W. Raiziss, M. Levine, M. G. Wohl, M. Kunitz, B. Harrow, B. H. Schlomowitz, S. Katzenelbogen, V. E. Levine, S. Hecht, E. J. Cohn, Meyer Bodansky, L. N. Katz, M. H. Feldman, L. Michaelis, B. Sure, H. Grundfest, H. H. Sobotka, E. B. Tietz, R. R. Blumenthal, H. A. Abramson.

PHARMACOLOGY AND THERAPEUTICS: J. L. Lascoff, J. Diner, W. Salant, Bernard Fantus, J. Gutman, A. S. Loevenhart, A. D. Hirschfelder, H. T. Hyman, S. M. Rosenthal, A. Taub, L. Gershenfeld, J. S. Dorfman, J. M. Rogoff, P. Hart, I. Neuwirth, S. A. Gutman.

X-RAY, RADIOLOGY AND PHYSIOTHERAPY: L. Jaches (1873-1939), M. Cohen (1875-1938), A. B. Hirsh, Ira I. Kaplan, L. J. Friedman, L. J. Levinson, M. Lenz, W. Bierman, Alexander Freed, G. Levene, Gustav Bucky, H. F. Wolf, S. Lange, I. S. Hirsch, Richard Kovacks, S. Brown, E. Mayer, A. R. Hollander, M. Ritwo.

PUBLIC HEALTH: A. S. Solomons (1826-1910), M. J. Lewi, Abraham Flexner, E. C. Levy, Milton J. Rosenau, W. Jacobsohn, S. S. Goldwater, M. Danzis, Joseph Goldberger, M. M. Davis, Louis I. Harris, L. I. Dublin, H. S. Bernton, I. D. Bronfin, E. M. Bluestone, W. A. Manheimer, G. M. Price.

HISTORY OF MEDICINE: A. Jacobi, C. D. Spivak, M. Frank, David Reisman, M. G. Seelig, Hyman Morrison, J. Rosenbloom, Victor Robinson, Solomon R. Kagan, Abraham Levinson, Max Kahn, H. A. Savitz, Hirsch Loeb Gordon, Edward Podolsky, Henry Illoway, Morris Fishbein, Iago Galdston, A. A. Brill, I. H. Coriat, C. P. Oberndorf, B. Weinberger, Aaron Brav, R. Friedman, Benjamin L. Gordon, B. Cohen, M. Danzis, L. Kanner.

See also: HYGIENE; MAIMONIDES; MEDICINE.

HIRSCH LOEB GORDON.

Lit.: Carmoly, E., Histoire des médecins juifs (1844); Münz, Über die jüdischen Ärzte im Mittelalter (1887); Landau, Geschichte der jüdischen Ärzte (1895); Steinschneider, M., Die arabische Literatur der Juden (1902); Scherbel, Jüdische Ärzte (1905); Roback, A. A., Jewish Influence in Modern Thought (1929); Kagan, S. R., Jewish Contributions to Medicine in America (1939).

PHYSICISTS, see SCIENCE AND INVENTION.

PHYSIOLOGY, see MEDICINE; PHYSICIANS.

PIASTRO, MISHEL, violinist, b. Kertz, Crimea, 1891. He studied violin at the St. Petersburg Conservatory under Leopold Auer in the class that included Heifetz, Elman, and Zimbalist. He graduated from the Conservatory in 1910 with first prize in violin playing. For a period he was soloist with Koussevitzky's orchestra. Then he made numerous tours as recitalist, which took him annually to the Orient. In 1920 he came to the United States, making his debut at Carnegie Hall. A year later he toured the country with Richard Strauss in performances of chamber music by that composer. In 1925 Piastro became concertmaster of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Arturo Toscanini, who brought him to a similar post with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra (1931), often called Piastro the greatest living concertmaster.

He has appeared also as soloist with major orchestras, made guest appearances as conductor with the San Francisco Symphony and the General Motors orchestras, and organized his own chamber music ensemble, the New York Philharmonic Symphony String Quartet.

PIATIGORSKAIA, ANNA, Yiddish poet, b. Zhitomir, Russia, 1893. She won recognition as a result of her work with the Red Army, in helping to eliminate illiteracy among the soldiers. In 1921-22 she worked in the Jewish divisions of the Volhynia and Moscow Boards of Education, and subsequently became a member of the Jewish section of the All-Ukrainian Union of Proletarian Writers. In 1930 a collection of her poems was published as In Gang (Along the Way). This book contains six cycles of poetry, ranging from personal lyrics to social poems.

Soviet critics considered her verse too abstract—even her more recent poetry, in which she made an attempt to increase her use of the revolutionary theme. The later poems were included in Breit is Mein Land (My Land is Broad), published in 1934.

Lit.: Literaturnaya Entziklopedia (1935).

PIATIGORSKY, GREGOR, cellist, b. Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, 1903. Of non-Jewish birth, Piatigorsky was converted to Judaism when he married Jacqueline de Rothschild, daughter of Édouard de Rothschild of Paris. At fifteen he was engaged as first cellist of the Imperial Opera orchestra in Moscow. During the revolution he went to Poland, where he played in the Warsaw Opera Orchestra, then to Berlin, where he studied with Julius Klengel. He came to the attention of Wilhelm Furtwängler, who engaged him as solo cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic, as a result of which Piatigorsky first came to prominence. He soon resigned from the orchestra to devote himself to concert work extensively, returning however to his chair in the Berlin Philharmonic, whenever Furtwängler conducted, as a mark of gratitude to the man who discovered him. In 1929 Piatigorsky made his American debut, following which he established himself in this country as one of the leading virtuosos of the cello. He became an American citizen in 1942.

PIATNITSKY, OSIP (IOSIF) ARONOVICH, revolutionary and author, b. Russia, 1882. The son of a carpenter, he worked as tailor and electrician in his youth. His political career began in 1898 when he joined the Social Democratic Labor Party in Kovno. He became a member of the "Iskra" group (1901) and was arrested for the first time in 1902. He escaped from the Kiev prison, where he had been interned, and went abroad in 1903. From then on he served as a professional revolutionary. While abroad he was in charge of the transport of illegal party literature into Russia and of comrades out of Russia—and maintained close ties with party organizations in Russia. He also participated in the organization of the second and third Party congresses (1903 and 1905).

Back in Russia, Piatnitsky was a member (1905) of the Odessa committee of the Party. He was arrested in 1906 but, upon being freed, he moved to Moscow, where he was placed in charge of the technical affairs of the Moscow committee until 1908 when he was called abroad by the foreign center of the Party. He was arrested en route, but again released, and he continued into Germany, where he was made chairman of the foreign bureau of the central committee of the Party; he resumed the organization and transportation of literature. In 1913 he returned to Russia, undertook central committee assignments for the Party in Kiev, Poltava, Kharkov, Moscow, Volsk, Samara (now Kuibyshev). A year later he was arrested (in Samara), as a member of the Bolshevik Committee, and exiled to Siberia.

The February revolution freed Piatnitsky and he returned to Moscow. There he was active in helping to bring to a successful conclusion the October (Bolshevik) Revolution. Thereafter he was instrumental in the unionization of railroad workers. He was chairman (1917-1919) of the union of railroad masters and workmen and chairman of the united trade union of railroad workers (Tsekprofsozha) (1919-20). In 1920 he became secretary of the Moscow Party Committee and simultaneously began his activities in the Comintern; in 1923 he became secretary of the E.C.C.I. (executive committee of the Comintern). At the thirteenth and successive Party Congress (1924-27) he was elected to membership in the Central Committee of the Bolshevik wing of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU: B), and to the Central Control Commission of the Party. In 1933, during the Party purges throughout the Soviet Union, he was on the cleansing commission. Piatnitsky was not in the news from the Soviet Union during 1941-42.

Among his published books, in Russian and in English, are Leading the World Proletariat to New Decisive Battles (co-author V. Knorin; Moscow, 1934); World Communists in Action (London, 1931); World Economic Crisis (1933); Memoirs of a Bolshevik (New York, 1933); and a pamphlet entitled Twenty-One Conditions of Admission into the Communist International (New York, 1934).

Lit.: Webb, S. and B., Soviet Communism (London, 1935); Malaia Entsiklopedia (1931); American Russian Institute files (New York).

PICA, see JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION.

PICCIOTTO, JAMES, writer, b. Aleppo, Syria, 1830; d. London, 1897. He was the son of Haim Moses Picciotto, stemming from an ancient Jewish family whose members were still living (1942) in Syria. In 1843 Picciotto went to London, together with his father. He served later on, until 1896, as secretary to the Council of Administration of the Morocco Relief Fund. Picciotto contributed on Jewish subjects to the Jewish Chronicle and the Examiner. With great industry he delved into the archives of the older synagogues of London, deciphered their minutes written in English, Spanish, Hebrew and Judeo-German, and, combining the results of his research work with his father's recollections, he wrote Sketches of Anglo-Jewish History, printed in the Jewish Chronicle and published as a book in 1875. Picciotto was a pioneer in the realm of Anglo-Jewish history. He was the first writer who attempted to trace the gradual rise and progress of the Jewish community of London. His book induced many British Jews, especially Israel Abrahams, to interest himself in Jewish history. But Picciotto stubbornly clung to his favorite heresy of attributing the resettlement of the Jews in England to the time of King Charles II not to the Oliver Cromwell era. He translated Joseph Halévy's Travels in Abyssinia (1877).

PICHEL, IRVING, actor, writer and director, b. Pittsburgh, Pa., 1891. He received his A.B. degree from Harvard in 1914, and shortly afterward began his theatrical career, first appearing in stock, then becoming identified with the Little Theatre movement in various cities. Subsequently he appeared in productions of Hamlet, All God's Chillun Got Wings, Lazarus Laughed and other plays. Called to Hollywood in 1930, Pichel wrote scenarios, directed productions and acted in them. He appeared in the screen versions of An American Tragedy, in British Agent, The House of a Thousand Candles (1936), Jezebel (1938), Topper Takes a Trip (1938). In 1942 Pichel produced the motion picture The Pied Piper, starring Monty Woolley, and based on a novel by Nevil Shute.

Pichel also lectured on the theatre at summer sessions of Leland Stanford University, the University of Wisconsin and the University of California. He was author of Modern Theatres and On Building a Theatre.

PICK, ALOIS, Austrian army physician, scientist and Jewish communal leader, b. Karolinenthal, near Prague, Bohemia, 1859. He became associate professor of internal medicine at the University of Vienna in 1918. As army surgeon he was departmental chief physician in Garrison Hospital No. 1 in Vienna, the largest military institution in Austria-Hungary. During the first World War Pick became president of the army sanitation committee (then the highest medical position in the army), and subsequently attained the highest possible rank, that of surgeon-major-general. As an army doctor in Herzegovina he conducted research on pappataci fever. For many years he was president of the Jewish community of Vienna. In 1939 Pick was still living in Vienna.

Pick wrote a large number of medical works, including Vorlesungen über Magen- und Darmkrankheiten (2 vols., Vienna, 1895) and Klinische Semiotik (in collaboration with Adolf Hecht; Vienna, 1908). His works were translated into English and Russian.

Lit.: Die Wahrheit (Vienna), Oct. 25, 1929; Biographisches Lexikon hervorragender Ärzte (1935).

PICK, ARNOLD, psychiatrist, b. Gross-Meseritsch, Moravia, 1851; d. Prague, 1924. In 1875 he graduated from the University of Vienna and was appointed assistant physician at the Grossherzoglich Oldenburgsche Irrenanstalt (insane asylum) at Wehmen. From 1880 to 1886 he was chief physician of the asylum in Dobrzan and subsequently professor of psychiatry and director of the psychopathic clinic at the German University of Prague. He retired from active medical service in 1921. A fibrous knot in the medula oblongata, "the Pick Knot," was named after him. In his writings he also discussed senile atrophy of the brain.

Pick's published works include: Beiträge zur Pathologie und zur pathologischen Anatomie des Zentralnervensystems (in collaboration with Kahler, 1880), which was republished in Berlin in 1898 with an additional essay on normal anatomy of the central nervous system; Die aggramitischen Sprachstörungen (1913); Der Krieg und die Reservekräfte des Nervensystems (1916); Die neurologische Forschung in der Psychologie und andere Aufsätze (1921).

Lit.: Biographisches Lexikon hervorragender Ärzte (1935).

PICK, BEHREND, numismatist, b. Posen, Prussia, 1861; d. Berlin, 1940. A pupil of Theodore Mommsen, he became assistant professor of archeology (1891) at the University of Zürich; custodian of the ducal numismatic collection in Gotha (1893) and its director in 1899. In 1911, he was made honorary associate professor at the Jena University.

He wrote Die antiken Münzen von Dacien und Moesien (1898-10); Aufsätze zur Numismatik und Archäologie (1931), and completed Ioannes N. Sboronos' posthumous work, Les monnaies d'Athenes (1923-26).

Lit.: C.V.Zeitung, vol. 15, No. 51 (1936); Yevreiskaya Entsiklopedia, vol. 12, p. 507.

PICK, ERNEST PETER, pharmacologist, b. Jaromer, Bohemia, 1872. He received his M.D. degree from the German University in Prague (1896). Beginning as head of the biochemical department in the sero-therapeutical state institute in Vienna (1899-1912), he was professor of experimental pharmacology and director (1924 to 1938) of the pharmacological institute of the medical faculty at the University of Vienna. From 1932 to 1933 he served as dean of the medical faculty of that university. Ousted from his post by the Nazis in 1938, Pick emigrated (1939) to the United States, where in 1942 he was pharmacologist in the Mount Sinai Hospital, New York city, and clinical professor of pharmacology at Columbia University.

Pick was twice awarded the Goldberger Prize by the Medical Society in Vienna, and was recipient of the Lieben Prize, conferred by the Academy of Sciences in Vienna. He was an honorary member of the Harvard Society of New York, corresponding fellow of the New York Academy of medicine, member of the American Society for Pharmacology and Experimental Therapeutics and of several other organizations. Pick's published works include: Biochemie der Antigene (1912); Biochemie der Antigene und Antikörper (together with F. Silberstein; 1928); Die experimentelle Pharmakologie (with Hans H. Meyer; 9th ed., 1936).

PICK, HERMANN, orientalist, b. Schildberg, Posen, 1879. From 1903 on he was librarian of the Prussian State Library. He was elected (1920) to the executive of the Mizrachi, and at the Twelfth Zionist Congress (1921) served as representative of the Mizrachi on the executive of the Zionist Organization. He remained in this office until 1927, directing the immigration department of the Palestine Committee in Jerusalem. He was also a member of the political committee of the Jewish Agency.

In addition to his work, Assyrisches und Talmudisches (Berlin, 1903), he contributed scientific articles to periodicals and collections. From 1930 to 1933 he was a member of the executive board of the Jewish community in Berlin. In 1942 he was living in Palestine.

PICK, LUDWIG, professor of pathological anatomy, b. Landsberg, Germany, 1868. In 1899 he became an instructor at the University of Berlin, and in 1909 professor; later he was prosector and director of the Friedrichshain Hospital in Berlin. Pick was last heard of from Berlin in 1938.

Pick's method of preserving anatomical preparations in their natural colors is widely used. His numerous works on pathological and gynecological anatomy include: Über das elastische Gewebe in der normalen und pathologisch veränderten Gebärmutter (1900); Über hyperemesis avidorum (1902); Angeborene Knochensyphilis (1929).

PICK, OTTO, writer, b. Prague, 1887; d. London, 1940. He was feuilleton editor and dramatic critic of the Prager Presse. He published a number of novels, plays, books of poetry and anthologies of great Czech authors, such as Brezina Šramek, Capek, Machar and Langer, whose works he translated and commented upon in a masterly fashion. He was author of a volume of poetry, Wenn wir uns mitten im Leben meinen, which is considered his most impressive work. Pick edited the Deutsche Erzähler aus der Tschechoslovakei and the correspondence exchanged between Casanova and I. F. Opitz. After the occupation of Czechoslovakia by the Nazis (1939) he emigrated to London, where he delivered lectures on Czech literature.

PICK, PHILIP JOSEF, dermatologist, b. Neustadt, Bohemia, 1834; d. Prague, 1910. He studied at the University of Prague, where he became assistant professor in 1873. In 1896 he was the first of his profession (dermatology) in Austria to be made associate professor. Together with Auspitz, he founded (1869) the Archiv für Dermatologie und Syphilis. He was a co-founder and president of the Deutsche Dermatologische Gesellschaft (1889).

Pick wrote Über Ekzema Marginatum (1869); Untersuchungen über Favus (1891); Zur Kenntnis der Keratosen (1875); Zur Pathologie des Ekzems (1892).

Lit.: Prager medizinische Wochenschrift, No. 18; Archiv für Dermatologie und Syphilis, vol. 103.

PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, GIOVANNI, Christian Hebraist, Platonist and mystic, b. Mirandola, Italy, 1463; d. Florence, Italy, 1494. He attempted to unite several philosophic systems. In 1486 he issued in Rome 900 theses named Conclusiones philosophicae, cabalisticae et theologicae. With the aid of Johanan Allemanno, a Jew of Constantinople, Pico became acquainted with the Cabala, and translated several Cabalistic treatises into Latin. He introduced Cabalistic doctrines into several of his writings; in Heptaplus he expounds the history of creation in conformity with the Cabala. However, he regarded the Cabala as a means of proving the truth of Christian dogmas, and with its help hoped to "defeat the Jews on all fronts."

Lit.: Cassuto, Umberto, Gli Ebrei a Firenze; Pflaum, Heinz, in Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, vol. 72; Anagnine, Eugenio, Pico della Mirandola (1937).

PICON, MOLLY, actress, b. New York city, 1898. At the age of six she made her first appearance in Philadelphia, under the management of Mike Thomashefsky. Although, while still an adolescent, she also toured in English companies, her marriage to Jacob Kalich, producer and librettist (1919), made the Yiddish theatre the primary choice of her activities thereafter. Yet it was the attributes which are more easily traceable to the sparkle of American musical comedy actresses that gave Molly Picon her distinctive quality. She was versatile, lively, ebullient, but well-schooled in theatre technique.

From 1921 to 1923 Kalich took her through Europe, playing the various capitals. When Molly Picon returned to New York, to appear in Yonḳele, she brought a matured act. The gusto of her Yiddish, combined with the litheness of her body and the aptness of her mimicry, introduced a new type of Yiddish musical comedy acting, distilled out of the Jewish tradition and the American background together. She starred on Second Avenue for eight years, in Zipḳe (1924), Mamele (1925), Molly Dolly (1926), and other plays. Later she toured through Europe, South Africa and South America. In 1935 she appeared in a motion picture, Yiddle mit'n Fiddel. At various times she appeared on the English vaudeville stage, on radio programs, and in motion picture shorts. After 1937 she remained in the United States, playing in New York and other cities. By 1942 she had appeared in thirty-five musical comedies. That year she appeared in her husband's Oy iz dus a Leben, a revue of her own career, produced at the newly named Molly Picon Theatre, New York city.

PICQUART, COLONEL, see DREYFUS AFFAIR.

PIDYON, see RANSOM.

PIDYON HABEN, see REDEMPTION OF FIRST-BORN.

PIDYON SHEBUYIM, see CAPTIVES; RANSOM.

PIEL, see HEBREW LANGUAGE.

PIERLEONI, Roman family of Jewish origin. In the 11th cent., Baruch, a banker at Rome, acquired a great fortune. Converted to Christianity, he assumed the name Benedetto Christiano and had widespread political influence. His son Leone was a leader of the papal party, and supported Pope Gregory VII. Leone's close relations to Gregory caused the rumor that the Pope was a member of his family. Leone's son Petrus Leonis—Pierleoni—followed his father in the leadership of the papal party. Pope Urban II died in Pierleoni's castle. Pierleoni vigorously defended Pope Paschal II against the German Emperor Henry V and the antipopes supported by him; later on he showed diplomatic ability by reconciling Paschal and Henry. The popes granted many privileges to the Pierleonis, who continued to direct their great banking house, and it was rumored that they did not pay attention to the canonical interdiction of usury. Pierleoni's son, Pierleoni II, became a cardinal in 1116, and was papal legate to France and England in 1121. In 1130 he was elected pope, assuming the name Anacletus II. After Anacletus died, in 1138, the Pierleoni family was reconciled with Innocent II, and continued to flourish until the 13th century.

See also: ANACLETUS II; ANDREAS.

PIEŠTANY, (in Hungarian Pöstyén, in German Pistyan), spa in Slovakia, formerly Nyitra county, Hungary. From the modest beginnings of thirteen Jewish families of Moravian origin (who were recorded as living on the estate and under the protection of Count Forgács in 1736), the Jewish community of Pieštany has grown to 1,200 in a total population of 8,000 (20th cent.). Liberalism, prevalent in Hungary from 1867 on to the end of the first World War, and democracy in the Czechoslovak state, of which Pieštany formed a part from 1919 on, were equally beneficial for the development of the community. In 1927 a new synagogue was erected. The community also had a public school and Talmud Torah. The Orthodox trend markedly prevailed in the religious life of the community, but Zionism also called forth vivid response. The Jews of Pieštany were active in business, the trades and agriculture.

After the Czechoslovakian Republic was shattered and the puppet state of Slovakia created by Germany, the Jews of that small country shared the fate of their coreligionists in Germany. In 1942 they were destined for deportation to German-occupied Poland and Russia.

PIETY. Piety is the mental temper produced by religions and the conduct in which religion eventuates. No single expression is used in Jewish literature to denote piety; such terms as Zaddik (the righteous man), Hasid (the godly man) and Kadosh (holy) are used in this connection. Hence it may be inferred that there are many facets to the soul of the pious man and that among them are his desire for righteousness, his loving-kindness and his sense of holiness. Thus it will be seen that, although the pious man does not ignore the demands of the ceremonial law, his piety manifests itself in human relations, in business, in charity and in general communal affairs (B.K. 30a). The truly pious Jew never forgets that God requires of man justice, mercy and humility (Micah 6:8).

Whenever Psalmist or scribe, rabbi or philosopher speaks of the way of life which man should choose, he is giving his own definition of piety. Throughout Jewish literature these definitions stand out in relief. The man of piety eschews evil; he meditates in God's law (Ps. 1). His hands are clean and his heart is pure; he does not swear falsely (Ps. 24). He despises the gain of oppression; he even shuts his eyes from looking upon evil (Isa. 33). By implication he is a man upon whose heart God's law is written (Jer. 31). In rabbinic literature the sages describe the care that must be taken in man's attempt to attain genuine piety (Sotah 19:15).

Indeed, the implication is that human characteristics belong in groups; piety, wisdom, knowledge, understanding belong together (Aboth 3:21). To find one of them a man must seek them all.

The Jewish mind has never regarded piety as the exclusive possession of any group or class. In Israel there is no special class of the élite whose initiation brings them into closer relationship with God. There is neither a monastic class nor a distinction between priests and laymen. A rabbi is a layman whose claim to leadership is his knowledge of the Torah and of all Jewish literature. Real piety may become the crowning glory of any man who is determined to live the higher life. The entire people of Israel is called (Ex. 19:6) a "kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Baeck, Leo, The Essence of Judaism, p. 39 et seq.).

The pious man is never satisfied to stay within the law in the formal sense, by doing only that which religious or civil law demands. On the contrary, his whole being is consecrated to a life which is in itself a sanctification of the Name of God (Kiddush Hashem). Therefore he adopts the rule of conduct known as supererogation (lifnim mi shurath hadin), of doing more than the law demands. Organized group effort to live such a life is reflected in the experience of the Hasidim, and of the Safed mystics (Schechter, Solomon, Studies in Judaism, Second Series, p. 289 et seq.).

ABRAHAM SHUSTERMAN.

Lit.: Schechter, Solomon, Studies in Judaism, Second Series; Baeck, Leo, The Essence of Judaism (1936).

PIGEON, see DOVE.

PIKLER, EMIL, labor leader and Hungarian deputy, b. Árvaváralja, Hungary, 1872. He graduated from the commercial academy of Budapest. Travelling in Germany and in the United States, he studied the labor movements of those countries. On his return to Hungary he was active in organizing salesmen and saleswomen. He became chairman of the Hungarian trade union of business employees, an organization which strove for betterment in the cultural and economic status of a large section of the city population in which the Jewish element was predominant. In 1922 the Social Democratic Party elected Pikler to the Hungarian national assembly, then violently anti-Semitic and anti-Laborite, and he courageously espoused the interests of the wage earning classes. In accordance with the anti-Jewish laws and decrees of the years 1938 to 1942, Pikler was barred from leadership in the Social Democratic Party and allied organizations.

PIKLER, GYULA (JULIUS), philosopher and psychologist, b. Temesvár, Hungary, 1864. He studied at the University of Budapest, where he became lecturer at the age of twenty-one. From 1903 on he was professor of philosophy of law. While still a lecturer he read during several terms at the University of Oxford. Pikler, who embraced the Christian faith, retired from his chair in 1919, when freedom of learning and teaching was abolished in Hungary by the numerus clausus law. He lectured for some time in Switzerland and Italy, and then lived in retirement in Hungary.

In addition to economics and philosophy of law, Pikler devoted himself to physiological psychology, and the results of his researches were utilized by medical science in Germany.

He published (in Hungarian): Ricardo jelentősége a közgazdaságtan történetében (Ricardo's Place in the History of Economics; 1886); Az objektiv létben való hit lélektana (Psychology of the Belief in Objective Existence; 1890); A jog keletkezéséről és fejlődéséről (On the Origins and Evolution of Law; 3rd ed., 1911); Az emberi egyesületek és különösen az állam fejlődése (The Evolution of Human Associations and Especially of the State; 5th ed., 1905); A büntetőjog bölcselete (Philosophy of Criminal Law; 7th ed., 1910); A lélektan alapelvei (Fundamental Principles of Psychology; 1908); (in German): Das Grundgesetz allen neuro-psychischen Lebens (1900); Die Stelle des Bewusstseins in der Natur (1910); Über T. Lipps Versuch einer Theorie des Willens (1908); Der Ursprung des Totemismus (with F. Somló; 1900); Zwei Vorträge über dynamische Psychologie (1908); Sinnesphysiologische Untersuchungen (1917); Schriften zur Anpassungstheorie des Empfindungsvorganges (5 books, 1919-26).

PIKLER, I. GYULA, economist, b. Munkács, Hungary; date of birth unknown. He received the degree of M.D. at the University of Vienna and served as a health officer in Hungary, contributing to the medical journals of several countries. From 1897 on he was in charge of the mortality statistics of Budapest; subsequently he became vice-director of the statistical bureau of Budapest. From 1919 to 1924 he was director of the Hungarian real estate assessment bureau.

Upon retirement he lectured throughout Europe on the theory of the revenue from land. He published several works in Hungarian on the taxation of real estate and on Hungarian land reform.

PILATE, PONTIUS, see PONTIUS PILATE.

PILGRIMAGE FESTIVALS (shalosh regalim, literally, "the three pilgrimage festivals"), a designation for Passover (Pesach), the Feast of Weeks (Shabuoth), and the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkoth), the three ancient harvest festivals in Palestine, on which pilgrimages were made to the holy sanctuary and offerings were brought from the produce of the fields. In the period of the Second Temple the Jews of the Diaspora, too, came to Jerusalem in great numbers on the pilgrimage festivals, especially on Passover. These pilgrimage-makers were called 'ole regel, "those who went up to Jerusalem for the pilgrimage festival." The three pilgrimage festivals are festivals of joy. Even today they are considered as being closely connected with one another, for which reason the liturgy for all three is extremely similar, consisting, with minor variations, of the same prayers and blessings.

Lit.: Elbogen, Ismar, Der jüdische Gottesdienst (1924; 2nd ed., 1931); Singer, S., and Abrahams, I., The Authorised Daily Prayer Book (1922) cxc-cxcii.

PILICHOWSKI, LEOPOLD, painter, b. Zadzin, Poland, 1869; d. London 1933. He studied art in Warsaw, Munich and Paris, and became a prominent portraitist. Upon his return to Poland (1895) he executed a few landscapes and numerous paintings inspired by the Bible and the lives of East European Jews and factory workers. His works—exhibited in Lemberg (1894), Paris (1900) and London (1906 and 1927)—won various prizes; in 1942 many were in the galleries and museums of The Hague, Paris (Luxembourg), Warsaw and Jerusalem. They include: Talmud Study; Sabbath Eve; Sukkoth; The Day of Atonement; The Laborer. His outstanding huge painting, The Opening of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, was shown at Buckingham Palace in 1927.

Equally noteworthy are his portraits of Anatole France, Albert Einstein, Max Nordau, Nahum Sokolow, Edmond de Rothschild, Chaim Weizmann, Sir Herbert and Lady Samuel, and Lord Balfour. Pilichowski moved from Paris to London in 1914. He was a fervent Zionist, participated in Jewish relief work, and was elected president of the Polish Jews of England. In 1927 he was made a knight of the Legion of Honor.

Leopold Pilichowski shown painting the portrait of Lord Balfour

Lit.: Cohn-Wiener, Ernst, Die jüdische Kunst; Schwarz, Karl, Die Juden in der Kunst (1936).

PILLARS OF CLOUD AND FIRE. According to a number of passages in the Bible (beginning with Ex. 13:21) the Israelites, in their journey from Egypt to Canaan, were guided by a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, as the visible presence of God. At the Red Sea these pillars served to prevent the Egyptians from approaching the Israelites the night before the latter passed through the sea. In the opinion of the Bible critics, this story is characteristic of the Jahvist Code (J), in contrast to the guides named by the other sources of the Hexateuch; Hobab ben Reuel, by the Kenite Document (K); the Ark, by the Book of the Covenant (C); an angel, by the Elohist Code (E); a pillar of cloud alone by the Priestly Code (P). The latter declares in various places that the cloud did not precede the Israelites, as in the J source, but rested on the Tabernacle; that the Israelites marched when it lifted and encamped when it settled (Ex. 40:34-38). Rationalists have interpreted the pillars of cloud and fire as an exaggeration of original volcanic phenomena or as fire and smoke signals.

PILNIAK, BORIS (Boris Andreevich Vogau), writer, b. Russia, 1894. First of the new crop of Soviet writers to attract general attention, he created something of a stir with the publication in Russian of his novel The Bare Year in 1922. It deals with the romantic period of revolution and civil war; Russia itself is the protagonist of this panoramic drama, and Pilniak weaves whatever action there is around "mystical" ideas of Russian nationalism and the old contradictions of Europe versus Asia. However, he failed to perceive the Russian revolution as part of an international movement of the working class. He approached it in the spirit of a Slavophile. Absence of plot, lack of chronological order, spasmodic structure—are typical of Pilniak's style. In his ideas and in the general form, Pilniak was influenced by Andrey Bely. Immediately following The Bare Year which was translated into English (1928), appeared The Third Metropolis (1923), Ivan da Maria (1923), Machines and Wolves (1925), all in Russian.

In 1929 the novel Mahogany, appearing in Berlin, brought Pilniak into sharp disfavor with Soviet critics. They regarded him as politically unprincipled and as a protagonist of the bourgeoisie rather than of the Soviet intelligentsia. Some of his books, published abroad, deal with Socialist construction in the Soviet Union, and when scrutinized by Soviet literary circles these works, notably Mahogany, were found to be replete with gross distortions.

His books on foreign conditions were held to be no truer. OK (1933), a book he wrote on America in the early 1930's, created fierce reaction. In 1933 Soviet newspapers carried scathing criticisms of his oversimple descriptions of New York. In 1930 Pilniak sought to rehabilitate himself in The Volga Flows into the Caspian Sea (known also to English readers), a novel of the five-year plan, which however did not altogether satisfy strict orthodox ideology.

Finally Pilniak was arrested (1936) on a charge of counter-revolutionary writing activities. He was found to have been involved in the so-called "Kershon group," alleged to have attempted through their writings to disseminate falsehood and to foment dissatisfaction and sabotage. In 1942 Pilniak was still in seclusion somewhere in the Soviet Union.

Other of his writings were English Tales (1924), written after a trip to England; Tale of the Unextinguished Moon (1927).

Lit.: Malaya Entziklopedia (1931); Literaturnaya Entziklopedia (1934), vol. 8, cols. 636-41; Mirsky, Prince D. S., Contemporary Russian Literature, 1881-1825 (1926); American Russian Institute files.

PILPUL (from the Hebrew pilpel, "pepper"), a dialectical method of Talmudic study, consisting of examining all the arguments pro and con in order to find a logical argument for the application of the Law and at the same time to sharpen the wits of the student. It consists of the application of a legal maxim to various individual cases, or the reconciliation of apparent contradictions in the law, or determining the logical basis for a given rule in the Mishnah. In course of time, Pilpul degenerated into mere hair-splitting and received a bad reputation. Actually, however, this was not the Talmudic Pilpul, but the medieval Hilluk, which became a favorite among the Jews of Central and Eastern Europe from the 15th cent. on. The schools of Nuremberg and Regensburg and the rabbis of Poland were especially noted for their skill in such dialectics. In course of time this led to a condemnation of Pilpul, as by Isaiah Horovitz (17th cent.) for its barrenness and disregard for the spiritual. It nevertheless was much prized as an intellectual exercise down to the 19th cent.

Lit.: Lauterbach, J. Z., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 39-43.

PIMIENTA, FRAY JOSEPH (ABRAHAM), renegade priest and Jewish convert, b. 1684 or 1688; d. Seville, Spain, 1720. He lived on the island of Cuba and in various parts of the Dutch West Indies at the end of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th centuries. He was subjected to public degradation and on the charge, among others, of practicing Judaism, sentenced at an auto-da-fé of the Spanish Inquisition held in Seville on July 25, 1720. The punishment meted out to him was death by strangulation, followed by the burning of his dead body.

The tragic end of Pimienta was the violent climax to a violent career of unbridled license and criminality. In the account of his life, as presented in the municipal archives of the Inquisition, Pimienta perpetrated innumerable crimes of many kinds and degrees, against laws of both church and state. His conversion to Judaism, which took place in 1714, appears to have been simply another of his many projects for extorting money, and afterwards he alternated between Judaism and Christianity, as expediency dictated. He was constantly involved in some scheme for playing Jew against Christian, and vice versa. After a series of imprisonments and escapes, he was caught. He steadfastly held to his Judaism until the very day before execution, when he suddenly accepted the Catholic faith once more. At the end he seems to have been genuinely penitent and courageous.

Five others were sentenced that day by the Inquisition, all to life imprisonment. Among these were Melchor de Molina, a linen merchant of Seville, and Manuel Rodrigez, a native of Malaga, both of whom were accused of "Judaizing."

Lit.: Gottheil, Richard, in Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 9, pp. 19-28.

PINA, PABLO DE, see JESURUN, REUEL (under Jesurun family).

PINANSKI, ABRAHAM EDWARD, judge and communal worker, b. Boston, Mass., 1887. Directly after his admission to the Massachusetts bar in 1910, he was employed in the legal department of the Boston Elevated Railway company for two years. From 1912 on he continued in private practice until 1930, when he took his seat on the Superior Court bench of Massachusetts, a judgeship he still held in 1942. Pinanski became active in several bar associations, and was chosen director of the American Judicature Society and member of the council of the Harvard Law School Association.

Pinanski served in the Massachusetts militia from 1910 to 1912, and in the first World War he was with the army ordnance department, advancing from lieutenant to the rank of captain.

He rose to prominence in Boston's educational, philanthropic, and civic affairs. From 1926 to 1931 he was a member of the Sinking Fund Commission; he served in the division on Americanization of the State Department of Education (1919-31); was chairman of the examining committee of the Boston Public Library (1939-41); director of Community Federation of Boston, and a trustee of Boston University. Equally active in the Jewish community, he was elected president of the Jewish Child Welfare Association and of the Hebrew Free Loan Society of Boston, and was chosen to hold directive posts in the Associated Jewish Philanthropies and the Beth Israel Hospital. Pinanski's father, Nathan, was a pioneer in the Jewish communal affairs of Boston.

PINANSKY, MAX LOUIS, lawyer and communal worker, b. Boston, Mass., 1887. He set up in practice in Portland, Maine, in 1913. In 1927 he was appointed judge of the Portland municipal court; and served for four years. He was president of the Municipal Court Judges' Association in 1930. From 1934 to 1936 he was state senator.

Pinansky rose to prominence in a number of educational and philanthropic movements: he was founder of the Maine Juvenile Aid Society (1928), and a founder of the Inter-Racial Fellowship of America, as well as its president in 1931; he was elected to the Portland School Board (1932) and served on the Regional National Labor Relations Board as representative of the public.

Interested in agricultural education, he was selected delegate from Maine and Portland at the Farm School Conference held in New York city in 1926; he was also elected national director for the Maine National Farm School.

Active in the Zionist movement, he was elected president of the Maine district of the Zionist Organization of America in 1926, and the following year, president of the New England district. In Portland he was founder and first president of Temple Israel.

PINCHAS OF KORETZ, see PHINEHAS OF KORETZ.

PINCHERLE, MAURIZIO, pediatrician, b. Pavia, Italy, 1879; d. Bologna, 1939. Attached to the pediatric clinic of Bologna (1910-24), he was later professor at the University of Siena (1924-27) and subsequently taught at Pavia and Bologna. Pincherle, a renowned authority on childhood diseases, was vice-president of the Reale Academia dei Fisiocritici in Siena and a member of the International Society of Pediatrists. He published numerous books, especially on the pathology of children. When, in conformity with Italy's anti-Jewish policies, he was ousted from his post as director of the Bologna children's clinic, he committed suicide.

Lit.: Annales della Reale Università di Bologna (1929-30).

PINCHERLE, SALVATORE, mathematician, b. Trieste, 1853; d. Bologna, 1936. In 1881 he became professor of algebra, analytical and higher geometry at the University of Bologna; in 1888 he was named assistant professor at the same university and was retired in 1928. He was awarded the Prix Royal in mathematics in 1889. In 1928 he organized and presided over the international congress of mathematicians at Bologna.

Pincherle's published works include Lezioni di algebra complementare and Lezioni di calcolo infinitesimale. From 1922 on he was associate editor of the Bolletino dell' Unione matematica Italiana and of the Annali di Matematica. He was a member of the Società Italiana delle Scienze, and of the Royal Edinburgh Society.

Lit.: Acta Mathematica, vol. 46 (1925).

PINCUS, GREGORY, biologist, b. Woodbine, N. J., 1903. His father was editor of the Jewish Farmer; his mother, the former Elizabeth Lipman, stemmed from the Lipman family who were among the first to settle in the Woodbine, N. J., colony. At Harvard University, where Pincus took his master's and doctor's degree in science, he was assistant in zoölogy (1926) and from 1927 to 1929, fellow of the National Research Council. The following year he went abroad, first to Cambridge University, and then to the Kaiser Wilhelm Institut. Returning to Harvard, he was appointed assistant professor of general physiology in 1931; in 1938 he was visiting professor of experimental zoölogy at Clark University, a post he still held in 1942.

Pincus's important and original work in parthenogenesis of mammals began to be widely publicized in 1934, when he reported that female host rabbits had produced litters which had developed out of the implanted ova of other females, previously fertilized by sperm in a test tube. Two years later he announced at a meeting of the Federation of American Societies for Experimental Biology in Washington, D. C., the successful fertilization of rabbit ova by the action of salt water and of heat, following the lead of work done by Jacques Loeb (1859-1924). Still later Pincus reported success in keeping alive embryo rabbits in test tubes for a longer period than had ever been done before.

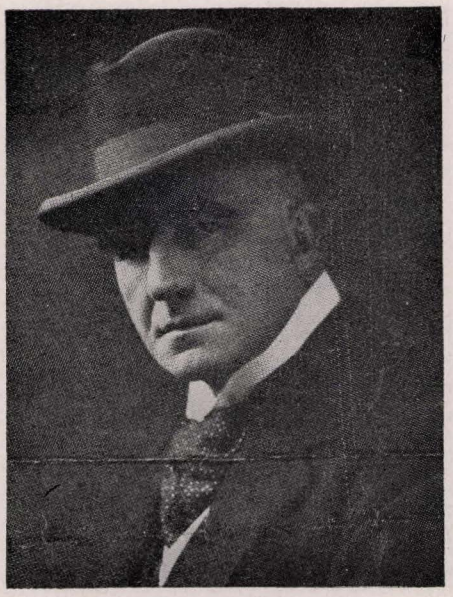
A member of various scientific societies, Pincus was elected a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1938. In addition to his numerous scientific papers, published in the journals, he wrote a book entitled The Eggs of Mammals (1936).

PINE, MAX, labor leader and communal worker, b. Russia, 1866; d. Maywood, N. J. 1928. He was a leader of organized Jewish labor in the United States, and served as secretary of the United Hebrew Trades. As such, he was largely instrumental in the establishment of the People's Relief Committee to represent American Jewish labor in the work carried on by the Joint Distribution Committee for relief of European Jews after the first World War. In 1920 Pine went abroad with Judge Harry Fisher of Chicago to investigate conditions of Jews in the Ukraine, and confer with Moscow authorities about ameliorating those conditions; it was this trip which laid the base for the relief activities of the Joint Distribution Committee among Jews in the Soviet Union. On his return, Pine played an important role in propaganda for relief work, and much credit was due him for the collection of large funds.

PINELES, HERSCH MENDEL, Talmudic and rabbinic scholar, b. Tysmienica, Galicia, 1805; d. Galatz, Roumania, 1870. In his early years he was a fervent Hasid. He married in Brody at the age of fifteen, and then began secretly to learn German and to read non-religious books; discovered, he was compelled to defend himself before the members of his family. His biographers tell that he succeeded in convincing his father-in-law of his innocence, but he continued to study German philosophical and scientific works.

In 1853 Pineles went to Odessa, Russia, and after the Crimean War settled in Galatz. He wrote, for Hebrew newspapers and magazines, many articles on questions concerning the calendar and astronomy. But the book which brought him fame and led to considerable discussion and controversy was Darkah shel Torah (The Way of the Law; Vienna, 1861), in which he vigorously defended the Mishnah. Baron Jacob Waldberg, another noted Roumanian Talmudist, who was at the same time a wealthy banker, replied to and attacked Pineles' theories in Kach Bedareche shel Torah (Jassy, 1864). The discussion which followed in the Hebrew periodicals of that period between the two authors and other writers on Talmudic subjects who espoused the one or the other side lasted for a long time. On this occasion Pineles had a long correspondence with Hayim Selig Slonimsky, then superintendent of the rabbinical seminary in Zhitomir; all the letters which they exchanged were published in the ninth volume of Kerem Hemed and in Hamaggid as testimony of Pineles' great Talmudic learning and keen analytical thought.

PINELES, SAMUEL, pioneer in the Roumanian Chovevei Zion and Zionist movements, b. Brody, Galicia, 1843; d. Galatz, Roumania, 1928. He was the son of Hersch Mendel Pineles. Together with Karpel Lippe, he founded the Yishub Eretz Yisrael association in Jassy for the purchase of land and the creation of colonies in Palestine. However, since he could not raise sufficient funds for this purpose, he sold the land already acquired to Baron Edmond de Rothschild, of Paris, in 1882, and thus laid the foundation for Zichron Jacob, which was the first Jewish and Roumanian Jewish agricultural colony in the Holy Land. Pineles had had a large part also in the founding of the colony Rosh Pinah. After the Yishub Eretz Yisrael association was dissolved and the Chovevei Zion movement founded (1884-90), Pineles became first its secretary and then for several years its president. In this capacity he purchased land in Palestine, but since the Turkish Sultan did not permit Roumanian Jews to settle there as colonists, Pineles, in 1909, donated all this land, then of the value of 30,000 gold francs, to the Jewish National Fund, since he and all his associates in the Chovevei Zion embraced the Zionist movement shortly after its founding by Theodor Herzl. For many years Pineles was assisted in his work by the ardent and energetic Chovevei Zionist Eliezer Rokeah, who came from Palestine to aid this cause. The two founded several periodicals, the most important being the Yiddish Der Emigrant, published at Jassy and Galatz from 1880 to 1884. Pineles left a huge correspondence with all the Chovevei Zion and Zionist leaders, including Herzl.



Arthur Wing Pinero

PINERO, SIR ARTHUR WING, dramatist, b. London, 1855; d. London, 1934. He was the descendant of a Portuguese Jewish family whose name had originally been Pinheiro. Submitting at first to the wish of his father, John Daniel Pinero, that he follow the paternal tradition and enter the law, Pinero became a clerk in a law office. But at the age of nineteen he joined a theatrical troupe in Edinburgh, beginning as general utility man. Later he played in Henry Irving's company in London, and remained an actor until 1881.

The writing of plays had already occupied Pinero, even while he was acting, and it was partly at the suggestion of Irving that he devoted himself to it. The Money Spinner (1880) was the first of Pinero's plays to be produced as a regular theatrical offering, and The Squire (1881) presented a forecast of the serious problems with which he was frequently to concern himself. For several years farce interested him, and seven plays were produced in 1883 and 1884. Pinero's pioneering accomplishments, however, were to come as the result of the Ibsen influence. In The Profligate (1889) and more particularly in The Second

Mrs. Tanqueray (1893), played by Mrs. Patrick Campbell, he introduced to the English theatre the freedom of social discussion. Long after Pinero had subsided into an exceedingly adept and skillful writer of entertaining comedies, the benefits of his break into once-untouchable realms of subject matter were felt by younger playwrights who, characteristically enough, were disposed to forget their indebtedness.

Among Pinero's many later plays were Trelawney of the Wells (1898); The Gay Lord Quex (1899); Iris (1901); Letty (1903); The Thunderbolt (1908); Mid-Channel (1909); Playgoers (1913); The Freaks (1918); The Enchanted Cottage (1922); A Private Room (1928) and A Cold June (1932). In some of his early plays, notably The Cabinet Minister (1890) and in Letty (1903), Pinero introduced Jewish characters, not always rejecting popular, negative interpretations. Pinero was knighted in 1909.

LIBBY BENEDICT.

Lit.: Boas, Frederic Samuel, "Sir Arthur Pinero," in From Richardson to Pinero (1937) 250-80; Cunliffe, John William, Modern English Playwrights (1941) 21-53; Gassner, John Waldhorn, Masters of the Drama (1940) 575-628; Dunkel, Wilbur Dwight, Sir Arthur Pinero (1941); Fyfe, Henry Hamilton, Sir Arthur Pinero's Plays and Players (1930); Landa, M. J., The Jew in Drama (1926).

PINES, JEHIEL MICHAEL, Hebrew writer, b. Rozhani, government of Grodno, Russia (now Poland), 1842; d. Jerusalem, Palestine, 1912. He received a traditional and secular education, which included the study of German and Russian. As a boy of twelve he was noted for his knowledge of Talmud and German. Several years later he published a series of articles on religious reforms in Halebanon. In 1862 he published a work consisting of his collected articles and entitled Yalede Ruhi (Children of My Mind; part 1, Rib Ammi, The Strife of My People, Mayence, 1872; part 2, Hahayim Vehayahaduth, Life and Judaism, Mayence, 1873); in this work he criticized the theory of assimilation and Reform. The work caused a short-lived sensation, but had no practical effects.

Pines was one of the first to deliver addresses favoring the settlement of Jews in Palestine. In 1878 the Mazkereth Mosheh association of London appointed him its representative for the purpose of establishing and organizing charitable institutions in Palestine. From this time on he lived in Palestine, and interested himself deeply in colonization, being instrumental in the purchase of the land on which the colony Gedera is now situated. After Ben Jehudah's arrival in Palestine, Pines and he collaborated in both Palestine resettlement work and in the revival of the Hebrew language; Pines contributed articles to the periodical Hatzebi which Ben Jehudah edited. Later he became a contributor to the Habatzeleth, an Orthodox Jewish weekly, in the pages of which, for a time, he carried on a controversy with Ahad Haam, maintaining that the religious and not the national element was the most important factor in the preservation of the Jewish nation. However, because Pines was unwilling to become a tool in the hands of the leaders of the Orthodox society, especially with reference to the dole (Halukkah) and its collection, the Orthodox rabbis of Jerusalem excommunicated him.

In his last years Pines served as instructor in Talmud at the Hebrew Teachers' Seminary of Jerusalem. He edited and published Shershewsky's two text-books, Massecheth Nittuah (on anatomy) and Baraitha Demerkabah (on chemistry; Jerusalem, 1886). Other works of Pines are: Hakoah (on physics), a translation of a work by Balfour Stewart (Jerusalem, 1894); Torath Mishpete Togarmah (Turkish Law; 1887), a translation prepared in collaboration with his son-in-law David Yellin; and Kithebe Mishpahath Iberiyyim (Jerusalem, 1930), a translation, written in collaboration with R. Benjamin, of a work by Wilhelm Herzberg; Binyan Haaretz, a collection of autobiographical fragments and letters, edit. David Yellin and Joseph Meyuhas (2 vols., Tel-Aviv, 1937-38).

Lit.: Michaeli, M., Rabbi Jehiel Michael Pines (1928); Harkavi, Zvi, in Yabneh, vol. 1 (1939) 196-212; Yellin, Itta, Letzeetzaai (memoirs; 1938).

PINHAS, JUDAH, miniature painter, b. Lehrberg, Germany, 1727; d. Ansbach, Germany, 1793. At the age of thirteen he decorated a Megillah with arabesques. Its beauty aroused so much admiration that the margrave wished to see an example of his art. Thus Pinhas illustrated a Passover Haggadah, whereupon the margrave obligated himself to pay for his study in portrait painting and then made him court painter. Later on he became court painter at Bayreuth. In Berlin he painted King Frederick II, the prince and the prince of Orange. His biography was published by his son Salomon in 1818.

Lit.: Haenle, Geschichte der Juden im ehemaligen Fürstentum Ansbach (1867); Wolf, A., in Mitteilungen der Gesellschaft für jüdische Volkskunde, vol. 9 (1902) 65.

PINHAS, SALOMON (LEO), painter and etcher, b. Bayreuth, Germany, 1759; d. Cassel, Germany, 1837. He was the son of Judah Pinhas. He learned the art from his father at an early age, and became a prominent miniature painter, executing portraits of members of the military circles, the court, and Jewish personalities. Settling in Cassel in 1782, he was awarded the title of court painter to Elector William of Hesse-Cassel in 1788, and was exempted from some of the Jewish disabilities. His works include seven portraits of the members of the Jewish consistory of the Kingdom of Westphalia (1810), and a large, richly decorated prayer-book written in German and Hebrew (1792) for Count William IX, of Cassel. In 1818 Pinhas published a biography of his father.

Lit.: Thieme, U., and Becker, F., Allgemeines Lexikon der bildenden Künstler, vol. 27, p. 59; Der Cicerone, vol. 8, p. 128 et seq.

PINKAS, originally the term signifying a tablet used for writing, then a book in which tradesmen kept their accounts, and finally the register of a Jewish community in which were recorded the community protocols, the names of the taxpayers, important decrees and statutes and important events in the history of the community. The word has a Greek origin. In German communities the Pinkas was known also as the Gemeindebuch. During the Middle Ages the term was sometimes applied to the memorial book of the community (Memorbuch). Jewish artisans, burial societies, and charitable organizations often had a Pinkas of their own.

Such books of record were valuable sources for the history of certain cities and localities. One of the most important and best known is the Pinkas of the Jews of the duchy of Cleve, from the years 1690 to 1807. The Gesamtarchiv der Deutschen Juden in Berlin preserved numerous Pinkasim of the 18th cent., including the Pinkas of the Berlin community.

Regional councils also kept records in a Pinkas which was called Pinkas Medinah, or regional Pinkas. The fragments of the Pinkas of the council of Four Lands (Vaad Arba Aratzoth) and the Pinkas, extant in three versions, of the Jewish diet for Lithuania (1623-1761) are important sources for the history of the Jews in Poland and Lithuania.

Lit.: Baer, F., "Das Protokollbuch der Landjudenschaft des Herzogtums Kleve," Veröffentlichungen der Akademie für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, Historic Section 1, 1922; Kaufmann Gedenkbuch, pp. 293, 307; Dubnow, S., "Akten des Vierländerwaad aus den Jahren 1621-1699," Yevreiskaya Starina (1912); Pinkas Hamedinah, Dubnow edit. (1925); Winter, Samuel, in Yivo-Bleter, vol. 13 (1938) 77-94.

PINKUS, FELIX, physician, b. Berlin, 1868. He received the M.D. degree from the University of Freiburg, Germany (1895). Pinkus was assistant professor of the University of Berlin, medical director of the Hospital for Women, Berlin (1908-33), and a member of the German Health Council (Reichsgesundheitsamt; 1926-34). He did valuable work in the field of normal and pathological anatomy of the skin as well as in the field of syphilology. He came to the United States in 1941.

Pinkus' writings include: "Die lymphatische Leukämie" (in Nothnagels Handbuch der speziellen Pathologie und Therapie, vol. 8, part 1, 1901); "Die Circulationsstörungen der Haut" (in Mraceks Handbuch der Hautkrankheiten, vol. 1, 1902); Haut- und Geschlechtskrankheiten (1910); Die Einwirkung von Krankheiten auf das Kopfhaar (1917; 2nd ed., 1933); Die Behandlung der Syphilis mit Salvarsan (1923); "Anatomie der Haut" (in Jadassohn and Sprinz, Handbuch der Hautkrankheiten, vol. 1, part 1, 1927).

PINNER, ADOLF, chemist, b. Wronke, Posen, 1842; d. Berlin, 1909. In 1867 he graduated from the University of Berlin, became lecturer in chemistry there in 1871, and was appointed assistant professor at the Veterinary Academy in Berlin in 1878. In 1884 he became a member of the Technical Commission, in 1885 a member of the Patent Office. Pinner discovered amidine and imidoether. His writings include well-known outlines of inorganic and organic chemistry and the monograph Die Imidoäther und ihre Derivate. He was one of the founders of the Centralverein deutscher Staatsbürger jüdischen Glaubens.

PINNER, ALBERT, commercial jurist and legal expert, b. Berlin, 1857; d. 1933. He won recognition through his work in organizing the Berlin and German bar associations. His books include: Das deutsche Aktienrecht (Berlin, 1899); Kommentar zum Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb (Berlin, 1910); Beiträge zum Aktienrecht (Berlin, 1918); and Gesetz gegen den unlauteren Wettbewerb (Berlin and Leipzig, 1921). In 1931 Pinner edited Aktiennovelle und Bankenaufsicht (Berlin and Leipzig). On his seventieth birthday the University of Berlin granted him the degree of LL.D. honoris causa, and the Berlin Bar Association founded the "Albert Pinner Prize" for scholastic achievement in his field.

PINNER, EPHRAIM MOSES, Talmudist, b. Pinne, Posen, 1803; d. Berlin, 1880. After studying with L. Kalischer, Jacob Lissa and Akiba Eger, he lived in Berlin, and later traveled extensively through Eastern Europe, apparently to enlist aid for publishing his work. By letter and by appeal he tried to arouse the Jews to work for the improvement of their political and religious status. Conservative in his religious outlook, Pinner denounced the Reform Movement in several of his studies. Pinner's most important accomplishment was a compendium of the Jerusalem and Babylonian Talmuds, Kitzur Talmud Yerushalmi Vetalmud Babli (1842), containing brief translations of both Talmuds as well as a literary silhouette of the Tanna Simeon ben Yohai. This was published as a prospectus of his projected twenty-eight volume translation into German of the Talmud, of which only a translation of and a commentary on the tractate Berachoth appeared—the first of its kind ever written by a Jew. Among the subscribers to the volume were Czar Nicholas I, to whom it was dedicated, the rulers of Prussia, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, and other potentates. Together with Simhah Pinsker, Pinner published a prospectus of the Odessa Society for Ancient Hebrew and Rabbinical Manuscripts which presented the archeological discoveries—later discredited—of Abraham Firkovitch.

Pinner's translation of the tractate Sanhedrin remained in manuscript, when the approval of Rabbi Moses Sofer of Pressburg was withdrawn. His most significant service to scholarship was his publication of facsimiles which aided the establishment of theories of Nikkud (Hebrew punctuation). An incomplete catalogue of Hebrew books and manuscripts were also ascribed to him. After his death, Pinner's manuscripts fell into private hands. His library of 3,000 volumes was purchased by the Königliche Bibliothek in Berlin.

Lit.: Lewin, Aus der Vergangenheit der jüdischen Gemeinde in Pinne (1903); Bischoff, Geschichte der Talmudübersetzungen (1899); Schreiber, Solomon, Igroth Soferim, part 2, pp. 70-71, 73-77.

PINNER, FELIX, economist and writer, b. Birnbaum, Posen, Germany, 1880; d. New York city, 1942. He received the LL.D. degree from the University of Berlin, and in 1924 became chief editor of the commercial section of the Berliner Tageblatt, a position which he held until 1933, when he was ousted by the Nazis. His weekly essays on current economics were considered authoritative and influential.

Pinner's published writings include: Emil Rathenau und das elektrische Zeitalter (1917); Das neue Palästina (1925); the novel Tannerhütte, der Roman einer Sozialisierung (1929). His volume Deutsche Wirtschaftsführer (1925) was the authoritative work on German industrialists.

PINNER, MAX, physician, b. Berlin, 1891. He studied at various Swiss and German universities, taking his medical degree in 1920. The following year Pinner came to the United States. For three years he was connected with a tuberculosis sanitorium in San Francisco, then he was with the laboratory of the Municipal Sanatorium in Chicago (1924 to 1926), serving at the same time as instructor in the department of pathology at the University of Illinois. After occupying several directive posts in Detroit (1926-30), Tucson, Arizona (1930-35), and with the New York State Hospitals (1935-38) Pinner was in 1938 made chief of the division of pulmonary diseases of the Montefiore Hospital in New York. The following year he was also appointed clinical professor of medicine at Columbia University; in 1942 he still held both these posts.

Pinner was the author of Die Seriodiagnose der Tuberkulose (1927) and was a contributor to Alexander's Surgery of Pulmonary Tuberculosis (1936) and to the Handbook of Medical Physics (1942), as well as to medical journals.

PINNER, MORITZ, anti-slavery editor, b. Prussia, 1828; d. New Jersey, 1906. He was an abolitionist worker in Missouri as early as 1856. After serving as a member of the committee of thirty-nine which distributed gratuitously 10,000 copies of the propaganda book, The Impending Crisis, in the South, he became (1859) editor of the abolitionist paper, The Kansas Post, in Kansas City. In 1860, Pinner was a delegate to the State Convention in Missouri and also a delegate from Missouri to the National Republican Convention which nominated Lincoln for president. In 1861 President Lincoln offered him the mission to Honduras but Pinner refused in order to enter the regular army. General Kearney appointed Pinner brigadier quartermaster of his personal staff. Pinner also served as captain of the United States Volunteers. He resigned from the regular army the following year and until his death was engaged in real-estate enterprises in New Jersey and New York.

Leo Pinsker

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 17 (1909) pp. 139-41.

PINSK, city in Poland, with 24,000 Jews out of a total population of 32,000 (1931). The earliest report of the presence of Jews in Pinsk is dated 1506. In that year Jews from Brest were permitted by Prince Feodor Jaroslavicz to found a synagogue and a cemetery, and from 1581 on they continually received all kinds of privileges. They were chiefly engaged in the grain trade, especially with Danzig and Königsberg. Pinsk was one of the three chief communities of the Lithuanian Council (Vaad). Later the community was greatly affected by the Chmielnicki uprising (1648-58), and at the end of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th cent. suffered much at the hands of the Swedes. They had assumed heavy liabilities which, at the time of the partition of Poland, amounted to 30,900 guilders out of an annual income of 73,000 guilders.

Pinsk was one of the most important battlefields between the Hasidim and their opponents. The former recruited their adherents mainly from the suburb of Karlin. During the first World War the community was subjected to many afflictions; in 1915 the city was conquered by the Germans, in 1919 the Poles entered the city, which belonged to Poland from 1920 on. The great conflagration of 1921 caused the destruction of the larger part of Pinsk.

Pinsk had the highest percentage of Jews of all cities in Poland (75 per cent). Most industries were in the hands of Jews, especially the tanneries, liquor manufactories, breweries, corn mills and saw mills. The Pinsk Jews played an important part also in the lumber and fish trade.

Pinsk was occupied by the Nazis soon after the outbreak of the Russian-German war in June, 1941. It was reported that Nazi troops murdered about 8,000 Jews at Pinsk by machine-gun fire shortly after their occupation, chiefly between the ages of sixteen and sixty, and including women.

Lit.: Berdshadski, Litowskiye Yevrei (1883); Yevreiskaya Entziklopedia, vol. 12; Encyklopedia Powszechna Ultima Thule, vol. 8 (1937); Hoffman, Ben Zion, A Toisend Yohr Pinsk (1941).

PINSKER, LEO (JUDAH LÖB), physician, and forerunner of political Zionism, b. Tomashov, Poland, 1821; d. Odessa, Russia, 1891. He was the son of the great Hebrew scholar and archeologist, Simhah Pinsker. After receiving his M.D. degree from the University of Moscow, he was appointed to the staff of the city hospital in Odessa and became one of the leading physicians of that city. When, as a result of the Crimean War (1853-56), Odessa was crowded with soldiers suffering from typhus, Pinsker devoted himself to their cure and was awarded a remuneration by Czar Nicholas II.

He was a contributor to the first Russian Jewish weekly, Rassviet (1860), and when E. Soloweitschik launched (1861) the periodical Zion to replace it, Pinsker joined its editorial staff, advocating in his articles the granting of equal rights to the Jews in Russia and their Russification. He became a member of the Society for the Spread of Culture among the Russian Jews (founded in 1863), and in 1867 one of the leaders of its Odessa branch. In accordance with his creed, "Enlightenment of the Jews through the Russian language and in the spirit of Russia," he advocated at the meetings of the Society the translation of the Hebrew Bible and the prayer-books into Russian, and turned against the resolution of the St. Petersburg headquarters which demanded that rabbinical students be sent to the Berlin Rabbinical Seminary. Pinsker held that these students would do better by remaining in Russia, and attend Russian universities, in order to become Russian rather than German rabbis.

But when, during the Easteer days of 1871, violent pogroms raged against the Jews in Odessa without arousing any protests from the Russian intelligentsia, while Russian newspapers even defended the pogromists, Pinsker began to waver in his assimilationist theories. In 1878 he joined anew the reorganized Society, but the pogroms of 1881 finally convinced him that assimilationism would never solve the Jewish problem. Leaving the Society, he declared at one of the last meetings he attended that its work had been fruitless and that "new remedies, new ways" would have to be found. He recognized that emancipation, with its emphasis on the attainment of political and civil rights, might not offer a solution of the Jewish problem. As long as the Jews have no territory of their own, he felt anti-Semitism might persist. Pinsker left Russia in order to discuss his ideas with Jewish leaders in Central and Western Europe. But his plan met with disapproval everywhere. Adolf Jellinek, chief rabbi of Vienna and a close friend of his father, declared that Pinsker, who expounded his theories to him in March, 1882, was "feverish" and that he needed medicine.

Unperturbed by these experiences Pinsker, upon returning to Russia, published anonymously a pamphlet in German, Auto-Emanzipation. Ein Mahnruf an seine Stammesgenossen. Von einem russischen Juden. As a motto it had Hillel's words: "If I do not help myself, who will help me? And if not now, when?" At the end of the pamphlet he summed up his concept as follows:

"The Jews are not a living nation; they are everywhere aliens; therefore they are despised. The civil and political emancipation of the Jews is not sufficient to raise them in the estimation of the people. The proper, the only solution, is the creation of a Jewish nationality, of a people living upon its own soil, the auto-emancipation of the Jews, their return to the ranks of the nations by the acquisition of a Jewish homeland. We must not persuade ourselves that humanity and enlightenment alone can cure the malady of our people. That we may not be compelled to wander from one exile to another, we must have an extensive, productive land of refuge, a center which is our own."

The pamphlet, the identity of whose author was soon discovered, caused much indignation among the majority of his contemporaries. It was condemned on religious grounds by the organ of German Orthodoxy, Der Israelit, while the Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums, organ of the Reformers and assimilationists, held an alleged "Russian Nihilist" Weltanschauung of Pinsker responsible for the fact that he failed to believe in the ultimate victory of humanity over prejudice and hatred. On the other hand, Judah Loeb Gordon, Hebrew poet, and Emma Lazarus, the American Jewish poetess, congratulated him (Epistle to the Hebrews), and a message of felicitation was sent him by the Viennese students' organization Kadimah.

In his own country he was soon chosen leader of the Chovevei Zion movement. Pinsker summoned a conference of Chovevei Zion organizations to Katowice, Silesia (1884), the so-called "Kattowitzer Konferenz," and, following his suggestion, the Society for the Support of Jewish Agriculturists and Handicraftsmen in Syria and Palestine was founded (the "Odessa Committee," as it was called later on). This society was sanctioned by the Russian government, but lack of money compelled Pinsker to abandon the plan of large-scale settlement in Palestine and to limit the activities of the Committee to the support of individual colonists.

After the conference of the Chovevei Zion at Drusgeniki (1887), at which Rabbi Samuel Mohilever found fault with the religious attitude of the Chovevei Zion leaders, Pinsker resigned as president of the Odessa Committee. In 1889 he did not participate in the Chovevei Zion conference held at Vilna, but was defended there against Mohilever's attacks by the writer Moses Löb Lilienblum, at whose suggestion he was made honorary member of the Chovevei Zion. Shortly before his death (1891) Pinsker transferred to Ahad Haam his last will, in which he stated that there ought to be established in Palestine, above all, a "spiritual center" for the Jews.

Herzl did not know of Pinsker when, in 1896, he published Der Judenstaat. In 1901, on the tenth anniversary of Pinsker's death, Ahad Haam, in an essay, "Pinsker and Political Zionism," saved the Russian's work from oblivion, although with the purpose of claiming the dead Pinsker for "spiritual" Zionism in opposition to the "political" Zionism of Herzl. Yet Pinsker, despite his above-mentioned testament, belonged to Herzl's camp rather than to Ahad Haam's.

His historical importance lies in the fact that he observed the Jewish situation with the eyes of a pathologist, free of illusions. Two diseases he held responsible for the misery of the Jews: the loss of self-respect in the case of the Jews, caused, to a certain extent, by the disease which befell the non-Jewish world, Judeophobia, which he regarded a "psychic aberration." Both will disappear, he averred, as soon as the Jews again become a healthy free nation like all other nations (although he did not necessarily consider Palestine the proper land of Jewish mass settlement). Prophetically he warned his fellow Jews of more pogroms, more persecutions to come, if they refused to face the facts and to take fate into their own hands.

Pinsker's Auto-Emanzipation was translated into English by A. A. Finkenstein (London, 1891) and by David S. Blondheim (1st ed., New York, 1906; 2nd ed., New York, 1916). The latter's translation was revised by Arthur Super

David Pinski

(New York, 1935). It was translated into Hebrew in 1934 (with biography of Pinsker by Joseph Klausner).

ALFRED WERNER.

Lit.: Sefer Pinsker, Joseph Klausner edit. (1921); Gelber, N. M., Aus zwei Jahrhunderten (1924); Goodman, Paul, foreword to Auto-Emancipation (1932); Werner, Alfred, "The Call to Self-Emancipation," Congress Weekly, Dec. 19, 1941.

PINSKER, SIMHAH, orientalist, b. Tarnopol, Poland, 1801; d. Odessa, Russia, 1864. Pinsker deciphered the manuscripts presented to the Odessa Society for Ancient Hebrew and Rabbinical Manuscripts by the Karaite, Abraham Firkovitch. He compiled a prospectus, jointly with Ephraim Moses Pinner, and published detailed reports in Fürst's Orient concerning those Karaite discoveries. The Russian government awarded him two gold medals and conferred honorary citizenship on him. The Odessa Jewish community granted him an annual pension of 300 rubles. Pinsker, until then the director of a private school, moved to Vienna (1840) to devote himself entirely to Jewish research. Likkute Kadmoniyoth (1860), the result of twenty years of labor, was a substantial contribution to the history of the Karaite religion and literature, so comprehensive that Isaac Marcus Jost and Heinrich Graetz acknowledged its influence on their own work.

Eventual discovery that the Firkovitch manuscripts were partly forgeries somewhat undermined Pinsker's conclusions. In 1863 Pinsker published his second book, Mabo Lenikkud Haashuri, a study of Babylonian-Hebraic punctuation. He wrote other works on grammar. Pinsker was the father of Leo Pinsker.

Lit.: Morais, H. S., Eminent Israelites of the Nineteenth Century (1880); Waxman, Meyer, A History of Jewish Literature, vol. 3 (1936); Hatekufah, vol. 12.

PINSKI, DAVID, playwright and novelist, b. Mohilev on Dnieper, Russia, 1872. He began to write while still an adolescent, and in his early twenties, living in Warsaw, he became associated with the Yiddish literary pioneering of Isaac Loeb Peretz. Simultaneously with the rise of Yiddish as a literary force, which marked the popularization of the period of cultural enlightenment by translating it into the vernacular, the Jewish working-class movement arose, marking the popular application of economic enlightenment. Pinski entered the forefront of both movements and retained the double connection permanently.

In 1896, having already made a name for himself as the author of numerous sketches and as an editor, Pinski went to Berlin, where he attended the university. Three years later he came to the United States at the invitation of the Ovend Blatt, of which he subsequently was made literary editor. Another of his early American connections was with Die Arbeiter Zeitung. When he turned to the writing of plays, ideological conflicts, through which Pinski's identification with his period made him see life, were paramount. Die Familie Zevi (1903), written after the Kishinev pogrom, shows the perpetuity of Jewish ideals, though the different generations find them in different interpretations. Yenkel der Schmid (1906) brought the sex motif, in a characteristically realistic approach, into a study of Jewish life.

These plays, and the numerous plays that followed, were produced in Yiddish and other languages both in America and Europe. Later Pinski's naturalism gave way to a more poetic study of historical Jewish subjects, some of Messianic content. Among the latter plays were The Eternal Jew, Shlomo Molcho and Sabbatai Zevi.

Pinski's fiction also embraced the divergent approaches of naturalism in modern life and a poetic treatment of historical material. Like many of his plays, several of his novels were translated into English: The Generations of Noah Edon (1931); Arnold Levenberg (1928); Temptations, a volume of short stories (1919). The plays which were translated into English were compiled in four volumes: The Treasure (produced by the Theatre Guild, 1915; published, 1920); Three Plays (1918); Ten Plays (1919); King David and His Wives (1923). Pinski's other plays produced in Yiddish were: Die Mutter; Gabri un die Frauen; Der Shtumer Moshiach; Yedder mit sein Gott; Besser nit Geboren Vern; Liebes Krumme Vegen; Der Koach vos Boit; Shier a Tragedie, Der Oitzer (The Treasure) and Der Letzter Sach Hakal (produced in English as The Final Balance, 1926).

Starting his pragmatic mode of life in a period when the ivory tower existence for artists had not yet begun to be volubly derided, Pinski maintained his active mode of life without shouting about it. The revolt which motivated his characters, however, had personal attitudes as its source. Although his characters represented the rebellion against economic misuse, theory and mass action did not prompt them. They were provoked to expression by their private inability to endure further unfairness. Thus Pinski, particularly in his early writings, spanned the distance between the first rise of cultural enlightenment among the Jewish masses and their eventual social consciousness. To his devotion to the working class movement he later added the adoption of the Zionist cause. He was for a time editor of Der Kemfer, the Labor Zionist weekly; from 1933 on he was also president of the Jewish National Workers' Alliance. NATHAN RICARDO.

Lit.: Waxman, Meyer, A History of Jewish Literature, vol. 4 (1941) 1016-17; Roback, A. A., The Story of Yiddish Literature (1940) 197-200; Reisen, Z., Lexikon fun der Yiddisher Literatur, Presse un Filologie, vol. 2 (1930), cols. 885-98; Yiddisher Kemfer, April 10, 1942, p. 1; Niger, S., and Rivkin, B., in Tzukunft, April, 1942; Fuftzig Yohriger Jubiläum fun David Pinski 1872-1922 (April, 1922); Sechtzig Yohriger Yubiley fun David Pinsker (April, 1932); Farbandshtimme, Oct. 27, 1942.

PINSON, KOPPEL SHUB, historian and writer, b. Postavy, Lithuania, 1904. He was brought to the United States in 1907 and educated in Philadelphia. After graduating from Gratz College in 1923, Pinson received his A.B. degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1925, and his Ph.D. degree from Columbia University in 1934.

From 1929 to 1934 Pinson was editor on history for the Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences. He was an instructor in history at the College of the City of New York in 1935 to 1936, and was made assistant professor of history at Queens College in 1937, a post he held in 1942. From 1937 to 1940 he was also head of the department at the college. Pinson was a lecturer in history and politics at the New School for Social Research, a member of the faculty of the Academy of Adult Jewish Education and of the Menorah School of Adult Jewish Education, and a visiting lecturer at the Yiddish Scientific Institute (1942-43).

Pinson's published works include Pietism as a Factor in the Rise of German Nationalism (1934); A Bibliographical Introduction to Nationalism (1935), and, with Henri Lichtenberger, The Third Reich (1937). He was the editor of Essays on Antisemitism (1942). Among Pinson's editorial posts were the managing editorship of Social Research, the managing editorship (1939-40) and the co-editorship of Jewish Social Studies (1941-). He wrote for numerous scholarly periodicals, and was a contributor to the Italian Encyclopedia.

PINTHUS, KURT, critic and esthete, b. Erfurt, Germany, 1886. He was living at Washington, D. C., in 1942. He received the Ph.D. degree from the University of Leipzig in 1911. Pinthus was a member of a group of young authors and artists which included Franz Werfel, Walter von Hasenclever and Oskar Kokoschka; he was one of the founders and leaders of the expressionist movement. From 1910 to 1925 he was literary adviser to the Ernst Rowohlt and Kurt Wolff publishing houses; from 1920 to 1922 he was dramatic adviser to Max Reinhardt. From 1921 on he was a regular collaborator on the weekly Das Tagebuch and from 1923 on he was on the editorial staff of the Berlin daily 8-Uhr Abendblatt, to which he contributed a column on cultural politics. He introduced the discussion of literary subjects on the German radio.

During the first years of the Hitler era (1933-37) he lectured at the Jüdisches Lehrhaus, Berlin, and contributed to Jewish publications, such as the Jüdisches Gemeindeblatt of Berlin.

From 1937 on Pinthus lived in the United States. He was lecturer at the New School for Social Research (1938-40) and a member of the faculty of the Dramatic Workshop, there; a member of the Institute of Social Research at Columbia University (from 1940 on); on the staff of the Library of Congress and of the American University, Washington, D. C., from 1941 on.

He published Die Romane Levin Schückings (1911); Das Kinobuch (1913); Menschheitsdämmerung (an anthology of modern poetry, 1920, which had twenty editions). He contributed to such publications as The American Scholar and Books Abroad.

PINTO or DE PINTO, Sephardic family of scholars and financiers whose members played an important part in Jewish life in The Netherlands and in North and South America. In The Netherlands the Pinto family rendered financial aid to the Jewish communities, to the state, and to a number of Christian churches. In Connecticut, Isaac, Solomon, Jacob and Abraham Pinto, all brothers, were influential citizens and prominent in the Revolutionary annals of the state.

Lit.: Oppenheim, in Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 16 (1907) 103; ibid., index to vols. 1 to 20, pp. 439-41; Wiernik, P., History of the Jews in America (1931) 93-94; Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 5 (1927) 205.

PINTO, AARON ADOLPH DE, Dutch public official, and criminologist, b. The Hague, Holland, 1828; d. The Hague, 1907. He studied law in Leiden, and was appointed a substitute judge in 1861. In the following year he became a functionary of the department of justice; later he was made advisor to the department of the Dutch Supreme Court; from 1903 on he served as vice-president of the Supreme Court. From 1888 to 1902 Pinto was chief editor of the Weekblad van het Recht. He was chevalier in the Order of the Netherlands Lion, and an officer in the Royal Order of Italy.

Pinto's works include: Supplement by de tweede uitgaaf der "Questions transitores" van Jonas Daniel Meyer (1858); Het herziene wetboek van Strafvordering (Revised Law Code of Criminal Procedure; 1886-88); Het proces Dreyfus getoetst met wet en Recht (The Dreyfus Trial: A Struggle between Law and Justice; 1898-99).

Lit.: Winkler Prins, Geillustreerde Encyclopedie, vol. 13 (1921) 666.

PINTO, ABRAHAM DE, jurist, b. The Hague, The Netherlands, 1811; d. The Hague, 1878. He received the degree of Doctor of Laws from the University of Leyden in 1835, and in the same year became editor and director of the law weekly Weekblad van Het Regt. In 1840 he founded the judicial review Themis, which he edited for thirty-six years. In 1851 he became a member of the municipal council of The Hague, a position which he retained until his death. Pinto was president of the Sephardic community at The Hague, and in 1850 founded the Jewish Association in Holland (Maatschappij Tot Nut der Israelieten in Nederland).

He wrote several works on jurisprudence, including Een Woord over de Circulaire van den Minister van Justitie (The Hague, 1850) and Hendleiding Tot de Wet op de Regterlijke Organisatie en Het Beleid der Justitie (The Hague, 1844).

Lit.: De Pinto, A. A., Abraham De Pinto (1879).

PINTO, ISAAC, Hebrew scholar and translator, b. 1720; d. New York, 1791. He has sometimes been identified with the Isaac Pinto residing at Stratford, Conn., in 1748. Isaac Pinto published an English translation of the Hebrew Prayer Book, in 1766, the first work of its kind ever issued. It contained the prayers for the Sabbath, the Jewish New Year and the Day of Atonement, in conformity with the ritual of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews. The authorship of an anonymous English translation of the evening services for the New Year and Day of Movement printed by W. Weyman (New York, 1761), is also attributed to him. Ezra Stiles, president of Yale College, mentions Pinto in his diary as "a learned Jew of New York," as late as 1790. The two carried on a correspondence. Pinto was a linguist and an ardent patriot. He was one of the signers of the Non-Importation Act. He never married.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 3, pp. 118-21, No. 13, pp. 113-14; No. 22, pp. 50-51; No. 30, pp. 56-59; Colonial Records of Connecticut, vol. 9, p. 406; Pool, David de Sola, in Jewish Tribune, Sept. 5, 1924; "La magia del credito svelata da Pinto," Rivista di storia economica, vol. 4 (1939) 48-77; Abrahams, Israel, By-Paths in Hebraic Bookland (1920) 171-77.

PINTO, ISAAC DE, philanthropist, economist and author, b. Amsterdam, The Netherlands, 1715; d. The Hague, The Netherlands, 1787. He was possessed of great wealth and of a wide reputation for learning and unbounded generosity. William IV, Stadtholder of The Netherlands, held him in high esteem, and frequently consulted him on matters of government, finance and political economy.

After the death of William IV in 1751, Pinto resided for several years in Paris and in London. During his residence in the former city Voltaire cast his slurs upon the Jews. In 1762 Pinto composed an open letter to Voltaire, entitled Apologie pour la nation juive, réflexions critiques, in which he defended the Jews against Voltaire's accusations. He forwarded a copy to the great French philosopher and author who, although in his reply he promised to insert a notice about it in the new edition of his works, failed to do so. Pinto's Apologie pour la nation juive roused international comment because of his expressed discrimination between German and Portuguese Jews. When criticized for his indifference toward the German Jews, Pinto replied that he had not intended to hurt the feelings of his coreligionists whether of German or of Portuguese origin. On numerous occasions Pinto pleaded the cause of the Jews before influential and powerful officials, for example in 1767 before Richelieu and at Paris in 1768, when hostile anti-Jewish legislation was being proposed. He acquired a considerable reputation as an economist and financier.

Two of the works which he published were on the subject of social science. These were Essai sur le luxe (Amsterdam, 1762), a treatise on luxury, and Traité de la circulation et du crédit (Amsterdam, 1771; later translated into English and German), a description of stock exchange transactions. He wrote also a philosophical work on materialism, Précis des arguments contre les matérialistes (The Hague, 1774).

Shortly after the outbreak of the American Revolution (1776), Pinto, like other prominent men of the time, interested himself in the controversies of the war. In one of his numerous pamphlets relating to this conflict, which he published and which was later translated into English under the title of Letters on the American Troubles (London, 1776), he expressed his personal sentiments concerning the quarrel between Great Britain and her colonies in America.

Pinto's complete works were published both in French (8 vols., Amsterdam, 1771) and in German (8 vols., Leipzig, 1777).

Lit.: Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 5 (1927) 341-46; Hühner, in Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 13 (1905) 115-26; Wijler, Isaac de Pinto, sa vie et ses oeuvres (1923).

PINTO, JOSEPH JESURUN, rabbi, b. Amsterdam, Holland, 1729; d. after 1766. He was a descendant of the old Pinto family, which was of Portuguese origin. He was in London in 1758, when the Jewish congregation of that city recommended him to the trustees of the Congregation Shearith Israel, New York, who were in need of a spiritual head. Early in 1759 Joseph Jesurun Pinto came to New York to fill the vacant pastorate. Pinto proved himself to be learned in the Jewish law and a man of general culture and refinement. Shortly after his arrival, he prepared a chronological table that determined the exact time for commencing the Sabbath for the meridian of New York. On October 23, 1760, he delivered a special prayer as a general thanksgiving for the acquisition of Canada by Great Britain, a copy of which is preserved in the archives of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.

Pinto married Rebecca de la Torre, who came especially from London, in 1762, to become his wife. He resigned from the New York congregation on the plea that he had to go to Europe to recover a small estate belonging to him. He left for London in 1766, together with his wife and two children, the congregation having paid for his passage across. After this date, there appears to be no further mention of him or his activities.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 6 (1897) 128-29; No. 11 (1903) 152-54; No. 27 (1920) 13-17, 24-25; Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, p. 54.

PINTO, JOSIAH BEN JOSEPH, Cabalist, b. Damascus, about 1565; d. Damascus, 1648. He lived for a time in Aleppo and Safed, but spent the greater part of his adult life as rabbi in Damascus. Pinto was the author of several commentaries and glosses on the Bible, of a collection of Talmudic Haggadoth and of responsa.

PINTO, SOLOMON, American patriot and soldier of the Revolutionary War, b. probably New Haven, Conn.; d. after 1818. He was graduated from Yale College in the class of 1777. Pinto's father, Jacob Pinto, was an early settler at New Haven (about 1759), whose name figures repeatedly in the Connecticut records (1765-76). Pinto was appointed ensign and was a member of the 2nd Regiment in the Connecticut line under Captain Baldwin from 1777 to 1781, and was among the wounded in the British attack on New Haven, July 5 and 6, 1779. Pinto retired from the army in 1783. He is mentioned many years later when he appears as a pensioner under the act of 1818. He was one of the original members of the Connecticut branch of the Society of Cincinnati, composed of Revolutionary officers.

Two brothers of Solomon Pinto were also in the American Army during the Revolution. Abraham Pinto served as a member of Company X, Seventh Regiment of the State of Connecticut. He joined the army in 1775 and, like Solomon, was wounded in the defense of New Haven. Abraham Pinto was also one of the founders of the Society of Cincinnati. Another brother was William Pinto, a graduate of Yale (1777) and a volunteer in the army from 1779 to 1781.

Lit.: Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 11 (1903) 90, 93-95; No. 19 (1910) 11-12; Stiles, Ezra, Literary Diary, vol. 1, pp. 283-84; vol. 2, p. 365; vol. 3, p. 107; Masserman, Paul, and Baker, Max, The Jews Come to America (1932) 74; Lebeson, Anita L., Jewish Pioneers in America (1931) 188, 213-14.

PIRBRIGHT, LORD (original name Henry de Worms), English statesman, b. London, 1840; d. Guildford, Surrey, 1903. He was the youngest child of Baron Solomon de Worms (1801-82) of Austria, who came to England in 1815 with his two brothers and founded a banking and colonial business; his grandfather was Benedict de Worms of Frankfort, who married Jeanette, eldest daughter of Mayer Amschel Rothschild of Frankfort, and sister of Nathan Mayer Rothschild, the first of the Rothschild family to settle in England. Admitted to the bar in 1863, he interested himself in public affairs, and in 1880 was elected a Conservative member of the House of Commons, serving until 1895. From 1885-88 he served as parliamentary secretary to the Board of Trade; then he was appointed under-secretary for the colonies (1888-92) and member of the Privy Council, being the first Jew to hold this office.

As president of the international conference on sugar bounties at London in 1887 he labored for the abolition of the bounty system in the interest of the sugar-growing colonies. In 1895 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Pirbright, taking the title from the village of Pirbright, Surrey, where he had acquired an estate. Lord Pirbright served from 1872-86 as president of the Anglo-Jewish Association, and throughout his parliamentary career warmly espoused the cause of the Roumanian Jews. He wrote: England's Policy in the East (1876); The Austro-Hungarian Empire (1877); Memoirs of Count Beust (1887).

Lit.: Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 57-58; Jewish Year Book (1903).

PIRKE ABOTH, see ABOTH.

PIRKE DE RABBI ELIEZER ("chapters of Rabbi Eliezer"), a Haggadic Midrash to Genesis and small parts of Exodus and Numbers; it is sometimes known as the Baraitha of Rabbi Eliezer. It consists of fifty-four chapters, arranged in seven divisions, and is mainly concerned with the creation of the world, the early narratives of the Bible, Moses, the sin of Israel at Peor and the zeal of Phinehas the priest. Its present form may be only the fragment of a larger work, though the citations are always from the text that is extant. Most scholars agree with the view of Leopold Zunz that the work was composed no earlier than the 8th cent.; however, they realize that much older material has been incorporated by the author. The work is pseudepigraphical in that the writer conceals his identity and writes in the famous name of Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, who gives an introduction to the work in the third chapter. The author probably lived in the Orient, and probably in either Palestine, Syria or Asia Minor. The latest and most complete edition of Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer is that of G. Friedländer (from the A. Epstein codex, London, 1916).

Lit.: Zunz, L., Gottesdienstliche Vorträge, p. 283 et seq.; Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 8, p. 567; vol. 10, pp. 58-60.

PIRKE SHIRAH ("Poems," literally "chapters of song"), poems in which heaven and earth, paradise and the netherworld, the sun, moon and stars, the clouds, rain and the storms, the plant world and the animal kingdom are represented as praising their Creator and thanking Him for the benefits conferred upon them. These Pirke Shirah, which consist of characteristic Biblical verses, were adopted into the prayer-book, but have not been retained in all prayer-books, since many pious Jews opposed their introduction.

Lit.: Baer, Seligman, Seder Abodath Yisrael (1868).

PIROGOV, NICOLAI, non-Jewish educator in the czarist regime, b. 1810; d. 1881. Pirogov was a physician and professor at Dorpat. A study he wrote of educational problems brought his appointment as superintendent of the Odessa school district (1856). From 1858 to 1861 he was superintendent of the Kiev district. Pirogov fought for the civic rights of the Jewish teachers, and endeavored to place the control of Jewish schools in the hands of Jewish instead of Christian inspectors. He succeeded in appointing the first Jewish principal, U. S. Rosenzweig. Pirogov's treatise on the Talmud Torah school of Odessa is well-known.

He also obtained various scholarships and endowments for Jewish students, and sponsored a fund for needy Jewish students at the University of Kiev. Pirogov supported the efforts of Josef Rabinovich to issue the Russian Jewish periodical Rassviet, and those of Zederbaum for the Hamelitz. Throughout his life, even after retiring from professional work, Pirogov remained an outspoken advocate of civic equality and the sponsor of Jewish aspirations toward achieving it.

Lit.: Yevreiskaya Entziklopedia, vol. 12; Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, p. 60.

PISA, city in the province of Tuscany, Italy, with 280 Jews out of a total population of 73,000 (1940). Jews are mentioned in a city ordinance as early as the 12th cent. Benjamin of Tudela (about 1165) reports that there were in Pisa twenty Jewish families, who at that time were restricted to the ghetto, or "Chiasso de' Guidei." In 1322 they were forced to wear the Jew badge. There is evidence of Jewish money lenders, in the 14th cent., some of whom were ancestors of the prominent da Pisa family of the 15th cent. At the end of that cent. Jews were prohibited to engage in money exchange; however, in 1515 to 1527 and then again in 1546 to 1570 they resumed this trade. A short time after Archduke Cosimo I had expelled the Jews from Pisa in 1570, he changed the edict so that individual Jews could stay there. In 1591 Archduke Ferdinand I invited a great number of Levantine Jews to Pisa and granted them broad privileges in order to revive the trade with the Orient, and in a very short period succeeded in developing commerce and industry as well as the manufacture of cotton. A synagogue was founded in 1595, which in 1942 was still in existence.

Not until the unification of Pisa with the kingdom of Piedmont (1859), later the kingdom of Italy (1861), was the question of Jewish emancipation solved, although the Jews of Pisa had enjoyed a brief period of freedom during the French dominion and under Leopold II (1848-49). Many Jewish professors taught at the University of Pisa. Alessandro d'Ancona, a Jewish professor, was mayor of the city for several years.

The anti-Jewish legislation of the Fascist government from 1938 on was, of course, applied also to the Pisa Jewish community.

Lit.: Leonardo, "Gli Ebrei a Pisa sino alla fine del secolo XV," Studi storici vol. 7, p. 171; vol. 8, p. 59; Segrè, Ebrei, industria e commercio a Pisa nei secoli XVII e XVIII (1907); Cassuto, Umberto, La famiglia da Pisa (1910); idem, Gli Ebrei a Firenze; Caro, Georg, Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte der Juden im Mittelalter und der Neuzeit, vol. 1, p. 487.

PISA, DA, Italian family of bankers, scholars and art patrons of the 15th and 16th centuries. Its most important members were:

JEHIEL BEN MATTATHIAH DA PISA (d. 1422) was the founder of the Jewish Da Pisa family in Italy. He established a loan bank at Pisa in 1400, and later on in other cities as well. He took part in a conference of Jews in Bologna (1416).

JEHIEL DA PISA (d. 1490), grandson of Jehiel ben Mattatiah da Pisa, directed with great success, the banking institution of his family and removed its main office to Florence. He was a friend of Lorenzo dei Medici and Isaac Abravanel, and a patron of Jewish writers and scholars. On his death a number of Hebrew elegies were written in his memory.

DANIEL DA PISA (d. Florence, Italy, 1527), grandson of Jehiel da Pisa, was a banker in Florence, and owned various trading houses in Rome, where he lived for a long time. In 1524 he was actively engaged in the preparation of a new administrative reform for the Rome Jewish community. In the same year he introduced David Reubeni to Pope Clement VII.

JEHIEL NISSIM DA PISA (b. Pisa, Italy, 1507; d. Ferrara, Italy, 1574), grandson of Jehiel da Pisa, was at first a banker, then became a rabbi at Pisa. He was a member of the Yeshiva of Ferrara. He wrote Minhath Kenaoth, showing the superiority of religion over philosophy (manuscript of the Jewish community of Mantua, edited by Kaufmann at Berlin, 1898); Hayye Olam, treating of the rabbinic laws regarding usury; Kelale Hochmath Haemeth, a treatise on the Cabala.

Entrance to the cathedral at Pisa, with Old Testament scenes carved on the bronze doors

PISGAH, mountain in Moab, described by G. A. Smith as about two miles long, composed of flinty limestone with a level top, affording a commanding view of the whole of western Palestine. Pisgah, invariably bearing the definite article (hapisgah), is identified with Mount Nebo, the place of Moses' death (Deut. 34:1-2); it is famous also as one of the stops of the Israelites in their passage through Moab (Num. 21:20) and as the scene of one of Balak's sacrifices (Num. 23:14). The Dead Sea was "under the slopes of Pisgah" (Deut. 3:17; 4:49).

Lit.: Smith, G. A., The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, 562-66; Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, 199, 369-70, 391, 583.

PISK, PAUL AMADEUS, musicologist and composer, b. Vienna, 1893. His father was of Jewish birth, but Paul was reared in the Lutheran faith. He studied music in Vienna with such masters as Franz Schreker, Arnold Schönberg, and Guido Adler, and received a doctorate from the University.

After conducting in several small German theatres, he served in the Austrian army for four years during the first World War. In 1924 some of his early compositions won the City of Vienna award. But he distinguished himself particularly in musicology and music criticism, serving for many years as the music editor of the Wiener Arbeitszeitung and, with Paul Stefan, as editor of the distinguished music review Anbruch. He also contributed articles to the leading music lexicons and journals of Europe, becoming spokesman for the younger and more progressive Austrian and German composers.

From 1931 to 1933, Pisk taught at the Austrian-American Conservatory in Mondsee during the summer sessions. He also appeared as conductor and pianist in numerous radio broadcasts. In 1937 Pisk emigrated to the United States and was appointed professor of theory at the University of Redlands (California). As composer he has written works for orchestra, choruses, and chamber music groups, radical in idiom, and revealing mastery of form and sureness of technique.

Camille Pissarro. From a woodcut self-portrait

Lit.: Ewen, David, Composers of Today (1934).

PISKA, see PESIKTA.

PISKO, SERAPHINE EPPSTEIN, philanthropic and communal worker, b. St. Joseph, Mo., 1861; d. Denver, Col., 1942. She was educated in Denver, where she became a leading factor in Jewish philanthropic endeavor. In 1895 she was a leader in the work of consolidating the city's philanthropic agencies. She first became identified with the cure of tuberculosis in 1899, when she helped found the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives. Thereafter she was associated with the Hospital to the end of her life, as member of the board and executive secretary. She toured the United States for the purpose of organizing committees for the Hospital in all large cities. She was elected a vice-president of the National Council of Jewish Women and the National Conference of Jewish Social Service, as well as to the executive board of the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods. In Denver's Juvenile Court she served as a volunteer probation officer and was vice-chairman of the philanthropy board of the Women's Club. In 1922 she was one of the two American representatives at the meeting of the executive committee of the International Women's Council, held at The Hague, Holland.

PISSARRO, CAMILLE, painter and graphic artist, b. on the island of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, 1830; d. Paris, 1903. His paternal family had immigrated to France from Portugal; his mother was a creole. Pissarro first went to France in 1843 to round out his education. In 1847 he was in St. Thomas again where at first he engaged in business, but later devoted his efforts to art. From 1855 on, with the exception of two years spent in London (1870-72), he lived in Paris, taking up his quarters in the more remote suburbs, such as Montmorency, Louveciennes, Pontoise and Eragny-Bazincourt. Here he became a painter of the countryside, of peasant and village life. Akin to F. Millet in the selection of his subjects, his simple rendering of nature and man, suffused by deep emotion, stands out in contrast to Millet's pathos. In his coloring, at that time inclined to the somber, he was influenced by Corot. About the middle of the 1860's Pissarro was attracted to the young artists who gathered around Edouard Manet and who, by reciprocal inspiration, were creating the new technique of the "plein air," tending to translate in expressive language the radiance and color brilliance of natural light. Pissarro, the eldest of this group, became, next to Claude Monet, a creator of the analytical technique of classic impressionism which consists in rendering the vibrations of air and the scintillating light of day by short dots of the brush, thereby capturing reality in its picturesque motion and vitality, and miraculously enhancing in riches the color value of the painting. Pissarro was the greatest among French Jewish artists, one of the founders and leading masters of the impressionist school of painting.

Pissarro exhibited at the official Salon of Paris from 1859 on. From 1874 on he took part in the exhibits of the impressionist school at Nadard's and Durand-Ruel's in Paris which challenged the world of art. About the middle of the 1880's his technique tended toward the "pointillist" style of the so-called "neo-impressionists," Seurat, Signac and others. In 1895 his eyesight was affected, preventing him from painting in the open air. But the sixty-five-year-old painter profited from this handicap: henceforth his wholly original, admirable paintings came into being. In the new language of decomposed, loosened layers of color he told of the beauties of urban architecture, of modern street life which he discovered for art. He painted the docks, embankments and bridges of Le Havre and Dieppe, the cathedrals of Rouen and Dieppe, but above all Paris, its streets and boulevards, its squares and buildings, for the most part seen from above, in a European adaptation of the Japanese manner. He painted but few portraits, among them several of his friend Cézanne.

Pissarro engraved more than 130 copper plates; he was also one of the creators of a new art of lithography. His influence on young artists was very great, among others on Gauguin and on Van Gogh in his first Paris period. Paintings of Pissarro have found their way to museums all about the world, among them to the National Gallery at London, the museum at Melbourne, the Metropolitan Museum of Art of New York city, the public art collections of Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Pittsburgh and many private collections in the United States.

Pissarro founded a dynasty of artists. Best known among his sons was LUCIEN PISSARRO (b. 1863), who lived mainly in London, and is treated separately.

GEORGES PISSARRO (b. 1871), who adopted the pseudonym Manzana, was a successful painter, graphic artist and designer of rugs, glasses and furniture.

FELIX PISSARRO (1874-1906) was a painter and etcher.

LUDOVICO RODOLPHE PISSARRO (b. 1878), who adopted the name Ludovic Rodo.

PAUL EMILE PISSARRO (b. 1884), painted in oil and water colors and carved wood.

His granddaughter OROVIDA PISSARRO (b. 1893), a daughter of Lucien Pissarro, was a graphic artist and etcher; she specialized in etchings representing animals.

MAX OSBORN.

Lit.: Duret, Theodore, Manet and the French Impressionists (translated by I. E. Crawford Flitsh, 1912); Rewald, John, "Camille Pissarro: His Work and Influence," Menorah Journal, vol. 27 (1939), No. 1, pp. 46-55; Lecomte, G. Ch., Camille Pissarro (1922); Holl, S., Pissarro et son oeuvre (1905); Tabarent, Adolphe, Pissarro (1924; English version by J. Lewis May, 1925); Catalogue de l'oeuvre gravé et lithographié de Camille Pissarro, eaux-fortes, aquatintas, lithographies, monotypes, et des tableaux aquarelles, pastels, dessins, Paris, Vente Hotel Drouot (1928 and 1929); "Des lettres inédites de Camille Pissarro à Octave Mirbeau (1891-92) à Lucien Pissarro (1898-99)," Revue de l'Art (1930); König, Leo, Pissarro (1927), in a series of books (Le triangle) on Jewish artists.

PISSARRO, LUCIEN, painter, b. Paris, 1863. He was the eldest son of Camille Pissarro. He became a naturalized British subject in 1916. Pissaro is one of the best-known landscape painters of Great Britain, although success to him came very late—his first picture was sold when he was fifty years of age. This belated fame was mainly due to the renown of the father, whose name as one of the leading impressionist painters overshadowed the unmistakably great talent of the son.

Pissarro was educated in France; he did not attend any art schools, but was a pupil of Camille, by whose painting technique he was undoubtedly influenced during the first years of his career. For a while he even applied the pointillism of Georges Seurat—as Camille had done before him—but merely by way of experiment; soon he returned to impressionism. His colors on the whole are firmer than those of Camille, and as a designer he is doubtlessly superior, particularly in his later life.

When his Paris work failed to bring material success—although he exhibited regularly with the impressionists and was one of the early members of the Société des Artistes Indépendents—he moved to London (1890). Here he came into contact with Charles Ricketts and Charles Shannon of The Dial, as well as with William Morris. He was greatly interested in their artistic printing efforts, and began to contribute wood engravings to The Dial as well as to other periodicals. Four years later he set up his own press under the name of Eragny Press and produced a beautifully printed booklet, The Queen of the Fishes, which brought him renown, both as a wood engraver and as a designer of type font.

In the next eight years he produced fifteen books, all of them printed in the so-called Vale type. In 1902 he designed an entirely new type face which he called the Brook type. This type was used for a further sixteen books. In all his printing work Pissarro was greatly assisted by his wife, Esther Bensusan Pissarro, who designed many of the vignettes and illuminated initials of the Eragny books.

Although throughout these years he never gave up painting, Pissarro became so well known as a wood engraver and book printer that in certain authoritative works on modern art appearing around the beginning of the 20th cent. he is mentioned only among the contemporary wood engravers. Once his canvases had become known—mainly through exhibition at the New English Art Club—they were requested by many public galleries and art collectors. His landscapes, whether of French or English scenes, betray the painter's sense for precise and truthful reproduction; yet in each canvas the tender emotion of a simple, kindhearted man has found expression.

Lucien Pissarro. From a portrait in oil by Clara Klinghoffer

Pissarro paints nature with the fervor and purity of the early Italians. He can find something to rejoice at in all seasons—the scintillation of sunlit snow is given with the same delicate harmony and precision as those with which he paints full, broad autumn tints, or catches the illusive coloring that lies hidden beneath gray skies.

His pictures are in the National Gallery (Tate Collection) of London, and in the art galleries of several English towns—foremost among them Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool and Belfast. In recognition of his outstanding qualities as a landscape painter, he was chosen a life member of the New English Art Club in 1942.

Pissarro's daughter, Orovida, is known as a draughtsman and as a painter of silk screens in Oriental style.

J. W. F. STOPPELMAN.

PISTINER, JACOB, labor leader and deputy, b. Fundul Moldavei, Bucovina, Austria, 1882; d. on board of a train bound for Bucharest, Roumania, 1930. He received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Czernowitz. In 1902 he founded, and edited until his death, the social democratic daily newspaper Vorwärts which was read also throughout Roumania after the annexation of Bucovina. Pistiner organized into strong labor unions and into a strong political party the working masses of Bucovina, among whom the Jewish group was one of the most important. As deputy of Czernowitz in the Roumanian parliament (1920 and 1928) he influenced labor legislation. From 1923 on he was a member of the executive board of the Second (social democratic) International.

His articles were published by the Arbeiter Zeitung and Kampf of Vienna. Pistiner made important contributions toward raising the economic, cultural and social standard of the Jewish working masses of Bucovina.

PITHOM, according to Ex. 1:11, one of the two Egyptian store-cities (Pithom and Raamses) which were built by the Israelites at the command of a Pharaoh, probably Ramses II (about 1292-1225 B.C.E.). Its Egyptian name was Pi-Tum (House of the God Tum), its Greek name Heroonpolis; it is now Tell el Mashuta. During the Middle Ages the Jews called Fayyum Pithom; hence the Arabic surname of Saadia, al-Fayyumi, becomes Hapithomi in Hebrew.

Lit.: Naville, The Store-City of Pithom and the Route of the Exodus (1903); Petrie, Hyksos and Israelite Cities; cf. Peet, Egypt and the Old Testament.

PITTSBURGH, a city in western Pennsylvania, with a population (1940) of 671,659, of whom about 55,000 were Jews. It is the second largest city in Pennsylvania, and took its name from William Pitt. As Fort Pitt, it was established as a trading post in 1759. The following year a trading house was founded there by Joseph Simon, Levy Andrew Levy and William Trent. Joseph Simon was among the Jewish signers of the Non-Importation Resolutions in 1765; David Franks, Michael Gratz and Barnard Gratz, all of Philadelphia, and all of whom had trading connections with western Pennsylvania, were also signers of the Resolutions. But despite the anti-British significance of the Non-Importation agreement, the first English occupation of lands beyond the Ohio River was made possible in 1765 as the result of an advance of funds by the firm of Simon, Levy, Franks and Company. It was because penetration to the new western lands was carried on from Pittsburgh that the city became known as the "Gateway to the West." After the Revolution, the Gratz brothers of Philadelphia resumed their fur trading which the war had interrupted, and a shipping point near New Weston retained the name of Gratz.

Moses Henry was one of the first Jews to own land in Pittsburgh; in 1768 he was granted permission by Lieutenant Colonel Wilkins to occupy a "Lot of Ground in the new Town of Pittsburgh." David Franks, Joseph Simon and Levy Andrew Levy were the original owners of Wilkinsburg, which became a suburb of Pittsburgh, and which in 1769 was referred to as "Jews' Land" in land patents. In 1787 two Jews, Isaac Israel and Andrew Simon, were among the signers of a petition to create a new county with Pittsburgh as the county seat. There was evidently a considerable Jewish community in Pittsburgh in 1800. John Israel arrived from Philadelphia about that time to become the publisher of the Tree of Liberty, a weekly periodical championing the interests of Democratic-Republicans.

Although religious services were held as early as 1842 or 1844, the first formal Jewish organization was the Bes Almon Society, founded in 1846. That same year a cemetery was purchased on Troy Hill. But there was not an entirely peaceful mood in the Jewish community, from the point of view of ritual observance, and this naturally affected its development. From 1830 to about 1850 the immigration had been basically from southern Germany; after 1845, however, there was an increase in the number of Polish immigrants. Although for a time there was outward unity, strife between Orthodoxy and tendencies toward Reform was evident.

The first synagogue, which grew out of the Bes Almon, was known as Ez Hajjim, and held its first services on Penn Street, in 1846, with the Reverend Mannheimer as cantor. A year later the group moved to Liberty Street, and elected the Reverend Sulzbacher as cantor. In 1854 dissension was sharpened over the choice of a reader. William Armhold, the incumbent, was satisfactory to the German elements, but the Polish factions preferred someone else. The German factions then formed Rodef Shalom Congregation, and built Pittsburgh's first synagogue in 1861. Josiah M. Cohen, who came to Pittsburgh from England in 1859, and who was later to be a leading judge and educator, was principal and English teacher of the first and only Jewish parochial school in Pittsburgh, day school of Rodef Shalom.

The Tree of Life Synagogue

After 1864, when a more definite and permanent cleavage occurred between the Orthodox and Reform groups in the Jewish community, Rodef Shalom became a Reform congregation. Louis Naumburg had succeeded Armhold, the cause of the original contention, in 1865, and remained with the congregation until 1870. Like some of the other early synagogues in the country, Rodef Shalom was distinguished by the long periods of service of its various rabbis. Lippman Mayer occupied the pulpit from 1870 to 1901; he was followed by J. Leonard Levy (1901-17) and by Samuel H. Goldenson (1918-34). Solomon B. Freehof, who succeeded Goldenson, was rabbi in 1942. The synagogue moved into a new building in 1907. In addition to the religious school established early in its history, it had also as an adjunct the Falk Memorial Library (1912), consisting of a library, a gymnasium, and a swimming pool.

The group which seceded from the Rodef Shalom nucleus in 1864 formed the Ez Hajjim congregation the same year. Subsequently it became known mainly by the English version of its name: Tree of Life. Its first synagogue was built in 1883, and in 1907 a newer synagogue was constructed. The congregation, which adopted the Conservative form of ritual, had among its rabbis Michael Fried (1898-1906), Rudolph I. Coffee (1906-15) and Maurice M. Mazure (1916-21). Herman Hailperin, who came to the synagogue in 1922, was rabbi in 1942. Among the auxiliary activities were a school, founded in 1868, and a library, opened in 1920. A second Conservative congregation, Beth Shalom, was founded in September, 1917, and moved into its own building in 1922; an addition was constructed in 1929. Goodman A. Rose became its rabbi in 1924, and was serving in 1942. It had also its own school. Benjamin A. Lichter was, in 1942, rabbi of B'nai Israel, a third Conservative congregation.

There were a number of Orthodox congregations in Pittsburgh in 1942. Among the first was Poale Zedek, founded in 1881; the rabbi, in 1942, was Joseph Shapiro. Poale Zedek erected its new synagogue in 1928. Shaare Torah was organized in 1892, as was Beth Hamidrash Hagodol, of which Joseph L. Kaplan was rabbi in 1942. Other Orthodox congregations were: Chofetz Chaim (Aaron M. Ashinsky, rabbi); Adath Jeshurun (N. A. Levin, rabbi); Agudath Achim (Marvin J. Elefant); Mogen Dovid (S. Malivotsky).

The participation of the Pittsburgh Jewish community in local, national and international affairs began early. In 1857, during the agitation throughout the United States against the signing of a treaty with Switzerland containing discriminatory clauses against the Jews, the Jews of Pittsburgh held a mass meeting of protest. During the Civil War the Jewish women gave a special festival (1863) for the sanitary commission of the armies. The Civil War was responsible for the organization of the first local philanthropy in Pittsburgh, the Hebrew Ladies' Aid Society, which adopted as its primary function aid to soldiers and other sufferers from the war; Mrs. Pauline Frank was founder and first president.

The synagogue of Rodef Shalom congregation in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

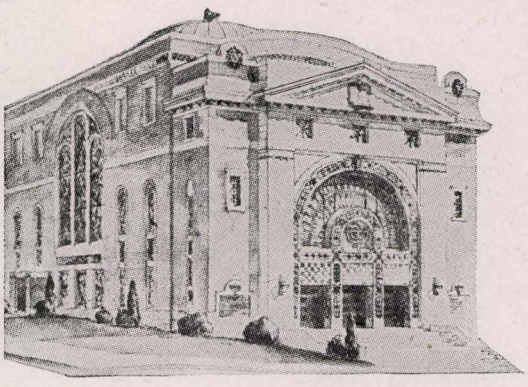
In 1864 the first Jewish relief society was formed under the name of Hebrew Benevolent Society; later it became known as the United Hebrew Relief Society, and still later as the Jewish Social Service Association. Other welfare institutions founded during the 19th cent. were the Free Burial Society (1870), the United Hebrew Relief Association of Allegheny County (1880), which was eventually to become the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of Pittsburgh (1912), and the J. M. Gusky Orphanage and Home (1890).

Esther Gusky established the Orphanage in memory of her husband, Jacob Gusky. To it was added an annex, the gift of Aaron Cohen in memory of his wife, Bertha Rauh Cohen. The Gusky Orphanage, from the very beginning of its existence, was a pioneer in the changing attitude toward child care. With the beginning of coordination between the various social agencies in Pittsburgh, including those concerned with child placement, the Orphanage became even more important as an institution of manifold purposes. In 1942 it could accommodate about ninety children. Another 19th cent. institution which was to become a model 20th cent. establishment was the Sabbath school founded by the Pittsburgh branch of the National Council of Jewish Women in 1895. In 1900 it became the Columbian School and Settlement, and was transferred from the exclusive auspices of the Council of Jewish Women to the direction of a special committee. A public bath-house was added in 1902, the gift of Alexander Peacock, and in 1909 the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Kaufmann was responsible for the construction of a new building, in memory of their daughter. The settlement was known from then on as the Irene Kaufmann Settlement.



Congregation Poale Zedeck

When the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies was organized in Pittsburgh in 1912, it inaugurated the coordinated activity of the major welfare activities in the city. The budget of the Federation the first year was $69,926. In 1921 it raised $130,680; in 1926, the budget was $266,062; in 1942 the total budget was more than $1,000,000. Its constituent agencies, in 1942, were the Emma Farm Association, Hebrew Burial Association, Hebrew Free Loan Association, Irene Kaufmann Settlement, J. M. Gusky Hebrew Orphanage and Home, Jewish Home for the Aged, Jewish Social Service Bureau of Pittsburgh, Ladies' Hospital Aid Society, Montefiore Hospital Association, Pittsburgh House of Shelter, and the United Employment Service.

There were also a United Jewish Fund, organized in 1936, which included several national and overseas agencies, the Hebrew Institute of Pittsburgh (the coordinating agency for Jewish education), the Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Associations, and the Jewish Home for Babies and Children. Under the United Jewish Fund was organized the Tri-State Welfare Council, comprising more than sixty smaller Jewish communities in western Pennsylvania, northern West Virginia and eastern Ohio. Publications in Pittsburgh in 1942 were the Jewish Criterion, a weekly, founded in 1899; the American Jewish Outlook, a weekly, established in 1934; and Der Vegveiser, a Yiddish weekly, founded in 1887.

Pittsburgh has been the scene of several conferences of various ideological groups in the American Jewish community which, because of their consequent importance, are identified by the city's name. In 1885 the rabbinical conference held in Pittsburgh drew up a program of Reform Judaism which is known as the "Pittsburgh Platform." In 1918 the Zionists, at a convention in Pittsburgh, adopted a program which subsequently became known as the "Pittsburgh Program"; later the Zionists tried to make this program the basis of the Mandate during the 1919 to 1920 peace negotiations. Much later, in 1938, Pittsburgh was the scene of an attempt to unite all sections of American Jewry, when a conference held there prepared a scheme of action to which the American Jewish Congress, the American Jewish Committee, the Jewish Labor Committee and the B'nai B'rith could ultimately subscribe, to be called the General Jewish Council; this united front, however, broke up in 1941, with withdrawal of the American Jewish Congress.

Josiah M. Cohen was one of the first Jews in Pittsburgh to hold public office. He was made judge of the orphans' court in 1901, elected judge of the court of common pleas in 1907, and reelected in 1917 and 1927, serving until his death in 1930. Other Pittsburgh Jews who served in the judiciary were Joseph Stadfield, who was a judge in the court of common pleas from 1930 to 1933, when he was elected to the superior court; Benjamin Lencher, elected to the Allegheny County court in 1933; and Sara M. Soffel, elected to the Allegheny county court in 1937. Henry Ellenbogen was a member of Congress from 1932 to 1938, when he was elected to the court of common pleas. Samuel A. Weiss, after having been a member of the Pennsylvania legislature from 1934 to 1940, was elected to the United States Congress (1940). Marcus Aaron, who was made president of the Pittsburgh board of education in 1923, still held this post in 1942. Among others who held civic office were Mrs. Enoch Rauh, director of public welfare from 1922 to 1934, and Abraham L. Wolk, elected a member of the city council in 1934.

The various higher institutions of learning in the city have had many Jews on their respective faculties. At the Carnegie Institute of Technology there have been: Ernst Berl, research professor of chemistry; Immanuel Estermann, associate professor of physics; David Moskowitz, assistant professor of mathematics; Nathan Jonas; Joseph Bernhardt Rosenbach; Otto Stern, research professor of physics; and Max Schoen, head of the department of education and psychology. At the University of Pittsburgh there have been Asher Isaacs, professor of economics; Alexander Lowy, professor of organic chemistry; Alexander Silverman, head of the department of inorganic chemistry; and Jacob Rosenbloom, assistant professor of biochemistry. Duquesne University has had Martin André Rosanoff as dean of its graduate school, and, earlier, Jacob Ellis Rosenberg as professor of physics.

Among the Jews of the city who made extraordinary contributions to the cultural life and the welfare of the community as a whole were various members of the Falk family. Maurice Falk established the Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation (1929). The Foundation is devoted to the advancement of research and education; Leon Falk, Jr., served as chairman of the board of trustees. The Rauh family is also well-known. Enoch Rauh was one of the original appointees to the city council; Mrs. Enoch (Bertha Floersheim) Rauh and her son Richard were instrumental in making possible the present Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Josiah Cohen, in the course of her long life, was an active participant in Jewish communal life and in cultural and education movements of city-wide interest.

CHARLES H. JOSEPH.

Lit.: Klein, Philip, A Social Study of Pittsburgh (1938); Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, index volume, No. 23; Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 63-65.

PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, see CONFERENCES, RABBINICAL; JUDAISM IN AMERICA (under REFORM JUDAISM).

PITTSFIELD, a city at the western extremity of Massachusetts. Its population in 1940 was 49,684, of whom about 1,850 were Jews. Although the Jewish community was not established until the middle of the 19th cent. (there were about 300 Jews in the city in the early 1900's), Pittsfield was in 1815 the scene of a discovery which induced many scholars to believe that they had found the link between the lost tribes of Israel and the American Indians. During the summer of 1815 Captain Joseph Merrick, ploughing his farm, turned up an object which proved to be a phylactery. There were no Jews in the community then, nor could any residents remember Jews ever having lived there. Although the mystery of the phylactery was never solved, it was ultimately assumed that a Jewish trader had lost it while en route from one trading post to another. For a time, however, the Pittsfield phylactery was added to the other evidence which was repeatedly brought up to prove the relationship between the Jews and the Indians—language similarities, customs and observances.

In 1942 there were several Orthodox congregations and one Reform congregation in Pittsfield. Morris Fuhrman, who came to Pittsfield in 1919, was the rabbi of two Orthodox congregations: Knesseth Israel and Ahavath Sholom. Knesseth Israel had a membership of 215. The synagogue in which the congregation worshipped was built in 1906. Ahavath Sholom had a membership of seventy-five, and worshipped in a synagogue built in 1918.

The Reform Temple, Anshe Amonim, was in 1942 under the spiritual leadership of Saul Habas, who came to Pittsfield in 1935. Anshe Amonim was started originally by immigrants from Germany; in the beginning it was an Orthodox synagogue, but it gradually adopted the liberal Reform ritual. The site on which the Temple was constructed was purchased in 1926.

Pittsfield had also a community center, built in 1925, housing the Young Women's Hebrew Association, the Young Men's Hebrew Association, the Junior and Senior Hadassah, the Ladies' Aid Society, and a Hebrew school with an enrolment of seventy children. All these institutions were sponsored by the three synagogues.

Jews who held public office in Pittsfield included Samuel Bloomberg, who was master in chancery, Albert Charles England, who was state medical examiner for the Berkshire district, and his brother Daniel England, who was elected to the Massachusetts legislature in 1898 and made mayor of Pittsfield in 1902. James M. Rosenthal was for a time city solicitor.

MORRIS FUHRMAN.

Lit.: Friedman, Lee M., "The Phylacteries Found at Pittsfield, Mass.," Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society, No. 25 (1917) 81-85.

PITY. Pity is a capacity of heart which man shares with his Creator. In Jewish thought it is regarded as one of the noblest virtues. The Hebrew word for pity, rahamim, may be translated also as "love," "mercy," or "compassion." Thus it is evident that Israel has never regarded pity as mere condescension, but rather as a feeling of kinship with all fellow creatures. In one sense, it is the identification of one's self with another whose lot may be less fortunate. Etymologically the word for pity is associated with the word rehem, which means "womb." Baeck (Essence of Judaism, 108) points out that the word "gets its nuance of meaning from the love of a mother toward the child which she has borne, that most natural and self-evident love, that love which has not grown up or developed but which is as old as the life on which it spends itself."

Pity must be considered, first of all, as characteristic of the Eternal. The Biblical statement in Ex. 34:6, "The Lord, the Lord, God, merciful and gracious," has been used by Jewish philosophers as proof that "pity" is one of the divine attributes. Other Scriptural statements also testify to the compassion of the Almighty (Deut. 8:5; Isa. 49:13; Hosea 11:4 et seq.). In rabbinic literature two of the attributes of God to which frequent reference is made are middath hadin—the attribute of justice—and middath harahamim—the attribute of mercy or pity. Creation was made possible only because God tempered His justice with genuine pity for His creatures (Midrash Gen. 12). If justice had been supreme, mankind could not endure. If pity were His only characteristic, there would be no end to man's immortality. Whenever the Bible uses the term "Adonoi" to denote the Creator, it has special reference to His mercy or pity (Midrash Gen. 33).

Living in imitation of the Eternal, man becomes merciful. The Talmud says that if man shows pity toward his fellow creatures heaven will be merciful to him (Sab. 151b). This has become one of the three distinguishing characteristics of Israel. The Jewish people, say the rabbis, are merciful, chaste and charitable (Yeb. 79a). Indeed, it is regarded as of great merit that the people of Israel are spoken of as "the merciful, the children of the merciful." The accuracy of this description and its meaning for all mankind may be inferred from the writings of Nietzsche (see Beyond Good and Evil), in which pity, as opposed to sternness, is called the distinguishing quality of the Jewish faith and of Israel's daughter religions.

Lit.: Baeck, Leo, Essence of Judaism; Joseph, Morris, Judaism as Creed and Life.

PIUS V, PIUS X, PIUS XI, see POPES.

PIYUT (plural, Piyutim; from the Aramaic paytana, "the poet"), term for all kinds of poetry, then applied specifically to religious poetry intended for use in the synagogue. Originally, simple elaborations and amplifications of the main prayers were called Piyutim; such elaborations were made through the insertion of alphabetically arranged series of words or rhymed verses. However, when the main prayers were laid down in fixed form, all additional compositions based on the prayers were called Piyutim. Today Piyutim is the inclusive term given to the entire concept and field of synagogal poetry. Those of the Piyutim which have as their subject matter elegies, lamentations, and penitence, are more specifically called Selihoth.

1. Origin and Development. Despite the fact that the main prayers of the Jewish liturgy were laid down in fixed form in the 6th cent., the religious genius of the Jewish people in this field was by no means exhausted. The spirit of the times and the changed political, cultural, and social conditions then prevailing necessarily had to be reflected and re-echoed in the prayers. The Piyut is believed to have originated in a period of religious persecutions; it was composed for the purpose of edifying and instructing the people. It was principally intended to serve in place of the Midrashic lectures and addresses, which were at that time forbidden. The exigencies of the times, the hopes for a better future and the admonition to the people to be patient and to endure all their sufferings find their most eloquent expression in the Piyutim. At a later period the old, simple form of expression no longer sufficed. The thoughts contained in the Piyutim were given a learned coloring; their language became more artistic and differentiated from ordinary speech; their structure became much more complicated and technically perfected. "The Piyut in every respect is artistic poetry." The motives for the Piyutim came to be derived from Talmud, Midrash, and Cabala; indeed, in their final stage the natural sciences and popular philosophy, too, were drawn upon for this purpose.

Palestine was the terrain upon which this new development in the field of liturgical poetry took place. Its further evolution appears to have had Babylonia as its scene, whence it spread throughout all the lands of the Diaspora. There were, of course, many opponents of this artistic poetry which thus interrupted the main prayers of the liturgy; nevertheless, the Piyut enjoyed such great popularity that even the most respected authorities were able to accomplish nothing in its disfavor.

Of decisive importance in the development of the Piyut was the fact that it was adopted into the Tefillah (Eighteen Benedictions). It then ceased to be merely an appendage of the traditional prayers, but became an essential component part of the liturgy. Of prime importance after the Tefillah was the Yotzer, where at first only the main portions, and later all its parts, were provided with Piyutim compositions. The Piyut then came to be associated with the Zemiroth, which it provided with introductory and concluding poetical verses. Still later, the Additional Service (Musaf) and the Evening Service (Maarib), occasionally also the Afternoon Service (Minhah), became the subject of poetical elaborations and amplifications, as had been the case first with the Morning Service (Shaharith). Furthermore, the reading of the Torah and every ceremony both in synagogue and home gave writers of Piyutim opportunities to display their artistic skill.

Originally the Piyut was intended solely for the festivals and for the special Sabbaths. Soon, however, it was extended in scope to include also the half-holidays (Hol Hamoed) and the fast days. Finally, Piyutim came to be written for the Sabbaths, in connection with the portions from the Torah (Sedarim) for the three-year cycle, and even for the weekdays of the entire year. From the beginning of the 10th up to the 16th cent. the most prominent and respected men of the congregations would adorn both the public and private divine worship with their own or others' compositions. As a result, these divine services gained in inner richness, and provided the worshippers with a hitherto unknown incentive and stimulation by means of the songs. The divine services became much more attractive by reason of this differentiation, and the religious mood gained ever newer forms of expression for its colloquy with God. The simple character of the divine service, based as it had been on plain, unadorned prayers and on the primitive litanies, became completely changed as a result of the magnificent delineation of the Paytanim and of the manifold artistic forms and linguistic innovations which they introduced. The rigid order of the previous divine worship was abolished by reason of the fact that it now became optional with the reader or precentor (cantor) whether to use his own compositions or those of other composers, and thus delight the congregation with new offerings.

2. Language and Form of the Piyut. The Piyut is of tremendous significance for the development of the Hebrew language. Apart from its borrowings from Mishnah and Talmud, Midrash and Targum, the Piyut pointed out new ways for the development of the Biblical language through numerous new formations and peculiarities of style. For this reason the language of the Piyut is comparatively difficult, often even obscure. The understanding of the Piyut requires a thoroughgoing and profound intimacy with the entire ancient Hebrew and Aramaic literature; additional difficulties in the understanding of the Piyut are conciseness and brevity of expression, the frequent use of allegorical terms, and numerous allusions to rare occurrences and expressions. At a very early stage it was found necessary to write commentaries on the Piyutim. Even today much of their contents is still extremely dubious, and much is altogether unintelligible.

The external form of the Piyut has its own peculiar laws; it changes with the times. At first the Paytanim, or writers of the Piyutim, utilized alphabetical acrostics at the beginning of the verse in manifold variations; there were, for example, the usual order (abgad), the inverted order (tashrak) or combinations of both, such as the atbash, etc. Later, there were, in addition, acrostics of Biblical passages and acrostics of names, and many similar kinds of acrostics, often in the most complicated of structures and applications. Under the influence of the Arabs, after the year 650, the rhyme at the end of the verse was introduced. Now, too, the quantities of the syllables began to be taken into consideration. Metre was employed for the first time in Spain, where its introduction and retention were favored by the fact that the Piyutim were sung. From the 11th cent. on most of the Piyutim written in Spain had metre. The Arabic metre had to be adapted to the Hebrew language; after the pattern of Arabic prosody, the Piyut displays great variety and multiplicity in metre. Before every metrical Piyut the metre (mishkal) is indicated. The terms for the individual component parts of the metre are tenu'ah (literally, "movement") or yathed (literally, "tent-peg," "nail"); the first consists of a long syllable (—); the second of a short syllable and a long syllable (— ∪). These are then formed into longer or shorter verses.

3. Kinds and Names of the Piyutim. Piyutim consist either of single poems or of a series of connected compositions. The individual poems take their name either from the structure and form, or are named in accordance with a characteristic initial or final word of the important prayer before or after which they are put. From the form of the Piyutim there are derived such designations as: a) alphabeta for the alphabetical Piyut; b) rahet, also in Greek, dromos (running or race), a piece with variations on a Biblical word or with the inclusion of a portion of a Biblical verse; c) muwashach or girdle rhyme, when the poem is preceded by a verse with which the ends of the strophes rhyme. These two last-mentioned forms were conditioned by the mosaic style of the Piyut. As introduction to the Piyut there served the poem called reshuth ("permission"), also pethihah ("opening"). The finale of the Piyutim was formed by the poem silluk ("conclusion"), frequently called also by the Arabic term Churudj.

The following types of Piyutim are distinguished, with reference to the principal prayers before or after which they are inserted in the prayer-book: a) Yotzer (plural, Yotzeroth, "creator-poems"), which follow the prayer Yotzer Or; b) 'Ofan ("wheel"), before the "Vehahayyoth," the poem dealing with the angels (Ofannim, according to Ezek. 1:16); c) Zulath, corresponding to the phrase "En Elohim Zulathecha" (There is no God beside Thee), before the prayer Ezrath. Poems are inserted even between these, for example, me'orah ("hymns of light"); 'ahabah ("hymns of love"), and ge'ullah ("hymns of redemption"), all named after the particular prayer with which they are connected. Those interpolations in the Tefillah are generally called Keroboth, while those made in the Evening Service (Maarib) are called Maaribim or Maaraboth. The Piyutim composed for the festival of Sukkoth, with the characteristic exclamation hoshana, are called Hoshanoth. The Tefillath Tal ("prayer for dew") is a poem intended for the first day of Pesach, while the poem Tefillath Geshem ("prayer for rain") was composed for Shemini Atzereth, the eighth day of the festival of Sukkoth. Mention may be made also of the Abodah ("service," "worship"), a poem dealing with the consecrated and sacred service of the high priest on the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), and of the Azharoth ("warnings"), an enumeration of the 613 commands and prohibitions of the Torah. The Keroboth are further subdivided into those for the daily service (Shemoneh Esreh), those for the Sabbath and festivals (Shibata), and those not reaching further than the third benediction (Kedushah).

The elegiac part of the Piyut, called selihah, comprises poems like 'akedah (the sacrifice of Isaac); gezeroth (in the sense of persecutions, hostile decrees); tochehah (in the sense of "reproach," "self-accusation"); viddui ("confession of sin"), and finally, the tehinnah and bakkashah ("petition" and "supplication"). To this class there belong also the elegy (kinah, plural kinoth; among Arabic-speaking Jews it is called almartiyyah, Hebrew, tamrur), "lamentation" or "dirge" over the destruction of Jerusalem; Judah Halevi's famous poem "Tziyyon Halo Tishali" ("Wilt Thou Not Ask, O Zion?") is the pattern of this kind of poem, which is called Zionide.

The Piyut was of tremendous importance for the development of Hebrew poetry as well. The flowerings of the Hebrew muse were very sparse in the post-Biblical period; the Piyut was the first influence which stimulated and aroused the minds and feelings of the following generations. Its limits were constantly extended. The Piyutim became the source of all later secular poetry among the Jews. Form, structure, and language were taken over from the Piyut, and even the motives of worldly poetry were often taken from common sources. The classical writers of Hebrew poetry gained great renown as writers of Piyutim.

See also PAYTAN. ARJEH SAMUEL DÖRFLER.

Lit.: Zunz, Leopold, Die synagogale Poesie des Mittelalters (1920; 1st ed., 1855-59); idem, Literaturgeschichte der synagogalen Poesie (1865-67); Elbogen, Ismar, Der jüdische Gottesdienst, pp. 206 et seq., 271-353; Davidson, Otzar Hashirah Vehapiyut (1925-33); Idelsohn, Jewish Liturgy, pp. 34-46; Zulay, V. M., Piyute Yannai (1938).

PIZMON (from the Greek psalmos), originally another name for Piyut, therefore a general term for synagogal poetry. Later the word Pizmon came to be employed as a designation for rhymed hymns arranged in strophe form and with a refrain. In particular, a Selihah (penitential poem) with a refrain was called Pizmon. The refrain, which by itself is often called Pizmon, is preferably taken from the Bible; frequently it consists of an entire stanza, but may also be limited to a single line. In the German collection of Selihoth the Pizmon is usually the last of the poetical Selihoth.

Lit.: Zunz, Leopold, Die Synagogale Poesie des Mittelalters (1920); Elbogen, Ismar, Der jüdische Gottesdienst (1924; 2nd ed., 1931).

PLAGUE. The Bible mentions many epidemics which slew tens of thousands, the prophets use them as a threat, and the Psalmist prays to be delivered from them. They appear under various names such as deber, maggefah and nega, but are not clearly described. Plagues were native to Egypt and other lands of the Orient, but the accounts of them given in the Bible and the Talmud are insufficient to enable us to determine their nature; they may have been such plagues as cholera, dysentery, typhus or any other epidemic sickness. The plague that befell the Philistines in consequence of their capture of the Ark (I Sem. 5) is described as being featured by 'ofalim; since this word etymologically means swelling, this epidemic was probably bubonic plague. After this appearance it seems to have disappeared for some time. This phenomenon of appearance and disappearance of epidemics in Palestine is not unusual. Observations made for about a century have shown that while Syria and Palestine are at times plague-breeders (from 1773 to 1843 there were no less than thirteen epidemics), the plague then disappears from that area and travels to other regions that formerly were spared.

The epidemic children's disease, called 'askera in the Talmud, and much dreaded, was probably diphtheria. In Europe the plague of the Black Death, which first appeared in Europe in 1347 and claimed more than twenty-five million victims in three years, was of especial fatality to the Jews, not only because of the Jewish victims that the plague itself claimed, but also because of the horrible persecutions of the Jews which followed in its train.

Two of the Ten Plagues as illustrated in the Sarajevo Haggadah: Darkness (9th) and Death of the Firstborn (10th).

See also BLACK DEATH.

Lit.: Preuss, J., Biblisch-talmudische Medizin, and the literature cited there.

PLAGUES, THE TEN. According to the narrative in Ex. 7 to 12, God sent upon Egypt ten successive plagues, each more severe than the last, in order to compel Pharaoh to let the Israelites leave the country. Each plague forced Pharaoh to yield additional concessions until the last plague, the death of the first-born, brought about the complete release of the Israelites with their women, children and property. Since these plagues led directly to the Exodus from Egypt, a recitation of them is an essential part of the Passover Haggadah.

These plagues can be divided into two categories: miracles and natural occurrences. The miracles are contrary to nature, and, directed solely to Pharaoh himself, cause no further damage, are even requested by Pharaoh (Ex. 7:9), and are sometimes duplicated by the Egyptian magicians. They serve the purpose of demonstrating that Moses and Aaron are the veritable messengers of God (Ex. 4:1-5). The plagues that are natural occurrences, on the other hand, are intended to bring about the deliverance through the severity of their affliction. They affect the Egyptian people as a whole and produce extraordinary damage. According to Bible critics, this division is due to the difference in sources: the miracles are ascribed to the P (Priestly Code) source, with its theological viewpoint, the natural occurrences to the older J (Jahvist Code) source.

In some instances the extent of the miracle is increased so that it becomes an actual plague. Thus, according to Ex. 4:9, Moses is directed to take some of the water of the Nile and turn it into blood; in Ex. 7:17 the entire Nile is turned into blood, and in verse 19 the miracle extends to all the water in Egypt. The manner in which the plagues are brought about also varies; it is sometimes by Aaron at the command of Moses (Ex. 7:9-10, 20; 8:2, 12-13), sometimes by Moses himself (Ex. 7:14-18; 9:8, 22-23; 10:13, 22), and sometimes by God alone (Ex. 8:20; 9:6; 12:29).

Some of the plagues reported in the Bible are such as might naturally occur in Egypt and the Orient, and the only miraculous feature in their part of the story is their intensity and the rapidity of their succession. The ten individual plagues were as follows:

1. Blood (dam; Ex. 7:14-25). During the annual rise of the Nile to overflow the land, the river sometimes brings down from its Abyssinian source quantities of red soil which give it a red color. The Egyptians called this appearance "red water," and the Egyptian prophetic books regard it as an indication of a period under a curse.

2. Frogs (tzefarde'a; Ex. 7:26 to 8:11). At the time of the overflow of the Nile it teems with frogs, which remain on the dry land after the waters have gone down and multiply there. As a rule, ibises and other birds keep them from becoming a plague.

3. Gnats (kinnim; Ex. 8:12-15). These bloodsuckers come in thick swarms from the rice-fields in the fall and torment both man and beast.

4. Dog-flies ('arob; Ex. 8:16-28). The Hebrew word is sometimes erroneously translated as "wild animals." The insect in question may be the tsetse fly. Cf. Isa. 7:18, in which the fly appears as the symbol of Egypt.

5. Murrain (deber; Ex. 9:1-7). This was frequent during the period when the waters of the river were low.

6. Plague-boils (shehin; Ex. 9:8-12). This was perhaps only pemphigus or leprosy.

7. Hail (barad; Ex. 9:13-35). Severe hailstorms were of frequent occurrence in Palestine, but are very rare in Egypt.

8. Locusts ('arbeh; Ex. 10:1-20). Locusts are a frequent and fearful plague in the Orient, where their coming can produce a famine (cf. Joel 1 and 2).

9. Darkness (hoshech; Ex. 10:21-29). This may perhaps have been caused by the hamsin, a burning wind that comes from the desert, filling the air with such quantities of dust and sand that it darkens the sky.

10. The Death of the Firstborn (makkath bechoroth; Ex. 11:1-8; 12:29-42).

There is an enumeration of the plagues in Ps. 78:43-51, within the description of the marvelous acts that God wrought for Israel; the enumeration is not complete and has a different order from that in Exodus. Ps. 105:28-36 gives an enumeration and order that is nearer that of the original story. There are further references to the plagues in I Sam. 4:8 and Ps. 135:8-9, and in Deut. 28:60 one of the punishments to be brought upon Israel if it is disobedient is the "plagues of Egypt."

See also HAGGADAH, PASSOVER. BERNHARD LEVY.

Lit.: The Biblical dictionaries and commentaries on Exodus.

PLAINFIELD, a city in Union County, New Jersey, with a population (1940) of 37,469, of which about 3,400 were Jews. There were four congregations in Plainfield in 1942, three Orthodox and one Reform. Aaron Paperman was rabbi of the United Orthodox Congregations, consisting of the Congregation Children of Israel, Congregation Ohav Sholom and Congregation Ohav Zadek. His predecessor was Chaim Kaplan. Joseph Levine was the rabbi of the Reform Congregation, Temple Sholom, having been appointed to the post in 1936. There were also in Plainfield a Jewish Community Center, a Young Men's Hebrew Association, and a Council of Jewish Organizations, which was founded in 1937.

Among the Jews resident in Plainfield who have held public office are William Newcorn, who was a member of the New Jersey State Legislature, a district court judge, first assistant attorney general of New Jersey and corporation council of Plainfield, and Harvey Rothberg, who was assistant attorney general of New Jersey.

PLANTS, see FLORA OF PALESTINE.

PLATO, Greek philosopher, founder of critical and idealistic philosophy, b. 428 B.C.E.; d. 348 B.C.E. Church fathers who were astonished at the resemblances between his philosophy and Jewish writings held that he must have absorbed Jewish teachings. Legends, which are not of Jewish origin, picture him as meeting and receiving instruction from Jeremiah in Egypt. These probably arose out of the fact that Plato writes in a prophetic style.

Plato's direct influence on Jewish thought was very slight. Except for a few passages in Wisdom of Solomon there is no evidence of Platonic influence in Jewish literature until the completion of the Midrash. Neo-Platonism, however, had a major part in the development of Cabala.

The absence of the influence of Plato upon Jewish literature is all the more striking because the Jewish way of thinking is rather closely related to main trends in Plato's philosophy, to numerous details of it, and to the dominant position of ethics in his system. The reasons for this are: 1. Very few of Plato's works were translated into Arabic. 2. In its disputes with other religions, Jewish philosophy was concerned rather with Aristotle, then regarded as the supreme philosopher. 3. The system of Aristotle furnished a better basis for an elaborate system of philosophy than the dialogues of Plato. 4. Occasionally a tendency to harmonize widely differing points of view leads to an employment of Platonic, Aristotelian and Neo-Platonic elements in a rather eclectic fashion. This was the case in the Microcosmos of Joseph ben Jacob ibn Zaddik.

On the other hand, whenever a Jewish philosopher criticized the views of Aristotle, he was likely, though this was by no means necessary, to use the same arguments as Plato, even if he had no direct knowledge of him. Thus Hasdai Crescas (1340-1410), who turned away from the rationalism of Aristotle, held love to be the essence of God, but went beyond Plato in referring God's love not only to ideas but also to His creatures.

The influence of Plato is apparent in only three Jewish philosophers. Philo interpreted Judaism, monotheism, the Bible and Jewish law in the light of Plato's dialogues (especially Timaeus), and views Plato through Judaism. He adopts Plato's psychology and his theory of the creation of the world out of nothing. The ideas are the archetypes of visible things and are the sole and true reality. The supreme idea of the good is, of course, replaced by a personal God.

The Dialoghi di Amore of Judah Abravanel (Leo Hebraeus) is written in an atmosphere saturated with Platonic thoughts. His conception of God as cosmic love and of human beauty as a reflection of the idea indicate Platonic influence in a mystic and esthetic direction.

Hermann Cohen, founder of the Marburg School of philosophy, revived the study of Plato in an original way and paved the way for a new understanding of his position in the history of thought. He was the first to link Plato's theory of cognition and his ethics. Judaism is a religion of reason, and can be adequately understood only in the spirit of Plato. Accordingly, Cohen declares that the idealism of Plato and the Jewish prophets is closely related and claims Maimonides as a follower of Plato.

Several dialogues of Plato have been translated into Hebrew by Leon Simon and published by the Hebrew University Press at Jerusalem. His Republic was translated into Hebrew by Zevi Diesendruck (Tel-Aviv, 1935).

See also NEO-PLATONISM. MAX GRUENEWALD.

Lit.: Joel, Blicke in die Religionsgeschichte; Güdemann, Religionsgeschichtliche Studien; Scholem, G., Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism; Cohen, Hermann, "Das soziale Ideal bei Plato und den Propheten," Jüdische Schriften, vol. 1; idem, "Charakteristik der Ethik Maimunis," ibid., vol. 3.

PLATT, SAMUEL, lawyer and public servant, b. Carson City, Nev., 1874. He began practice as a lawyer in his native city in 1896, and figured in important mining suits. He was one time president of the Nevada Bar Association. Very soon in his career he became active in Republican politics, city and state, and in 1900 was appointed assistant secretary of state. Three years later he was elected to the Nevada Assembly, became speaker of the House, was reelected in 1905. The next year President Theodore Roosevelt appointed Platt United States District Attorney; he was the first Jew to hold this office in the state of Nevada. He was reappointed by President William Howard Taft in 1910, and that year was designated also special assistant to the United States Attorney General.

Platt rose high in the councils of the Republican party. Four times he was delegate at large to their national convention, and he was the party's nominee for United States senator in three campaigns.

Active in fraternal and communal organizations, Platt was elected president of the Reno B'nai B'rith; he served also as president of the Nevada Community Concert Association for seven years.

Among his interests was the Reno Evening Gazette, of which he was president, and the Carson City News, which he owned. He wrote Galloping Through Europe (1927).

PLATZEK, MARX WARLEY, judge, b. North Carolina, 1854; d. New York city, 1932. He was a member of the New York Constitutional Convention in 1894. Elected justice of the Supreme Court in the First District, New York, in 1907, he was reelected in 1920, and held that post until his retirement under the age limit, when he became official referee. From 1904 to 1907 Platzek served as trustee of the College of the City of New York. For several years he was president of the Young Men's Hebrew Association, and was otherwise active in New York Jewish communal affairs. He was a supporter of the American Jewish Historical Society, and provided for a financial bequest to it.

PLEDGE. In Biblical law the pledge appears in many forms, as can be seen from the numerous Biblical expressions such as habol or habolah and 'abot; the Talmud prefers the term mashkon. The Jewish law in connection with pledges is intimately connected with that referring to loans in general. As Jewish law forbade the taking of interest, it had to facilitate the provision of a means of security for the lenders, "so that the doors of the lenders are not closed to the borrowers." The Jewish law, accordingly, realizes the necessity of the pledge, but tries to find a compromise between the interests of creditors and debtors.

In order to protect the borrower, the Bible (Ex. 22:25-26; Deut. 24:6, 10-13) imposes various restrictions upon the rights of the lender. He may not enter the house of the borrower to accept a pledge, which would give him a choice of objects or enable him to make a secret and illegal agreement; he must stand outside the house and wait for the borrower to bring out the pledge to him. Under no circumstances may the upper or lower millstone be given as a pledge; it is regarded as the equivalent of a man's life, since it is required to prepare the poor man's daily meal. Furthermore, it is provided that if the pledge be a garment, it should be returned overnight in order that the poor man may have a covering while he is sleeping. Any violation of these rules, designed to protect the poor, was criticized by prophet and teacher as a sign of moral corruption (Amos 2:8; Ezek. 18:12; 33:15; Prov. 20:16; 27:13). The general principle behind all Biblical thought was that a loan was to be a friendly act, not a commercial transaction; and that even if the pledge was necessary, the rule was: "If thou lend money to any of My people, even to the poor with thee, thou shalt not be to him as a creditor" (Ex. 22:24).

The valid manner of making a pledge for a loan was the delivery of the pledge on the part of the borrower to the lender. If the latter lost the pledge, the debt was regarded as discharged in case the loan and the pledge had the same value; if they were of unequal values, the lender had to pay the borrower the difference if the pledge was worth more than the loan, while the borrower had to assume the difference as a debt in case the loan was more than the pledge. If the pledge was of such nature that it deteriorated in value in the course of time, the lender had the right to demand an additional pledge by way of security.

A distinction is made in Talmudic law between the voluntary pledge which is given by the borrower before he receives the loan and the compulsory pledge, or levy, made after the conclusion of the loan agreement. The creditor who has been given a pledge is not entitled to use it or to sell it. He is obliged to see that the pledge is properly taken care of, and to return it as soon as the loan is repaid. Roman law provided that if a loan is not repaid the pledge is forfeited to the lender; this harsh provision is totally absent in Jewish law, and the lender is simply entitled to keep the pledge until the money is repaid, without a time limit.

If the creditor makes use of the object pledged, he must deduct the value of such use from the total of the debt. His liability for the maintenance of the pledge is the same as that of the paid trustee: that is, he is responsible even for slight negligence, but not in case of accident.

The compulsory levy is limited as much as possible in Talmudic law. The provision that the creditor may not enter the house of the debtor, the exemption of certain kinds of property and the duty to return certain pledges at sunset are accordingly extended. The Talmud generally permits the execution of a compulsory pledge only to the representative of the court (sheliah beth din; B.M. 9:13).

The Talmud generally extends the law forbidding the pledging of a millstone or requiring the return of a garment to all objects of a similar nature or use. Thus it mentions pillows, plows, food for thirty days, clothing for a year, phylacteries, tools for the mechanic, including two each of the more important, the farmer's span of animals and the carrier's ass. Debtors are not allowed to take an oath that will nullify the provisions of Biblical or Talmudic law. Special consideration was given to widows, and they were never required to give pledges in making loans.

MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Malveh Veloveh 6 et seq.; Shulhan Aruch, Hoshen Mishpat 72, 104, 112, 117; Yoreh Deah 172; Dembitz, L. N., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 85-86; Goldmann, Felix, "Die Theorie des Faustpfandvertrages nach jüdischem Recht," Zeitschrift für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft, vol. 21.

PLEHVE, VYATCHESLAV KONSTANTINOVICH, Russian non-Jewish statesman, b. 1846; d. 1904. When he became minister of the interior in 1902, he made it his main policy to suppress by terror and brutality all classes of the population that were participating in the movement for liberty. Thus he carried on in the most ruthless manner the Russification of the people of Finland, Poland and Caucasia, but it was the Jews upon whom his hand fell heaviest. He is considered the originator of the pogrom policy against the Jews, which started during his administration with the massacre of Kishinev at Easter, 1903. His feeble efforts to improve the condition of the Jews were rather actions of contempt than betterment for them. For instance, in 1903, upon his proposal, 158 sections were eliminated from those territories prohibited to the Jews by means of the prevailing provisional laws. He is said to have declared that it had to be the task of the Russian government to make life for the Jews in Russia a living hell. Plehve was assassinated at St. Petersburg in 1904. Among those who plotted his death was a Jewish laborer, named Sikorski.

See also PALE OF SETTLEMENT.

Lit.: Dubnow, S., Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes, vol. 10 (1929).

PLEITE, PLETAH, see PHRASES, POPULAR.

PLESSNER, JACOB, sculptor, b. Berlin, 1871; d. Berlin, 1936. In 1892 he began the study of architecture under Pesthal in Berlin, but by 1896 his interest turned to sculpture and portraiture, which he pursued first under Professor Menzel at the Industrial Arts Museum and subsequently under Jamesch, Hertey and Breuer. His work was exhibited for the first time in 1899. In 1901 Plessner was awarded the Michael Beer Prize. His group Bettelweiber aus Perugia was acquired by Queen Wilhelmina of Holland. His work includes sepulchral monuments in Berlin, plastic portraits (among them a bust of Moses Mendelssohn), and many small objects of plastic art.

Lit.: C. V. Zeitung, vol. 15 (1936), No. 43 and 44.

PLESSNER, SALOMON, preacher, b. Breslau, Germany, 1797; d. Posen, Germany, 1883. In 1819 he published a Hebrew translation of the apocryphal additions to the book of Esther. He was a firm believer in Orthodox Judaism as opposed to Reform. When the government wanted to forbid the teaching of the Talmud in Posen, he published in its defense Ein Wort zu seiner Zeit oder die Autorität der Traditionslehre, with a Hebrew version, Eduth Leyisrael (1826). Plessner was a noted Hebrew poet. His sermons were full of quotations from Schiller and Goethe. In 1834 he began the publication of his sermons. Belehrungen und Erbauungen. Other collections of his Sabbath and festival sermons were published after his death.

PLINY THE ELDER, see ROMAN WRITERS ON JEWS.

PLOESTI, city in Roumania, with about 15,000 Jewish inhabitants in a total population of 60,000 (1940). The Ashkenazic Jewish community of Ploesti is one of the oldest in Roumania. In 1818 the community, styling itself "the Jewish corporation"—a name which proves that it was recognized by the state—bought a new cemetery. Jacob Psanter, in his Dibre

Hayamim Leartzoth Romaniah (1871), points out that the community had a cemetery prior to 1818, a circumstance which would bear out the fact that it was in existence long before that time.

Sephardic Jews established themselves in the community early in the 19th cent. The community was governed by a committee, the Epitropie, which was responsible to the authorities and had the right to provide the members with traveling papers and passports. The number of Jews residing at Ploesti early in the 19th cent. is not known, but judging from the number of seats in their synagogues it may have been from 2,000 to 2,500. The most ancient synagogue, called the rabbi's synagogue—erected about 1820—contained in the interior a sort of prison delimited by an iron band: ḳina; here were confined those who had trespassed religious commands. The Jews at this time, deeply religious, but also superstitious, under the influence of Hasidism unconditionally bowed to the strictest religious rule. A certain rabbi Moidel (1847-60), who derived his absolute authority from a letter which he claimed to hold from a Zaddik, overawed the community.

The members of the community, merchants and tradespeople, lived in quarters separated from those of the non-Jews, and, frequently visiting the villages, bore themselves as Roumanians in idiom and garb. Toward the middle of the 19th cent., when a period of persecution began, they were driven from the villages, and under the influence of Polish and Russian Jews immigrating in great numbers, they abandoned the Roumanian garb for the kaftan, Shtreimel and earlocks. The Jews of the adjoining towns were attracted to Ploesti by an era of prosperity. When the products of Roumanian industry and agriculture entered into the European system of exchange of goods in the middle of the 19th cent., the Jews of Ploesti founded manufactories and small industries, thereby creating wealth for themselves and for the city. They had to suffer, however, until 1871, from the hostility of the non-Jewish population, mostly Bulgarians, kept in ferment by recurring trumped-up blood accusations.

After 1890, when Ploesti became the prosperous center for the exploitation of the adjacent oil fields, the best in Roumania, the Jews, like other groups in the city, benefited a great deal from the economic and cultural rise, counting among their numbers many bankers, industrialists and merchants of considerable wealth. The growth of the cultural and charitable institutions of the community kept pace with this development. The school of the community, Luca Moise, became one of the best-known in the kingdom, and gave several thousand Jewish children their education. From the Jewish community of Ploesti stemmed such well-known men in the world of science as David Emanuel, professor of mathematics at the University of Bucharest, and Lazar Saineanu, a leading philologist of Roumania.

The entry of Roumania into the second World War on the side of Germany in 1941 brought about the ruination of the members and institutions of the community of Ploesti as well as of those of other Jewish communities of Roumania. According to press reports, Ploesti was the first city in Roumania where a ghetto was established. SANIEL LABIN.

Lit.: Schapira, Israel, Istoricul comunitatii din Ploesti (History of the Jewish Community of Ploesti; 1889); Jewish Telegraphic Agency, bulletin of Jan. 16, 1942.

PLOTKE, JULIUS, jurist, b. Borek, Posen, Germany, 1857; d. Frankfort, Germany, 1903. He was active in the Alliance Israélite Universelle, the Jewish Colonization Association, and the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden, and especially in the administration of the Frankfort community. His activities concerning the regulations applied to Jewish emigration were praiseworthy, as well as his intervention on behalf of the Roumanian Jews both by word of mouth and by pen. Among other publications, he wrote Die rumänischen Juden unter dem Fürsten und König Karl (1901).

Lit.: Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums, 1903, p. 484 et seq.; Jüdische Presse, 1903, p. 441 et seq.; Österreichische Wochenschrift, 1903, p. 648 et seq.; Heppner and Herzberg, Aus Vergangenheit und Gegenwart der Juden und der jüdischen Gemeinde in den Posener Landen (1909) 318.

PLOTNIKOFF, EUGENE, conductor, b. Odessa, Russia, 1877. After completing his studies at the Moscow Conservatory, he became conductor of the Ballet at the Imperial Theatre in Moscow, directing the music for such famous dancers as Duncan, Fokine, Mordkin and Allen. His excellent work brought him an appointment as conductor of opera. He was then named principal conductor of Moscow's civic opera house where, for a decade, he directed an extensive repertory which featured many world-famous artists, including Chaliapin, Koshetz, Battistini and Lapowska.

For another ten years he was conductor of Zimin's Orchestra in Moscow, which featured many new works by contemporary Russian composers. In 1921 Plotnikoff went to Paris, where he directed several performances at the Opéra.

In 1926 he migrated to the United States, touring the country with Chaliapin in performances of The Barber of Seville. Thereafter Plotnikoff conducted numerous concerts in New York under the auspices of the Federal Music Project.

PLOTZ, HARRY, physician and bacteriologist, b. Paterson, N. J., 1890. After serving as interne in the pathological laboratory of Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York, he went abroad during the first World War as a member of the American Red Cross Commission to participate in the control of typhus in the Balkan states (1914-15); subsequently, at the invitation of the Austrian government, he visited the Austro-Russian front to demonstrate treatment of that disease. Later he was connected with the medical section of the League of Nations in the same specialist capacity, and was decorated by various European governments for his work. He was made an officer of the Legion of Honor of France. From 1920 to 1921, he acted as medical director of the commission which the Joint Distribution Committee sent to Poland. He remained in Europe then, pursuing his bacteriological research at the Pasteur Institute in Paris, where he became chief of service. At the same time he also was made chief of service at the Institut de Biologie Physico-Chimique. On the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Pasteur Institute, Plotz was awarded the Institute's gold medal decoration. At the outbreak of the second World War Plotz returned to the United States, where, a lieutenant colonel, he went on active duty as chief of the virus laboratory of the Army Medical School, in Washington, D. C.

Recognized as an authority in the field, Plotz contributed numerous writings in both English and French to medical literature on poliomyelitis and typhus, including the section on the latter in Tice's Practice of Medicine (1932). He studied the mechanism of infection and immunity, reporting to the press on cultivation of viruses and Rickettsiae, and he translated and edited Alexandre Besredka's Local Immunisation: Specific Dressings (1927).

PLUGATH HA'YAM, see COLONIES, AGRICULTURAL.

PLUMER, HERBERT CHARLES ONSLOW, first viscount of Messines and of Bilton, British field marshal and High Commissioner for Palestine, b. Torquay, England, 1857; d. London, 1932. He distinguished himself in the Sudan campaign (1884), in the Boer War (1899-1902) and in the first World War. After his governorship in Malta (1919-24) he was called to Palestine to succeed Sir Herbert Samuel as High Commissioner.

Significantly, the chapter in Norman Bentwich's book, England in Palestine, that deals with Lord Plumer's administration (August, 1925, to July, 1928) bears the motto from the book of Judges, "And the land had rest." The chief planks of his policy were quiet administrative reforms and encouragement of agriculture, and the country enjoyed complete tranquillity and security despite the Drusian revolts that shook neighboring Syria. Unfortunately, however, one of the first administrative acts of Plumer, the reorganization of the military forces in Palestine, necessitated by budgetary stringency, was bound to be fatal. He dissolved the so-called Elite Gendarmery, consisting of Arabs, Jews and Cherkesses, and created the Transjordan Frontier Force, destined for service along the eastern frontiers, but excluding Jews from its ranks. The exclusion of Jews caused a storm of protest among Palestinian Jews, and the order had to be rescinded. When, during the Arab riots of 1929, the retired High Commissioner was criticized for his radical reduction of the Palestinian forces, his defenders retorted that Lord Plumer's personality in the country was worth a battalion, and that it was not sufficiently appreciated by the British authorities that, when he left the country, a battalion might be necessary to make up for him.

Among the many reforms initiated by him are the improvement in the condition of the Jaffa port and of the trunk roads, which were gradually asphalted; building of a reinforced road from Rosh Pina to Metullah, securing easy access to the northern frontier in the Huleh region; installation of an auxiliary water supply system for Palestine, securing the city against the danger of drought; beginning of civil aviation in Palestine, which was linked with the Imperial Chain by a station at Gaza, on the way from Egypt to Iraq (1927); effective fight of the agricultural department against the cattle plague and the locusts; relief given in the customs tariff to certain infant industries; provision by the Public Health Department for greater assistance to infant welfare. During Plumer's administration the Revised Immigration Ordinance was also enacted (1925) defining the classes of persons that might be admitted into the country, and a citizenship order-in-council was established which made provisions for Palestinian nationality.

Plumer was the true type of British officer, endowed with a supreme sense of justice and fair play. Although he did not seek popularity, he was profoundly respected and his practical work was appreciated by Jews and Arabs alike. According to Bentwich "he was never tired of insisting with the English official, the Arab and the Jew that the primary need of the country was consolidation, and under his firm hand the country had three years in which that purpose was steadily pursued." The prosperity that Palestine enjoyed under his administration greatly helped to dispel the strong opposition to the British mandate policy. ALFRED WERNER.

Lit.: Harrington, Sir Charles, Plumer of Messines (1935); Bentwich, Norman, England in Palestine (1932); Paassen, Pierre von, "Lord Plumer," The New Palestine, May 29, 1925.

PLUNGIAN (PLUNGIANSKY), MORDECAI, Hebrew writer, b. Plungian, district of Kovno, Lithuania, 1814; d. Vilna, 1883. He studied for the rabbinical office, but was too advanced in ideas for the Orthodox, and earned a scanty living as teacher, and as corrector in a print-shop. He wrote numerous works of a scholarly and biographical nature, such as: Talpioth, on Talmudic hermeneutics (1849); two works entitled Kerem Lishelomoh, commentaries on Ecclesiastes (1851), and Song of Songs (1877); Ben Porath, a biography of Manasseh of Ilye (1858); Shebet Eloah, against the blood accusation (1862); Or Boḳer, on the Masorah in the Talmud (1868). He translated into Yiddish the Hayye Adam and Hochmath Adam of Abraham Danzig.

PNIOWER, OTTO, philologist and historian of literature, b. Gleiwitz, Germany, 1859; d. Berlin, 1932. He devoted himself chiefly to the field of classical German literature, in which he manifested a profound grasp of the subject, a thoroughness in its treatment and a fine critical sense in its presentation. In 1916 he edited and published Richard M. Mayer's Deutsche Literatur bis zum Beginn des 19ten Jahrhunderts. He was an authority on Goethe, Theodore Fontane and Heinrich von Kleist. From 1911 to 1924 he was director of the Märkische Museum in Berlin; this position enabled him to write his fundamental work, Bilder aus Berlin 1795-1860. In 1922 he became curator of all works of art in Berlin, and was presented with the Leibnitz gold medal by the Berlin Academy of Science.

Pniower's other works include: Goethe's Faust (1899); Die Briefe Theodore Fontanes (1910); Dichter und Dichtung (1912); Goethe in Berlin und Potsdam (1925). He renounced Judaism in 1927.

PO, LENA, blind sculptress, b. Ekaterinoslav, Russia, 1900. Although her early inclinations were toward sculpture, it was to ballet dancing that Lena Po first turned, graduating from the ballet school in Ekaterinoslav in 1919. Three years later the Trade Union of Art Workers arranged for her to continue her studies in Moscow. Here, again, she passed the entrance examinations for the study of sculpture, but conflicting hours made it impossible to devote herself to both dancing and sculpture, and she chose dancing.

In 1935 she lost one leg and the sight of both eyes as the result of an infection. Before losing her vision she had amused herself in the hospital by modelling mice out of bread crumbs. Later she was urged to continue her modelling in clay, and despite her blindness, the figures she produced found their way into the Tretyakov Galleries in Moscow. Among these were Dance (1936); The Leap (1937); and The Poet's Childhood (1937). A continuation of the infection eventually deprived her of her other leg.

POALE ZION. The Poale Zion ("Workers of Zion") is as old as political Zionism. The first two Poale Zion groups in Minsk, White Russia, and Lemberg, Galicia, were organized in 1897, immediately after the First Zionist Congress. Other groups were organized spontaneously in various parts of Russia, Galicia, Western Europe, and in the United States.

They were hardly aware of each other's existence, and consequently their programs were anything but uniform, except the affirmation of the possibility of a synthesis of Zionism and Socialism.

The majority of the Poale Zion were of the opinion that the most obvious evils of modern society should be made impossible in the upbuilding of the new Jewish community in Palestine. They stood for the cooperative idea, particularly in the agricultural field, and due to their influence the first cooperative settlements in Palestine were created. They believed that at least some of the more objectionable features of capitalism could be prevented in Palestine if it were to be built from the beginning along cooperative lines.

The Poale Zion groups held their first world conference at The Hague in 1907. There the World Federation of the Poale Zion was founded, and recognized as a Sonderverband (special group) in the World Zionist Organization. The conference adopted a broad program covering the essential aims of the movement, leaving a considerable measure of autonomy to the constituted parties in all questions of doctrine and tactics.

Up to the first World War, the activities of the Poale Zion Party were mainly of a propagandistic and educational nature. It fought anti-Zionist prejudices in the Jewish labor movement, tried to win the sympathy of non-Jewish Socialists for Zionism, worked for secular Jewish education, and sent pioneers to Palestine.

The efforts of the Poale Zion to receive the recognition of a Socialist movement were crowned with success in 1916, when it was first admitted into the Socialist International. Since then the aspirations of the Zionist labor movement enjoyed the support of the Socialist movement, particularly of the British Labor Party.

The split in the Socialist movement after the first World War left its mark on the Poale Zion movement. The leftist elements broke with the movement. The others, among whom the parties in America and Palestine were the largest groups, formed the Poale Zion World Confederation.

As a result of the War and the greatly increased immigration to Palestine of the post-War years, the center of the Poale Zion movement gradually shifted to Palestine. The Poale Zion Party in Palestine (under the name of Ahduth Haabodah) played a leading role in the organization of the Jewish community, progress of colonization and the labor movement in the period between the two World Wars. During this period it was consistently the majority party in the general Federation of Jewish Labor in Palestine (Histadruth Haobedim), controlling approximately 70 per cent of the votes at its conventions. The Palestine Party deeply influenced its sister parties in the Diaspora, of which those in Poland and the United States were the strongest in number and influence. The strength of the Poale Zion Party in the World Zionist Organization was constantly on the increase during this period. In 1927 it received 22 per cent of all the votes to the World Zionist Congress; in 1939 over 44 per cent of the votes to the Congress were given to the Labor Zionists in the various countries.

In 1932 the Poale Zion World Confederation united with the Tzeire Zion Hithahduth, a non-Marxian Labor Zionist party. This amalgamation did much to increase the strength and influence of the organization, particularly in Palestine and the United States.

The first American Poale Zion group was founded in New York city in 1903. In its first years its propaganda met with strong resistance on the part of the Jewish workers, who were largely influenced by the anti-nationalist socialism which, at that time, dominated the Jewish labor movement. Besides its propagandistic activities, the American Poale Zion was instrumental in founding the secular Jewish folk schools, and engaged in various activities on behalf of the Jewish workers in Palestine.

During the first World War the Poale Zion took the initiative in the establishment of the Jewish Legion that fought on the side of the Allied army in Egypt and in Palestine. Most of the membership of the Poale Zion in the United States who were of the required age enlisted in that Legion. The veterans of the Jewish Legion were, in 1942, still connected ideologically with the Poale Zion.

After the first World War the scope of activity grew considerably. The Poale Zion took the initiative in founding the National Labor Committee for Palestine, which up to 1942 raised over a million dollars for the Histadruth. The Poale Zion founded the Jewish National Workers' Alliance, a thriving fraternal organization, and the Pioneer Women's Organization, the second in membership among the Zionist women's organizations in the United States. These organizations were identified with the Poale Zion in ideology and shared in many practical activities and leadership. The youth was organized in the Habonim, a nation-wide organization of young people which participates in all Labor Zionist activities. The organization maintained (1942) nine summer camps, where its members devoted their time to the study of various problems connected with Palestine and the labor movement. Some of its members went to Palestine, where they joined several workers' collectives.

The Poale Zion Party of America, in 1942, published a Yiddish weekly, the Yiddisher Kemfer, and a monthly, the Jewish Frontier, both edited by Hayim Greenberg.

The members of the World Central Bureau (Ichud) of the Poale Zion Zeire Zion Organization in 1942 were: Joseph Sprinzak, Shlomo Kaplansky, David ben Gurion, Eliezer Kaplan, Anshel Reiss, Georg Landauer, Melech Neustadt, Benjamin West and Chaim Shurer.

The members of the Central Committee of the Poale Zion Zeire Zion Organization (1942) included: David Wertheim, national secretary; A. Arial, Abraham Balfour, S. Bonchek, Mayer Brown, Zev Baumgold, Abraham Cohen, Pinchus Cruso, H. Ehrenreich, Sarah Feder, M. Goodman, P. Gingold, Hayim Greenberg, Shlomo Grodzensky, L. Glantz, I. Hamlin, Dr. H. Fineman, B. Itzkowitz, M. Kekst, J. Lemberger, David Pinsky, L. Rubenstein, A. Revusky, Dvorah Rotbard, S. Sokal, Louis Segal, Boruch Zukerman.

The members of the National Executive of the Pioneer Women's Organization in 1942 were: Leah Brown, Ida Ehrenreich, Sara Feder, Bert Goldstein, Sarah Kahn, Sonia Kamenetzky, Miriam Kubowitzki, Sonia Lehr, Dunia Margolis, May Bere Mereminsky, Blanche Mogil; Dvora Rothbard, National Secretary; Anna Schlossber, Alta Sher, Yehudith Simchonit, Marie Syrkin-Resnikof, Sophie Udin, Anna Waxberg, Rivkah Wohl and Nina Zukerman.

The members of the Central Committee of the Habonim —Labor Zionist Youth in 1942 included: Leon Adler; David Breslau, executive secretary; Shirley Goldberg, Nachum Guttman, Shimon Kauffman, Ari Lashner, Shirley Levin, Paul Milgrom, Kieve Skidell and Mignon Weiss.

DAVID WERTHEIM.

POALEI AGUDATH ISRAEL. The Poalei Agudath Israel was first organized in Poland in 1920 as a labor organization within the Agudath Israel world organization. Its membership was about 65,000 in the late 1920's. In Poland, Lithuania, Latvia and Germany the Poalei Agudath Israel prepared Jewish youths in Hachsharah (agricultural training camps) for immigration into Palestine. In Palestine, the Poalei Agudath Israel was organized in 1924. It established several agricultural settlements, maintained trade schools, and instituted courses on subjects general and religious. Among its institutions were also cooperatives, a non-profit bank and a sickness insurance fund. It participated actively and outstandingly in the defense of the Palestine Jewish settlement during the Arab riots and in the second World War. In 1942 the Poalei Agudath Israel, with a membership of 10,000, had thirty branches in Palestine. Its headquarters were in Tel-Aviv.

In 1939 a movement for the Poalei Agudath Israel started in the United States, at first with a view to support the organization in Palestine, but from 1941 on the movement began to spread among Jewish workers in the United States.

PODELL, DAVID LOUIS, lawyer, b. Russia, 1884. He was brought to the United States as a boy, and educated in New York city, where he was admitted to the bar in 1907, then established a successful private practice. His first important public post was an appointment as special assistant United States attorney to be in charge of the trial of anti-trust cases; in this capacity he served from 1921 to 1924, successfully conducting several notable cases. Before the Supreme Court of the United States he defended the constitutionality of rent laws. In 1933, at the suggestion of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Podell served on the Wagner Committee and assisted in the formulation of the National Industrial Recovery Act. From 1938 to 1941 he was again prosecuting attorney for the government in anti-trust litigation. Podell lectured at the College of the City of New York on trial of cases in 1917 to 1918, and on cross-examination at Columbia University Law School in 1932. He contributed noteworthy articles to law literature on anti-trust laws.

Active in the Jewish community, Podell was elected a trustee of the New York Federation of Jewish Charities (1927) and of the Educational Alliance (1922), and was made president of Beth Israel Hospital (1935). He became a director of America's Good Will Union.

PODOLSKY, EDWARD, physician and writer, b. New York city, 1902. In New York he was appointed to the staffs of several hospitals, and was made director of the Diabetes Research Clinic of New York. In 1940 he became clinical instructor in cardiology at New York Medical College, and that year joined the staff of the Fifth Avenue and Flower hospitals in the city. He was still active in these posts in 1942. Podolsky contributed extensively to popular and scientific medical literature, publishing in the United States, England, India, Egypt, Africa and Burma.

He was associate editor of Modern Psychologist (1934), and editor of the Diabetes Review (1936); in 1935 he served as advisory editor of the Indian Journal of Venerology. He was likewise editor of Progressive Medicine. His numerous writings include: Medicine Marches On (1934); Young Women Past Forty (1934); Old Age Postponed (1936); The Diabetes Specialist (1938); The Doctor Prescribes Color (1938); The Doctor Prescribes Music (1939); Worry and Disease (1940); The War on Cancer (1942); Sex Life Today in Wedded Life (1942).

POETRY, HEBREW. 1. In the Bible. The knowledge of Hebrew poetry has been considerably enlarged in the 19th and 20th centuries, but it can not be said that scholars are agreed in all particulars.

Drama is almost completely absent from Biblical literature. The nearest approaches to it are the alternate recitations of verses (as in Ps. 118), or of solos with choruses (Ps. 113). Job is cast in the form of a dialogue, but was not intended for production on the stage; some have thought, however, that Song of Songs is the fragment of a dramatic poem.

Epic poetry occurs in some psalms (Ps. 105 to 107) and many Biblical narratives have an epic strain. However, it is more of a prose nature, lacking the characteristic parallelism of Biblical poetry; this is found only in snatches here and there, especially at the beginning of separate passages (Gen. 2:5; 21:1), and in speeches (Gen. 3:14-19). Many verses of the Bible can be read rhythmically, especially in the opening stories in Genesis, which are for the most part legends or ancient tales that have been used by poets and may therefore have carried over some of the poetic diction in the course of their transmission.

The real poetry of the Bible is of three types, which appear chronologically in the following order: lyric poetry, prophetic rhetoric, and didactic poetry. Lyric poetry was prevalent in the earliest period, and though bound by traditional rules, takes many forms. It accompanied all important functions of life: birth, marriage, death, spring and harvest, work such as the digging of wells, worship, war and victory. It is always an anonymous popular song, secular in nature, composed for a concrete occurrence. The Bible refers to songs of harlots, watchers and of love as being of common use. The only poetry with a religious coloring is that which is national: the Blessings of Jacob and Moses, the prophecies of Balaam, and the songs sung at the beginning and end of a war.

In contrast to this, the later lyric poetry is almost always religious, even in depictions of nature, or songs about sickness, or fortune and misfortune. The true religious lyric (as in Psalms, or similar compositions scattered in the Prophets) is either a ritualistic chorus, an individual prayer, or a religious poem which has no reference to worship; it may contain any kind of religious feeling. The only later lyrics without religious coloring are the songs of love and marriage in Song of Songs.

Prophetic rhetoric makes use of many of the forms of the older lyric poetry, but changes and expands it. The older prophets composed short poetic pieces, while those of the later times wrote longer poems; both, however, wrote their visions in prose. Beginning with Ezekiel, the prophets wrote books as well as delivered speeches, and poetry was gradually replaced by prose in the utterances; it is only in the last chapters of Isaiah that a breath of poetry appears again. The prophetic warnings and promises reflect their ethical aims and are the chief constituents of their poetry; a lyric note appears only when they pray or give descriptions of a better future. They make use of such artistic forms as demonic and mysterious meanings, inexactness in numbers, places and effective forces, allegories, secret words, mythological allusions, abrupt beginnings and rapid changes, and concrete depictions, especially of the future as if it were present before them; they address personified trees, mountains and similar objects; they glide from their own words into a direct address by God; they use standing formulas at the beginning and end of their utterances. In the later period they become more the teacher; they use the style of the preacher, the adviser, or the one who replies to a question; they tell stories, they conduct an argument. Thus prophetic rhetoric gradually passes over into didactic poetry.

Didactic poetry has the same admonitory purpose as prophetic rhetoric, but employs a milder manner; it teaches, it appeals to reason and emotion, and strives to influence more by persuasion than by power. It was preceded by the half-poetic parable (Mashal) of the pre-Exilic period. The time when didactic poetry flourished was at the beginning of the Greek period (4th cent. B.C.E.). It produced theorizing books of religious scepticism, such as Job and Ecclesiastes, and ethical optimism, such as Proverbs and Sirach. It makes use of various forms, almost universally employs hexameter verses, and has for content a universal, timeless, popular and noble ethics based on monotheism.

Job is probably the greatest of all Biblical poems. It employs every form of the poetic art: a didactic purpose, lyricism that is full of feeling, a dramatic form, prophetic force, beauty of diction and wealth of vocabulary. It is the only book in which the poetic purpose receives the same stress as the religious aim.

As a rule the Bible uses poetry only as an aid to religious purposes. The fact that both its prophecy and its lore (observations of nature, history and philosophy) are often cast in poetic form shows that the yearning to express one's ideas in the form of poetry was very strong in ancient Israel.

The Hebrew text of the Bible makes no distinction in the way in which it writes down prose and poetry, with the exception of Ex. 15, Deut. 32, Judges 5, II Sam. 22 (equals Ps. 18) and Ps. 136. Certain passages are recognizable as poems because they follow an alphabetic acrostic (Lam. 1 to 4; Ps. 34, 119 and 145). Refrains occasionally occur (Isa. 9; Ps. 42 and 43); sometimes the poem is constructed so as to begin and end with the same words (Isa. 1:21-26; Ps. 103); alliteration is of frequent occurrence (Isa. 40:1; Ps. 1:1) and there is an occasional use of rhymes or assonance (Gen. 4:23; Ps. 54).

A common characteristic of Biblical poetry is parallelism. Each verse falls into two halves, which are either similar in thought (synonymous parallelism), contrasting (antithetic parallelism) or supplementary (synthetic parallelism). The absence of a parallel section usually indicates text corruption; sometimes, however, strophes are constructed with a deliberately irregular number of half-verses (Ps. 45 and 93). In rare instances verses are in two parts, but there is no parallelism (Ps. 113:2).

Hebrew poetry in the Bible has no regular metre, but a rhythm based on accents; the length of the verse is measured by the number of accented syllables, disregarding the intermediate unaccented syllables, which may be anywhere from none to four. Each word is given at least one accent, with the exception of small particles and prepositions, especially as these are often joined to the more important words; longer words sometimes have two accents.

The character of Hebrew rhythm is nearly always a combination of iambic and anapest, which gives it a very lively nature. The contrast between such poetry and the general ponderousness and solemnity of the Hebrew language is so great that it gives the former an exciting diction which is not always suitable to the content of the poem.

The length of the verse is not always dependent on the content of the poem; it is often varied, in order to produce an artistic effect. There are never less than three nor more than eight accents. Trimeters are of rare occurrence (Ps. 2 and 93). Tetrameters are often used in groups of three as a substitute for two hexameters (Isa. 9:8-9). The pentameter always has three accents in the first half and two in the second. This form was first discovered by Budde in Lamentations, and he therefore called it the Kinah ("lamentation") verse. It is found, however, in numerous other places, such as Gen. 3:22; Ps. 19:8-9; Isa. 51:17-18.

The hexameter is the most frequent form in Hebrew poetry; it has either one or two caesuras, dividing it into two parts of three beats each, and three of two beats each, respectively. According to Sievers the heptameter is the verse of epic Hebrew poetry; it is divided into three and four beats, or four and three beats, or, more rarely, two, three and two. The octameter can have a single division (four and four) or two (three, two and three beats, Isa. 6:3; two, three and three, Ps. 6:7; three, three and two, Ps. 27:11). The later poets use mostly free long verses.

The strophes have different numbers of verses, ranging from two to twelve. In many cases there are no regular strophes, or they vary within a given poem. Sometimes several verses are used as an introduction or epilogue. The length of the lines sometimes varies within the strophe, but as a rule the various strophes are of the same type (for instance, Ex. 15; Isa. 12:21-26, a double strophe which occurs frequently, as in Micah 4:1-4; 6:1-8). The length of the lines in the strophes often corresponds to the changes in the sequence. In many cases the number of accents is the same in every strophe, although they are differently distributed in the individual verses (as in Isa. 40:1-4, 6-8, where there are two strophes of four lines each with alternations of half-verses of three and two accents), a variation in technique which bespeaks a good schooling and a fine feeling on the part of the poet and his public.

Biblical poetry employs the same general figures of speech that are common in all literatures. A striking fact is the concretizing of all abstract ideas (abstraction is almost completely absent) and the omission of all ornamental adjectives—Palestine poetry remained naive for a thousand years—as well as the Oriental abundance of pictures and comparisons, sometimes to excess. HUGO FUCHS.

2. In the Middle Ages. a. Religious Poetry. Divine worship was the central point of Jewish life; yet it was short and simple up to the 7th cent. and it was only gradually that the basic prayers were supplemented by poetic pieces which drew their material from the Bible, the Talmud and the Midrash. The desire to shed lustre upon the services through poetic prayers, as well as that to pray in an individual manner, to express one's individual religious feelings, and to relieve sorrow through prayers, added to the old formulas of prayer a number of artistic poems, hymns, elegies and supplications, created by the Payetanim from the 7th cent. on. These religious poems are known as Piyutim and are classified, according to their position in the service, as Yotzeroth, Ofannim, Zulath, Geulah, Keroba, Kedushah and other similar titles. If they are elegiac in nature, they are called Selihoth, as they are used during the Penitential Days when forgiveness of God is sought, or as Kinoth, especially when they were intended for the Ninth of Ab or to commemorate the martyrs of the Middle Ages.

Biblical Hebrew presented great difficulties to the poets, and they created a new poetic language of their own with the aid of the vocabulary of the Talmud, Midrash and Targum; this at the same time served as a development of the Biblical Hebrew. In this process new formations came into vogue, some of which were not grammatically correct; voices, such as those of Abraham ibn Ezra, were raised now and then against this corruption of the Hebrew language. Nevertheless this writing of poems became very widespread, and Jewish poetry again reached a height, sometimes almost the equal of classical Hebrew poetry.

The new religious lyric poetry arose in Palestine, and soon found its imitators in Southern France. In Germany and France the painful impressions of the persecutions of the Jews led to a preference for Selihoth. In more fortunate Spain it was the poet's own talents, his inner compulsion, that lent him wings; in Germany, France and other countries, it was the misery of barbaric persecutions that caused the poets to take up their pens. Only a few of the earlier Payetanim are known by name; most of the poems are anonymous. The first poet definitely known to history is Jose ben Jose (about 650), in Palestine. In the 8th cent. that country was the home of the prolific poet Jannai, whose pupil Eleazar Kalir later became the model for Saadia.

In the following centuries synagogue poets were prominent in Europe, such as Solomon ben Judah Hababli of Rome (about 950), a contemporary of Shephatiah in the Byzantine Empire. From Italy, too, came the renowned Kalonymus family, which migrated to Germany in 982. The Payetan Simeon ben Isaac of Mayence (about 1000) wrote numerous verses in the style of Kalir. The feelings aroused by the persecutions of the Crusades found expression in the Selihoth and elegies of Gershom ben Judah and Benjamin ben Zerah (11th cent.), Eleazar ben Judah, Elijah ben Shemaiah of Bari, in southern Italy, Menahem ben Machir of Regensburg, Solomon ben Isaac (Rashi), Meir ben Isaac of Worms, Jacob ben Meir (Rabbenu Tam), Kalonymus ben Judah of Mayence, David ben Meshullam, Eliezer ben Nathan, Ephraim ben Isaac, Ephraim ben Jacob, Meir ben Baruch, Judah ben Samuel of Regensburg (d. 1216), Meir of Rothenburg and Isaac ben Solomon.

The finest Piyut poetry was composed in Spain in the 12th cent. The writers followed the style of Kalir, but possessed enough power and imagination to free themselves completely from the influence of their master and go their own way. The first representative of synagogal poetry in Spain was Joseph ben Isaac ibn Abitur. Of related poetic style is the writing of Isaac ben Judah ibn Ghayyat (d. 1089), whose pupil Moses ben Jacob ibn Ezra (d. after 1138), together with Solomon ibn Gabirol and Judah Halevi, brought the religious poetry of Spanish Jewry to its highest point of perfection. Abraham ibn Ezra, whose religious poems were very popular, had a great influence upon the Jewish liturgy. The last of these poems to find acceptance was the Lechah Dodi of Solomon Halevi Alkabetz (about 1500), a member of the Cabalist group. Since that time there have been no poetic additions to the prayerbook itself, though later religious poetry, arising under the influence of mystical movements, continued to be written, especially in the Orient, down to the present day.

b. Secular Poetry. Although traces of religious poetry can be found almost uninterruptedly from the close of the Biblical period, all the way through the Talmudic and Gaonic periods, secular Jewish poetry can show no notable representatives. The poetry that has survived from this period is mainly didactic and the few secular poems are of an epigrammatic nature (topical poems to a particular address). On the other hand, there were many secular Jewish poets in Arabia both before and after the appearance of Mohammed; but these poets, such as Samuel ibn Adiya, wrote in the vernacular. It was only in the 10th cent., first in Spain, and later in Provence and Italy, that a secular Hebrew poetry arose, which is inferior to no artistic writing in the world in beauty, euphony and wealth of ideas. A lasting influence upon the development of the new Hebrew poetry was wielded by Dunash ibn Labrat, whom Hebrew poetry has to thank for the introduction of meter in the Arabic manner. Secular poetry advanced hand and hand with the development of Hebrew in the later Middle Ages among Jews all over the world. Arabic influence was more lasting upon Jewish secular poetry than it had been upon Jewish religious poetry. Secular poems of Samuel Hanagid, including a war poem, have been preserved. But it was Moses ibn Ezra in particular who brought such secular subjects as wine and love, joy and friendship, jest and earnest, and the like, into the realm of Hebrew poetry. Solomon ibn Gabirol and Judah Halevi wrote not only religious poems (shire ḳodesh) but also secular songs (shire hol). Abraham ibn Ezra was the first to make use of satire, and he was followed by the last representative of the old classical school, though not the last poet on Spanish soil—Judah Alharizi, the clever writer of Makamas.

The most prominent secular poets were Immanuel ben Solomon of Rome and Isaac Rieti. Other important representatives of this branch of Hebrew literature were Joseph ben Meir ibn Zabara, Judah ben Isaac Sabbatai, Abraham ibn Hasdai, Berechiah ben Natronai Hanakdan, Isaac ben Solomon ibn Zahula, Abraham and Jedaiah Bedaresi, Kalonymus ben Kalonymus, and Solomon ben Reuben Bonafed. In modern times, when secular influence became much stronger, secular Hebrew poetry entirely outstripped religious poetry. ALEXANDER KRISTIANPOLLER.

The oldest Hebrew poetry of the Middle Ages is but little more than exalted prose; it was only gradually that poets began to write verse that was divided into separate stanzas, or composed of lines of equal length. It can not be exactly determined just when Hebrew poets adopted rhymes and acrostics; the latter served the purpose of making known the author's name or of giving Biblical words in their proper sequence or in various arrangements. A highly developed artistic poetry arose among the older Palestinian Payetanim (about 600-900). Of decisive importance was the adoption of Arabic prosody (no later than the first half of the 10th cent.), which, when some of its characteristics were removed, was very suitable for Hebrew.

The poets of the Spanish school and their successors in Provence, Italy, Asia and Africa made use of the Arabic meters in the secular poems and sometimes in Piyutim; on the other hand, nearly all the poets of northern France and of the Germanic and Slavic countries wrote non-metrical poetry. Spanish-Arabic prosody is based on the quantitative principle. The elements that form the syllables are the Tenuah (–) and the Yathed (u–), the combinations of which form the basis for all Hebrew meters. Fourteen of the sixteen chief Arabic meters are used in Hebrew poetry. The favorite of these are the Wafir (u– – – | u– – – | u– –) and the Kamil (– – u– | – – u– | – – [u] –). Each rhyme verse (Bayith) consists of two half-verses (Deleth and Soger). The rhyme (Haruz) in the second half-verse, following Arabic models, is often the same for the entire poem, even though the latter may consist of hundreds of verses; but the strophic "girdle poems" (Mubashahath) have various rhymes. A favorite form of rhyme was the tejnis, in which the rhyme consisted of words with the same sound but different meanings. Artificial forms such as echo rhymes, poems in the form of figures, written in more than one language at the same time, or having all the words beginning with the same letter of the alphabet, begin to appear in the Spanish period, but were employed far more frequently at a later time (16th to 18th cent.). The terminology of Spanish Hebrew poetry is largely borrowed from that of the Arabs; in addition to terms that are translated, there are found such purely Arab ones as Diwan, Kaside, Ghazal, Marthiya or Moztedjab. Rhymed prose was very frequent in letters, and Makamas were the favorite form of composition.

Beginning with the 13th cent. Provençal and Italian influences are felt in Hebrew poetry. The new forms of the sonnet, the terzina, the sixtina, the octava, and the decima now come into use. The Italian Jews retained the Spanish Hebrew prosody, but often accommodated to the poetic forms of their vernacular; thus the Kamil meter, with them, corresponded to the undecameter of the Italians (endecasillabo) and hence was preferred.

The forms of Hebrew poetry were repeatedly treated in special writings of Jewish authors. The most important of these are Moses and Abraham ibn Ezra (12th cent.), David ibn Billa (14th cent.), Absalom Mizrahi (15th cent.), Saadia ibn Danaan (1473), Moses ibn Habib (1486), the anonymous Shekel Hakodesh (1506), Immanuel of Benevente (1557), Samuel Archivolti and Jacob Roman (beginning of the 17th cent.), Moses Abudiente (1633), Joshua Benveniste (1635), Moses Raphael d' Aguilar (1661), Solomon d'Oliveyra (1663), Immanuel Frances (1677), Gershom Gentili (1700), Moses Hayim Luzzatto (1724) and Simhah Calimani (1754). Books of rhymes are also extant, such as those of Saadia and of Solomon Poggibonsi of the 15th cent.

3. In Modern Times. Beginning with the second half of the 18th cent., the Hebrew poetry of the Germanic and Slavonic lands becomes of increasing importance. The Ashkenazic pronunciation and accentuation of Hebrew gains the preference; and the quantitative form or prosody is replaced by a system based on accents. Vocal Sheva is not considered a separate symbol and rhymes are permitted which include letters that sound unalike in Sephardic pronunciation, but alike in the Ashkenazic, such as Samech and Tav without the Dagesh. The use of meter based on accents made possible the employment of the various meters of European poetry, and hence modern Hebrew poetry has the same rhythm as modern English verse. The verses of the most important modern Hebrew poets, such as Micah Joseph Lebensohn, Judah Leon Gordon, Chaim Nachman Bialik, and Tschernikovsky, can only be read in the Ashkenazic pronunciation; these poets have paid especial attention to the problems of Hebrew metrics and have made use of difficult forms of composition in numerous poems. This German and Slavic prosody was bitterly attacked by the Italian Jews, although they permitted some modifications in the Spanish and Arabic rules, as can be seen from the writings of Romanelli (1799), Anania Coen (1822), Samuel David Luzzatto (1865), Lelio della Torre (1868) and Vittorio Castiglioni (1890). The Jews of Asia and Africa still follow the Arabic rules in their poetry.

In the 20th cent. the use of the Sephardic pronunciation in the Hebrew spoken in Palestine has led poets there to compose poems in that pronunciation, but based on the principle of accentuation.

See also: FABLES; LITERATURE, HEBREW; MAKAMA; SATIRE; TROUBADOURS. JEFIM SCHIRMANN.

Lit.: Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 93-100; Waxman, M., A History of Jewish Literature (4 vols., 1930-41); Sievers, E., Metrische Untersuchungen; Kraft, C. P., The Stropic Structure of Hebrew Poetry (1938); Fein, Harry F., Titans of Hebrew Verse (1936); Davidson, Israel, in Jewish Quarterly Review, New Series, vol. 29 (1938-39) 345-87; vol. 30 (1939-40) 299-398; idem, in Hebrew Union College Annual, vols. 12-13 (1937-38) 715-823; idem, Otzar Hashirah Vehapiyut (4 vols., 1924-33); Bernstein, S., Anthology of Hebrew Poems of Italy, 16th to 18th Centuries (1938-39); idem, in Horeb, vol. 5 (1940); Schirmann, Jefim, in Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, vol. 81 (1937) 131-40; Segal, M. Z., in Klausner Anniversary Book (1937) 90-108; Halper, Post-Biblical Hebrew Literature; Fleg, Jewish Anthology; Brody, Anthologia Hebraica; Zunz, L., Literaturgeschichte der synagogalen Poesie; idem, Synagogale Poesie des Mittelalters.

POGÁNY, JÓZSEF, public official, b. Hungary, 1886; place of birth unknown. A member of the Social Democratic party of Hungary, he collaborated (before and during the first World War) on its publications Népszava (People's Voice) and Szocializmus. He edited the periodical Tudás (Knowledge) and a series of publications known as the library of natural sciences. In the post-War revolution (1918) he was a leading member of the soldiers' council and strongly opposed to the communists. When, however, the latter took over the government (1919), he joined them as one of the war commissars. His play, Napoleon, was performed in Budapest. After the downfall of the communist government, he emigrated to Vienna and subsequently to Soviet Russia, where he was reported living in 1942, and whence, prior to falling into disfavor because of Trotzkyite activities, he used to serve as secret emissary in countries abroad.

POHL, MAX, actor, b. Nikolsburg, Moravia, 1855; d. Berlin, 1935. He first studied law in Vienna, and then became an actor. After various ventures on minor stages, he subsequently appeared in important roles in Hamburg and Moscow. He became a star character player with the Deutsches Theatre in Berlin. In 1894 he joined the staff of the Königliches Schauspielhaus in Berlin, performing as Lear, Mephisto and Shylock, as well as taking parts in dramas by Anzengruber (for example, Wurzelsepp). For several years Pohl headed the Deutsche Bühnengenossenschaft.

Lit.: Pohl, Max, Vierzig Jahre Rampenlicht (1919).

POGROMS. The Russian word pogrom, which literally means "disturbance" or "riot," has in the course of time come to denote all violent attacks directed against the Jews in particular.

Up to 1881 the only pogroms were three in Odessa (1821, 1859 and 1871) and a minor one in Akkerman in 1862. After 1881, however, they became a continuous menace and almost a "normal" phenomenon of Jewish life in Russia; as time went on they became increasingly cruel in character. From April to June, 1881, a series of pogroms broke out in larger and smaller places in southern and southwestern Russia; in the other parts of the empire there was only one, at Warsaw in December. The heaviest of these attacks were at Elisabethgrad, where the first pogrom occurred on April 15th to 17th (Old Style), and at Kiev, Odessa, Smela and Neshin. In many places the police and soldiers stood idly by and watched the progress of the rioters. The outbreak of these pogroms was to a certain extent connected with the assassination of Alexander II by revolutionaries in the same year. The reactionary parties strove to divert the discontent of the people with the government and its corruption by telling them that their plight was due to the exploitation practised upon them by the Jews, and not to any fault of the government. At the same time, a report spread among the people that Alexander II had been assassinated by the Jews, and that the new czar had issued an order allowing them to plunder the Jews; however, the officials, it was claimed, bribed by the Jews, had suppressed this order. Many of these pogroms showed plain evidence of the work of agitators who stirred up the masses and even led them. Some of the educated classes even held that the blame for the pogroms rested upon the Jews themselves, since Judaism, they said, was essentially hostile to Christian civilization and the Jews were attempting to gain dominion over the world through their wealth. On the other hand, some of the revolutionaries saw in the pogroms a welcome indication of the restlessness of the masses. But later, as the true nature and mechanics of the pogroms became evident, a decisive stand against them was taken both by the liberals and by the larger part of the conservatives.

The pogroms recurred at Easter, 1882, in some cities; the severest of them was that at Balta. Others occurred in 1883, the most vicious being at Rostov on Don, Yekaterinoslav and Kriwoirog. In 1884 occurred the first case of a pogrom outside of the Pale of Settlement, at Nizhnii-Novgorod; in this a few Jews were killed. The governor of the city explained the pogrom by declaring that "the riots were directed against the Jews because the population were convinced that there would be little or no punishment for crimes that were committed upon the Jews."

Although the Russian government officially denounced the pogroms, and Alexander III, on May 24, 1881, stated to a Jewish delegation that the pogroms were the work of anarchists, Ignatiev, minister of the interior, named commissions in the Pale of Settlement to determine "which aspects of the economic activities of the Jews were detrimental to the life of the natives, and what legal and administrative measures should be taken in order to prevent them." The idea behind the activities of these commissions was that the Jews, "due to their solidarity, with few exceptions, devoted their powers not to increasing the productive power of the nation, but to exploiting the natives, especially the poorest classes." Most of these commissions were very hostile to the Jews. Thus the Vilna commission expressed itself as follows: "The Jews possess no fatherland; they acknowledge only the authority of the Kahal and form a state within the state, against which they wage an eternal and bitter economic war." It was on the basis of these opinions of the commissions that the "provisional rules" of May 3, 1882, were issued. The government named a commission (the Pahlen Commission) to make a more objective study of the "Jewish question." This commission came to the conclusion that the organs of the government were responsible for the pogroms, since they had not energetically intervened against the disturbers of the peace, and suggested that the authorities be made responsible for the pogroms. The same view was expressed in a circular letter issued by the minister of the interior, Count D. Tolstoi, on June 22, 1882, in which he made the governors of the provinces personally responsible for any excesses.

From that time on there were no more pogroms for about twenty years. Then a pogrom broke out in Kishinev at Easter, 1903. It lasted for three days, during which forty-five Jews were killed, eighty-six were severely, and some hundreds slightly injured, and 700 Jewish-owned houses and 600 shops were demolished. The pogrom, which was preceded by a violent anti-Semitic agitation in the local press, bore the marks of careful organization. After the pogrom the government directed the lower officials to protect the population against riots, but at the same time forbade the Jews to organize a self-defense and warned the Jewish press not to publish what had happened during the attacks. Prince Urussov, who was appointed governor of Bessarabia after the pogrom, testifies in his memoirs that pogroms took place only because a policy of pogroms was favored by leading members of the government, who were actively sympathetic to Krushevan's campaign of agitation. The trial of the pogrom rioters took place at the end of 1903. The investigation proved that the public officials of Kishinev were undoubtedly to blame for the pogrom because of their passive behavior; many were of the opinion that the pogrom had been directly ordered by the government. While this is an exaggeration, it is true that the reactionary regime of the minister of the interior, Plehve, which sought to establish absolutism in Russia by any and every means, was extremely hostile to the Jews.

From that time on pogroms were used by the government and the reactionary parties in Russia as a means of fighting the revolutionary movement. Pogroms conducted toward this end took place at Homel in August, 1903, and at Zhitomir in April, 1904. But pogroms did not multiply in number until October, 1905, immediately after the publication of the first Russian constitution on October 17th (Old Style). The demonstrations of the liberals because of this manifesto became the occasion for counter-demonstrations on the part of the reactionaries, which in many places took the form of extremely brutal anti-Jewish outbreaks. In the period from October 18th to 29th (Old Style) pogroms took place in 660 larger and smaller localities, and in some more than once; altogether this period of twelve days witnessed 690 pogroms, of which all but twenty-four were within the Pale of Settlement. As a result of these, 810 Jews were killed and 770 severely injured, not including those Jews who died later as a result of the excitement and the women who were violated and subsequently committed suicide. The investigation of these occurrences by the government representatives showed that the police and soldiers had not only generally looked passively upon the riots, but had often intervened to assist them, while at the same time proceeding against the Jewish self-defense organizations which had been organized in a number of places and treating them as if they were revolutionary assemblages. All these pogroms plainly revealed the activities of the reactionary groups known as the Black Hundreds, an organization which played a provocatory part and played upon the greed, fierceness and ignorance of the masses. They were in close relationship with the organs of the police, and everywhere enjoyed the passive, and in many places the active, assistance of the authorities. The individuals who were convicted and sentenced by the courts for participating in pogroms were generally pardoned by the czar. About three million dollars were raised in countries outside of Russia for the aid of the victims of the pogroms of October, 1905. In 1906 there were pogroms at Bialystok (June) and Siedlce (August); there were again many killed and injured, and the participation of the authorities was definitely proved.

While these pogroms showed a more or less favorable attitude on the part of the authorities as a factor, those which took place in 1917 and 1918, during the second Russian revolution and during the civil war, were plainly due to the soldiers. ISAAK LEWIN.

The revolution of February, 1917, which brought full equality to the Jews of Russia, was accompanied by no anti-Jewish excesses, although the monarchistic groups conducted a vigorous anti-Semitic propaganda campaign. It was only after the seizure of control by the Bolsheviks and during the civil war that ensued that a horrible wave of pogroms passed over the country, from which the Jews of the Ukraine were the greatest sufferers. In that area the fight against communism was fiercer than in other parts of Russia. Those in power changed ten and fifteen times. In the Ukraine the antagonism between the anti-communistic villagers and the cities under Soviet rule was very strong, and chauvinistic Ukrainian elements made use of this feeling to stir up the peasants against the Jews, who lived for the most part in the cities and therefore were represented to a large degree in the Soviet institutions. In addition, the Ukraine was invaded by the armies of Denikin which, under the guise of a fight against Bolshevism, instituted pogroms in czarist fashion. The first anti-Semitic excesses took place in the fall of 1917, at the beginning of the civil war. The starving soldiers who were deserting the front plundered Jewish settlements on their way. In some places there were excesses on the part of the Ukrainian peasants, but these were merely isolated cases.

In January, 1918, the Ukrainian army had to withdraw from the entire country under the pressure of the Soviet forces. When Hetman Skoropadsky returned in March of that year under the protection of the German army, the false report was spread that the Jews had been responsible for the previous defeat of the Ukrainians. However, under the rule of the hetman, there were but few pogroms, and these were from groups opposed to him. The chief wave of pogroms began in January, 1919, and lasted two years. As the armies of Petliura, which had defeated those of the hetman, were in turn forced back by the Red army, a violent anti-Jewish agitation was raised in the entire area. Pogroms took place at the great Jewish centers of Berdichev and Zhitomir (January, 1919), and from there the wave of attacks spread over the entire land, reaching its height in the massacre at Proskurov, where more than 1,500 Jews were killed. Various insurrectionary bands which cooperated with the army of Petliura conducted pogroms either on their own or in conjunction with that army. The worst of these bands was that of the ataman Grigoriev, who had originally been commandant of a corps of the Soviet army. During the uprising against the Soviet, horrible massacres took place under his leadership in May, 1919; within two weeks 3,500 Jews lost their lives. Other bands, under the leadership of such men as Struk, Sokolowski, Angel, Mordalewich, Zwetkovsky, Holy, Wolynetz, Schepel and Slipanski, terrorized the Jewish population of the area for months.

The pogroms increased in July, 1919, in connection with the successful attack of the volunteer army led by General Denikin. The advance of this army was accompanied by slaughter and plundering, and in particular by mass rape of Jewish women. After the collapse of the Denikin army most of the pogroms were due to insurrectionary bands. In May, 1920, the country was occupied for a short time (until July) by the Polish army and Petliura's army. There were some pogroms, especially during the retreat of the Polish army. After the end of the invasion there were pogroms by scattered bands and even by some adherents of the Red army. There were other excesses in 1919 and 1920 by some sections of the Soviet army, especially those who had gone over to it from the Petliura and Denikin armies. The worst were the excesses of individual army corps of the army of General Budenny, when the Soviet armies were retreating from Poland (October, 1920). However, the Soviet government took energetic steps and stopped the anti-Jewish riots on the part of its troops. The attitude of the anti-Soviet leaders was just the opposite. Petliura allowed the agitation for pogroms to proceed unhindered, and did not punish a single pogrom leader. It was only after the wave of pogroms had reached its height that he belatedly issued disapproving proclamations. Denikin took the same passive attitude, despite repeated interventions on the part of prominent Jews and Russians, and never forbade the anti-Semitic agitation, which actually was partly conducted by his own division of propaganda.

During this period the Jews organized their own self-defense organizations in various places; these could not do much against the well-armed regulars of Denikin and Petliura, but were successful in their fights with the roving bands. The most noted of these self-defense organizations were those at Chmelnik, Spola, Steblew, Korsun and Holowanewsk, which not only defended their own cities more than once, but also protected the neighboring Jewish settlements.

There were pogroms in a few cities in Great Russia, which were occupied for a short time by the forces of Denikin (Koslow, Tambow, Yeletz and others).

According to the statistics compiled by the Berlin archive on the history of the East European Jews, 688 places in the Ukraine and seven in Great Russia were affected by these pogroms. There are exact reports only on 524 of the localities in the Ukraine and on all of those in Great Russia. In these 531 localities, in the period from the fall of 1917 to April, 1921, there were 1,236 pogroms or attacks, an average of 2.3 per cent per locality. The number of Jewish victims is only partly known; the number killed amounted to 31,071 in 1,146 of these pogroms. The table below indicates how the various armies participated in the pogroms:

Army	Number of Pogroms	Per Cent of All Pogroms	Number Killed	Per Cent
Petliura Army	493	40.0	16,706	53.7
Denikin Army	213	17.2	5,235	17.0

Army	Number of Pogroms	Per Cent of All Pogroms	Number Killed	Per Cent
Insurrectionary Bands	359	29.0	8,086	26.0
Red Army	106	8.6	725	2.3
Polish Army	32	2.6	134	0.4
Miscellaneous	33	2.6	185	0.6
	1,236	100.0	31,071	100.0

Since the number of those killed does not include localities which are not reported, those who were killed in the open or who died of their wounds, the real figure of Jews killed in these pogroms, at the most conservative estimate, must have been between 50,000 and 60,000. The number of those injured must have been about the same; hence at least 100,000 persons were victims of these attacks. In addition, many fell victims to the epidemics which raged among the unfortunate refugees with a high percentage of mortality.

During the years 1920 and 1921 there was a wave of pogroms in White Russia and the province of Homel. There had already been excesses in 1919 during the Polish occupation. These became still more severe when the Polish army retreated from the area in July, 1920. The Polish pogroms consisted mostly of heaping indignities upon Jews and Jewesses, but there was also a certain amount of plundering and killing. The worst of these pogroms were those committed by the army of General Bulak Balachovich at Masyrer and Slutzker Rayon, marked by wholesale rape of Jewish women and a considerable number of killings. A third group of pogroms was the work of various anti-Bolshevist groups who made attacks on Jews in various places in 1920 and 1921. In general, the pogroms in White Russia were not as severe as those in the Ukraine; the number of those killed, with a few exceptions, was proportionately less. There are no data available as to the number of killed; there were altogether 179 pogroms in White Russia and 29 in Homel. The Soviet government made the following report about the participation of the various armies in the pogroms:

Army	White Russia	Homel
Petliura Army	5	—
Polish Army	18	—
Balachovich Army	43	4
Bands	30	25
	96	29

For attacks on the Jews in countries other than Russia which are sometimes called pogroms, see Anti-Semitism and the articles on the various countries.

Nahum Gergel.

Lit.: Die Judenpogrome in Russland (2 vols., 1910); files of the Yevreiskaya Starina; Stif, Di Pogrome in der Ukrain (1923); Gergel, N., in Shriften far Ekonomik und Statistik des Yiddishen Vissenshaftlichen Instituts, vol. 1 (1928); Lestschinsky, J., in Zukunft (New York), Sept.-Oct., 1922; American Jewish Year Book, reviews of the year, 1903 et seq.; files of the Contemporary Jewish Record; Yivo Historische Shriften, vol. 2 (1937) 444-516; see also the literature under Kishinev.

POLACCO, GIORGIO, conductor and impresario, b. Venice, Italy, 1875. After studying at the Milan Conservatory, he went to London to serve as assistant conductor at the Shaftsbury Theatre. He was appointed assistant conductor for a season of opera when illness of a principal conductor offered him the opportunity of directing one of the performances. He made such a favorable impression that he directed other performances as well. He was soon called to Rio de Janeiro for a principal post, after which he conducted opera performances in Buenos Aires for eleven years. Returning to Italy, he was principal conductor at La Scala for three years, and for two years the first conductor at the Teatro Costanzi in Rome, where he directed the Italian première of Pelléas et Mélisande. In 1911 he was selected by Puccini to direct the Henry Savage production of The Girl of the Golden West which was touring the United States.

Polacco attracted the attention of the Metropolitan Opera House, and was engaged as a principal conductor. Three years after this he succeeded Arturo Toscanini and took over a great share of the French, Italian and Russian repertory at the Metropolitan. In 1920 Polacco resigned from his Metropolitan position, and toured as guest conductor in Havana, South America and France. In 1922 he was engaged by the Chicago Civic Opera Company as principal conductor and music director. He held this post until 1930, after which illness compelled him to go into retirement.

POLACCO, VITTORIO, lawyer, b. Padua, Italy, 1859; d. Rome, 1926. He was associate professor of civil law at the University of Padua (1885-86), and professor at the University of Modena (1888-1918). For a time he was rector of the University of Padua. An opponent of divorce, he published his views in Contro il divorzio (2 vols., Padua, 1892 and 1902) and La Questione del divorzio e gli Israeliti in Italia (Padua, 1894). In 1918 he was called to the University of Rome, where he became interested in the local Talmud Torah which was named after him.

POLACHEK, SOLOMON, rabbi and educator, b. Senitchenitz, province of Grodno, Russia, 1877; d. New York city, 1928. Polachek is considered by many to have been the most profound Talmudic scholar of his generation. At the age of three and a half he could already read Hebrew and Yiddish fluently, and at seven he so overwhelmed his teacher in Talmud with questions that his teacher felt constrained to flee the city in the middle of the night. He learned in various Yeshivas until the age of twelve, when he was taken to the great Yeshiva of Volozhin. After Rabbi Hayim Soloveitchik, one of the officials of the Yeshiva and the greatest Talmudist of his time, chatted with the lad for a few moments he dubbed him the "Maichter Illui" (genius of the city of Maichet), and by this name he was known throughout his life. When the Yeshiva in Volozhin was closed in 1892, Polachek went with his teacher, Rabbi Soloveitchik, to Brest-Litovsk, and studied with him until 1896. He then attended the Yeshivas of Slobodka and Kelm for a short while, but soon returned to Brest-Litovsk. In 1898 he went to Vilna to study in the group of distinguished scholars under the supervision of Rabbi H. O. Grodzinsky.

He married in 1902, and refusing to enter the rabbinate, he tried his hand at business, but lost all his money. In 1906 he accepted a call to head the modern Yeshiva established by Rabbi I. J. Reines in Lida. He remained there until the first World War in 1915, when he wandered with over one hundred of the Yeshiva students to Kirovo, Russia. He stayed in Russia until 1921, when he was invited to head the Yeshiva Tahkemoni in Bialystok. In 1922 he was invited to the Rabbi Isaac Elhanan Theological Seminary in New York city, where he taught until his death.

Polachek was as famous for his modesty and humility as he was for his great genius. He possessed a wide worldly erudition, was a mathematician of note, and was familiar with Russian, German and English literature. He loved Palestine dearly, and in his later years often remarked how deeply he regretted that his age made it impossible for him to go to Palestine and work there as a Halutz. Those who saw him immersed in thought were amazed at the expression of deep and intense concentration which was reflected in his eyes. A few of his articles appeared in the periodical Ner Maarabi. These are immortal contributions to rabbinic literature, but most of his writings were, unfortunately, lost or burned during the course of his many wanderings. HIRSCHEL REVEL.

Lit.: Hahed, vol. 7, No. 12; Eidenu (published in his memory by the students of the Rabbi Isaac Elhanan Theological Seminary, 1928); Berlin, Meyer, Fun Volozhin bis Yerushalayim, vol. 2 (1933) 252-59.

POLACHEK, VICTOR HENRY, editor and publisher, b. Chicago, 1876; d. Great Neck, N. Y., 1940. He began his newspaper career at the age of seventeen, when he became a reporter for the Chicago Times. Rising quickly, he was soon appointed telegraph editor of the Chicago Inter Ocean, and the very next year moved to New York to take the same job with the World. In 1898 began Polachek's connection with the Hearst newspaper organization, a connection he maintained, with only a brief interruption, for the forty years until his retirement. In 1901 Polachek was managing editor of the first issue of the Chicago Herald and Examiner, known at the time as the Chicago Morning American; from 1903 to 1904 he was city editor of the New York American, and for the next ten years managed the Chicago Examiner. During the first World War period he was a general executive officer of the Hearst publications, going back in 1918 to the New York American as publisher.

During the next several years Polachek was out of the Hearst organization, publishing the New York Sun and the Evening Sun, and then going into the business of paper manufacture. But he returned to Hearst as an editor and a member of the executive council. After serving in several high executive posts he was put in charge of the circulation of all Hearst newspapers in 1931, and in 1937 became business manager of the American Weekly magazine.

POLACK, JOEL SAMUEL, trader and author, b. London, 1807; d. San Francisco, 1882. In his early manhood Polack traveled through Europe and America; he served for a short time as a commissioner of the British War Office in Africa. In 1831 he emigrated to New Zealand. As a trader he came into contact with the Maori, learned their language, and gained their confidence. When he returned to London, in 1837, he owned 1,100 acres of land in New Zealand. In 1838 Polack was a prominent witness before the Select Committee of the House of Lords on New Zealand. His report made a great sensation, and was violently attacked by the London Times. Polack entered a lawsuit against the Times and secured a verdict assuring his vindication and £100 damages. His testimony became important for the policy of the British Colonial Office, which thus learned through him the real conditions of life and the most urgent wants of the Maori.

In 1838 Polack published New Zealand; a Narrative of Travel and Adventure, and in 1840 Manners and Customs of the New Zealanders. Both these books were esteemed as instructive and reliable sources of New Zealand folklore. Later on Polack left London for San Francisco, where he married the widow of William Hart, a New Zealand settler.

Lit.: Hight and Bamford, The Constitutional History and the Law of New Zealand (1914).

POLACK, SALOMON (SOLOMON), painter and engraver, b. The Hague, Holland, 1757; d. Chelsea, London, 1839. He emigrated to England early in life, and thence to Ireland. For a time he was a successful miniature painter in Dublin; later he returned to England, and from 1790 to 1835 he was a constant contributor to the exhibitions of the Royal Academy. Polack designed and etched the plates for a Hebrew edition of the Bible.

Lit.: Bryan's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers (1903-05), vol. 4 (1904) 139; Redgrave, Dictionary of Artists (1874) 321.

POLAK, HENRY, Social Democratic leader and labor organizer, b. Amsterdam, Holland, 1868. He was a diamond-cutter by trade, and his major accomplishment was the organization in 1895 of the Algemeene Nederlandsche Diamentbewerkers Bond, which secured many advantages for diamond workers. Polak, who had lived in London at intervals during the years 1887 to 1890, joined the Sociaal Democratsche Bond upon his return to Amsterdam. However, due to disagreement with its anarchistic principles, he left the movement and in 1894 became one of the twelve founders of the Sociaal Democratsche Arbeiders Partij, which espoused evolutionary socialism. In 1900 he became chairman of the Kamer van Arbeid, and in 1903 chairman of the Alliance Universelle des Ouvriers Diamentaires. He served as a member of the Amsterdam Board of Aldermen, and in 1914 was elected a member of the lower chamber of the General States. Active in Jewish affairs, he was on the board of the Hollandish Keren Hayesod.

Polak served for a time as editor of the Weekblad of the diamond workers' guild. He translated Sidney and Beatrice Webb's History of the Trade Unions into Dutch under the title of Geschiedenis van het Britsche Vereenigingsleven (1900), and their Theory and Practice of Trade Unions under the title of Theorie en Praktijk van het Britsche Vereenigingsleven (1902). His original works include De inuloed van den oorlog op de diamantinindustrie (1917) and De vakuereeniging (1922).

When the Nazis occupied Holland (1940) Polak was sent to a concentration camp.

Lit.: Verschave, Paul, La Hollande politique (1910); Yevreiskaya Entziklopedia, vol. 12, p. 734.

POLAK, JAKOB EDUARD, physician and author, b. Gross-Morzin, Bohemia, 1820; d. Vienna, 1891. In 1851 he volunteered his services to the Persian government when it established a military college in Teheran. After learning Persian, he created for it a modern medical terminology. Despite the Mohammedan prohibition against dissection, Polak published, in Persian, a handbook of human anatomy (1854), a medical dictionary in Persian, Arabic and Latin, and a compendium of physiology. From 1855 to 1860, when he returned to Vienna, Polak was court physician to Shah Nasir-ed-Din. Before leaving Persia he organized a hospital and a school for medicine in Teheran. In Vienna he published Persien das Land und seine Bewohner (1865) and Persiens materieller Zustand (1866).

POLAK, LEONARD, philosopher, b. Steenwijk, Holland, 1880; d. in a German concentration camp, 1942. After attending the Gymnasium (Latin grammar school) of Zwolle, in the province of Overijssel, he studied law at the University of Amsterdam, and became a Doctor of Law in 1921. In the following year he received the honorary Ph.D. degree from the University of Groningen. In 1925 he became assistant professor at the University of Leyden, teaching principally philosophy of law. In 1929 he was appointed to the chair of philosophy at the University of Groningen. He was one of the best-known contemporary Dutch philosophers, an excellent teacher, and a scholar of great versatility. Polak was the leader also of thousands of Netherlanders in quest of a rationalistic view of life. He played an important role in the activities of the Philosophical Society, as well as in the Society of Freethinkers and the Freethinkers' Broadcasting Company.

A few years before the outbreak of the second World War, Polak was chosen to preside at the International Philosophical Convention at Prague. During this congress he uttered prophetic words of warning against the growing Nazi menace which, he said, would soon "drive out of Europe all freedom of thought."

Polak's many works include: his thesis, Kennisleer contra Materie-realisme (1912); Philosophy of War (1915); Hegel's Law of Punishment (1925); Le sens de la mort (1931); Unity Above Religious Division (1931); Sociologist and Ethicist (1933); Sexual Ethics (1936); Fate and Free Will (1937).

POLAND. 1. From the Earliest Times to the End of the 15th Cent. a. First Settlements. Jewish settlers may have infiltrated into Polish lands from Byzantium, the Moslem East and the Khazar kingdom. The majority, however, came from Central Europe. As early as the 9th cent. Jewish merchants from the Germanic West journeyed to the still pagan region of the Vistula and the Varta. Visits led to settlement. Legend has it that a Jew yielded the honor of becoming the first ruler of Poland to the founder of the Piast dynasty. Beginning with the close of the 11th cent. there was a constant stream of immigrants from Bohemia and the Rhine provinces, where the Crusades had fanned the flames of religious intolerance. These people brought with them, among other cultural traits, a variety, or varieties, of German (which eventually developed into Yiddish) and a system of community organization.

By the end of the 14th cent. there were a dozen Jewish communities in Poland and neighboring Lithuania. The oldest settlements in Poland were those of Plock (first mentioned in 1237), Kalisz (1287), Cracow (1304), Poznań (Posen; about 1330), Lwów (Lemberg; 1356) and Sandomierz (1367).

b. Legal Status. In addition to Jews, the newcomers included German artisans and merchants. Since both these groups played an important part in the economic development of the country, the princes encouraged their immigration. In recognition of the services rendered by the Jewish settlers, the rulers welcomed them and extended them protection. Charters were granted them, patterned on those issued to Jews in Central Europe. In 1173 Meczyslaw III, the feudal prince of Great Poland (the northwestern section of the country), issued a decree prohibiting violence against the Jews. His successors followed his example. In 1264 Boleslaw the Pious granted his Jewish subjects a charter of rights which guaranteed them inviolability of person and property, freedom of residence and movement, religious liberty and fair trial. Furthermore, loose charges of ritual murder were forbidden. In 1334 Casimir the Great (1333-70), king of unified Poland, confirmed this charter, which originally applied to a section of the country only. In 1364 he decreed, and later amplified, a similar set of regulations which were valid for the entire realm. Jews, in litigation particularly with non-Jews, were exempted from the jurisdiction of the municipalities and of the church and subjected to that of the king or his lieutenant, the voivode, who appointed from among the nobles "a judge of the Jews." Other provisions of the charter protected the dignity of the Jews and guarded them against discriminatory practices. The last statute enacted by the king laid down the principle that cases involving Jews only were to be tried solely by their "elders," an idea which contained the germ of communal autonomy. In all these documents the Jews are treated as a corporate body, placed outside the estates which made up the commonwealth and under the direct tutelage of the crown.

Casimir's attitude was dictated by a desire to promote the economic development of the country. According to a popular legend, first noted by the 15th cent. Polish historian Dlugosz, the king favored the Jewish group because of his passion for the daughter of a Jewish tailor, the fair Esther, who bore him two sons and two daughters. As a lawgiver Casimir, like his predecessors, strove to make it possible for the Jew to carry on his business activities unmolested and to live in peace with his Christian neighbors. On the other hand, the Church of Rome, which since the 10th cent. had counted the Polish people among its flock, pursued a policy diametrically opposed to that of the royal power. It sought to segregate the Jews, to hedge them about with legal disabilities and to reduce them to the position of social outcasts. The Church Council of Breslau (1266) decreed that the Jews residing in the diocese of Gniezno (Gnesen) should inhabit a section of each town separated by a hedge or a wall from the rest of the urban area, and that when they appeared in the street they should wear a peculiarly shaped hat. It forbade the faithful, under pain of excommunication, to have any social intercourse with Jews or to buy foods from them, and it invoked the old regulation forbidding the Jews to exercise public functions, including the collection of taxes. The Council which met thirteen years later at Buda, Hungary, and was attended by high Polish churchmen, confirmed these enactments, adding the requirement that Jews of both sexes should wear a round patch of red cloth sewn on their outer garments over the heart.

As yet the clergy was not sufficiently influential to jeopardize the position of the group. The canonical regulations were largely disregarded. A more serious danger was the hostility of the burghers, mostly of German stock, who were business competitors of the Jews. It is reported that even in Casimir's reign his Jewish subjects suffered from mob violence, notably in the year of the Black Death (1348-49). Nor were Casimir's successors as liberal as he. Such was the case with the Lithuanian Grand Duke Jagiello, who married Jadwiga, queen of Poland, and ascended the Polish throne as Wladislaus II (1386-1434), bringing about a personal union between the two countries. He was strongly influenced by the church, and confirmed only with reluctance the Jewish privileges issued by his predecessors.

It was in his reign (1399) that the rabbi and thirteen elders of the community of Poznań were burned alive on the trumped-up charge of desecration of the host, and a perpetual fine payable to the local Dominican cloister was imposed upon the community itself. In 1407 the Jews of Cracow were plundered and massacred by a mob, consisting chiefly of German traders and artisans inflamed by a rumor of ritual murder. There was now an alliance between the clergy and the burghers, whose anti-Jewish animus had a clearly discernible economic basis. The church convention which met at Kalisz in 1420 confirmed the anti-Jewish regulations enacted by the Councils of Breslau and Buda, and added to them a provision for a special tax to be paid by the Jews for the benefit of the churches located in the districts where they resided. The Diet held at Warta in 1423 revived an old ordinance restricting the Jews' money lending to loans against pledges.

Jagiello's second son, however, who, under the name of Casimir IV, ruled both Poland and Lithuania for nearly the entire second half of the 15th cent., reverted to the tolerant policy of Casimir the Great. In direct opposition to the spirit of the regulations passed by the Council of Kalisz, he confirmed, in August, 1453, the rights and privileges previously bestowed upon his Jewish subjects. But the power of ecclesiastic authorities in public affairs had by now grown stronger. Cardinal Olesnicki, Archbishop of Cracow, boldly denounced the king for protecting the infidels, and Casimir, also much affected by the grave defeat his troops had suffered in the war with the Teutonic Knights, was forced to yield ground. In November, 1454, at the Diet of Nieszawa, he rescinded his confirmation of the Jewish privileges as "opposed both to divine right and to the law of the land." Simultaneously the old anti-Jewish canonical laws were declared valid. Thereafter anti-Jewish riots occurred repeatedly. On the third day of Easter, 1463, detachments of irregulars on their way to Hungary to fight in a crusade looted the Jewish quarter in Cracow and massacred some thirty persons. Similar outrages occurred in other centers.

In spite of his official policy, Casimir had no personal animosity against the Jews, and on several occasions shielded them from violence and punished the perpetrators of riots. With his two sons, John Albert (1492-1501) and Alexander (1501-6), the anti-Jewish policy was a matter of personal bias. John Albert confirmed the Nieszawa Statute at the Diet held in Piotrków in 1496, and the century closed amidst renewed troubles.

From the first, some Jewish settlements occupied certain districts within the cities. The earliest mention of the Cracow community contains a reference to the Jewish quarter of the city. Not infrequently a municipality succeeded in making such segregation obligatory, thus creating ghettos. Lwów had one at least as far back as 1383, and Warsaw as early as 1430. In 1494, after a fire which burned out a large section of Cracow, John Albert ordered the Jewish residents to move to the suburb of Kazimierz, and to live there apart from the Christians. Occasionally a municipality excluded Jewish residents entirely. Thus in 1483 all the Jews were expelled from Warsaw and the city was barred to them.

Throughout the period under review and down to the partitions the Jews were not personally liable to military service, nor were they obliged to furnish or outfit soldiers in time of war. They paid into the royal treasury an annual tax which was levied on communities. Here and there the municipalities, too, succeeded in taxing them. Yet on the whole the Jews were not systematically discriminated against in fiscal matters.

c. Economic Conditions. The various restrictions and disabilities which multiplied toward the end of the period failed to hamper seriously the economic activities of the Jews. Extant silver coins bearing Hebrew inscriptions point to the fact that Jews acted as minters under the princes who reigned at the turn of the 12th cent. There are early references to Jews tilling the soil and owning and managing estates. Their chief role, however, was in developing the country's money economy and trade. They handled much of the domestic and foreign commerce, exporting native agricultural products (cereals, hemp, wax, hides, cattle, timber) and importing manufactured goods from the West and such commodities as spices, dyes, silk and cotton fabrics from the East. They maintained active trade relations with Gdansk (Danzig) and Breslau, Kaffa (in the Crimea) and Istanbul, Genoa and Venice. They farmed tolls and taxes and leased salt mines. Money-lending was a common occupation, but by no means a Jewish monopoly.

A few individuals (Moses and Jacob Fischel of Cracow, Shachna and Yosko of Lwów, David of Przemysl) accumulated considerable wealth and conducted relatively large financial operations, counting kings among their debtors. In small towns a Jewish householder made a living by doing a little truck or dairy farming, in addition to some buying and selling and lending petty sums of money. As yet only a very limited number of men earned their bread as butchers and tailors, leather workers and glaziers; a handful practised medicine.

2. From the Beginning of the 16th Cent. to the Cossack Wars. a. Growth of Population. Driven by persecution, immigrants from the Germanic lands, as well as from Hungary, Italy and Spain, welcomed the economic opportunities offered by Poland. When, in 1495, the Jews were expelled from Lithuania, a number of them came from that neighboring country. They arrived also from Istanbul, Jerusalem and Kaffa. In the course of the 15th cent., forty-five communities came into being. At its close the Jewish population of the Polish lands was, it has been estimated, 16,000, of whom 13,000 were in the towns and 3,000 in the villages.

During the following century immigration assumed large proportions. In fact, the center of gravity of the Jewish population shifted from west to east, to Poland and Turkey. According to one estimate, in 1578 there were approximately 75,000 Jews in Poland proper and 27,000 in the Lithuanian provinces. About that time Jewish contingents were to be found in fifty-two cities and towns in Mazovia (an independent duchy incorporated into the kingdom in 1526) and Great Poland and in seventy-nine inhabited centers of Volhynia and Red Russia (Eastern Galicia and Podolia).

The Jewish community of Cracow, with its 4,500 persons, and that of Lwów, with its population of 3,000, yielded in size only to the communities of Istanbul and Venice. By the end of the century the Jewish population of the Polish-Lithuanian commonwealth is believed to have reached 156,000, and fifty years later the impressive total of 350,000. Properly to evaluate these figures it is necessary to consider that the total population of the country at the end of the 16th cent. has been estimated at 3,800,000 and its urban component at only a little over 800,000.

b. Political and Social Developments. The early years of the 16th cent. witnessed an improvement in the status of the Jews. Shortly after Grand Duke Alexander ascended the throne of Poland he rescinded the decree which had banished the Jews from Lithuania, and permitted them to return to their former homes. He also allowed the inclusion of the old statute of Boleslaw the Pious into the official Polish Code of Laws compiled in 1506. The article on money-lending was altered to the disadvantage of the Jews, and the document was provided with a note to the effect that it had been inserted as "a measure of protection against the Jews." Nevertheless, the introduction of the Magna Charta of Jewish liberties into the Code was a tacit admission of the group's claim to the rights it had enjoyed in the Middle Ages.

Alexander's successors, Sigismund I (1506-48), king of Poland and grand duke of Lithuania, was a just, humane and tolerant statesman. Among his first official acts were a number of decrees confirming the privileges of individual Jewish communities and alleviating their fiscal burden. Believing the Jews to be an economically useful element, he invariably sought to shield them against the rapacity of officials, as also against discrimination and every manner of lawlessness. The protection which he could offer them was not, however, effective, in the face of the bitter hostility toward the group on the part of the urban middle class, the Szlachta (gentry) and the church.

Back in the reign of Casimir IV the Christian merchants and artisans, acting through the municipalities, had attempted to impose severe restrictions upon their Jewish competitors. Thus in 1485 the Jews of Cracow were obligated to sell exclusively pawned articles that had been forfeited to them, and this in their own homes or on the streets and on certain days of the week only. The prohibitions remained largely ineffectual. And now the effort to curtail Jewish trade and handicraft was resumed in real earnest, the merchants finding an ally, though an uncertain one, in the gentry. The campaign went on for years with varying success and in the end the Jews suffered defeat, in spite of the king's efforts on their behalf.

In Cracow they were held to the regulations of 1485, in Lwów they were permitted to deal only in cloth, horned cattle, hides and wax. The diet held at Piotrków in 1538 explicitly denied to the Jews freedom of commerce. It also took measures to keep a tight hand on money-lending by Jews and forbade them to farm tolls and taxes. The same legislative assembly revived the ancient canonical prescription that all Jews should wear headgear made of yellow cloth as a distinguishing mark.

Not only was the Jews' freedom of occupation interfered with, but also their right of residence. Their segregation in the towns became stricter, and furthermore the municipalities opposed any territorial expansion of the ghettos necessitated by the growth of the communities. In Poznań, to mention one instance, the number of houses that Jews could own was strictly limited. Some towns, taking advantage of their administrative autonomy (Magdeburg Law), succeeded in excluding Jews entirely. The larger centers situated on crown land having become overcrowded, considerable numbers of Jews were forced to settle on land belonging to the nobles in the vicinity of the towns, thus forming suburban settlements. As a result, the gentry claimed the exclusive right to tax and mete out justice to their Jewish tenants, and in 1539 the Diet satisfied this demand. Thereafter a considerable section of Jewry found itself deprived of royal protection. This reduction of the king's jurisdiction and taxing power was symptomatic of the weakening of his authority. For the Jews, this new development was to have fateful consequences.

Under the wing of the magnates, who were absolute lords in their domains, they were free from the chicanery and exactions of municipal and royal officials and could engage in business activities unmolested. On the other hand, they were at the mercy of the petty despots whom they served. As stewards, commercial agents and lessees of the landowners, they benefited materially, but at the price of identifying their interests with those of a predatory feudal aristocracy and becoming the tool with which it carried out its conscienceless exploitation of the masses. This made for the moral degradation of the Jewish contingent and eventually resulted in tragedy for it.

Alarmed by the rise of Protestantism, which occurred in the reign of Sigismund I, the church became more militant. Jews were accused of proselytizing and of smuggling their converts across the border. Clerical writers attacked the infidels in inflammatory pamphlets. One of these, published in 1543, urged the expulsion of the Jews from the country. In the previous year a church convention held at Piotrków outlined a series of severe anti-Jewish measures, including the demolition of newly-built synagogues. This "constitution" was submitted to the king, but did not receive his approval.

At the national diet held in the first year of his reign, Sigismund II (1548-72) confirmed the privileges which his grandfather, Casimir IV, had granted his Jewish subjects. His policy toward the Jews was liberal, but not consistently so. During his reign there was a lull in the conflict between the Jewish communities and the magistracies, but the church continued to carry on active agitation against the group, and the king had neither the will nor the way to stop it.

In 1556, at the instigation of the papal nuncio and in defiance of the king's order, three Jews were burned at the stake in the town of Sochaczew on the charge of having desecrated the host. The Diets of 1562 and 1565 confirmed the anti-Jewish regulations of 1538. The Union of Lublin, in 1569, which effected a complete merger of Lithuania and Poland, placed Jewry in both countries on the same footing. It was not an auspicious event, since the union further weakened royal authority. The Lithuanian Jews, accustomed to the simpler atmosphere of economically backward communities, now found themselves drawn into the life of Poland proper, with its sharp political and social conflicts.

In the early years of the century the Kahals (communities) were headed by rabbis whom the king appointed for life, sometimes at the recommendation of the community elders. The Kahals were at this time largely fiscal agencies. As part of an effort to improve the country's finances, Sigismund I had attempted to centralize Jewish taxation. He appointed two Jewish financiers as chief tax collectors, and in 1514 Abraham of Bohemia was made responsible for the entire sum which his coreligionists were to contribute. The system met with strenuous opposition on the part of the Kahals both in Poland and in the Lithuanian provinces, where it was also tried. In fact, it came to such a pass that the collector general was excommunicated by the rabbi of Cracow. In the end the system was abandoned. Sigismund II resigned control of Jewish internal affairs and thereby gave an impetus to the development of Kahal self-government. By a decree dated August 13, 1551, he permitted the communities to elect (or appoint) their own religious leaders. To insure the independence of these, they were placed directly under the royal jurisdiction and, together with the Kahal elders, were given wide judicial and administrative authority, including the power to impose upon offenders all punishments permitted by Jewish law and custom. Only in litigation with Christians were the Jews subject to the jurisdiction of the king's lieutenant or of a judge appointed by the latter, and a decree issued in 1556 required the presence of Jewish assessors in such courts. The Jews settled on private lands were tried in patrimonial courts presided over by the lord of the manor.

The communal authorities were now again acting as collectors of the tax which the Jewish group paid into the royal exchequer, and this, indeed, was their chief function. After 1552 all Jewry paid not the annual tax which was levied also on the rest of the commoners, but a special impost, laid on them as well as on the Tatars and gypsies. As this was in the nature of a poll tax, a census had to be taken from time to time to determine the sum to be raised. After the death of Sigismund II it was decided to discontinue the taking of the census, and the Kahals were made responsible for the raising of a fixed sum.

In 1579 this was set at 10,000 zlotys for Poland (a little later the sum was doubled) and at 7,000 zlotys for Lithuania. At the end of the period under review (1649) the two sums were, respectively, 60,000 and 12,000 zlotys. In addition, the Jews paid a great many other imposts, direct and indirect, ordinary and extraordinary, general and special.

With the passing of Sigismund II the commonwealth became an elective monarchy, and the crown suffered a further loss of prestige and power. The turn of events boded nothing good for the Jews. The Hungarian duke, Stephen Báthory (1576-86), the second elective king, was a zealous Catholic and a friend of the Jesuit order. Nevertheless, he did not deviate from the tolerant policy of his predecessors. He confirmed the earlier charters of the Lithuanian communities and granted new privileges to the Jews of the Polish provinces. He championed their rights against the encroachments of the municipalities and guilds, and sought to protect them from mob violence, but his efforts were often thwarted. In 1576 he issued two decrees forbidding the blood accusation, a measure which the temper of the times made sorely necessary, but which remained ineffectual. In his reign Kahal self-government achieved its final form and became the supreme factor in ghetto life which it remained for nearly two centuries.

The reigns of Sigismund III (1587-1632) and of Wladislaus IV (1632-48), who was personally more liberal than his predecessor, were marked by the triumph of the Catholic Reformation. The clerical influence, aided by the Jesuits, greatly increased, and with it the anti-Jewish zeal of the church. To rouse the fanaticism of the masses the clergy made extensive use of the blood accusation. A dozen ritual murder cases came up between 1578 and 1639. They were tried without the prescribed safeguards and often resulted in convictions.

Thus, in 1598, three Jews were executed in Lublin for an alleged ritual murder. The blood libel and the charge of desecration claimed a number of victims in the 1630's. Students in the Jesuit seminaries, aided by the populace, formed a habit of attacking the ghettos, and the communities had to pay a special tax to buy them off. Crude defamatory pamphlets made their appearance. In 1618 a professor in the Academy of Cracow published a violent attack in which he demanded that the infidels be expelled from the country as they had been banished from Spain and other lands. In a pamphlet printed in 1623 a Kalisz physician argued that those who used the professional services of Jewish doctors exposed to mortal danger their bodies as well as their souls.

Not only Jewish merchants but artisans as well were now hemmed in by every manner of restriction, intended to reduce the scope of their activities. Furthermore, the city authorities now arrogated to themselves jurisdiction over the Jews, in violation of their ancient right to be tried by royal magistrates when in litigation with Christians. Residential disability spread to Lithuania, and in 1633 the first ghetto was established there, notably in Vilna. The king had not abandoned his traditional role of protector of the Jews, but the only effective check on the anti-Jewish efforts of the clergy and the burghers was exercised by the gentry, particularly the wealthier landowners who, in favoring the Jews, were guarding their own economic interests.

c. Economic Conditions. In spite of obstacles, the Jewish group played a leading part in the country's economic life. Since Jews were forbidden to receive real estate as security for loans, they could only act as pawnbrokers and, indeed, they were the first to establish "lombards." Yet Jewish banking was still an important factor in a country in which money economy had made rapid strides since the end of the Middle Ages. There was a great demand for credit on the part of Jewish merchants. They borrowed money from non-Jewish financiers as well as from their coreligionists (yielding to the spirit of the times, the rabbis had found a way to lift the prohibition against a Jew's lending money on interest to his own), and thus drew into circulation money that would otherwise have remained idle. The restrictions were such that a Jew rarely had a chance to become a retail merchant with a permanent place of business. As a result, there sprang up itinerant tradesmen, who took their wares to the fair, and when it was over had to travel to another fair or to dispose of the remainder of their wares to a Christian buyer, often at a loss. The home market being practically closed to them, the Jewish merchants devoted much of their energy to foreign commerce. They developed great activity in this field, traveling as far as India and maintaining connections with the Levant and the Black Sea littoral, as well as with European trading centers as distant as Muscovy in the East and Leipzig and Cologne in the West. The gentry had the privilege of exporting the produce of their estates, and this gave them a hold on an important branch of foreign commerce. As exporters, the Jews either managed to compete with the nobles or acted as their agents. The Jewish merchant had to content himself with a low rate of profit and so tended to increase his turnover; his operations were apt to be speculative and based on credit. As a result, bankruptcies were not unusual. They were particularly frequent and disastrous in the first half of the 17th cent.

The wealthier continued to farm royal tolls and taxes and every manner of special impost, in spite of the fact that injunctions against the Jews' engaging in this business were repeatedly secured by the gentry and confirmed by the Jewish authorities. Some Jewish tax-farmers did business in partnership with members of the szlachta. At the end of the 16th cent. Jewish landownership disappeared, and as for farming, it exercised but little attraction, since it entailed serfdom. Nevertheless, in the latter part of the period under review about a fifth of the Jewish population was settled on the land, chiefly in Red Russia and in the Ukraine, which, as a result of the Union of Lublin, was incorporated into Poland. In this southwestern borderland Polish magnates carved out for themselves vast estates. By preference they employed Jews as stewards, and absentee owners rented their properties to Jewish entrepreneurs. These acquired control of the serfs' labor and the right to mete out justice and impose penalties.

The less well-to-do leased such rural establishments as mills, breweries, refineries, dairies and inns. Jews rented fish-ponds, salt-mines, saltpeter beds, forest lands, farmed local bridge- and gate-tolls and such imposts as the excise on alcoholic drinks, which gave them the right to confiscate smuggled goods. In these various activities they contributed to the development of a potentially rich and sparsely populated region, but they were forced into a position which made them the object of intense resentment on the part of the native Ukrainian population. Jewish leadership was fully aware of the dangers inherent in the situation. Kahal authorities legislated against leasing and tax-farming, but these prohibitions were of no avail in the face of economic necessity.

A growing number of people, particularly in the older communities, made a living as artisans. There was hardly a branch of handicraft in which Jews were not represented. The Christian guilds could not but become alarmed by this development. Unorganized labor was a menace to them. The Jewish artisans soon found themselves as hard pressed as the merchants. One of the aims of the guilds was to force the Jewish artisans to work for their coreligionists only. Except where a tailor or a shoemaker, a metal worker or a jeweler, lived under a magnate's jurisdiction, he had to work by stealth, fearful of fines and confiscation of goods. Early in the 17th cent. the Jewish artisans in self-defense began to form guilds of their own. These were patterned on the Christian guilds and in a measure controlled by the Kahals. The condition of the artisans continued, however, to be a deplorable one. Altogether, although the Jewish population included some men of wealth, the masses were abjectly poor, and as the 17th cent. wore on the struggle for existence became increasingly bitter.

d. Communal Self-Government. A factor that contributed to the perpetuation of the Jewish group and its culture was Kahal autonomy, which took its rise in the second half of the 16th cent. The term "Kahal" denoted both the community as a whole and its administrative board, consisting of elected elders. From the first the institution showed an oligarchic tendency which in the course of time prevailed. Within its territory the Kahal collected all the various imposts, after having apportioned them among individual taxpayers. Several of the elders, in conjunction with the rabbi, constituted a court of law (beth din) which adjudicated, in accordance with the provisions of Talmudic law and later decisions, disputes involving Jews only.

With the aid of an educational, clerical and medical staff, it took charge of Yeshivas, synagogues, cemeteries, charitable and public health institutions. The board executed real estate deeds, regulated local commerce and handicraft, enforced the dietary laws, looked after weights and measures, and supervised elementary instruction. The elders also acted as assessors in the courts presided over by voivodes or starostas (in Lithuania) where mixed cases were tried.

From time to time representatives of Kahals and noted rabbis met, usually during the fair at Lublin, to settle matters of more than local importance. These Vaads (councils) acted as courts of appeal as well as legislative and administrative bodies. They apportioned taxes, since the Jewry of Poland, like that of Lithuania, formed a fiscal unit. Late in the 16th cent. these conventions assumed a regular character and became the central agency of the federated Kahals, "the Jewish Diet." Delegates came from four Polish provinces as well as from Lithuania, but in 1623 the Lithuanian Kahals, which had always exhibited a separatist tendency, established a central synod of their own (Council of the Principal Communities of the Province of Lithuania), and thereafter the Polish convention became known as the Council of the Four Lands (Vaad Arba Aratzoth). The two Councils spoke for the Jewish group and championed its interests. Their main function, however, was to regulate the inner life of the communities, their relations to each other and with the non-Jewish world. Some of the legal decisions passed by the Vaads and the regulations they adopted carried authority even beyond the confines of the country.

e. Intellectual Activities. During the Middle Ages Polish-Lithuanian Jewry made no contribution to learning. Intellectually it was dependent upon Jewish centers in Germanic lands and from there it drew its spiritual sustenance. In the first half of the 16th cent. Poland became the seat of intensive Talmudic and rabbinical scholarship, and before long there appeared such zealous and erudite collectors and systematizers of the religious lore, accumulated through the generations that their authority was recognized throughout the Diaspora.

The first notable Polish rabbis were Jacob Pollak, who had been active in Prague before he became the head of a congregation in Cracow, and his pupil, Shalom Shachna of Lublin. They were teachers and master dialecticians, who left no writings. A pupil of Shachna, Moses Isserles (1520-72), and Solomon Luria (1510-73) may properly be considered the twin pillars of Polish rabbinism. Isserles was unique in being interested in secular science and philosophy, two neglected subjects, and Luria had a weakness for the Cabala, but their chief importance lies in their having codified the regulations relating to ritual and everyday life. This juridical vein was further worked by such worthies as Mordecai Jaffe (d. 1612), Joshua Falk Cohen (d. 1616), Joel Serkes (d. 1640), David Halevi (1586-1667) and Sabbatai Cohen (1621-63). A less practical line of study was pursued by Meir of Lublin (1554-1616) and Samuel Edels (d. 1631). It was not until the 17th cent., when the outlook grew especially dark, that the mystical teachings and practices of the Cabala gained a vogue in Poland and Lithuania, chiefly among the less educated. The Cabala won a number of inspired and articulate adherents, notably Rabbi Isaiah Horovitz, but they were not as distinguished as the representatives of rabbinical rationalism. A good deal in the way of apologetics was also produced during the period under consideration.

The treatises that came from the pens of the rabbis, being intended for the learned, were couched in Hebrew. At the same time, a body of literature in the vernacular, consisting of works of entertainment and edification, had come into being to meet the demand on the part of the untutored, particularly women. The dissemination of both Hebrew and Yiddish books was greatly furthered by the introduction of typography. The beginning of both Hebrew and Yiddish printing in Poland goes back to the year 1534, when a treatise on ritual law and a Yiddish-Hebrew Bible glossary came from a Cracow press. Cracow and Lublin, where a press was founded in 1556, were the centers of Jewish printing in Poland, which competed with the presses of Venice and Prague. Books were also imported from abroad. AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY.

3. From the Cossack Wars to the Partitions. a. Causes of the Wars. The Ukraine was the meeting place of three alien elements, the Poles, the Greek Orthodox peasants, and the Jews; the clash of these elements eventually resulted in a catastrophic explosion. The fact that lease-holding was one of the main occupations of the Jews here was of especial importance after a great colonizing activity set in after the union of Poland and Lithuania in 1569. At that time vast stretches of land passed into the possession of the Polish nobles and a system of latifundia economy developed more rapidly than was desirable, resulting in a peasantry that was despised, exploited and inwardly seething. Numerous Jews, as well as Christians, were active here as stewards and lease-holders, and these, in order to be able to live, had to exact as high taxes as possible from the peasant serfs. Thus the Jews were between the hammer of the nobility and the anvil of the country people.

The situation was not a little intensified by the fact that the Polish kings, partly for political and partly for strategic reasons, had encouraged the formation of the Cossack companies. After a series of smaller revolts, the first larger revolt broke out in 1637 under the leadership of Hetman Pavlyuk; among its victims were some 200 Jews, mostly lease-holders and tax-farmers, and several synagogues. For a decade sultry weather prevailed in the Ukraine, and in 1648 the storm crashed.

b. The Cossack Wars. The insurrection in the Ukraine against the Poles and the Jews was stirred up by Hetman Bogdan Chmielnicki. Fearful massacres took place in the Ukraine, in White Russia, in Podolia and in Volhynia. Thousands of Jews were slaughtered, the most important Jewish communities devastated, and the survivors plunged into the misery of an aimless flight. Prince Jeremiah Wiśniowiecki and a few others received the scattered refugees and gave them free passage and protection. The Cossack hordes poured forth as far as Lwów in Red Russia (Galicia) and, with brief interruptions, the fearful fury lasted until 1651. At first the Cossacks repeatedly defeated the Polish armies, but the latter gradually won the upper hand. Chmielnicki then placed himself under the protection of the czar, Alexis Mikhailovich. The latter now directed his troops towards Poland. Hardly had he trodden the soil of White Russia and Lithuania than he was surrounded by the Greek Orthodox population, who begged him to expel the Jews. Several cities immediately received that privilege. The Jews, who even earlier had not been passive victims, rendered active service in the war with the czar, and distinguished themselves in particular during the siege of Vitebsk.

In 1655 a new enemy of the state arose in Sweden and the Polish soldiers whom General Czarnecki led against the Swedes again and again mistreated the Jews in the most shameful fashion in Great Poland, Little Poland and Mazovia. When the conflicts finally ended, more than 700 communities had been destroyed or had suffered severely, and many thousands of Jews had been killed, driven away or carried off. In the Ukraine, in Volhynia and in Podolia only a tenth of the Jewish population survived the catastrophe. The centers of learning were deserted and the economic life lay in ruins. Some of the survivors found admittance into nearby Prussia as day laborers; the majority fled to other countries of Western Europe. From the Rhine to Italy, from Constantinople to Barbary, Ashkenazim and Sephardim united to save the Jews of Poland.

But despite the amazingly courageous sacrifice and the solidarity revealed by the communities in those dark days, the glories of Polish Jewry were forever ended. Economic life was shaken to its foundations and the catastrophe had a profound effect upon the cultural life of all Jewry. The most prominent Talmudists had emigrated and had become the rabbis and leaders of Talmudic academies in the most important communities of Western Europe. The center of Talmudic study, which had passed from Germany to Poland, now returned to Germany, Italy and Holland. All Western Europe, wherever Jews lived, was filled with the spirit of these Polish Talmudists; it is due to them that Jewish knowledge in Western Europe did not stagnate, but revived with the infusion of this new blood.

c. Attempts at Restoration. The Period of the Tumults. It was with empty hands that the Jews of Poland undertook the task of rebuilding that which had been destroyed. It was only very gradually that the exiles returned and attempted to restore their places of learning, to reorganize their communities and to regain their economic position. To be sure, Kings John Casimir (1648-68) and Michael Korybut Wiśniowiecki (1669-73) did their best to aid the Jewish communities; but the social and economic barriers which stood in the way of the process were very great. The atmosphere of Poland was poisoned with Jew-hatred, political anarchy had entered the country with the "liberum veto," and the influence and authority of the kings had greatly diminished. The financial demands of the state and the cities upon the Jews became immense; the church and the szlachta, which was under ecclesiastical influence, made new attacks against the Jews through the renewal of the church prohibitions against the building of synagogues, the employment of Christian domestics, and the like.

In 1659 two Jews fell victims to the blood accusation, and in the following year there were excesses against the Jews in Cracow. In 1663 the Cracow Jewish apothecary Matthew Kalahorra was executed in Piotrków for blasphemy, in 1664 the Lwów students instituted an attack (Schülergeläuf) on the Jews, and even in the "Messianic year" (1666), in which the Jews gave enthusiastic expression to their hopes for deliverance, they were exposed to many excesses.

John Sobieski (1674-96), who had made the Jew Bezalel ben Nathan collector of tolls for Red Russia, and whose personal physician was Emanuel de Jonah, used all his powers to oppose the tumults and protect the Jews in their rights, especially that of being placed under the royal jurisdiction. Yet the feeling after the peace of Buczacz in 1672, when Podolia and a part of the Ukraine were ceded to Turkey, remained unfavorable to the Jews, and tumults occurred again in 1680 in Brest-Litovsk, in 1681 in Vilna, in 1682 in Cracow, and in 1687 in Poznań.

d. The Time of the Saxon Kings. With the successor of Sobieski, Frederick Augustus the Strong of Saxony (1697-1733), there began a new era in Polish history, a time of descent and general anarchy. Besides the external disturbances, due to the war in the north, there was also a civil war, and both seriously affected the Jews. During the ritual murder trial of Sandomierz, which had begun in 1698 and now continued, the armies of the combatants harassed the Jews. In 1704 the Swedes compelled them to give aid at the siege of Poznań, and the troops of the various confederations pillaged the Jews completely. The uninterrupted fermentations in the Ukraine, the ceded portions of which again became Polish after the peace of Carlowitz (Karlovci) in 1699, were directed against both the Szlachta and the Jews.

In the Ukraine and in White Russia the Haidamaks raged against the Jewish communities from 1734 to 1750. Three factors made the situation of the Jews worse under the Saxon kings than it had ever been before—the arbitrary rule of the high nobility, the economic struggle and the agitations of the clergy. The anarchistic conditions revealed themselves at their worst in the open country where the power of the government was weak. The Jews were helpless under the nobility, who proceeded against them with the brutality that characterized their class. Of course there were also magnates who honestly tried to help their Jewish lease-holders, so that their Jews were in better circumstances than those in the cities, where expulsions and chicaneries made their lives difficult. But these were only exceptional cases. On the whole, they were in the power of the propertied nobility and were subject to their whims. The tales of Jewish contemporaries such as Ber Bolechover, Solomon Maimon and Moses Wasserzeug present an affecting picture of these conditions.

The economic conflict with the bourgeoisie and the guilds was renewed in the time of the tumults. The Jews not only suffered from being crowded into the cities, but they had to renew their contracts with the magistracies from time to time, which gave the latter the opportunity to limit the bounds of the activity of the Jews, who had to fight again and again for their economic existence.

In 1720 a royal decree ordered that in Lublin all trade contracts with Jews could not be renewed after they had expired, that all hiring contracts with Jews were to be abrogated, and that places of business or dwellings might not be leased to Jews under penalty of 1,000 marks. A commission was appointed to consider measures which would prevent damage to the business of Christians by Jews. Although this and similar orders were not carried out, since the Jews were indispensable as renters who paid a good, high rate, frictions arose, and the negotiations kept the Jews in a perpetual state of excitement for decades. On the other hand, limitations were laid upon them as to the times of business, the purchase of wares, the practise of handicrafts, and the like.

The previously mentioned ritual murder trial of Sandomierz proved anew the implacable hatred of the church. Even the king submitted to clerical influence in 1712, when he carried out the expulsion of the Jews from Sandomierz for the reason that "the unbelieving Jews pour out the blood of Christian children in a secret and revolting manner and this cries for divine retribution." The ecclesiastical fanaticism could never have enough of the ever recurring renewals of the canonical prescriptions against the Jews, of efforts at conversion, and of sharpest measures against conversions to Judaism, although these occurred only in negligible individual cases. It also aroused the masses by spreading wild rumors about the blasphemies and acts of witchcraft perpetrated by the Jews, and of the ritual murders that they had committed.

In 1728 the brothers Hayim and Joshua Reizes of Lwów were accused of having persuaded a baptized Jew to return to Judaism, and they were condemned to death. A ritual murder trial in Poznań from 1736 to 1740 was followed by similar charges in Zaslav (Zastaw) in 1747, in Shepetovka in 1748, in Dunaigorod in the same year, in Zhitomir in 1753, in Yampol (Jampol) in 1756, in Przemyśl in 1759, and in Wojstawice in 1760. This hatred was greatly stirred up by anti-Jewish writings. The clergy strove during the Frankist conversions to prove the correctness of the blood accusation in particular, and did their best to nullify the intervention started from the papal seat by the representative of Polish Jewry, Jacob Selig.

e. From the Reign of Stanislaus Augustus Poniatowski (1764-95) to the First Partition (1772). According to the official census, the number of the Jews aggregated more than half a million at the beginning of the reign of the last king of Poland; of these 420,589 were in Poland and 157,300 in Lithuania. The first important event in his reign was the destruction of Jewish autonomy through the change in the method of collection of the poll tax, which was decided at the Warsaw Sejm of 1764. In the political disturbances that followed the Jews were attacked in a pamphlet; the confederation of Bar also was hostile to them. The worst fate befell the Jews of the Ukraine. The peasant hordes again united with the Cossacks to attack the magnates and the Jewish lease-holders. After individual plunderings by the Haidamaks, an extensive movement began, having its origin at Kiev and consisting of hordes of peasants and the Zaporogian Cossacks. Their watchword of "Death to the Poles and the Jews!" was taken up by thousands, and under the command of bestial leaders singing and plundering hordes spread death and destruction everywhere.

There was a fearful massacre in Uman, where 20,000 Jews and Poles fell in three days of slaughter. After that the Poles succeeded in overpowering the revolt with the aid of the Russians. In 1772 the first partition of Poland took place; White Russia was ceded to Russia, Galicia, except Cracow, to Austria, and Pomerania, minus Gdańsk (Danzig) and Toruń (Thorn), as well as a slice of Great Poland, fell to Prussia.

f. Internal Organization. Declining Power of the Kahal; Destruction of Autonomy. The power of the Kahal, once used for the common good and a source of strength for Jewish life, became in the course of time an abuse, and intellectual supremacy was replaced by a policy of personal interest. Influential and ambitious men were able to grasp positions of leadership, the office of rabbi was sometimes for sale, and the administration was neglected. This moral retrogression was directly connected with the distraction of the finances of the Kahal. Until about the second half of the 17th cent. the communities had generally been able to meet their taxes from the regular income, i.e. from the various fees. After the second half of the 17th cent., the main sources of income for the communities were the consumption tax (Krupka) on meat and other means of life and, in addition, the so-called Hazakah. The original purpose of the Hazakah had been to prevent sordid competition. It was intended to give lease-holders who had administered an estate for three years in succession a preference over all rivals in regard to the same lease-holding. But as the revenues of the Kahal grew more scanty, it was compelled to pay less attention to the lease-holders and instead to make the Hazakah an object of gain in order to fill its treasury and meet the interest on its loans. The universal want due to the never-ending wars, the gifts connected with the numerous blood accusations, the journeys of the Jewish syndics to the Diets, and the restoration of the communities swallowed up immense sums which could not be met in the regular way and made new loans necessary.

The creditors of the communities were generally clerical orders and congregations, but sometimes private individuals. As a rule the loans were secret and were secured by the community real estate. In the 18th cent. the debts of the communities had already reached a dizzy height. Many communities were utterly unable to pay the annual sums for amortization, and paid only the interest. All attempts to straighten out the finances were unsuccessful and the moratoriums that were now and then granted to the communities only made their situation worse. Dissatisfaction with the Kahal grew rapidly. An opposition party was formed everywhere, and the powers granted the Kahals were no longer sufficient to restrain the recalcitrants.

The local synods and the national organization also suffered. The feeling of union had disappeared and the smaller communities rebelled against the hegemony of the central committee and the Jewish Diet. Finally, the Sejm of 1764 decided that the poll tax, now two gulden, should no longer be collected as a lump sum, but levied on each community separately; this gave the death blow to the already tottering organization: while the Kahals continued to function, the system's central agencies, the Vaads, becoming superfluous, were abolished.

g. Intellectual Life. The growing poverty of the Jewish masses and the internal decay of the country naturally had a deleterious effect on intellectual life. The rabbinical literature of this period was still abundant, but there were no longer such brilliant names as in the 16th and 17th centuries, and the works produced did not bear the stamp of originality. There were still a few men of importance, such as Aaron Samuel Kaidanover, Moses Rivkes, Abraham Abele Gombiner and Jehiel Heilprin. The contribution literature of edification (Musar) from the pen of Hirsch Kaidanover and others, and works in Yiddish, found a wide circulation. The most prominent of the Polish physicians was Tobias Cohen, author of Maaseh Tobiah (1708).

This period revealed a much greater interest in mysticism, the usual refuge of intimidated souls. Sabbatai Zevi's proclamation of the approaching redemption of Israel spread through Eastern Europe. The glowing reports about the pseudo-Messiah led the Jews of Poland to send two messengers to Sabbatai at Abydos. These returned home in a state of enthusiasm, because of their experiences, and happy because of the solemn reception which was accorded them; they cherished the most daring hopes for new and better times. No wonder, then, that the ban laid upon the Sabbatians by the Jewish Diet at Jarostaw (Yaroslav) in 1670 had no effect. The fact that Podolia belonged to Turkey from 1672 to 1699 aided in spreading the influence of the Sabbatians of Constantinople and Salonika. Even after Podolia again fell to Poland (1699), the Sabbatian movement continued.

New proclaimers of the Messianic doctrine arose out of the masses who were filled with Cabalistic inclinations. Mystical elements joined to form a sort of sect, which endeavored to hasten the coming of the Messiah by means of chastisements and fastings. The degeneracy of certain apostles of this new gospel led to protests by the communities and the rabbis. Another product of this mystic current was the Frankist movement. At the very time that this was at the height of its power, a new spiritual movement appeared in Polish Jewry. This was Hasidism, one of the greatest spiritual creations of East European Jewry. It created a new doctrine, but split East European Jewry into two camps.

h. From the Attempts at Reform up to the Third Partition. The national misfortune which befell Poland through the first partition led to all sorts of attempts at reform, and thought was given to the position of the Jews. The new regulations in Austria and Prussia gave an impetus to this movement. The utterances on the Jewish question were varied and contradictory. The project of the former chancellor Andrew Zamoyski was reactionary, limiting the right of residence of the Jews, and placing them in an inferior position. On the other hand, the project of "An Anonymous Citizen" in 1782 and 1785 suggested compulsory enlightenment in which the autonomy of communities was to be limited and the Jews were to speak Polish and follow different vocations. The Jewish question became an especially lively topic of discussion during the Quadrennial Diet of 1788 to 1792. In 1789 Mateusz Butrymowicz issued the pamphlet of "An Anonymous Citizen" under a new name, and added proposals of his own; he was an ardent champion of the emancipation and assimilation of the Jews, which he hoped to attain through the regulation of Jewish life and certain compulsory measures. Tadeusz Czacki recognized the usefulness of the Jews to the country, but even he did not shrink from compulsory measures.

On the other hand, there were those, such as Stanislaus Staszic, whose criticism of Jewish conditions was almost anti-Semitic. The Jews added their own views. Hersh Józefowicz sharply attacked Butrymowicz' projects of assimilation and demanded the preservation of Jewish individuality. Abraham Hirszowicz completely agreed with the view of the Polish reformer. Simon Wolfowicz, the Vilna "tribune of the people," sharply criticized the Kahal, and Mendel Satanover wished to follow the model of the methods of enlightenment practised in Western Europe.

The Sejm was still hestitating to decide the question, but the mob now expressed itself by deeds of violence. An attack on the Jews took place in Warsaw on May 16, 1790. The Sejm evaded the issue by creating a commission to deal with the Jewish question; its members included Garnysz, the vice-chancellor and bishop of Chelm, Jezierski and Butrymowicz. The committee worked out a project of compulsory enlightenment, but it never came to a vote, and the constitution of May 3, 1791, did not help the Jews. A compromise was eventually reached; the first task would be that of the liquidation of the debts of the Kahal, and after that was finished the Jewish question would be taken up anew.

In 1793 the second partition of Poland took place, Russia and Prussia annexing large territories. In 1794 occurred the insurrection under Kościuszko, in which Berek Joselowicz took a prominent part. The third partition, which occurred in 1795, gave to Russia Lithuania with its dense Jewish population, while Prussia got the rest of Great Poland, including Mazovia and Warsaw, and Austria absorbed the provinces of Cracow and Lublin.

i. The Duchy of Warsaw. In 1807 Napoleon, after crushing Prussia, deprived it of Great Poland and turned the province into the Duchy of Warsaw. Thereupon the Jews of the duchy once more appealed for civil rights. The answer to this appeal was contained in the Duke's decree of October 17, 1808, which bore the approval of Napoleon and the same tenor as his "infamous decree" of March 17, 1808. Political rights were not to be granted to the Jews for ten years, during which time they were to get rid of their peculiar characteristics and completely assimilate themselves to their surroundings; a few individuals might receive their rights sooner.

Certain Jews laid stress on their higher cultural niveau with the hope of securing special preference for themselves, but without results. Hence the time of the Napoleonic domination was not fortunate for the Jews either economically or politically. They suffered especially severely because of the introduction of military duty in 1808; it was not until 1812, after protracted endeavors and the payment of an annual sum of 700,000 zlotys for exemption, that this was abrogated.

4. From the Congress of Vienna (1815) to the Restoration of Poland (1918). a. New Attempts at Reform. The Congress of Vienna made Poland a kingdom under the Russian czar, and permitted it to retain its autonomy. At that time the number of Jews in Poland was said to be 200,000 in a petition addressed by the Jews of Warsaw to the Russian government. The constitution of the kingdom contained a clause not only guaranteeing the previous rights of the Jews, but even promising them more in the future if they would fulfill certain other conditions, which were not definitely expressed, but which certainly implied a thorough assimilation.

The treatment of the conditions of the peasants and the Jews lay in the hands of a reform committee headed by Adam Czartoryski, which was influenced by the discussions in the press and in literature. The future archbishop of Warsaw, Malczewski, sent a letter to David Friedländer, a Berlin liberal, asking him for an opinion as to an appropriate reform of the Jewish population in Poland.

Friedländer's answer, later printed as a pamphlet (Über die Verbesserung der Israeliten im Königreich Polen, 1819), reached its climax in the demand that the Jews should first be trained to civilization by giving up all their traditional culture, and must be held firmly to the performance of all their civic duties before they could share civic equality. This view found accord both in government circles as well as among the "enlightened" Jews. The commission suggested a project calling for reforms of Jewish life before equality would be granted; another project demanded immediate equality and removal of all discrimination. This met with strong opposition in the ministry, and ended with the rejection of the entire plan. The discussion and the work of the committee continued, and a lively literary war followed.

While this was going on, new limitations were being put into force. Although Alexander I refused to sanction the passage of the law about inns, there were limitations of residence by the anti-Jewish governor, Zajączek, the imposition of a tax for a brief stay, the exemption of the Jews from military duty in return for the payment of "recruiting money" and a limitation of the power of the Kahal. The equality which had been promised to the Jews ten years after 1808 was still far away, and the Sejm asked the czar for new material on a "reform project" for the Jews. The upper classes of Jews, who called themselves "Starozakonni" ("Old Testament Believers," "Poles of the Mosaic Religion") and were in sharp contrast to the Jewish masses, again endeavored to secure special privileges, and to obtain control of the administration of the communities.

The ukase of January 1, 1822, set aside the Kahal and set up in its stead "Congregational Boards" (Dozory Bożnicze) to control the administration of religious affairs and of charities. These committees consisted of the rabbi, his assistant or representative, and three directors elected by those who had the voting privilege. This vestige of former autonomy lasted until 1916.

A committee of Jewish affairs, known as "The Committee of Old Testament Believers," was set up in 1825. It consisted of Polish officials and Jewish councilors, chiefly merchants and members of the liberal professions. In 1826 the Committee founded a rabbinical seminary which became a nursery of assimilation. In the meantime the anti-Jewish feeling grew, and was fostered by literature. The most effective piece of anti-Semitic writing was Théorie du Judaisme (1829), by the Jew-baiter Aloysius Chiarini, a Pole of Italian extraction, who was a professor of theology and a member of The Committee of Old Testament Believers. The book is on a par with the work of the 17th cent. German anti-Semite Eisenmenger, and even revived the blood libel. It was Chiarini who had brought to the seminary Abraham Buchner, the outspoken representative of assimilation.

b. The Jews in the Polish Insurrections. The Jews played their part in the Polish insurrection of 1830 to 1831. This movement had a rather aristocratic character and it was only where a greater amount of democracy was displayed that Jews entered its ranks. Stanislaus (Sinai) Hernisz, in behalf of a number of young Jews proposed to organise a Jewish legion; but this was energetically rejected by the dictator Chlopicki, since the general inclination was to debar Jews from the army. However, the intervention of influential liberal Jews succeeded in obtaining permission for Jews to enter the service. Josef Berkowicz, the son of Berek Joselowicz, issued a patriotic proclamation to the Jews; the Warsaw community contributed 40,000 zlotys for the insurrection and made collections for the equipment of Jewish volunteers. The Jews entered the national guard, but the antipathy of the Polish bourgeoisie was so strong that eventually the 850 Jews in the national guard formed a separate division. Outside of Warsaw, and particularly in Lithuania, the Jews were rather indifferent to the Polish revolutionary cause. Following the crushing of the insurrection, emigrant circles frequently discussed the Jewish problem and many of them revealed a friendly attitude. Major Benjowski and Jan Czynski formed a committee to bring about the emancipation of the Jews, with General Lafayette as honorary president. The Jews Hernisz, Ludwig Lubliner and Leon Hollaenderski were also active in emigre ranks, often fighting in vain against prejudice. After suppression of the insurrection, the autonomy of Poland was abolished, but the Jews were at first still treated according to the law of the country. Later, changes were made in accordance with the Russian policy, but these were not as strict as they were in Russia itself. This was true, for instance, of the military service.

The movement for freedom (1860 to 1863) afforded an opportunity, such as never occurred again, for a closer relation between Poles and Jews. It seemed at that time as if the goal of the Jewish bourgeoisie and some sections of the intelligentsia would become a reality. There now arose among the Jews a man who was certainly predestined by fate to be the intermediary and leader. This was Rabbi Dob Berush Meisels.

Even in the first stages of the insurrection there were examples of fraternization between Jews and Christians. On February 26, 1861, a group of representatives of Poles of all classes resolved to send a petition to the czar, asking for reforms, including equality for the Jews, and Meisels was made a member of the committee that was to draw up the address. Numerous Jews were killed in the demonstrations on the following days. Poles and Jews walked arm in arm behind the biers, together with representatives of the Catholic clergy. Chief Rabbi Meisels and another preacher, Marcus Jastrow, who later became a rabbi at Philadelphia, spoke at the grave after the other clergymen. Jews delivered patriotic speeches in churches, and Christians took part in the memorial services in the synagogues. On Rosh Hashanah of 1861 prayers were recited in many synagogues for the success of the insurrection, and the Polish national hymn was sung. In October, when the Russian government compelled the Catholic clergy to close their churches, the rabbis and communities ordered the synagogues also closed as a sign of protest. The new Russian viceroy Lieders revenged himself on the Jews by throwing Meisels, Jastrow and the presidents of the community into prison, where they remained for about three months.

The frenzy of enthusiasm in which both Poles and Jews felt themselves to be "children of one mother" could not be idly disregarded by the Russian government, for it was perhaps the greatest achievement of the revolutionary movement up to that time. Marquis Wielopolski, chief of the civil government, was entrusted with the difficult mission of serving as intermediary between Poland and the Russian government. The ukase of May 24, 1862, granted the Jews equality in principle; they could buy land and houses, settle wherever they liked, could appear as witnesses before the court, and were freed from the humiliating Jewish oath. The exceptions in regard to the payment of taxes were abrogated; the prohibition of the use of Hebrew and Yiddish in public documents was intended to facilitate the process of assimilation. This edict, which was followed by other ordinances which gave a greater degree of emancipation, had a profound influence upon the Jews.

It seemed as if they had experienced a change of heart. Meisels' agitation could no longer arouse the enthusiasm of the people as it had done before. Even the appeal of the Polish national committee to their "brothers of the Mosaic belief," which held out promises of a happier future and a fraternization of both peoples after they had obtained their freedom, did not meet with the response that was to be expected from the previous conduct of the Jews. Grand Duke Constantine was hailed by the Jewish population in Warsaw; soon afterwards he allowed Meisels and Jastrow to return from exile.

The result was that only a handful of Jews, mostly young people, took part in the bloody clash in Warsaw in April, 1863. Some fell and others were thrown into Russian prisons. The Lithuanian Jews acted more prudently; they refused to follow the Poles, feeling instinctively that the freedom of Poland would not certainly mean happiness to them. Thus they escaped the bloody persecutions of Muraviev the Hangman. The Jews of Poland now had to suffer doubly under the government's efforts for Russification.

c. Growth of Anti-Semitism. With the downfall of the revolution, the Jewish masses no longer felt the attraction of the ideas of the Polish Jewish patriots. The fraternization between Poles and Jews ended in a bitter disillusionment. In 1870 Jan Jeleński, in Jews, Germans and Ourselves, demanded the Polonization of commerce and manufacture, freedom from all "alien" (i.e. Jewish) influence, and the transfer of the Jews to productive activity; these became the watchwords of popular Polish anti-Semitism up to the second World War. Jewish capitalism, argued Jeleński, was alien to the national interests, and the Jewish masses were inimical to and ignorant of modern culture. The Polish press took up these ideas, and even the Jewish periodical Izraelita demanded absolute assimilation.

In 1881 a three-day pogrom against the Jews broke out in Warsaw. It was an offshoot of the pogroms in Russia in the spring and summer of that year, and was denounced vigorously by Polish society, who did not need to import measures from Russia in order to fight the Jews. Hatred against the Jews steadily grew in Poland, and the immigration of Jews from Russia and Lithuania after the pogroms furnished a convenient pretext. The party of National Democrats, founded in 1897, opposed the assimilation of the Jews as counterfeit and harmful; both this party and the Progressives opposed Jewish nationalism. When the Jews supported their own candidates or those of the liberal parties in the elections to the Duma, it only added fuel to the flame, and an economic boycott arose which was even more destructive than the political warfare. This had already attained considerable proportions by the time of the third Duma, and became especially intense after the elections to the fourth Duma in 1912, when the Jews supported Eugene Jagiello, member of the Polish Socialist Party. At that time both Positivists and Progressives openly declared their adherence to anti-Semitism.

d. The First World War. The first World War brought unspeakable miseries to the 2,000,000 Jews in Poland. Suspected of sympathy for the Central Powers, they suffered severely from the Russian troops. Many Jews were shot as spies under martial law, rabbis and prominent Jews were held as hostages, and numerous communities were evacuated, so that more than 80,000 fugitives fled to Warsaw. The lot of the Jews grew worse and worse as Poland became the scene of the fighting.

The Jews breathed more freely after Congress Poland was occupied by the Central Powers in 1915; but they soon felt the heavy hand of the victors, who made all sorts of requisitions, plundered them, and subjected them to oppressive military labor, often deporting them to Germany. German and Austrian chaplains, officers and soldiers, however, often treated the poor Jewish population in a more friendly manner.

In 1916 the authorities attempted a solution of the Jewish problem. A committee was appointed to deal with Jewish communal, educational and religious affairs, and its aim was certainly the gradual Germanization of the Jews of Poland. The ordinance of November 1, 1916, provided for a supreme council, local committees and congregations based on religion; despite all its failings, such as the undemocratic method of voting, it was a step forward. It was opposed by the Jewish nationalists as being incompatible with the idea of minorities, but it survived even after the defeat of the Central Powers and the creation of the new Polish state.

JOSEF MEISL.

5. Period of Restored Sovereignty (1918-39). a. Legal Status and Government Policies. With the armistice, and the declaration of Poland's independence, the miseries of the war years did not come to an end for the Jewish population. Violent death and destruction revisited many communities in the course of the clash of the Polish troops with the Ukrainians in Galicia in 1919 and of the Russo-Polish campaign of 1920. The epidemic of pogroms did not subside until 1922. When the country's sovereignty had been restored, the Jewish citizenry of Russian Poland found itself reunited with the sections of Polish Jewry which had lived under Austria and Germany since the partitions. On the other hand, it was now separated by political frontiers from the rest of Russian Jewry, which was apportioned among half a dozen mutually hostile states. Poland held the largest Jewish contingent in Europe: 2,845,000 in 1921, 3,137,000, or 9.8 per cent of the total population a decade later (census of December 9, 1931), and about 3,300,000 at the end of the period under consideration.

The Minorities Treaty concluded on June 28, 1919, by the Allied and Associated Powers, on the one hand, and by Poland, on the other, guaranteed to the latter's nationals belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities the same treatment as that accorded to its other citizens. In addition, the Treaty gave the Jews special safeguards, such as partial control of their own state-supported schools. The provisions of the Treaty were incorporated into the democratic constitution adopted by the Sejm (Parliament) on March 21, 1921. Nevertheless, they were more honored in the breach than in the observance. Some of the legal disabilities to which former Russian nationals of Jewish faith had been subject under the czars were not revoked until 1931. Furthermore, the government eventually adopted a Jewish policy which was in flagrant violation of the constitution.

From the first, the Jewish representatives in the Sejm, save for the assimilationists from eastern Galicia, formed a separate Parliamentary Club which vigorously defended the interests of their own people. In June, 1925, the government entered into an agreement with the Club to the end of winning the Jewish delegates over to its own side, by promising to give serious attention to the needs of the Jewish population. No important legislation was passed as a result of this step, however, and the agreement itself was soon reduced to a scrap of paper. The Pilsudski regime inaugurated in 1926 by a coup d'état adopted the reactionary program of the National Democrats, except for its anti-Jewish plank. Yet as economic conditions in the newly constituted nation worsened, anti-Semitism grew more virulent. The political leaders, unable to solve the many grave problems which plagued the country, diverted attention from their failure by bringing forward the traditional scapegoat. Anti-Semitism found a ready following among the bourgeoisie, the white-collar workers, and the members of the liberal professions. The Nazis' advent to power in Germany strengthened the movement not only indirectly, but directly, since they gave it financial support. The National Radical Party (Nara) which came into being in 1934 as an offshoot of the old National Democratic organization, advocated the Nazi solution of the Jewish question: the confiscation of the property of the Jews and their expulsion from the country.

In spite of his totalitarian leanings, Pilsudski himself was opposed to discrimination against citizens on religious or racial grounds. The revised constitution of April 23, 1935, which he signed shortly before his death, opens thus: "The Polish State is the common good of all its citizens," and contains also the following provision: "The rights of a citizen to influence public affairs shall be estimated according to the value of his efforts and services for the common good. These rights cannot be restricted by origin, religion, sex, or nationality" (Article 7). Two years after Pilsudski's death his former close associates trampled upon the document which they had helped to frame. In February, 1937, Moscicki, president of the republic, and Marshal Smigly-Rydz openly declared their solidarity with the Camp of National Unity, a new political party formed to supersede all the others. Membership in it was denied to Jews on the ground that they did not belong to the Polish nation. Government sanction was thus given to anti-Semitism. Thereafter the Sejm became a tribune for anti-Jewish propaganda. The official stand was that the Jews were "superfluous" aliens and should be eliminated from the Polish body politic. There was only one difference between the Nara hotheads and the government leaders: while the former were eager for immediate and drastic action, the latter preferred to go about the business of elimination gradually, so as not to injure the state, with which the Jewish element was closely integrated.

Anti-Semitism had the additional support of the Catholic church. Active centers of anti-Jewish agitation were also the universities. Here the number of Jewish students and instructors was severely curtailed and a numerus clausus unofficially set up. This did not satisfy the nationalist students, and they continued to terrorize their Jewish fellows, not stopping at murder, in order completely to exclude them from the schools of higher education. In 1937 the minister of education authorized "ghetto benches" in the classrooms. The measure was enforced in spite of the resistance of liberal and high-minded professors and protests from the academic world abroad, not to mention a half-day general strike by the Jewish citizenry, in which non-Jewish labor too participated. It should be noted that the city workers, who were under the influence of the Polish Socialist Party, were least infected with anti-Semitism, and so were certain radical elements of the peasantry led by the Populist party "Wyzwolenie." Although disapproval of acts of violence had occasionally been voiced in high places, such acts against the Jews had for some time been on the increase. In 1936 anti-Jewish disturbances spread all over the country, claiming many victims. Bloody riots occurred in 1937 in Brześć (Brest-Litovsk) and Częstochowa.

b. Economic Conditions. Polish Jewry emerged from the first World War and the troubled years that immediately followed it in a greatly weakened condition, economically speaking. The destruction of human resources and physical equipment, such as buildings, and the removal of industrial machinery to Germany and Austria, which had been going on for nearly a decade, affected the Jews more severely than the rest of the population. Furthermore, inflation did away with the liquid assets of the businessmen and the savings of all. The restoration of Poland's independence resulted in a drastic shrinkage of economic opportunities: the agriculture of Galicia and of other Polish areas lost its Western markets, and the country found itself minus the Russian outlet for the products of its industries, such as textiles. A high tariff wall further impeded the flow of foreign trade. National productivity fell to a fraction of what it had been before the War, and the world depression pushed the already unbelievably low standard of living even lower. Furthermore, the safety valve of emigration no longer functioned.

The Jews, a particularly vulnerable group, suffered acutely from these unfavorable developments. They were a predominantly urban element, identified with commerce and industry, i.e. chiefly the handicrafts, and forming a disproportionately large part of the mass of emigrants. The occupational structure of the group, as compared with that of the rest of the population, is indicated in the following table (the figures, based on the findings of the census of 1921, are percentages of gainfully employed persons deriving a living from the occupations listed):

Occupation	Jews	Non-Jews
Agriculture	9.8	80.7
Industry and handicrafts	32.2	7.7
Commerce and insurance	35.1	1.5
Communications and transport	2.7	1.7
Officials and liberal professions	4.4	2.3
House workers	5.0	1.8
Other occupations	10.8	4.3

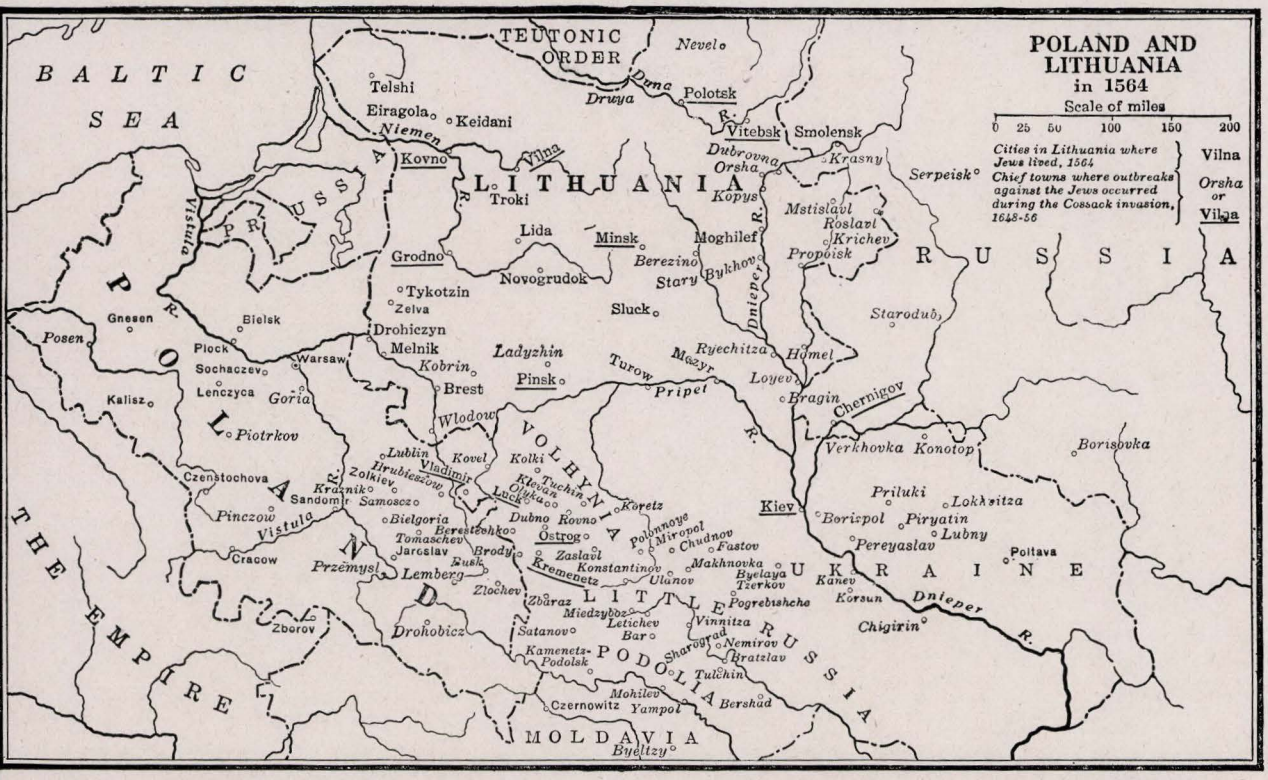
In the decade which elapsed between the first census and that taken on December 9, 1931, no great changes, aside from a general impoverishment, occurred in the occupational alignment of the Jewish contingent. A clearly discernible trend was an increase in the industrial sector and a relatively smaller decrease in the number of persons engaged in commerce. Thus in Warsaw the percentage of economically active Jews in industry grew from 36.5 in 1921 to 46.8 in 1931, while the respective percentages for commerce (and insurance) were 35.3 and 32.7. In the same city the number of Jews in the liberal professions increased from 5.6 per cent in 1921 to 8.2 per cent in 1931. The second census revealed the fact that the Jewish group included a large number of wage earners (including some groups of white-collar workers): 24.7 per cent of all economically active Jews living in town and city. The urban sector of the Jewish population, according to the same census, amounted to 76 per cent.

In the 1930's the economic condition of the Jews took a sharp turn for the worse. For some time the dominant nationality was developing a middle class which claimed an increasing share in commerce, in industry, and in the professions. What rendered these competitors so formidable was the fact that they had the backing of the state. In the second decade of the existence of new Poland its Jewish citizens were subjected to a ruthless campaign intended to eliminate them from the economic life of the country.

This campaign was first directed against the Jewish shopkeeper. The "Polonization" of commerce, i.e. the supplanting of Jews by merchants of "native" stock, was not a new slogan. It was given a practical test just before the first World War, when Jewish stores were boycotted in retaliation for a defeat allegedly administered by Jewish votes to a National Democratic candidate from Warsaw in the elections to the Imperial Duma. In the 1930's the boycott of Jewish business establishments, enforced by pickets and also direct action, became a formidable weapon. It was pronounced legal by the courts, was blessed by the church and given official sanction when the prime minister, in a public statement (June 4, 1936), while discouraging the use of violence against the Jews, approved "the economic fight." Government radio stations broadcast appeals to boycott Jewish places of business. The ruined Jewish traders were to be replaced by peasants from the overpopulated villages.

To induce them to move to the towns, the government offered them cheap credit and even subsidies. Jewish merchants were being displaced also by the growth of consumers' cooperatives. In these enterprises, in credit establishments and transport services, as well as in mines and steel works and in the numerous industrial and commercial establishments operated by the state, it was becoming difficult or impossible for a Jew to secure employment. In fact, there was hardly an occupation in which he did not face systematic discrimination intended to reduce his earnings or deprive him of his livelihood, be it that of a shoemaker's apprentice, an oil-well operator, or an engineer. Blows were dealt to Jewish economy in various devious ways. Thus the anti-Shehitah Law, passed in 1936, was framed to reduce the Jewish meat trade.

While seeking to eliminate the Jews from commerce, from the handicrafts, and from the professions, no attempt was made to find a place for them in agriculture or in heavy industry or in any way to rehabilitate the déclassé elements.



Map of a historic period in Polish Jewish life described on pp. 569 and 570. Reproduced, by courtesy of the Jewish Historical Society of America, from "The History of the Jewish People" by Max L. Margolis and Alexander Marx

Polish Jews, before the Nazi invasion of Poland, receiving aid at one of the free loan agencies established by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee

The intention was to force the Jews to leave the country. Jewish organizations for the promotion of emigration received every encouragement from the authorities. Yet both the public at large and the leadership were fully aware that emigration on any large scale was not within the bounds of possibility, and that not because of any lack of willingness on the part of the Jews.

In the years 1931 to 1935 an average of only 17,000 Jews were able to emigrate, and in 1937 and 1938 the figure declined to 8,900 and 9,200 respectively. "The cold pogrom" which went on for over a decade, far from improving the condition of the non-Jewish population, had only a deleterious effect on the country's economy. At the same time it brought a considerable portion of the Jewish population to the edge of starvation. In 1937 over 40 per cent of the entire Jewish population applied for Passover aid. The ever-growing need was somewhat alleviated through the activities of philanthropic organizations which derived their funds chiefly from the United States and Great Britain.

It should be noted, however, that the anti-Jewish movement did not succeed in completing its work. By the end of the period under review, Polish Jewry, through its ownership of many plants, its managerial ability and industrial skills, its training in the arts and sciences, was still playing an important part in commerce and industry and in the professions.

c. Communal Organization and Cultural Activities. The Jewish community boards (Kehillahs) which had functioned in occupied Russian Poland continued to operate under the Polish regime. They were legalized by a decree dated February 7, 1919, which was superseded by general regulations passed in 1927 and 1928. The law recognized the Kehillahs as a federation of autonomous voluntary associations headed by a central council, but limited their scope to religious and charitable matters and subjected them to a state control so severe as to nullify their autonomy. By the terms of the Minority Treaty of 1919 the Jews were entitled to "an equitable share" of the public funds set aside for religious and charitable purposes. The authorities, however, failed to respect the provision of the Treaty. In 1937 to 1938 the Jews, who formed nearly 10 per cent of the population, received only 1 per cent of such funds, while the Catholics, who were 65 per cent of the population, obtained 90 per cent. On the other hand, because of the general impoverishment of the people, only a fraction were in a position to make any contribution to the community chests. As a result, the Kehillahs were carrying on their work under the constant threat of insolvency. The Warsaw Jewish community spent over one-half of its budget of 3,000,000 zlotys on religious education and welfare.

Political activities were carried on under a variety of banners. There were two clerical parties: Agudas Israel, founded in 1916, and Machzikay Hadas, formed in 1931, in addition to the Mizrachi wing of the Zionist Party. The latter devoted much attention to domestic affairs, upholding the interests of the Jewish people within the confines of the Polish state. It had a large following, particularly in the 1920's, and was indeed the major factor in world Zionism. Polish Jewry was the backbone of the Hechalutz movement for the training of prospective emigrants to Palestine.

Individual Jewish intellectuals were active and indeed prominent in the Polish Socialist Party. The size of the Jewish membership in the underground Communist Party is uncertain. The proletarian and semi-proletarian elements continued to rally round the "Bund" (Yiddisher Arbeiter Farband). This socialist labor party fought the influence of the clerical groups and of the Zionists, advocated national-cultural autonomy and used Yiddish in its publications. A section of the population sponsored Hebrew as the proper medium for an indigenous Jewish culture.

Meanwhile, although the temper of the people was staunchly anti-assimilationist, the use of Polish was making headway. According to the census of 1931, 381,300 persons of Jewish faith named Polish as their mother-tongue.

By the terms of the Minority Treaty, the Polish state undertook (1). to provide children with primary schooling in their mother-tongue at public expense in localities where "a considerable proportion" (interpreted as 25 per cent) of the residents belonged to minorities; (2). to allot "an equitable share" of public funds in support of secondary and vocational schools set up by minority groups. As a matter of fact, not a single Jewish primary school was provided by the state, and the subsidies to the secondary schools were small, diminishing as the years went by.

In spite of great financial stringency, Polish Jewry managed to support a school system of its own. Tarbuth, a cultural organization backed by the Zionist party, maintained, in addition to an agricultural school, a network of kindergartens, elementary and secondary schools and evening courses in which the language of instruction was Hebrew, 269 schools with 44,780 pupils in all (in 1934-35). In the same year the Mizrachi wing of the Zionist Organization supported 220 elementary schools which were a modernized variant of the traditional Heder, as well as two seminars, four Yeshivas and three secondary schools. In these institutions the language of instruction was Hebrew or Polish. Zisho (Zentrale Yiddishe Shul Organizatzye) sponsored a system of schools which were imbued with the spirit of socialism and in which children and adults were taught in Yiddish. In 1934 to 1935 there were 169 such schools with 15,486 pupils. In 1936 to 1937 fifteen trade schools with instruction in Yiddish were also in existence. Moreover, Orthodox associations maintained Heders and Talmud Torahs as well as a number of Yeshivas. As access to the government schools and colleges became more restricted, many young men and women went abroad to obtain a higher education.

In the face of crushing poverty, fairly intense cultural activities persisted. The cause of learning, with the emphasis on secular scholarship, was promoted by the Yiddish Scientific Institute, of Vilna, and the Institute for Hebraic studies of Warsaw. There were several literary and artistic associations. Notable additions were made to the body of Neo-Hebraic and particularly Yiddish writing. Hundreds of books in Hebrew and Yiddish were published annually. On January 1, 1930, there were 180 Jewish dailies and periodicals in the two languages just mentioned and in Polish. By 1937 the number increased to over 250. Moreover, men and women of Jewish extraction made important contributions to Polish culture in literature, in the arts, and in the sciences.

6. Under the Nazi Heel. Even after the occupation of the Sudeten region and the pact of Munich, the campaign against the Jews in Parliament, in the press, the universities, and the various semi-public and private associations continued to be ruthlessly waged. A number of anti-Jewish bills, including a ban on Shehitah, were introduced into the Sejm elected in November, 1938. It was only the occupation of Prague (in March, 1939) and the resultant international crisis that saved the Jews from being legally deprived of some of their basic civil rights. Nevertheless, when, on September 1, 1939, German troops invaded the country, the Jewish citizenry eagerly rallied to its defense. Jew and non-Jew united against the common foe. The authorities ordered the arrest of several anti-Semitic leaders, and agitation against the Jews ceased overnight. According to the Polish general staff, 31,216 Jews fell in battle and 61,000 were captured by the enemy. The number of civilian casualties has not been ascertained. It has been estimated that in Warsaw alone from 8,000 to 10,000 Jews perished.

On September 17th the Soviet army marched into eastern Poland, and twelve days later the fourth partition of Poland took place, the U.S.S.R. annexing an area which held about one-third of the population of the former republic. By a decree dated October 8th the territory that fell to Germany was divided into two sections. The western, including the industrial city of Łódż, was incorporated into the Reich, the rest was formed into a vassal Government General. According to a German statistician, in 1931 the incorporated area and the Government General held respectively 632,000 and 1,269,000 Jews. By July, 1941, as many as 1,700,000 Jews lived in the Government General, forming 12.1 per cent of its total population.

According to figures published by the World Jewish Congress, 250,000 Polish Jews lost their lives up to December 17, 1939. The first weeks of the occupation were filled with looting and massacres. Later, Nazi terror assumed the cloak of law. A decree of October 26, 1939, imposed forced labor upon the Jewish population and provided for the creation of special Jewish labor battalions. All Jews above ten years of age were obliged to wear on their clothes a distinguishing mark in the form of a six-pointed star (decree of November 23, 1939). The group was expropriated either through outright confiscation of funds or the imposition of collective fines. Jewish enterprises were either liquidated or transferred to "Aryans." The entire Jewish population was uprooted. Thousands had fled before the onrush of the Nazi troops, and in the early months many had crossed the frontier into the area held by the U.S.S.R. Many persons went of their own accord from small towns to larger centers. But for the most part migration was in the nature of forced transfers carried out at a moment's notice under conditions of maximum hardship for the victims.

In the annexed area the Jews were deported from Gdynia (Danzig) and Pomerania. An attempt was made to expel them also from Łódż, but as this would have disrupted the economic life of that important textile center, the plan was abandoned, and 160,000 Jews remained there. Another 120,000 were left in Silesia. Within the Government General most of the Jews were expelled from Cracow. Persons in small towns were ordered to move to larger ones and vice versa, without any apparent reason. It would seem, however, that eventually the Germans adopted the policy of herding the Jews into a few large cities so as to facilitate their segregation from the rest of the population.

At first the Nazis devised a scheme of moving the Jews from all over Poland as well as from other occupied territories to the Lublin area, one of the less favored provinces of the Government General, which before the War had a Jewish population of 275,000. By November, 1939, an additional fifty to sixty thousand reached the Lublin Reservation. Subsequently the project was given up, presumably because overcrowding had caused epidemics, which were a menace to the German troops. Then the Nazi authorities proceeded to set up strictly segregated quarters for the Jews in the cities where they were concentrated, such as Lublin and a score of other towns in the Government General. A ghetto, the only one in the Reich, was also set up in Łódż. The largest one to be established was that of Warsaw, decreed on October 17, 1940.

In compliance with this order, 180,000 persons were forced to change their quarters within a few weeks, Jews being compelled to move into the ghetto area, non-Jews out of it. By the end of 1941 nearly half a million persons, some hailing from points outside of Poland proper, were crowded into the space of 100 blocks, eight persons, on the average, occupying one room. The ghetto is separated from the rest of the city by an eight-foot wall with twenty-two entrances, each having a triple police guard: German, Polish and Jewish. No one is permitted to leave the place without special permission in writing, and the Nazi police is instructed to shoot at a Pole who comes within fifty meters of the ghetto wall. The inhabitants include hundreds of Protestants and Catholics of Jewish birth, the term "Jew" being interpreted in accordance with the Nuremberg laws of 1936. The extension of these laws to the Government General was decreed on July 24, 1940, but mixed marriages were not ordered dissolved.

The Warsaw ghetto is a self-governing community with its own militia and courts of arbitration, transportation facilities, postal service, and welfare institutions. It is directed by a Council of Elders, appointed by the Nazi authorities and responsible for the carrying out of their orders. It controls all the phases of the life of the community. Although isolated from the world, the ghetto is not self-sufficient; raw materials and food have to be imported. The latter is rationed, a Jew being allowed one-quarter of the ration allowed a German. The imports are paid for with manufactured goods (haberdashery, clothing, leather goods), and in addition the Council daily supplies a number of laborers to the German authorities. The rate of payment is one-fourth of what a German receives for work of the same kind.

Within the ghetto artisans continue to ply their trades as far as this is possible with the meager allotment of raw materials, working for Jewish customers and even for Germans. They are organized in guilds, and some have set up cooperative workshops. Some stores also are open. From the first, school teachers and government officials of Jewish birth were dismissed from their posts, and lawyers forbidden to practise, while Jewish physicians were allowed to treat only their own people. Some professionals found employment as Council clerks, and former university students became mllitiamen. A source of much concern was the fact that for nearly a year the children went without any schooling. It was not until August 31, 1940, that the Council was permitted to open elementary and trade schools. No other instruction is permitted. A year later libraries and book stores were opened. No printing of books or magazines is permitted, and there is only one newspaper, Gazeta Żydowska, which appears every other day in Polish.

As the months went by and the cumulative effect of Nazi rule was felt, it was becoming more and more difficult for the Council to meet the demands made upon it and especially to carry out its primary function of providing food for all. Notwithstanding some relief from abroad and in spite of the hundreds of thousands of free meals served daily, by the end of 1941 thousands were starving. From April to June (1941) over 10,000 deaths were registered. In the second half of the year epidemics broke out, and the mortality must have risen even higher.

Conditions in the Warsaw ghetto were typical of the general situation. Throughout the occupied territory (in 1942) the Nazi authorities used the Jewish communities as a source of cheap serf labor, and allowed the Jews to live only if they could be useful to the German war machine. Their segregation was enforced with the utmost severity, men and women having been executed for leaving the ghetto without proper permission. On June 26, 1942, the Polish government-in-exile announced in London that 700,000 Jews had been slain by the Nazis in Poland (New York Times, June 27, 1942).

In the grip of disaster Polish Jewry has shown an admirable spirit of self-dependence and mutual help. All party strife has been forgotten in the common struggle for survival. Misery has been a great leveler and has made for a community of sacrifice and effort. The relief organizations have pooled their resources, and new forms of welfare work have come into existence to meet unprecedented conditions. Children were taught in secret, teachers going from town to town. In 1942 they were even preparing for university education, and cultural life goes on. Both Zionist, especially Hechalutz, and Socialist groups are active in bolstering the morale of the people. Ghetto walls can not prevent them from fraternizing with Poles. Together they took part in the underground movement against the common enemy. When the ghetto was set up in Warsaw, at the risk of their lives Polish workers printed a proclamation in protest, and the Jewish workers managed to print a leaflet in response. According to Jewish Telegraphic Agency dispatches (June 8, 1942), German authorities in Nazi-held Poland claimed that there were 2,000,000 Jews in the territory known as the Government General.

A Jewish wedding scene in pre-Nazi Poland

On June 12, 1941, the Polish government-in-exile, in an official declaration, expressed its adherence to the principle of "equal treatment of all citizens without regard to nationality, race or religion" and explicitly condemned "all anti-Semitic activities as harmful to the Polish cause." More recently the minister of labor in that government said publicly: "The Polish and the Jewish population are united as never before by their common suffering, their common desire for freedom, their common hatred of the enemy."

According to an authentic underground report, which the American delegation of the Polish Bund published in October, 1942, ten percent of the Jews of Warsaw died of hunger and disease in 1941. Subsequently the mortality rose to 15%. From time to time mass executions occurred in a number of cities. The extermination of the Jewish population was carried on in the most ruthless and systematic manner in the section of Poland incorporated into the Reich. Only about 20% of the children were given systematic education. During this period as many as eight underground publications in Yiddish and Polish were issued by the Bund.

See also: ANTI-SEMITISM; ARTISANS; BIALYSTOK; CAPITALISM; COOPERATIVES; CRACOW; FINANCE; GALICIA; GUILDS; HANDICRAFTS; JEWISH COMMUNITY AND COMMUNAL ORGANIZATION; LEAGUE OF NATIONS; LITERATURE ON AND BY JEWS; LODZ; LUBLIN; LWÓW; MINORITY RIGHTS; OCCUPATIONS; PERIODICALS AND PRESS; POSEN; PRUSSIA; PUBLIC OFFICE, JEWS IN; RUSSIA; STATISTICS; WARSAW.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY.

Lit.: (Sections 1 to 5): Balaban, M., Z historji zydów w Polsce (1920); idem, Yidn in Poiln (1930); Borovoi, S., "Natzionalno-osvoboditelnaya voina ukrainskovo naroda protiv polskovo vladychestva i yevreiskovo naseleniya Ukrainy," Istoricheskie zapiski, vol. 9 (1940); Braudo, A., and others, edit., Istoriya yevreev v Rossii, vol. 1 (1914); Dubnow, S., History of the Jews in Russia and Poland (3 vols., 1916-20); Friedlaender, Israel, The Jews of Russia and Poland (1915); Gelber, N., Die Juden und der polnische Aufstand 1863 (1923); Goldstein, M., and Dresdner, K., Kultura i sztuka ludu zydowskiego na ziemiach polskich (1935); Gzeires Takh (1938); Lewin, L., Die Landessynode der grosspolnischen Judenschaft (1926); Mahler, R., "A Budzhet fun Vaad Arbe Artzos in 18tn Yorhundert," Yivo Bletter, vol. 15, No. 1-2 (1940); Meisl, Josef, Geschichte der Juden in Polen und Russland (3 vols., 1921-25); Schall, J., Historja żydów w Polsce, na Litwie i Rusi (1934); Schamschon, J., Beiträge zur Geschichte der Judenverfolgungen in Polen während der Jahre 1648-58 (1912); Schipper, I., Kulturgeshichte fun di Yidn in Poilen Besn Mitlalter (1926); idem, Studja nad stosunkami gospodarczymi żydów w Polsce (1911); Schipper, N., Dzieje żydów w Polsce (1926-27).

Section 6: Buell, R. L., Poland: Key to Europe (1939); Chmieliewski, S., "Stan szkolnictwa wśród żydów w Polsce," Sprawy narodowościowe, vol. 11, No. 1-2 (1937); Duker, A. G., The Situation of the Jews in Poland (1936); Gliksman, G., L'aspect économique de la question juive en Pologne (1929); Great Britain, Mission to Poland, Report by Sir Stuart Samuel on his Mission to Poland (1920); Janowsky, O., The Jews and Minority Rights (1937); idem, People at Bay (1938); Lvovitch, David, Economic Situation of the Jews in Poland and Other Eastern European Countries (New York, 1938); Lestschinsky, J., "Der Yidisher Proletariat in Poilen," Yivo Bletter, vol. 15, No. 1-2 (1940); Mendelson, S., The Polish Jews Behind the Nazi Ghetto Walls (1942); Reich, N., "Towards a Solution of the Jewish Problem in Poland," Menorah Journal, vol. 26, No. 2 (1938); Segal, S., The New Order in Poland (1942); idem, The New Poland and the Jews (1938); Unzer Kamf (1941); Ziemiński, J., Problem emigracyi zydowskiej (1937).

POLÁNYI, MICHAEL, scientist, b. Budapest, Hungary, 1891. He studied at the technical schools of Budapest and Karlsruhe and became a lecturer (Privatdozent) at the technical school of Berlin in 1923. In 1929 he was made a life member of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institut für physikalische Chemie, but in 1933 he lost this membership, partly as a result of his protest against introducing the racial question in the evaluation of scientific achievement. In the same year he went to England where he became professor of physical chemistry at Victoria University, Manchester.

In addition to a number of articles on plasticity, crystal structure, absorption and chemical reaction, he published Atomic Reactions (1932); U.S.S.R. Economics (1935). In the latter book as well as in The Contempt of Freedom (1940) he touched upon questions outside his proper field of research. He also made a diagrammatic film, Money and Unemployment (1939).

POLEMICS. The scattering of the Jews throughout the world, as well as their fidelity to their religion, drew upon them the attention of the majority, who regarded them as a strange, unique phenomenon. In addition, the missionary movement among the Jews of ancient times included attacks against ancient religions, while the triumph of Christianity in the 4th cent. brought into power the adherents of a religion that had long been at war with Judaism. As a result there are numerous instances of polemics against Jews and Judaism, beginning with the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C.E. The most important are as follows:

1. Manetho (3rd cent. B.C.E.), in his history of Egypt, incorporated a number of anti-Jewish legends as to the sojourn of the Jews in Egypt and the Exodus.

2. Lysimachos of Alexandria (2nd or 1st cent. B.C.E.), a Greek writer, repeats the same stories.

3. Apollonius Molon (1st cent. B.C.E.), teacher of rhetoric at Rhodes, wrote a diatribe against the Jews.

4. Apion (1st cent. C.E.), a grammarian of Alexandria, was the leader of a movement against the Jews there. He attacked the Jews in speeches and in his historical writings, repeating the previous slanders and accusing them of human sacrifice, ass worship, and hatred of humanity. Josephus answered this and other charges in his Against Apion.

5. Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho, accuses the Jews of altering the passages in the Hebrew Bible which were favorable to Christianity.

6. A number of early Church Fathers attacked the Jews or Judaism. Among them were Aristo of Pella, Clement of Alexandria, Claudius Apollinarius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Eusebius, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Ephraem Syrus, Epiphanius and Jerome. The usual burden of the attack is that the Jews refused to accept the Christian teachings.

7. Isidorus (6th cent.), in Spain, wrote a polemic against Judaism.

8. Agobard and Amolo (9th cent.), bishops of Lyon, attacked the Jews for their "insolence."

9. Raimondo Martin (13th cent.), with his Capistrum Judaeorum and Pugio Fidei, inaugurated a new series of attacks on Judaism, written for the purpose of converting the Jews. This was followed by polemics of Christian clerics and Jewish apostates, such as Abner of Burgos, Astruc Raimuch, Geronimo de Santa Fé, and Nicholas Donin. This was also the period for attacks on the Talmud.

10. Johann Andreas Eisenmenger's Entdecktes Judentum (1700) is a violent polemic against both Jews and Judaism. It is the opening shot of a violent and scurrilous anti-Semitic campaign, which started again after 1815, increased after 1870, and grew to its highest pitch of intemperate assault upon everything Jewish in the years after the first World War.

See also: ANTI-SEMITISM; CANARDS; CHURCH FATHERS; GREEK WRITERS ON JEWS; ROMAN WRITERS ON JEWS.

Lit.: Wilcken, U., Zum alexandrinischen Antisemitismus (1909); Broydé, I., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 102-9.

POLEMON II, king first of Pontus and Cilicia (38-63 C.E.) and then of Cilicia alone, d. 74 C.E. About 42 or 43 C.E., together with several neighboring princes, Polemon, who was a pagan, attended a conference called at Tiberias by Agrippa I, king of Judea, ostensibly for the purpose of general amusement and relaxation, but actually for the purpose of planning means to lessen Roman power in Judea. The conference was dissolved by Vibius Marsus, Roman governor of Syria, who, suspicious of Agrippa, ordered all his allies to return home.

Polemon later married Berenice, sister of King Agrippa I, because of her wealth and beauty, submitting to circumcision, and adopting the Jewish faith in order to do so. When, after a short space of time, Berenice left him, he returned to paganism.

POLEYEFF, MOSES AARON, rabbi and Talmudist, b. Minsk, Russia, 1888. He was ordained rabbi in 1910 in Slutzk, Russia. Ten years later he emigrated to the United States. He was appointed professor of Talmud at Yeshiva College, in New York city, where he was still incumbent in 1942. He first occupied a pulpit in Brooklyn, and in 1937 was elected to the pulpit of Congregation Chevra Mishnayos in the Bronx, N. Y. Poleyeff was on the Rabbinical Board of Greater New York from 1921 on.

A regular contributor to the Chicago rabbinical monthly Hapardes, to Eretz Israel (Palestine), the New York Hamesillah and the two publications of the Yeshiva College, Hedenu and Ner Maarabi, he published Mahaneh Yisrael (1930) and Beer Abraham (1939).

POLGAR, ALFRED, critic and author, b. Vienna, 1875. The son of a musician, he gained renown in Germany through his reviews, character sketches and feuilletons on music and the stage. He was a master of the short essay, and ranged from profundity to satire in his witty comments on contemporary music and drama. In collaboration with Egon Friedell and Armin Friedmann, he wrote several comedies and farces for the theatre.

His works include: Pallenberg (1921); Gestern und heute (1922); An den Rand geschrieben (1927); Ich bin Zeuge (1928); Schwarz auf Weiss (1929); Die Defraudanten (1931). A selection of his writings, Auswahlband, appeared in 1930. After his books were banished by the Nazis, he published, in Holland, In der Zwischenzeit (1935) and Sekundenzeiger. He contributed to the anthology, Dichter helfen (1936). In 1942 Polgar was living in the United States.

Lit.: Die Weltbühne, Oct., 1925; Kürschners deutscher Literatur-Kalender (1932).

POLGAR, ISAAC BEN JOSEPH, see IBN PULGAR, ISAAC BEN JOSEPH.

POLIAKOFF, JACOB, banker and philanthropist, b. Dubrovna, Russia, 1832; d. Biarritz, France, 1909. He was founder and director of several banks, and was made an honorary citizen of Taganrog in recognition of his philanthropic activities. Poliakoff devoted much of his time to Jewish communal life, and when he moved to St. Petersburg he became a leader of the Jewish community and was elected vice-president of the Jewish Colonization Association of Russia.

POLIAKOFF, LAZAR, banker and industrialist, b. Dubrovna, Russia, 1842; d. Paris, 1913. He engaged in the banking business in Moscow in 1873, and soon after founded there the Agrarian Bank and several other commercial banks. Besides, he founded and directed various industrial undertakings in Russia and Persia; he was also instrumental in the construction of important state roads in Persia. An outstanding leader of the Jewish community of Moscow, Poliakoff built two large synagogues and founded a textile factory in his home town for the purpose of providing employment for Jewish weavers. He was raised to nobility in Russia and in Persia.

POLIAKOFF, SAMUEL SALOMONOVICZ, industrialist, b. Orsha, Russia, 1837; d. St. Petersburg, 1888. He received his early Talmudic education in Orel, and after a number of years of vicissitudes and hardships settled in St. Petersburg in the 1850's. He soon became involved in numerous industrial enterprises and built several railroads, such as the Voronezh-Rostov, Orel-Griasi, Kursk-Kharkov-Azov, and, during the Russo-Turkish War (1877-78), the Benderi-Galatz. Poliakoff was one of the founders of the Moscow Agrarian Bank and of several other banking institutions. In his closing years he devoted himself to purely Jewish causes, social and religious, contributed to the construction of a Jewish theological academy in St. Petersburg, and helped in the founding of the Jewish Agricultural Fund, out of which arose the ORT. He was offered the post of finance minister on condition that he renounce Judaism, but he declined.

Lit.: Lipschitz, Toledoth Yitzhak; Wininger, S., Grosse Jüdische National-Biographie, vol. 5 (1931) 59; Brockhaus-Efron, vol. 57, p. 461.

POLIER, JUSTINE WISE, lawyer and judge, b. Portland, Ore., 1903. She was a daughter of Rabbi Stephen S. Wise. After receiving the LL.D. degree from Yale Law School, she was admitted to the New York bar in 1928. She served as referee in the New York State Department of Labor (1929-34), as assistant corporation counsel to the City of New York (1934-35) and as justice of the Domestic Relations Court, New York city, from 1935 on. She was active in child welfare work, serving on the New York Committee for Child Welfare from 1940 on and as chairman of the executive board of the Child Adoption Committee of the Free Synagogue. In 1941 she published Everybody's Children; Nobody's Child. She served also on the board of the New School for Social Research from 1941 on, and was a consultant to the Office of Civilian Defense.

POLISH JEWS IN AMERICA, FEDERATION OF, established in 1908 to serve as a central body uniting the groups of Polish Jewish immigrants who concentrated themselves in societies, lodges and clubs. They established the Beth David Hospital in Manhattan (1912), and engaged in various fraternal actions. The scope of activities of the organization became much wider in 1923, when Benjamin Winter became president, and under the executive directorship of Zelig Tygel, who served from 1923 to 1940. In 1930 the Federation had 15,000 dues-paying members, and branches in Pittsburgh, Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis and other cities, as well as in Canada, in addition to the central office in New York city.

The chief activities of the Federation during the period from 1920 to the outbreak of the second World War were to defend the rights of the Jews in Poland by means of a series of direct negotiations with the representatives of the Polish government, and to establish relief committees of the groups hailing from a common town or city of nativity (Landsmannshaften). More than one hundred such relief committees were established in 1928 to 1929, which sent over hundreds of thousands of dollars annually to the needy Jews in various Polish towns. The central office was in constant touch with all important leaders of the Jews in Poland, as well as with many who needed aid from their American relatives, for purposes of trade, besides other economic purposes.

In September, 1930, the name was changed to American Federation for Polish Jews, and its purposes were set forth as follows:

To give aid and relief to Jews in Poland and to give counsel and material assistance to needy Jewish refugees of Polish origin in the United States and other countries.

To assist Jewish émigrés of Polish origin to a better understanding and appreciation of American ideals and institutions; and to assist them in preparing themselves to become American citizens.

To facilitate the exchange of information between Jewish residents and Jewish communities in Poland with their relatives resident in the United States.

To foster a better understanding and deeper appreciation of the cultural, moral and spiritual attainments of the Jews in Poland and of the contributions which Jews of Polish origin have made to American democracy and to advancement of progress in other countries in the various fields of cultural endeavor.

To assist in the establishment of opinion favorable to equal rights for Jews in Poland.

The officers of the Federation in 1942 were: Benjamin Winter, president; Jacob Brown, Mrs. Alex P. Kaplan, Jacob Leichtman, Dr. Joseph Tenenbaum, Nathan Warshaw, Benjamin J. Weinberg and Abraham Werman, vice-presidents; Sam Berke, treasurer; Morris Blumenstock, director. The Federation (1942) published a monthly, called Polish Jew, in Yiddish and English.

The Women's Division of the Federation of Polish Jews in America was organized in 1933. It served the parent organization in all its activities, and since the entrance of the United States into the second World War it undertook a great deal of work in behalf of the war effort. During 1942 the Women's Division presented a completely equipped ambulance to the British-American Ambulance Corps. Under the leadership of its president, Mrs. Alex P. Kaplan, the organization grew from thirty-four members in 1933 to over 300 members in 1942. In addition, it helped to organize women's branches in the following Federation's districts: Boston, Philadelphia, Detroit, St. Paul and Chicago. BENJAMIN WINTER.

POLITZER, ADAM, otologist, b. Alberti, Hungary, 1835; d. Vienna, 1920. One of the most famous otologists of his time, he became, in 1861, instructor and in 1870 assistant professor at the University of Vienna, and in 1873 director of the otological department of the Vienna General Hospital. He was made full professor in 1895, and from 1898 occupied the post of general director of the university's otological clinic. The results of his wide researches in the field of psychology, normal and pathological anatomy and histology enriched this branch of medicine and laid the foundation for a scientific understanding of otological diseases and for its consequent therapeutic methods. These he began to publish in Archiv für Ohrenheilkunde, founded by him in 1864, and which, in 1878, appeared in a collection entitled Lehrbuch der Ohrenheilkunde, constituting his chief work on this subject. In 1893 the ministry of education appointed Politzer a delegate to the Chicago World's Fair, and great honors were conferred on him in 1909 by the university, occasioned by the celebration of the fiftieth year of his medical service. Politzer was vice-president and curator of the Jewish Museum in Vienna.

His published works include: Beleuchtungsbilder des Trommelfells (1865); Zehn Wandtafeln zur Anatomie des Gehörorgans (1873); Die anatomische und histologische Zergliederung des menschlichen Gehörorgans im normalen und kranken Zustande (1889); Geschichte der Ohrenheilkunde (2 vols., 1907-8).

POLL TAX, see TAXATION.

POLL, HEINRICH, physician, b. Berlin, 1877; d. Lund, Sweden, 1939. From 1899 to 1922 he was instructor in the anatomical and biological department of the University of Berlin. In 1922 he became assistant professor of hereditary science and in 1924 was appointed professor of anatomy at the University of Hamburg. He presented the first of the Flexner lectures at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn. (1928-29). During his stay in the United States he lectured also at Chicago University, Columbia, Yale, Harvard and the University of Washington. In 1933 he was removed from his office by the Nazi regime and went to Lund, Sweden, where he continued his researches.

Poll's published works include Die vergleichende Entwicklungsgeschichte der Nebennervensysteme der Wirbeltiere (in Hartwig's Handbuch der Entwicklungslehre, vol. 3, 1905) and Biologische Wandtafeln (1924).

Lit.: Biographisches Lexikon hervorragender Ärzte (1931-32); Cummins, Harold, in Science, Aug. 25, 1939.

POLLACK, EGON, conductor, b. Prague, 1879; d. Prague, 1933. He studied with Knittl at the Prague Conservatory, following which he became chorusmaster at the Landestheater. In 1905 he was appointed conductor at the Bremen Opera. From 1910 to 1912 he was conductor of the Leipzig Opera, from 1912 to 1917 at the Frankfort Opera, and from 1917 to 1933 at Hamburg. He distinguished himself as a Wagnerian conductor of exceptional merit, and as an interpreter of the operas of Richard Strauss. In 1914 he achieved great success with the Wagnerian repertory at Covent Garden, repeating his performances sometime later at Théâtre Champs Élysées, in Paris.

Pollack also distinguished himself in guest performances in Egypt, Vienna, and Chicago (1931-32). With the rise of the Nazi regime he left Germany and became principal conductor at the Prague Opera. He died of heart attack while conducting a performance of Fidelio.

POLLAK, BERTHOLD STEINBACH, phthisiologist, b. Vienna, 1873. He came to the United States in 1888. After he had completed his medical education and spent a period as resident physician in a hospital in Philadelphia, he settled in Jersey City, N. J., where he pursued his private practice from 1899 to 1907. That year he was appointed medical director of the Hudson County Tuberculosis Hospital and Sanatorium. Pollak became chief of the tuberculosis division of the Jersey City Medical Center in 1917, and phthisiologist of numerous New Jersey institutions; in 1932 he was elected chairman of the Medical Board of the Deborah Sanatorium at Browns Mills, N. J. He was still active in these posts in 1942. From 1916 on he was on the executive council of the New Jersey Public Health and Sanitary Association. He rose to prominence in numerous other health associations, and contributed many papers to medical literature on the subject of tuberculosis.

Pollak was elected president of Temple Beth-El of Jersey City in 1907, and after serving as president of the B'nai B'rith, District Three, he was elected treasurer. He was formerly a member of the American Jewish Committee and of the American Jewish Congress.

POLLAK, GUSTAV, journalist and editor, b. Vienna, 1849; d. Cambridge, Mass., 1919. He emigrated to the United States at the age of seventeen. In 1874 he began to contribute articles on foreign politics and literature to the New York Nation; he had already made the acquaintance of Michael Heilprin, encyclopedist and one of the editors of the Nation, and in 1875 he married Heilprin's daughter Celia. Heilprin was a major factor in Pollak's further education, and Pollak commemorated Heilprin's life and influence in his volume Michael Heilprin and His Sons (1912).

Pollak was made cashier of the newly organized Evening Post Publishing Company in 1881, and continued to write for periodicals, becoming editor of Babyhood in 1884. Later he published Our Success in Child Training and (with Dr. L. M. Yale) The Century Book for Mothers (1901). He was, in addition, associated as contributor or editor with Appletons' Cyclopaedia of American Biography, the Century Cyclopedia of Names, The New International Encyclopedia, and Nelson's Encyclopedia. Other writings were: Franz Grillparzer and the Austrian Drama (1907), considered the standard work on that subject; Fifty Years of American Idealism; The New York Nation (1915).

During his residence at Summit, N. J., Pollak was candidate of the Gold Democrats for state senator, and in the presidential campaign of 1892 helped found the German American Reform Union.

FRANCIS DEÁK POLLAK (b. 1876; d. 1916), older son of Gustav Pollak, rose to prominence in the practice of law in New York city, and was active in civic reform. He served as a member of the Committee of 107 which in 1913 nominated the Fusion administration. Toward the close of his life he was active in the movement to settle Jewish immigrants on farms.

Lit.: Nation, Nov. 8, 1919, p. 581; Dictionary of American Biography, vol. 15 (1935) 46-47.

POLLÁK, HAYIM, author and educator, b. Liptovsky-Sväty-Mikulaš (Liptószentmiklós), Hungary, 1835; d. Budapest, 1905. After receiving a Talmudic education in his native city, he studied at the Yeshivas of Pressburg and Sátoraljaujhely, also at Prague. He taught at various Jewish public schools in Hungary, including that of Óbuda (Altofen), where he was retained on the staff after the city of Budapest took over the school.

Pollák was the author of a Hebrew-Hungarian dictionary (1880), the first of its kind. Furthermore, he published Válogatott gyöngyök (Choice of Pearls), translations from Solomon ibn Gabirol's Mibhar Hapeninim; Megillath Antiochus (1886), with Hungarian translation and Hebrew notes; Izráel népének multjából (1898; German trans., Die Erinnerung an die Vorfahren, 1902), a history of mourning customs; Aktenstücke über Alt-Ofen (1902). From 1882 to 1883 he edited the journal Jesurun, founded to combat anti-Semitism.

POLLÁK, HENRIK, physician and communal worker, b. Óbuda (Altofen), Hungary, 1821; d. Budapest, 1894. He studied medicine at the Universities of Pest and Vienna. In addition to Hebrew, Latin, Greek, English, French and German, he learned the Hungarian language. He advocated among Jews the necessity of learning the vernacular and giving up their idiomatic and social seclusion. He took part in the national war of independence of 1848 to 1849 as a physician in the revolutionary army. From 1860 on, when political conditions permitted it, he collaborated actively in the movements which were to establish the Jewish community of Hungary as one among equal denominations: Magyarization, emancipation, reform of communal organization, establishment of the rabbinical seminary. He took part also in the founding of the Hungarian Jewish Scholarship Fund. Pollák retired from communal activities in the 1870's.

POLLAK, JACOB, Talmudic scholar, who lived at the end of the 15th and the beginning of the 16th cent. He founded his own clever method of instruction, known as Pilpul. This method gained a firm footing in Poland and, despite many objections on the part of famous authorities, remained predominant even thereafter in the Polish Yeshivas; it was partly displaced in Lithuania.

Pollak came from Prague, and at an early age married Esther, the daughter of Moses Fischel, of Cracow, the banker of Polish kings, and of his wife Rachel, who was one of the most influential women at the court of Alexander and Sigismund I, kings of Poland. In 1495 Pollak and his father-in-law, together with other community elders, were accused of arson and arrested. They were soon released, but were obliged to leave Cracow with the entire community and settle in Kazimierz. Here, in 1503, Pollak was named chief rabbi of Little Poland (perhaps only of Cracow) by King Alexander, and vested with great powers. But in 1509 he was involved in a controversy with the most eminent rabbis of his time on account of his negligent issuance of a bill of divorce (Get), and he would have been forced to leave Cracow if the king had not protected him. Pollak then opened his famous Yeshiva in Cracow, at which the later Lublin rabbi, Shalom Shachna, and the later Cracow rabbi, Moses Fischel, Pollak's nephew, studied. Pollak soon again had a dispute with some rabbis and even issued a ban against the rabbi of Padua, Abraham Minz. But when he had a dispute also with the queen's physician, Samuel bar Meshullam, he was compelled to leave Poland and moved to Safed, Palestine. He left no scholarly works.

Lit.: Balaban, Majer, "Jakob Pollak, Der Baal chillukim in Krakau und seine Zeit," Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums (1913); idem, Dzieje Zydow Krakowie i na Kazimerzu, vol. 1 (1930) 106-12.

POLLAK, LEOPOLD, painter, b. Lodenitz, Bohemia, 1806; d. Rome, 1880. He studied at Prague, Vienna and Munich, and later at Rome, where he painted Italian scenes, taking Riedel as his model. Some of his pictures were engraved by Mandel Straucher and others. Pollak's best paintings were placed in the following galleries: the portrait of the painter Riedel (1851), in the New Pinakothek, Munich; Pilgrim and Italian Shepherds, in the Hall of Art, Hamburg; Shepherd Boy, at Harrach, Vienna; Shepherdess with Lamb, in the Redern Palace, Berlin.

Lit.: Bryan's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers, vol. 4 (1904) 140; Thieme, U., and Becker, F., Allgemeines Lexikon der bildenden Künstler, vol. 27, p. 216; Kohut, Adolph, Berühmte israelitische Männer und Frauen, vol. 1 (1900-1) 301.

POLLÁK, MIKSA, rabbi and historian, b. Beled, Hungary, 1868. He was ordained at the rabbinical seminary of Budapest in 1894, and from that time on served as chief rabbi of the Reform community of Sopron. He published: A zsidók Bécsujhelyen (The Jews at Wiener Neustadt; 1892); Das Judentum und seine Parteien (1895); A zsidók története Sopronban (A History of the Jews at Sopron; 1896), a German version of which was published in 1929.

He was author also of Abodath Yisrael (1924) and of a volume of sermons (1938). His monographs on the Bible in the works of Hungarian poets were published with the aid of the Hungarian academy. He contributed articles to the Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, Österreichische Wochenschrift and the jubilee volume in honor of Moses Bloch (1905). The author Károly Pap was his son.

POLLAK, MORITZ, RITTER VON BORKENAU, industrialist and financier, b. Vienna, 1827; d. Vienna, 1904. In 1857 he became a member of the Vienna municipal government, and in 1858 a member of the Committee of the Niederösterreichische Escomte Gesellschaft. He was a member also of the Vienna Chamber of Commerce, and was unanimously elected the director of the Wiener Kaufmannshalle. In 1858 he was appointed director of the department of finance of Vienna.

In 1861 Pollak became a director of the Vienna Jewish community prayer-house, and was its president during 1884 to 1885. He was active in Jewish community affairs and in the civic improvement of Vienna. For his services at the Paris Exposition (1878) he was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor. He was knighted by the Austrian emperor.

POLLAK, SIMON, physician, b. Prussia, 1816; d. 1903. He came to the United States in 1838 and finally settled in St. Louis, Mo. There he organized an eye and ear clinic, the first west of the Mississippi. He was particularly active in the field of ophthalmology, and one of the founders of the Missouri Institute for the Blind in 1850. During the Civil War he served as general hospital inspector in the United States Sanitary Commission.

Lit.: Morrison, Hyman, Early Jewish Physicians in America (1929).

POLLAK, WALTER HEILPRIN, lawyer, b. Summit, N. J., 1887; d. New York city, 1940. He was the son of Gustav Pollak, and, like his father, was identified with liberal movements. Receiving his law degree from Harvard in 1910, Pollak was admitted to the New York bar the following year and entered practice. He was associated with many state and federal special commissions and undertakings. From 1925 to 1931 Pollak was counsel for the New York State Housing Commission, and from 1929 to 1931 consultant to the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement.

Pollak was chairman of the United States Railroad Investigation Commission in 1935, and later was special assistant to the United States Attorney General in railroad pension litigation. He was prominent also in 1932 and again in 1935 when he argued the appeals of the Scottsboro defendants successfully before the Supreme Court, obtaining retrials for the Negroes charged with rape in the state of Alabama. Among Pollak's communal positions were his membership on the board of directors of the Foreign Policy Association and the National Consumers League.

POLLINI, BERNHARD (originally, Baruch Pohl), opera impresario, b. Cologne, Germany, 1838; d. Hamburg, Germany, 1897. He made his musical debut as opera tenor in I Puritani at Cologne (1857). He later traveled with a wandering Italian troupe as baritone, soon assuming its direction. In 1865 he became manager of the Lemberg Opera, following which he directed Italian opera at the opera houses of St. Petersburg and Moscow. In 1874 he became manager of the Hamburg Opera, a post he held until the end of his life. His regime in Hamburg was marked by progressive opera-making which earned him international repute, as well as the honorary title of Hofrat. He coupled his directorial duties in Hamburg with the management of the Altona Theatre and that of the Thalia Theatre in Hamburg.

POLLITZER, ADOLF, violinist and teacher, b. Budapest, 1832; d. London, 1900. He studied violin in Vienna with Böhm, winning first prize at the Conservatory in 1846. Following a brief concert tour, he continued his studies in Paris with Alard. In 1851 he settled in London, and thereafter was a prominent figure in its musical life. He was concertmaster of the London Philharmonic Orchestra and, after 1861, professor of violin at the Royal College of Music, rising to the post of director in 1890. At one time he was the teacher of Sir Edward Elgar. Besides composing a concerto for the violin and numerous smaller pieces, he edited numerous musical works for his instrument.

POLLITZER, SIR FRANK JOSEPH COLEMAN, British government official, b. 1869. He was in the transport contracting business until his retirement in 1931. Pollitzer was an alderman of the city of London, sheriff in 1936 and 1937, and justice of the peace for the County of London. He was knighted in 1937.

POLLITZER, SIGMUND, dermatologist, b. New York city, 1859; d. New York city, 1937. He received his M.A. degree from the College of the City of New York in 1882, and his medical degree from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University in 1884. Then he went to study in Europe, and while there joined the medical corps of the Serbian army for the duration of the Serbian-Bulgarian war of 1885 and 1886. Pollitzer was one of the first American physicians to become acquainted with modern bacteriology.

On his return to the United States he became associated with the Lenox Hill Hospital, then known as the German Hospital, and retained this connection until his death. From 1908 to 1915 Pollitzer was also professor of dermatology at the Post Graduate Hospital. He wrote approximately a hundred monographs on dermatology and syphilology. During the first World War he was attached to the surgeon general's headquarters in Washington, and later served with Base Hospital No. 1 in New York city.

POLLOCK, CHANNING, author and playwright, b. Washington, D. C., 1890. He was the son of a Jewish father—Alexander L. Pollock, who in 1894 was United States consul at San Salvador. At the age of eighteen Pollock became dramatic critic for the Washington Post. Subsequently he served as dramatic critic for Ainslee's, The Smart Set and The Green Book. Although he retained his magazine connections until 1919, most of Channing's time, after 1906, was devoted to his own writing. As the author or co-author of almost thirty plays and more than ten books, Pollock was one of the most prolific of popular American writers. Pollock also wrote for many magazines and prepared motion picture scripts. He was for a time vice-president of the Authors League of America. He was awarded an honorary Litt.D. degree by Colgate University in 1938, and an LL.D. degree by Northeastern University.

Among his plays were: The Pit (1900); Napoleon The Great (1901); The Crowded Hour (with Edgar Selwyn; 1918); The Sign on the Door (1919); The Fool (1922); The Enemy (1925); The House Beautiful (1931). Some of his plays were produced in various European cities as well as in the United States. Among his books were The Adventures of a Happy Man (1939) and Guide Posts in Chaos (1942).

POLNA TRIAL. In April, 1899, Agnes Hruza, daughter of a cottager, was found murdered, her throat cut, in the woods of Brezina, near Polna, a small city on the Bohemian-Moravian boundary with 210 Jews among 5,000 inhabitants. The victim's brother, after a dispute over their inheritance, had left for the United States. Rumor had it that Leopold Hilsner, a Jewish shoemaker's helper, had committed the crime. The youth was apprehended, and after a five-day jury trial in Kuttenberg, Hilsner was found guilty and condemned to death, in September, 1899. Moreover, the testimony by the physician of the court that an insufficient amount of blood had been found near the corpse led to the assumption, in public, that a murder for ritual purposes had been perpetrated. But at the court of appeals in Vienna, the faculty of the Czech University of Prague refuted the verdict of the court physicians.

At the jury trial in Pisec, Hilsner was accused also of the murder of Mary Klima, of Upper Wieznitz, near Polna, who had been missing since July, 1898. Her skeleton, covered with faggots, had been found in October of the same year in a condition similar to that of Agnes Hruza. A witness was produced who testified that at a distance of about 2,000 feet he had seen Hilsner in the company of two other men on the evening of the day of the crime; he based his recognition of Hilsner on the color of the latter's coat. The court refused to have the witness's eyesight examined. In the course of the investigation Hilsner was prevailed upon to implicate two Jews, Erbmann and Wassermann, as his accomplices in the crime. At the trial Hilsner professed his innocence and declared that he had been tricked into involving the two guiltless men; the two Jews were able to produce a perfect alibi. Hilsner was condemned to death, but the verdict was commuted to penal servitude for life. The trial itself caused much unrest and Jew-baiting in Bohemia and Moravia. Although he exposed himself to slander, Thomas G. Masaryk, after a thorough investigation of the real facts, objected to the manner in which the trial had been conducted and the insinuation of a ritual murder. All future efforts to obtain a new trial were in vain; not until Emperor Charles I succeeded to the throne (1916) was Hilsner released.

Lit.: Masaryk, Thomas G., Die Notwendigkeit der Revision des Polnaer Prozesses; Nussbaum, Arthur, Der Polnaer Ritualmordprozess, 2nd ed. (1906).

POLO, MARCO, non-Jewish explorer, b. 1254; d. 1323. His notes, known as the Book of Marco Polo, which were dictated in French in the Genoa prison in 1298, contain important data on the Jews of far-off lands. Polo relates that Kublai Khan, in whose service he was for many years, accorded to the Jews and their faith the same consideration he showed for all other creeds. However, the emperor was under the impression that Moses was the God of the Jews. Polo states also that he met many Jews who spoke their own language in Coilum, Malabar, South India, and also in Abyssinia, where they wore a mark on both cheeks. On the southern coast of Arabia Polo saw two islands, "an island of men and an island of women," inhabited by Jewish Christians of the Old Testament; the men were separated from their wives nine months out of the year, and did not disturb them during pregnancy.

Marco Polo's report on the Jews of Georgia, in Transcaucasia, seems to be an interpolation.

Lit.: Le livre de Marco Polo, citoyen de Venise (1865) 250-252, 643, 671 et seq., 694; Book containing the Kingdom and Marvels of the East, translated by H. Yule (1871).

POLOCK, MOSES, publisher, rare book dealer and bibliophile, b. Philadelphia, 1817; d. Philadelphia, 1903. His father was Hyman Polock, a native of Amsterdam, who emigrated to England. There he married Rebecca Barnett, a descendant of the Levy family, some of whose members were early settlers in Pennsylvania. The Polocks left England and settled in Philadelphia in 1811, becoming active and prominent members of the Jewish community in that city. Hyman Polock at one time served as president of Beth Israel Congregation.

Moses Polock, as a youth, showed a great interest in books, and his father, although in the jewelry business himself, permitted the son to follow his inclination. In 1831, upon the retirement of William McCarty from the old and leading Philadelphia publishers McCarty and Davis, Moses Polock, then fourteen years of age, obtained a clerkship in the store. There the bookish young man met and knew many of the eminent writers of the day, including Edgar Allan Poe, James Fenimore Cooper, Noah Webster, Charles Godfrey Leland, Herman Melville, and others.

So successful was Polock that he became chief assistant to Thomas Davis, and upon the latter's death (1851) was named one of the executors of his estate. The stock of McCarty and Davis was sold at auction, but a considerable portion of it was bought in by Polock with money left by his former employer for that purpose. From 1853 on Polock carried on a publishing business under his own name, issuing miscellaneous books. The most important of these was the first collected edition (1857) of Charles Brockden Brown, America's first novelist. Gradually Polock retired from active publishing and established himself as a rare book dealer; as such he was the first to deal solely in Americana, and he numbered among his friends and customers such eminent bibliophiles and collectors of Americana as James Lenox, Samuel L. M. Barlow, Samuel W. Pennypacker, Henry C. Murphy, George Brinley, J. C. Brevoort and Clarence S. Bement. These men owed much to Polock's knowledge in the field of Americana; and so, too, did several institutions, including the Historical Society of Pennsylvania and the John Carter Brown Library.

Growing older and somewhat eccentric, Polock became reluctant to part with his rare items. When he did consent to give up an item, he would copy it painstakingly in pen and ink; these copies remained as outstanding examples of calligraphy. He finally withdrew from all active business, and lived as a bookish hermit in the top floors of his office at 406 Commerce Street, sought out by scholars for his knowledge and occasionally by some intrepid collector in search of a rare item.

Polock was for many years a member of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, and as a collector was interested chiefly in Frankliniana, in Washingtoniana, and in American children's books. His collection of children's books (the first of its kind in the United States) Polock, who remained a bachelor, gave to his niece, Rebecca Rosenbach, and to his famed nephew, Dr. A. S. W. Rosenbach, who, after adding to it over a period of forty years, deposited the collection in the Free Library of Philadelphia. In 1895, after having spent sixty-five years in the book trade, Polock sold at auction a large portion of his stock, including the Franklin imprints.

After his death the remainder of his collection of rare books, including the celebrated volumes from the library of George Washington, were sold at Henkels in 1904. Some of Polock's books were acquired by Rosenbach. Polock was, during his lifetime, a member of Mikveh Israel Congregation, of Philadelphia. EDWIN WOLF 2ND.

Lit.: Brotherhead, William, Forty Years Among the Old Booksellers of Philadelphia (1891); Rosenbach, A. S. W., Books and Bidders (1927).

PÓLYA, JAKAB, economist, b. Békésszentandrás, Hungary, 1844; d. Budapest, 1897. He worked his way through university, studying law in Budapest. He opened a lawyer's office, and at the same time wrote several works propounding sound principles and practical ways for the solution of the main problem of the Hungarian state, agrarian production. He also advocated agrarian and credit cooperatives. In 1890 he published a book analyzing the economic crisis. Four of his works were awarded prizes by the Hungarian Academy of Sciences.

In 1891 Pólya became lecturer of national economy at the University of Budapest, and in 1893 he was made a member of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. From constructive research and planning Pólya then turned to descriptive and historical economics, devoting several works to the history of major economic institutions and bodies in Hungary in the second half of the 19th cent. He translated into Hungarian the works of Adam Smith and Sismondi.

JENŐ PÓLYA, surgeon, b. Budapest, 1876, was the son of Jakab Pólya. Having received the degree of M.D. from the University of Budapest, he became a lecturer on surgery in 1908 and was named professor extraordinary in 1914 after having served as surgeon-in-chief at the St. Stephen hospital from 1910 on. He wrote many works on the pathology and surgical treatment of the organs of digestion, as well as on cancer.

POLYBIUS, see GREEK WRITERS ON JEWS.

POLYGAMY. The Bible, in tolerating polygamy, gives evidence that the practice had long been an accepted social institution when these laws were written down. In the patriarchal age polygamy is regarded as an unquestioned custom. While the Bible gives a reason for the action of Abraham in taking Hagar for an additional wife and, in the case of Jacob, for having Rachel as a wife besides Leah, it only proves that polygamy as well as concubinage, with which it was always associated, was among the mores of the ancient Hebrew people (Gen. 16:1-4; 29:23-28). The same attitude is revealed in the episode of Abimelech and Sarah (Gen. 20:1-13).

Polygamy was such a well established part of the social system that Mosaic law is not even critical of it. We find only certain regulations with respect to it; as, for example, if a man takes a second wife the economic position of the first wife and of the children she bore must be secure; and, in the case of inheritance, no child of a subsequent marriage is to be preferred over a child from the first wife. Other regulations were that the high priest could have only one wife and that a king in Israel should not have too many wives (Lev. 21:13; Deut. 17:17; Ex. 21:10). The last injunction, however, was of no effect. David had seven wives before he began to reign in Jerusalem, and an extraordinary number of wives and concubines has been attributed to Solomon (II Sam 3:2-5, 14; 5:13). In connection with David, the prophet Nathan did not denounce the king for adding Uriah's wife to those he already had but for the means he employed to secure her (II Sam. 12:7-15).

However, if polygamy was not forbidden it was not directly sanctioned. It was a heritage from the past and it was left undisturbed. As the civilization of the people reached a higher form and, especially under the teaching of the prophets, their moral and religious consciousness developed, the polygamous system gradually declined. This is noticeable in Israel after the return from the Exile. In the Second Commonwealth polygamy is far from general (cf. Tobit and Susanna). Yet it survived far into the Christian era. In the New Testament Jesus neither condemns polygamous unions nor advocates a change in the system. From this non-interference attitude Luther, as late as the 16th cent., arrived at the conclusion that he could not forbid the taking of more than one wife.

According to the Talmud the right to a plurality of wives is conceded, but the number of legitimate wives, as in the Koran, is limited to four. The taking of additional wives is held as sufficient ground for divorce for a woman who had previously been the sole wife. Where a polygamous union exists, provision must be made for adequate maintenance of each wife as well as a separate domicile. Throughout the Talmudic age not one rabbi is known to have had more than one wife. Monogamy was held to be the only ideal legal union; plurality of wives was a concession to time and condition.

At a later period Maimonides in his Mishneh Torah maintains, contrary to his personal opinion, that polygamous unions from a strictly legal point of view are permissible. Eventually, however, they were proscribed under the authority of Rabbi Gershom (about 1000), although cases of polygamy were found in Spain as late as the 14th cent. That such cases were not rare may be inferred from the fact that in the Spanish communities the Kethubah, the document marking the betrothal, exacted that the man was not to take a second wife. The Islamic influence on the Jews in Spain was more or less pronounced until the expulsion at the end of the 15th cent.

In modern Europe polygamy disappeared from Jewish domestic life while among Christians it remained a tolerated privilege of royalty until very late times. In the declaration against polygamy of the Sanhedrin convoked by Napoleon in Paris, in 1805, there is no implication that modern Judaism tolerated plural marriages. It was just an emphatic assertion that Jews had discarded the orientalism of the past and were in full accord with the culture and civilization of Western Europe. CHARLES A. RUBENSTEIN.

Lit.: Abrahams, I., Jewish Life in the Middle Ages (1917); Westermarck, E., History of Human Marriage (1901); Spencer, H., Principles of Sociology; idem, Descriptive Sociology; Lay, Wilfrid, A Plea for Monogamy (1923).

POLYTHEISM, see HENOTHEISM; MONOTHEISM; RELIGION OF ISRAEL.

POMEROON, see BRITISH GUIANA.

POMIS, DAVID DE, physician, b. Spoleto, Dalmatia, 1525; d. Venice, Italy, 1588. After obtaining his medical degree from the University of Perugia, he started practice in Magliano. He was initiated into medicine by his scholarly uncle Jehiel Alatino, brother of Vitale Alatino, and by Moses Alatino, both of whom were prominent physicians. However, Pomis was soon barred from Magliano by the anti-Jewish decrees of Pope Paul IV. He then entered the service of Duke Nicholas Orsino and of the Sforza family. However, upon Pomis' personal protest, Pope Pius IV gave him permission to resettle in Magliano. Pope Sixtus V, to whom he dedicated his great Talmudic dictionary Tzemah David (in Hebrew and Aramaic, with explanations of the words in Latin and Italian; Venice, 1587), granted him the right to treat Christian patients.

Pomis' Latin essay, Enarratio brevis de senum affectibus praecavendis atque curandis (Brief Account of the Prevention and Cure of Diseases of Old Age; Venice, 1588), is of importance. His greatest work, also in Latin, De medico hebraeo enarratio apologica (Apology for the Jewish Physician; Venice, 1588), which he wrote for the purpose of defending Jewish physicians and Judaism, enumerates the popes and their personal Jewish physicians as well as renowned Jewish medical men. Sixtus V later abolished some of the exceptional laws directed against Jewish physicians.

Lit.: Münz, J., Die jüdischen Ärzte im Mittelalter; Landau, R., Geschichte der jüdischen Ärzte; Vogelstein, H., and Rieger, P., Geschichte der Juden in Rom, vol. 2 (1895) 259; Broydé, Isaac, in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 122-23.

POMPEY (GNAEUS POMPEIUS MAGNUS), Roman general, b. 106 B.C.E.; d. 48 B.C.E. During Pompey's campaign in Syria, in 65 B.C.E., Judea was torn with internal strife between the two Hasmonean brothers, Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II. Aretas, a neighboring king, was helping Hyrcanus besiege Aristobulus. Pompey sent his legate Scaurus to investigate conditions, and the two brothers immediately showered him with gifts, and asked him to settle their dispute. The legate favored Aristobulus and ordered Aretas to withdraw from the siege under pain of being declared an enemy of Rome. The king did so, and Aristobulus inflicted a defeat on him as he retreated.

When Pompey came to Damascus in the spring of 63 B.C.E., he ordered the two disputants to appear before him. Knowing the Roman's greed, both tried to win his favor by means of expensive gifts. Although Aristobulus presented Pompey with a golden vine bearing clusters of golden grapes and golden leaves and valued at 500 talents, the Roman general did not render a decision in his favor. Pompey secretly favored Hyrcanus, the younger and weaker brother, and since the conquerer had designs upon Judea for himself, told the brothers that he would defer his decision until he had conquered the Nabateans. Aristobulus, suspecting these designs, fled to Alexandrium, where he prepared for armed resistance. He finally made his peace with Pompey and surrendered the fortress to him. Pompey delegated Gabinius to take Jerusalem, meanwhile keeping the older brother in camp. The people shut the gates against Gabinius, and the Roman general marched against Jerusalem.

The Hyrcanites, or "Lovers of Peace," being in the majority and considering the Romans their friends and allies, opened the gates to them. The Patriots, who were followers of Aristobulus, entrenched themselves on Temple Mount and Pompey besieged them. The siege lasted for more than three months before a breach in the wall was finally opened and the Romans poured in. There is some dispute among the authorities as to whether the Romans broke through on a Saturday or on the Day of Atonement. The Romans slaughtered more than 12,000 Jews, including the priests who were sacrificing at the altar. Pompey entered the "Holy of Holies" to see for himself the nature of the Jewish Deity. Surprised at not finding statues or images of any kind, he left the contents of the sanctuary untouched. Aristobulus and his family and many of his followers were led back to Rome as prisoners. After Pompey's conquest of Judea in the autumn of 63 B.C.E., the Jewish community lost its status as an independent state. Pompey appointed Hyrcanus high priest and ethnarch, and deprived the Jews of the liberties gained under the Hasmoneans.

Lit.: Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 2 (1927) 61-75; Dubnow, S., Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes, vol. 2 (1925) 76-79.

PONIM, see PHRASES, POPULAR.

PONTE, LORENZO DA, see DA PONTE, LORENZO.

PONTIUS PILATE, Roman procurator of Judea from 26 to 36 C.E. At the very outset of his inauguration he caused a riot of the Jews by secretly bringing into Jerusalem the imperial standards, which the Jews regarded as idols and which other procurators, out of respect to their feelings, had left outside of the city. Jews hastened to the residence of the procurator at Caesarea and besieged him with petitions to remove the images; after five days Pilate sent out soldiers against the crowds and threatened to kill them if they would not stop, but when he saw that they were ready to die rather than yield, he gave way and removed the images. Another uproar was caused when Pilate attempted to appropriate some of the Temple funds in order to build an aqueduct; on this occasion he sent soldiers in disguise among the crowds and killed many of them. In 36 he was removed on the complaint of the Samaritans, many of whom he had slaughtered.

The character given Pilate in the New Testament is totally inconsistent with these statements. He is reported there to have sought to save Jesus, to have offered to yield the Jews one prisoner at the time of the Passover, and to have "washed his hands" of the guilt. Such a concession because of a festival is unheard of elsewhere, and the whole manner of the execution of Jesus, including the inscription over the cross, shows that the charge was not heresy, but rebellion against the Roman government. The later fate of Pilate is unknown; Christian legend makes him a wanderer and a suicide, whose body could find rest only in a pool in the Alps, where his reputed grave is still shown.

Lit.: Josephus, Antiquities, book 18, chap. 3, sections 1 and 2; the histories of the period.

PONTREMOLI, ALDO, physicist, b. Milan, Italy, 1896; d. at the North Pole, 1928. After his graduation from the University of Rome and from the University of Cambridge, he published a number of scientific studies in the Rendiconti dei Lincei, and undertook many theoretical and experimental researches. He served as assistant professor of physics at the University of Rome until 1924, and from 1924 until his death he was professor of advanced physics at the University of Milan. There he organized the first Institute of Physics, which bears his name.

Pontremoli distinguished himself for service with the Italian army during the first World War as an aerometeorologist, and in 1918 won official citation and the award of a silver medal and three war crosses. In 1928 he participated as a scientist in General Umberto Nobile's expedition to the North Pole in the dirigible Italia, and lost his life in the disaster which this dirigible suffered.

Lit.: Giordana, G. P., Vita di A. Pontremoli (1934); Vanoni, E. P., "Aldo Pontremoli," Nuovo Cimento, vol. 7 (1930) 41-49; A. Petermanns Mitteilungen, supplement volume (1929), No. 205.

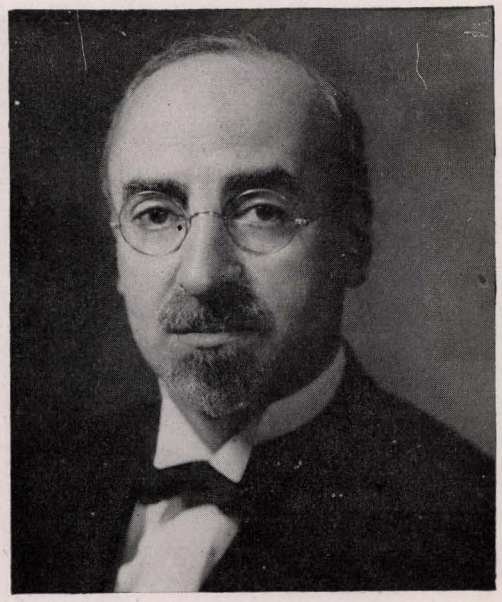
PONTREMOLI, EMMANUEL, architect, b. Nice, France, 1865. In 1890 he won the Prix de Rome for architecture, and in 1919 became professor at the École Nationale des Beaux Arts in Paris. In 1922 he was made a member of the French Art Academy (Institut de France), and in 1925 general inspector of the public buildings and state palaces. He became an officer of the Legion of Honor in 1926. Pontremoli served as director of the École Nationale des Beaux Arts (1932-37), and was retired with the title of honorary professor.

He was chief architect of the Museum of Natural History in Paris, the Maison Grecque of Theodore Reinach in Beaulieu-sur-Mer, the French consulate in Smyrna and many other outstanding buildings. His writings include Étude et restauration de l'Acropole de Pergame and Fouilles du sanctionaire d'Apollon (with M. Haussoullier; 1896-97). In 1942 he was reported still living in France.



David de Sola Pool
(See also illustrations in vol. 1, p. 409; vol. 8, p. 213)

POOL, DAVID DE SOLA, rabbi, b. London, 1885. He was the descendant of an old rabbinical family, in the direct line from Raphael Meldola of Livorno and from the Raphael Meldola who was chief rabbi of the Sephardim of England. H. Pereira Mendes was a first cousin once removed. Pool received an A.B. degree from the University of London in 1903, and subsequently studied at the Universities of Berlin and Heidelberg, receiving his Ph.D. degree from Heidelberg. He attended the Rabbinerseminar of Berlin.

In 1907 Pool came to the United States to become rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese synagogue Shearith Israel in New York city. Except for the period from 1919 to 1922, when he was one of the three American representatives on the American Commission to Palestine and remained in Jerusalem to act as regional director for Palestine and Syria of the Joint Distribution Committee, Pool occupied the pulpit of Shearith Israel from 1907 on, and was still serving in 1942. Until 1941 the sole spokesman for Sephardic Jewry in the United States representing both the newer arrivals from the Levantine countries and the Sephardim who had lived for many generations in the English-speaking lands, Pool was one of the most cosmopolitan members of the Orthodox rabbinate. His manifold cultural background, combined with his sincerity and devotion to everything Jewish, brought him into a collaborative role in almost every religious and cultural activity undertaken by American Jews, as well as in interdenominational movements.

Pool was appointed one of the three Jewish representatives on Herbert Hoover's food conservation staff in 1917 and also, during the first World War period, a field organizer of the Jewish Welfare Board. In 1940 he was made chairman of the committee on religious activities of the Army and Navy committee of the Board, a task which included the supervision of Jewish religious matters in all the army camps and naval bases. Pool was, in 1942, a director of the Jewish Welfare Board, and the representative of the Jewish army and navy chaplains to the chief of chaplains of the armed services.

From 1922 to 1940 Pool was a director of the Jewish Educational Association and four times president of Young Judea of America; he was president of the Union of Sephardic Congregations (1928-) and president of the Synagogue Council of America from 1938 to 1940. He was also a member of the advisory committee of the National Youth Administration, having been appointed in 1935.

In addition to having made and published numerous studies relating to Jewish history in the Americas, Pool was author of The Kaddish (1909; American edition, 1930); Hebrew Learning among the Puritans of New England (1911); Capital Punishment in Jewish Literature (1916); and six Sephardic Hebrew and English prayer-books.

POOL, TAMAR DE SOLA, communal worker, b. Jerusalem. She was the daughter of Haim Hirschenson, rabbi and Hebrew writer, and the wife of David de Sola Pool, to whom she was married in 1917. Mrs. Pool was brought to the United States in 1904, and graduated from Hunter College in 1913. Subsequently she studied in Paris and at Columbia University. From 1914 to 1917 she was an instructor in French, Latin and Greek at Hunter College. Her communal activities were centered largely in the Hadassah movement. From 1930 to 1935 she was president of the New York chapter of the Hadassah, in 1938 and 1939 she was editor of the Hadassah Newsletter, and in 1939 she was made national president of Hadassah. She was honorary chairman of the Jewish National Fund of America and a member of the general council of the World Zionist Organization. She was also a director of the National Council of Women of the United States.

POOLS OF SOLOMON, see SOLOMON, POOLS OF.

POOR, see PHILANTHROPY; POVERTY; SOCIAL LEGISLATION; SOCIAL SERVICE.

POPES. The Pope is head of the Roman Catholic hierarchy and consequently of the Roman Catholic Church. The Papacy's relations with the Jews were regulated by and are mentioned in papal documents, letters, and decrees which, because of the seal (bullum) they bore, are called Bulls; also in orders issued by the Popes' vicars and in decisions of the governing bodies of cardinals.

1. Bases of the Relationship. Fixed factors in the attitudes of the Popes to the Jews were those derived from Church policy and doctrine. Social and economic restrictions stemmed from the Church policy of depriving non-Christians anywhere of opportunities to influence Christians by means of political or economic authority, social contacts or the recognition of religious equality. On the other hand, the continuance of the Jewish group was also a fixed doctrine. Other non-Christians were tolerated as a matter of expediency; in theory, at least, the Jews were tolerated because of the traditional interpretation of various Biblical passages, notably Ps. 59:12, "Slay them not, lest my people forget," and the expression "A remnant shall return," as in Isa. 10:21. This involved freedom of worship for the Jews and therefore clashed with the Church's equally basic conversionist policy. Much, however, depended on the variables in the situation: the character of the reigning Pope and his environment, the requirements of his personal policy, and the demands of the broad Church policy at any given time.

Still another element in the situation was the secular rule of the Popes. From the dark ages to 1870 in the case of the Jewish communities of Rome and of the Papal State in Italy, and from the 14th cent. to the French Revolution in the case of the Jews of Avignon and the County Venaissin, the Pope was the secular overlord. Problems of practical administration sometimes clashed with Church policy, so that occasionally a Pope might advise and applaud restrictions on the Jews elsewhere which he was not ready to impose on the Jews in his own lands.

2. Papal Jurisdiction. The relationship between the Popes and the Jews as a group was direct only in those territories where the Pope was political overlord. Elsewhere it was exercised through the secular authorities. There was, to be sure, a theory that the Jews everywhere, being tolerated as a religious symbol, ought properly be subject to the Church. But the economic importance of the Jews to every European state militated against the application of this theory and strengthened secular control of the Jewish population; secular suzerains, sometimes churchmen themselves, adopted Church policy and submitted to papal orders only after an appeal to their Christian loyalty or a threat of ecclesiastical punishment. Repeatedly pressure had to be brought on the princes to prevent the Jews from practising usury, to compel their separation from the Christian population through badge or ghetto, to stop their employment of Christian help in their homes, and the like. On the other hand, in a number of instances the right of the Pope to interfere directly in Jewish activities came to be universally recognized. Since the Crusaders were under Church protection, a moratorium on debts owed by them to Jews could be enforced by a papal threat of a boycott of the Jews concerned. Jews trying to persuade apostates to revert to Judaism were deemed a threat to Christianity and therefore fell under direct Church jurisdiction. Jews publishing or studying rabbinic works adjudged guilty of insulting Christianity were also subject to Church discipline. Finally, heresy regarding fundamentals common to both faiths, as well as the practice of witchcraft, came under Church jurisdiction whether the guilty person was Jew or Christian. Secular powers, nevertheless, sometimes interfered with the execution of papal edicts even on subjects under recognized Church authority.

3. Direct Contacts. Individual Jews sometimes received papal grants of privilege. These might cover exemption from the badge, the right to live outside the ghetto, to practise medicine on Christian patients, to open loan banks and, in the Papal States, to be exempted from all or certain taxes. Such letters of privilege were particularly numerous between the end of the Avignon period and the Counter-Reformation. After the 16th cent., practically all contact between the papacy and the Jews was carried on through a vicar, papal edicts meant for non-papal lands being addressed to the civil or ecclesiastical authorities. More personal contacts, however, were continued. Directly and indirectly Jews were employed by the Popes and the Papal Court from the earliest times. A Jew by the name of Jehiel was the financial head of the papal household of Alexander III. Jehiel must have had predecessors, but he did not have successors because thereafter the Popes began to insist that princes discontinue a common practice of appointing Jews to high administrative posts. Various Popes employed Jewish physicians, some of whom were showered with privileges and concessions. The Jews of Europe had frequent occasion to send petitions and delegations to the Papal Court. Usually the Jewish community of Rome undertook to assist these delegations, to represent other Jewish communities, or to speak for the entire Jewish people.

4. Protection. The usual request of the Jews was for protection against attack. Roman precedent and ethical considerations caused Pope Gregory I (590-604) to establish the rule forbidding the use of force against the Jews as long as they stayed within the limits prescribed by the Church. The same Pope forbade conversion by force. More than five centuries later his attitude was revived when the Jews of Western Europe appealed to the Pope for protection during the era of anti-Jewish disorders which began with the First Crusade. Around 1120 Pope Calixtus II issued a bull (Sicut Judaeis) beginning with the statement, copied from similar documents issued by Pope Gregory I, that "just as the Jews ought not to have the license to do . . . more than the law permits them, so ought they not suffer curtailment in those privileges which have been conceded them." The bull goes on to forbid forcible conversion, greater oppression, and desecration of synagogues and Jewish cemeteries. This bull became the basis for decrees granting protection to the Jews, and was repeated by practically every Pope down to the Avignon period and frequently thereafter. As occasion required, changes were made in the text of the document sometimes emphasizing the prohibition of forcible conversion, sometimes forbidding the charge of ritual murder, sometimes dealing with purely fiscal matters. This was not the only bull through which protection was extended. Documents dealing with specific situations in various parts of Europe were issued fairly often, though not as often as they were requested. Without such protection extended by the papacy, the Jewish position would have been very much worse, if not altogether untenable.

5. Conversionist Efforts. The Church bent every effort to convert the Jews to Christianity. Even the limitations set up in the bulls of protection were often stretched to the utmost, the term "forcible conversion" being made meaningless in practice. The required parental consent for the baptism of minors was broadly interpreted in favor of Christianity by Popes beginning with Innocent III and especially, following the Counter-Reformation, in the Papal States. After the 12th cent., reversion to Judaism on the part of such as had become converts during bloody riots was forbidden by the Popes and declared invalid. The bull Turbato corde, often repeated after the middle of the 13th cent., expressed the horror of the Popes over the attempts of Jews to proselytize, and subjected both Jew and proselyte to the Inquisition. The bull seems to refer mainly to new Christians who, the storm over, ought to return to the faith of their fathers. Grants of financial support and privilege were used by the Popes, following the example of Gregory I, to attract Jews to baptism. Houses for catechumens, or recent converts presumably being taught the new faith, were established in various parts of Europe, during the later Middle Ages and thereafter, where converts were maintained for life. At the same time, the forcing of conversionist sermons upon the Jews became common and in Rome was continued long into the 19th cent. The interest of the Popes, beginning in 1311, in the establishment of chairs in Hebrew at various universities was due to the desire to prepare preachers to the Jews. The hope of weakening loyalty to Judaism was the cause for repeated burnings of the Talmud and its commentaries and prohibitions of printing and studying such books. Jews, however, prevailed upon the Popes and their advisors to permit the reprinting and the study of the Talmud after the removal of the objectionable passages and the rewording of a number of expressions. There was no such difficulty regarding the Zohar, which papal authorities declared free of blasphemies (1558).

6. Greeting the Pope. One of the characteristic ceremonies, expressing the relationship between the papacy and the Jews, was that by which the Jews of Rome greeted a Pope on his way to be crowned at the Lateran basilica, sometimes also annually at Easter, and when he returned to Rome from a long absence. Some form of greeting must have been customary in early times; the first such ceremony definitely heard of, however, dates from 1120, when Pope Calixtus II entered Rome. Before long the details of the ceremony were regulated. The rabbi and a number of communal leaders awaited the procession on the line of march, as did other corporations of the city, and on the approach of the Pope handed him a scroll of the Torah. He received this and handed it back in a fashion indicating disdain, while pronouncing a prepared formula approving the Torah but not the Jewish interpretation of it. Like every corporation (schola), the Jews also made a symbolic gift and, in return, received a number of coins. Not the act, but the manner of it was degrading. Sometimes, after the papal procession had moved on, the Jewish dignitaries were left to the taunts and threats of the mob inspired by the insulting example given by the Pope. After the long interruption during the Avignon period, the ceremony was resumed. Gregory XII (1406) found the scroll so handsomely decorated with gold and silver that he asked for it as a gift, thereby establishing a precedent and adding to the financial burden of the Roman Jewish community.

A problem which the Jews of Rome had to face resulted from the occasional existence of several claimants to the Papal Throne. With complete impartiality to the internal politics of the Church they sometimes sent a deputation to congratulate and offer gifts to the rival Popes (Alexander V, 1409). In time the ceremony offered so real a threat of physical danger to the Jews that at their request in 1484 the place assigned them was changed so as to avoid rioting. So dangerous had the temper of the populace become at the coronation of Gregory XIV (1590) that thereafter the Jews were not expected to make a public spectacle of themselves and the Torah. To them was assigned the decoration of the Colosseum and the Arch of Titus. This they did by means of Biblical quotations appropriate to the occasion and to the individual Pope.

7. Historical Forces Behind the Relations. While the essentials of the papal policy toward the Jews remained constant after their formulation by Pope Gregory I, historical processes compelled certain changes in temper and tempo at various points. To the end of the first millennium the papacy was too weak internally, while the Jews were too strongly entrenched as the merchants of Western and Southern Europe. A change began with the Church reformation of the latter half of the 11th cent., whereupon the Popes urged a deterioration of the Jewish position in European society and were aided by the social and economic forces manifested during the crusading age. The efforts reached their greatest development during the 13th cent., when the papacy was at the height of its power, but did not achieve full results until the following century. By that time, however, the repressive movement had gone too far.

A series of social and natural calamities in the 14th cent. combined with a dangerous weakening of the Jewish economic situation to make the Popes change the emphasis of their Jewish policy from repression to protection. The 15th cent. Popes, however, were struggling to reestablish papal authority in the Catholic hierarchy and to regain the confidence of the masses. This need conflicted with the humane feelings of a number of Popes and resulted in a vacillating policy toward the Jews. Broad tolerance characterized the Humanist Popes of the first half of the 16th cent., but gave way before the forces of the Counter-Reformation in the second half of that century. With few exceptions, the Popes of the next three centuries maintained a policy of unrelenting repression. The Jewish population of Catholic Europe had either ceased to exist or become insignificant socially and economically. The major interest of the Popes in the Jews was limited to those of the Papal States. During the 19th cent., except for a brief period in 1848, the policy toward the Jews was guided by the sympathy of the Popes for the anti-democratic forces. All direct authority of the papacy over the Jews was terminated with the unification of Italy in 1870, and pronouncements thereafter were few. The adjustment of the papacy to a democratically ruled world, which followed upon the first World War in 1914, resulted in a better understanding of the Jewish position.

8. The Formative Age. The claims of the Bishop of Rome to primacy in the Catholic hierarchy are based on his being the direct successor to PETER. Tradition makes Peter the first bishop of the Roman Christian community and places his tomb, upon his martyrdom in 67 (?), on Vatican Hill, where St. Peter's now stands. It is not known how many of Peter's immediate successors were Jews or of Jewish descent; nor do we know the relations which obtained between the Jews of Rome and the growing Christian community. It is significant that after Peter the first Bishop of Rome mentioned as having contacts with Jews is SYLVESTER I (314-35), who witnessed the actual triumph of Christianity. Legend speaks of a disputation between him and a "high priest of the Jews," both sides depending on miracles as arguments. Sylvester's miracle having been the more impressive, the Jewish bystanders at once accepted Christianity.

Documentary information on contacts between Popes and Jews begins with GELASIUS I (492-96). One of his letters contains a warm recommendation of a Jewish friend; another letter urges several bishops to be absolutely fair to the Jewish owner of a runaway slave who sought freedom by accepting Christianity and accused his owner of having forced him to undergo circumcision, apparently knowing that Jews were forbidden to proselytize.

The meaning of justice and fairness in the relations of Christians to Jews presented a problem also to GREGORY I (590-604), called "Saint" and "the Great," who laid the foundations for much that was best in the subsequent papal policy toward the Jews. Some twenty-five letters of his are known to have mentioned or dealt with the Jews. Without objecting to slavery as an institution, the Pope ruled that a Jew must not convert a pagan slave to Judaism nor keep a Christian slave or a newly-converted pagan slave for more than three months. His anxiety to gain converts led Pope Gregory to counsel kindness and moderation in the treatment of the Jews without granting them equality with Christians. Out of this attitude rose the famous sentiment, already mentioned, which later Popes used frequently in bulls of protection granted to Jews (598, to the Jews of Rome; 602, to the Bishop of Naples). He likewise reprimanded the Christians of Sicily and Sardinia for attacking and robbing synagogues. To the Sicilian bishop he suggested supporting Jewish converts from papal funds or even granting a reduction of one-third in the rental being paid on Church lands by Jewish farmers who accepted Christianity. A synagogue annoyingly close to a church might be removed if the church provided other accommodations (September-October, 591). He went so far as to order the restoration to the Jews of a synagogue building in which a cross and images had been placed by an overzealous convert from Judaism (July, 599). Already in 591 the Pope had written to the Bishop of Marseille warning that converts by force were not to be trusted. Sad experience with baptized Jews led him (May, 598) to introduce a forty-day preparatory period for conversion. He urged avoidance of judicial prejudice against individual Jews as well as against Jewish communities. It must, therefore, have been due to the urging of Spanish Catholics not to alienate a newly-acquired, powerful adherent to the Roman Church that Gregory addressed (August, 599) words of praise to King Reccared of Visigothic Spain after the latter had subjected the Jews to brutal treatment in an effort to convert them.

In the comparatively few references which extant papal correspondence provides during the next few centuries, there is mention of a variety of problems and evidence of a variety of attitudes. HONORIUS I (637) would have liked to permit the forcibly baptized Jews of Spain to return to Judaism; but the Spanish bishops were horrified at the thought. JOHN IV (640) and GREGORY III (731) expressed sorrow over instances of Christians celebrating Easter at the same time as the Passover. GREGORY III and STEPHEN IV (768) spoke in harsh and bitter terms of the favorable position of the Jews in France and of their use of Christian slaves, serfs and domestics. Soon thereafter HADRIAN I (772-95) continued the attack on the social contacts between the Jews and Christians both in Spain, which was then Mohammedan, and in France. In the latter the practice persisted among Christians of observing the day of rest on the Sabbath and Easter on Passover. NICHOLAS I (858-67) found even greater evidence of the social influence of the Jews in Italy, where he forbade the Bishop of Orti to use garments of Jewish style. Less humane was the attitude of LEO VII (936-39), who advised the Archbishop of Mayence to expel the Jews if they refused to give up their religion despite his attempts at persuasion. SYLVESTER II mentioned the Jews only in a matter involving a local transfer of taxes to the Bishop of Gerona (December, 1002). In 1007 a representative of the Jews of Lorraine came to Rome to ask JOHN XVIII for protection against persecution. Whether Pope John gave any aid is not known. Alleging that the only explanation for a cyclone and earthquake which caused much damage in Rome was the blasphemy of the Jews, BENEDICT VIII had a number of them put to death (1021). ALEXANDER II (1061-73), however, followed the tradition of Gregory I in protecting the Jews.

The gathering in southern France of a crusading army to fight against the Mohammedans in Spain had become a real danger to the Jews of Narbonne (1063). The Pope directed one letter to Count Berengar, praising him for defending the Jews, and another to Archbishop Wifred, pointing out that "God finds no pleasure in the spilling of blood." A separate appeal was directed by the Pope to the clergy of Spain to defend the Jews against the crusaders invading the land. A sterner warning was issued to the Count of Benevento in Italy (1065) not to continue forcing Jews into Christianity. GREGORY VII, the great fighter for Church reform and for its supremacy over the State, found it necessary to attack the employment of Jews in administrative office. He had a law passed against it at the synod held in Rome in 1078; he wrote (1081) to Alfonso VI of Castile and Leon saying that the placing of Jews in authority over Christians was an insult to the Church.

9. The Crusading Era. The records of the papal chancery during the 13th cent. are more complete and the policy of the Popes more uniform. The growing influence of the papacy and the spread and increase of the Jewish population, combined with the economic and political changes of Europe and with the emotional tension and social disorders due to the Crusades, caused the Jews to be brought more frequently to the attention of the Popes and to crystallize the papal attitude toward them. URBAN II, who preached the First Crusade, did nothing to prevent or even to condemn the excesses of the Crusaders, although he did think it necessary to condemn Emperor Henry IV for permitting those forcibly baptized by the Crusaders to return to Judaism (1098). The anti-Pope CLEMENT III had already voiced a like condemnation the year before, and Urban may have found it impolitic not to show equal zeal. The Crusaders' attacks on the Jews did result eventually in the famous bull of protection, Sicut Judaeis, issued by CALIXTUS II. The Pope may originally have granted the bull to the Jews of Rome, and its application to the Jews in general was probably a later extension.

The almost constant rivalry for the papal tiara which characterized the 12th cent. affected the Jews because of the anti-Pope ANACLETUS II (1130-38). His election to the Papacy was bitterly contested and his character maligned chiefly on the ground of his Jewish descent, for he was the grandson of a convert. His rival, INNOCENT II (1130-43), consequently was not friendly to the Jews and did not renew the bull of protection. Among the Jews the memory of Anacletus has survived in a number of legends about a "Jewish" Pope.

EUGENE III's call for the Second Crusade (1145) stirred the fears of the Jews. They probably appealed to the Pope for protection, perhaps through the Jews of Rome, and he responded with a repetition of the bull Sicut Judaeis, which did not prove completely effective.

The reign of ALEXANDER III (1159-81) indicates the changed situation of the Jews. The Pope himself was liberal enough in attitude to have a Jewish favorite and financial guide in the person of Jehiel, nephew of the compiler of the Aruch. He repeated the bull Sicut Judaeis, perhaps in answer to fears of the Jews over the outcome of the Third Lateran Council. The temper of the lower clergy having become more aggressive, the Jews of France and Spain called a synod of their own and sent representatives to Rome to attempt forestalling the expected evil decrees. Actually the Council (1179), under the presidency of the Pope, renewed old limitations on the Jews, forbade the employment of Christian nurses and servants, and ordered that no new synagogues be built, and that the testimony of Christians be valid against Jews. Apparently the Jews had feared worse decisions, and considered their efforts successful. LUCIUS III (1181-85), URBAN III (1185-87), and CELESTINE III (1191-98) praised Philip Augustus of France, not so much for the expulsion of his Jews as for the turning of certain synagogues into churches, but gratification with the expulsion was implied. Nevertheless, both CLEMENT III (1187-91) and Celestine III reissued the bull Sicut Judaeis because of the Third Crusade, then in full swing, from which the Jews had much to fear. Celestine also reminded the Christians of two recommendations made at the last Lateran Council: one that Christians must not be in the service of Jews; the second that Jewish ownership of property must not lead to loss of tithes for the local churches.

With INNOCENT III (1198-1216) begins the century when the papacy reached the height of its influence on the society and politics of Europe. With him, too, the papacy assumed leadership in the movement to relegate the Jews to a lower social status and to economic impotence by the conscious and uncompromising application of Church policy. Innocent III set the pace, although at the beginning and the end of his reign he found it necessary to grant protection to the Jews. In 1199 he reissued the bull Sicut Judaeis, introducing it with a hostile apology; in 1215 or 1216 he turned specifically to the Crusaders, probably in connection with the Albigensian Crusade, urging that Jews be not molested. The rest of his fairly frequent references to the Jews breathed a spirit of suspicion and enmity. He expressed indignation at Philip of France and Alfonso of Castile for showing favor to the Jews by permitting Christians to work for them, by letting them acquire property and holding it without paying tithes to the churches. Moreover, he indirectly indicated his credence of the worst charges made against the Jews, such as the desecration of the host. He showed great interest in the conversion of the Jews, and urged the clergy to offer liberal support to converts. The accusation of usury was made repeatedly, and Crusaders were freed from repayment of debts to Jews. At the Fourth Lateran Council, in 1215, over which Innocent presided, his anti-Jewish attitude was incorporated in legislation. He urged the imposition of a special mark to be worn by Jews on the outside garment whereby they might be easily distinguished from Christians (the Jew Badge). The Jews had again organized a commission which they sent to Rome to obviate the legislation to be introduced by Innocent, but this time they failed.

The papal policy for the rest of the 13th cent. was directed toward enforcing the regulations of the Fourth Lateran Council. This was the case with HONORIUS III (1216-27), whose chief concerns seem to have been the non-payment of the tithe from land owned by Jews and the appointment of Jews to public office. He also tried to enforce the wearing of the Jew badge, but at least in the case of the Spanish Christian kingdoms was forced to suspend this decree because of the threat of the Jewish population to emigrate into Mohammedan lands near-by. Aside from reissuing the now customary bull Sicut Judaeis to all Jews (1217), he granted (1220) a special privilege to Isaac Benveniste, the favorite of James of Aragon.

The same questions of tithes and preferment in public office occupied GREGORY IX (1227-41) during the first part of his reign. The tone of his letters to certain bishops of Spain and to the king of Hungary, in 1233, reminds one of Innocent III, for he openly spoke of reducing the Jews to a servile status and of using the badge to that end. In the same year, however, the Pope had occasion to express his horror over the treatment of Jews in a number of French provinces. Protection was called for again in 1235 to 1236, and in a number of bulls, one being the usual Sicut Judaeis, Gregory attempted to prevent bloody excesses against them. For this expression of the more humane side of the Church policy toward the Jews, Gregory was accused of having accepted bribes.

In June, 1239, Gregory turned his attention to the Talmud and other rabbinic works, thus starting a phase of Papal-Jewish relations which continued into the 18th cent. In letters to kings and bishops of Western Europe he ordered the confiscation and examination of rabbinic works to see what truth there was in a charge made by an apostate from Judaism that these works not only contained blasphemies against Christianity, but were the bulwarks of Judaism, preventing the success of the Church's conversionist efforts. This order led to the famous disputation of Paris (1240) and to the burning of many carloads of Talmuds (1242 and 1248).

INNOCENT IV (1243-54) continued the attack on the Talmud (1244, and again in 1247), and caused a second confiscation in Paris and perhaps a second burning. The change which had come over the Jewish status by this time is evident from the fact that, apart from comparatively few references to the restrictive elements of the Church policy, this Pope's correspondence on the subject is characterized by efforts to protect the Jews. On two different occasions (1246 and 1247), and possibly three (1253), Innocent IV reissued the bull Sicut Judaeis, the last two containing a new paragraph assuring Christians of the libelous nature of the ritual blood accusation. The same Pope had occasion to issue six other major bulls urging the cessation of attacks upon the Jews. The Jews of France and western Germany had sent delegations to Rome who had moved the Pope with the tale of lust and horror practised in the name of Christianity. Nonetheless, Innocent IV continued to urge the institution of the badge, the prohibition of building new synagogues, and financial support for converts to Christianity. He consented to the expulsion of the Jews from the province of Vienne (1253).

ALEXANDER IV (1254-61) continued the fixed policy. In letters to the king of France and the duke of Burgundy he urged the enforcement of the rule of the Jew badge and reminded them of their duty to forbid the Talmud. The king of Navarre was given permission to confiscate money of Jews on the ground that it had been amassed through usury. In this Alexander was following the example of his predecessor, who had given similar permission to the king of France. Bishops were warned not to pledge church vessels with Jewish moneylenders. At the same time, the Pope protected Jewish merchants who hailed from papal territory.

Soon after his enthronement, URBAN IV (1261-64) issued the bull Sicut Judaeis. Apart from that, he urged European rulers not to appoint Jews to public office, to grant Crusaders a moratorium on debts to Jews, and to urge various clerics to give material aid to converts from Judaism. Similar matters occupied CLEMENT IV (1265-68). In addition, he was the first to bring the Jews of Poland openly into the sphere of Church policy with the usual restrictions of prohibiting them from managing lands, employing Christian nurses, and building new synagogues. Through support of the apostate Pablo Christiani, this Pope urged the king of Aragon to compel Jews to listen to conversionist sermons and to seize and destroy all copies of the Talmud. After Paul's disputation with Nahmanides, Clement urged the punishment of the Jews for having published a report of the disputation favorable to themselves. The comparatively new institution of the Inquisition was told to pay close attention to converted Jews who might try to revert to Judaism and to Jews who, the Pope said, were trying to bring them back to their old faith. This last bull (Turbato corde) was destined to be repeated quite frequently by succeeding Popes. The mild GREGORY X (1271-76) repeated it, although most of his references to the Jews once more indicate his response to their urgent need for protection. Twice in two years he reissued the bull Sicut Judaeis: in 1272, with the addition of a clause denying the blood libel even more emphatically than Innocent IV had done, and in 1274, without this clause, in an apparent attempt to strengthen another bull of protection (Lachrymabilem Judaeorum), previously issued by Innocent IV in 1247, now reissued in an effort to stop the horrors of the interregnum period in Germany.

Although NICHOLAS III (1277-80) repeated the bull Sicut Judaeis, he was more interested in guarding converts from reverting to Judaism. He urged this as a duty upon the inquisitors of the Provence, Lombardy, Austria, and Sicily. In 1278 he took the further step of urging that conversionist sermons be preached to the Jews (Vineam soreth). That some inquisitors took advantage of this attitude to persecute the Jews is evident from the fact that the Jews of Montpellier sent a representative to Rome to seek papal protection. Nicholas wrote an indignant letter to the king of Castile because of his employment of Jews in state affairs. It was Nicholas III whom the Cabalist, Samuel Abulafia, hoped to convert to Judaism.

The few references to the Jews by MARTIN IV (1281-85) deal with the question of heresy-hunting and relapsing by converts. Although he repeated the bull Turbato corde, he reissued the bull Sicut Judaeis with an additional clause freeing the Jews from prosecution by the Inquisition unless witnesses were produced substantiating the charge of having aided converts to relapse. Yet the next Pope, HONORIUS IV (1285-87), raised the charge in an intemperate Bull which he dispatched to England in 1286. Therein he also attacked the Talmud, cast doubts on Jewish moral life and asserted that the Jews daily cursed Christianity. He expressed himself against Jews' holding public office in Sicily.

NICHOLAS IV (1288-92) concerned himself with the same problem, in Portugal, but his chief interest lay in the relations of the Inquisition to the Jews. During the first two years of his pontificate, down to September, 1290, he repeated the bull Turbato corde a number of times, thereby urging the inquisitors of France, the County Venaissin and Rome to greater efforts against converts relapsing into Judaism, and against their Jewish friends. Beginning with November, 1290, however, the situation with regard to the Jews was reversed. As a result of a moving appeal by the Jews, the Pope issued the bull Orat mater ecclesia, applied to the Jews of Rome and of the County Venaissin, wherein he exempted them from interference by the Inquisition and made them subject only to the ordinary ecclesiastical courts. Apparently he also reissued, for the Jews of Rome, the bull Sicut Judaeis. In response to pleas from the Jews of Germany, voiced through the Roman Jews or through his personal physician, Maestro Gajo (Isaac ben Mordecai), Pope Nicholas made a vain appeal to Emperor Rudolph to free Meir of Rothenburg (1288). Either the Pope or his vicar in Rome interfered in the controversy among the Jews regarding the study of philosophy by warning the Jews of Rome against speaking disrespectfully of Maimonides (cf. Mann, J., Texts and Studies, vol. 1, p. 422 et seq.). Like a number of his predecessors, he countenanced the confiscation of money from the Jews by Christian princes on the ground that it had been earned through usury, most of these sums being freed for ordinary purposes provided a third was devoted to crusading or charity. Nicholas IV granted such permission to the queen of France; his successor, BONIFACE VIII (1294-1303), granted it to the queen of Sicily, provided that part of the money was spent on poor or sick converts. The chief interest in Boniface's references again centers in the efforts of the Inquisition to fight heresy. Once more the Jews of Rome and the County Venaissin asked for relief from inquisitorial control, and the Pope gave them the bull Exhibita nobis. Aside from being couched in less friendly terms than the Orat mater ecclesia of Nicholas IV, this Bull contained a clause which may well have nullified the total effect. For Boniface stated that, if the Jew proceeded against were known to be influential, the Inquisition was not bound to reveal to him the nature of the testimony against him. A year later, Pope Boniface ordered the rector of the County Venaissin to expel Christians or Jews practising usury. During this pontificate occurred a threat of persecution which caused Elia de Pomis to make a martyr of himself in order to save the Roman Jewish community.

10. The Avignon Period. The relations of the Popes to the Jews during the 14th cent. were affected not only by the milder character of most of the Popes, but also by the changed situation of the Jews, this being preeminently the century of expulsions and persecutions.

CLEMENT V (1305-14) continued to oppose moneylending by Jews, again freeing Crusaders from repayment of their debts, absolving the duke of Brabant from a commitment to let some Jews open banks in his territory, and having a clause against usury passed at the Council of Vienne. To the queen of France he granted the right to retain money confiscated from the Jews expelled a few years previously, provided that some of the money went for support of the Holy Land. The king of Castile, however, refused to permit the clergy to interfere with the financial activities of the Jews, since this was detrimental to his property and income. Early in his reign he condemned an attack on the Jews of Genappe and freed those still remaining in Toulouse and Narbonne from the power of the Inquisition. In 1315 he revoked the latter grant. At the Council of Vienne a resolution was passed, and subsequently published by the Pope (1312), prohibiting Jews from testifying against Christians. Similarly, at this Council was first presented the idea of establishing chairs in oriental languages at the universities of Paris, Oxford, Bologna and Salamanca. Although Clement V incorporated this in a decree, the actual establishment of the chairs took place later, under John XXII (Cupientes ut fidei, to Paris, 1326).

JOHN XXII (1316-34) had more contacts with the Jews than many of his predecessors, and thereby had the opportunity to show to what extent Church policy had crystallized. The precariousness of Jewish financial transactions becomes clearer than ever from the freedom with which the Pope advised churchmen to refuse payment of Jewish debts and from the threatened prosecution of Jewish moneylenders, as in the case of the diocese of Cologne in 1321 and at various times down to 1328, as well as from repeated permission to princes to keep property confiscated from Jews, as in the case of the queen of France in 1318. The refusal of the German Emperor Louis to stop moneylending by Jews subsequently became one of the heresy charges against him. A number of pronouncements by John XXII deal with the property of converts which secular princes were wont to confiscate, thus leaving the convert worse off than he had been as a Jew. The civil officials even of the County Venaissin had to be reminded of the Church's stand (Cum sit absurdum and Dignum arbitrantes, 1320). The Archbishop of Viterbo was asked to establish a charitable foundation for converts and the Bishop of Paris to provide for a certain John Salviati, a convert who had undertaken to translate Hebrew and Chaldean works into Latin (Cum sicut ex, 1319). On three different occasions Pope John published the bull Ex parte vestra, first issued in 1281, by which the right of asylum in a church was taken away from relapsed converts. The growing activity of the Inquisition against converts and Jews aroused the protest even of ecclesiastics (Apulia, 1328) who, when they exercised civil authority over a province, objected as much as any other prince to the interference of ecclesiastical courts with the financial affairs of their Jews (Mayence, 1325; Würzburg, 1326 and 1331).

John XXII followed a consistent policy of severity toward the Jews of the Papal States. In the early summer of 1320 he made strenuous efforts to stop the Shepherds' attacks on the Jews, but this was due probably more to personal and political fears than to humanitarianism. Later in the same year he resumed the attack on the Talmud where it had been left off by Honorius IV in 1286 (Dudum felicis recordationis). There is a vague story about the Pope's decision to expel the Jews from Rome, an act insisted upon by the Pope's sister and obviated by an appeal of the Jews to King Robert of Sicily, although the Talmud was burned in Rome in 1322. There was, however, an expulsion from at least part of the County Venaissin, and in Carpentras and Bédarride a number of synagogues were converted into churches. Subsequently the Jews were permitted to return to Carpentras, and a special district was assigned them. No better than others of his age to whom witchcraft was a reality, Pope John lent credence to the charge of well-poisoning current during his reign.

Benedict XII (1334-42) complained that Jews in Aragon were not prohibited from mingling with Christians and were permitted to build new synagogues. He urged the destruction of a new synagogue also upon the Archbishop of Gran (Hungary), accusing the Jews of having deliberately erected this synagogue near a Cistercian chapel so as to interfere with the prayers of the monks. To him Albert of Austria complained against clerics who trumped up cases of host desecration in order to bring about the murder and robbery of the Jews (Ex zelo fidei, 1338), and Benedict ordered the Bishop of Passau to investigate (Fraternitati tuae, 1338), but nothing further is heard about the matter. He relieved the Bishop of Würzburg from paying his debts to Jews on the ground that the charges were usurious.

Clement VI (1342-52), a man of high intelligence, assumed a more favorable attitude than his predecessors at Avignon. While ordering that the Jews of Ancona wear the badge, he advised the Archbishop of Lyon against expelling the Jews, but rather to profit from their presence, as the Pope himself was doing. He granted permission for the building of a new synagogue in Seville. Most important of all, however, was his protection of the Jews during the savage attacks upon them in the period of the Black Death. He not only issued the bull Sicut Judaeis (July 4, 1348), but another bull, similar to it (Quamvis Judaeorum perfidiam, September 26, 1348), in which clergy and secular powers are asked to make clear that the Jews were not guilty of spreading the plague. He also ordered the repression of the Flagellants (Inter Solicitudines, 1349). This humane policy was continued, on the whole, by Innocent VI (1352-62). In response to the pleas of the Jews of Aragon, he issued a bull of protection similar to his predecessor's Quamvis Judaeorum perfidiam. While urging ecclesiastical authorities to aid the Inquisition in the search for relapsed Jews, he forbade the inquisitors to force Jews into their courts, force testimony from them and refuse to heed their defense (Significarunt nobis, 1360). Moreover, he reissued the bull Sicut Judaeis (1356), including the paragraph absolving the Jews from the blood libel. Interesting for its bearing on cultural history is Pope Clement's arrangement to have Gersonides' mathematical work translated.

Urban V (1362-70) also issued the bull Sicut Judaeis, and was joyfully greeted by the Jews on his visit to Rome in 1367, for they saw in his return an end to the disorders in the city. He reversed, however, Innocent VI's policy with regard to the Jews and the Inquisition, ordering aid to the latter in the punishment of Jews of the Provence who presumably helped converts to relapse. He also urged that the Jews of this district be compelled to wear the badge and to live in a separate quarter.

Gregory XI (1370-78), the last Pope of the legitimate line to reside in Avignon, showed his favorable attitude by reviving Boniface VIII's Exhibita nobis in order to set a limit to the persecuting tendencies of the inquisitors both in the County Venaissin and in the Provence. Otherwise his attitude was not friendly. Despite the pleas of the Jews of Carpentras, he refused to free them from the district to which John XXII had limited their residence. He issued sharp reprimands to the Archbishop of Magdeburg, to the Bishop of Nuremberg, and to King Henry of Castile for showing favor to the Jews (1372). To the last named he wrote a second time (1375), charging him with showing particular favor to such as hated Christians and urging him to force the Jews to listen to sermons by apostates from Judaism. He himself set the example by granting a converted Jew permission to preach in the synagogue of Avignon He urged all Christians to be particularly charitable to Jewish converts.

11. The Age of Schism and Councils. The critical situation through which the papacy passed during the period of the Great Schism affected the relations between the Popes and the Jews. The desire to restore the Papal State and city often conflicted with the desire to gain adherents or to avoid criticism by displaying great zeal. Public fasting and prayer were ordered by the rabbis of Rome before the communal representatives went to present themselves to Urban VI (1378-89). Their reception seems to have been a favorable one.

Urban's rival, Clement VII (1378-94), at Avignon, feeling himself in a stronger position, continued the established policy toward the Jews. In 1379 he reissued the bull Sicut Judaeis, chiefly for the Jews of the County Venaissin, which included a paragraph lightening the burden of the closed Jewish district. To the complaints of the Jews of Arles he responded by removing them from the Inquisition's jurisdiction and even granted certain other Jews the right to rebuild a synagogue. Also the Jews of Avignon itself and of northern France were freed from inquisitional interference. At the request of a number of Jews, he ordered (1383) that Christians put no faith in the false accusations spread by a certain convert. At the same time, there were the usual remissions of Jewish debts, the customary accusations of usury and the urgings upon inquisitors to prevent Jews from aiding converts who might desire to revert to Judaism. The last Jewish reference in Clement VII's documents seems to be a repetition of Sicut Judaeis (November 12, 1393), presumably as a belated effort to stop the anti-Jewish crimes in Spain.

Boniface IX (1389-1404), of the Roman succession, showed his gratitude to the Jewish community and to a number of individuals, especially physicians, for their service to himself and their aid in restoring the city. He changed the method of taxing the Jews of the Papal State to the benefit of Roman Jewry, and eased the regulations about Jewish clothes. To a complaint by the Calabrian Jews the Pope replied by ordering the Neapolitan inquisitors to stop acting as though more out of greed than faith (Etsi Judaeorum, 1403). At the same time, Boniface tried to make conversion from Judaism profitable. A like policy was followed by INNOCENT VII (1404-6), who ratified for the Jews all the privileges granted by his predecessors (Quamvis potius, 1406).

The work of the Council of Pisa may have had something to do with the general change under Gregory XII (1406-15) by compelling him to avoid the suspicion of overfriendliness toward the Jews. The anti-Jewish utterances of the anti-Pope elected by this Council lend color to this supposition. For ALEXANDER V (1409-10) accused the Jews of Judaizing among Christians, of blaspheming through the study of the Talmud and of engaging in magical rites.

The strongly anti-Jewish attitude of the anti-Pope BENEDICT XIII (1394-1423) was in large measure due to his need of a reputation for great zeal. He long retained favor in Spain, partly because he fell in with the persecuting spirit rampant there at the time. Practically all his references to the Jews are confined to Spain, and most of them deal with the conversion of Jews to Christianity and of synagogues into churches. Against the anti-Pope's policy the Jews found protection in the merciful and utilitarian policies of the royal courts. Benedict's staging of the disputation at Tortosa may have been due to his conviction that the Jews of Spain were already mentally depressed enough to accept the arguments presented by Geronimo de Santa Fé. The bull Etsi doctoribus gentium (May 11, 1415) was an expression of Benedict's disappointment over the failure of the disputation and a bid for recognition by the Council of Constance. The bull aimed at the economic destruction of the Jews and the practically complete suppression of Judaism, and served as a model for anti-Jewish Popes of a later era.

The election of MARTIN V (1417-31) did not completely end the schism in the papacy, a fact which had considerable influence over this Pope's attitude toward the Jews. Soon after his election Martin was persuaded by Emperor Sigismund, who had received large sums from the Jews, to renew all the privileges granted by his predecessors (Quamvis potius). Even more important was the enumeration of a number of far-reaching statements regarding the Jews which included freedom from ecclesiastical jurisdiction, from further humiliation in matters of dress, from molestation in matters of observance or study, and from forcible conversion of children under twelve. He declared that economic relations with the Jews were useful to Christians, and that their conversion was to be attained by mildness. The Roman community not only had the benefit of these pronouncements, but received a number of additional favors, including the reaffirmation of some personal privileges previously conferred by various Popes and the order for other Jewish communities of the Papal State to join that of Rome in making up its tax quota. During the year 1420 a charge of sacrilege in Austria made the Jews turn to the Pope for special protection. In granting this (Licet Judaeorum omnium, January 1, 1421) he specifically condemned forcible conversions. Little more than a year later Martin reissued the bull Sicut Judaeis in a form going beyond the previous text, and condemned preachers who stirred the populace with tales of the use by Jews of Christian blood or of the poisoning of wells. Even for the Jews of Spain, then the hotbed of anti-Jewish agitation, Martin issued an order contrary to the decrees of the anti-Pope Benedict. In 1423, however, the favorable attitude of Martin changed, perhaps as a result of the unbending opposition of the lower clergy, certainly as a result of the combined influences of John Capistrano and the election of an anti-Pope, Clement VIII, to succeed Benedict XIII. A year after the issuance of the bull favorable to the Jews of Spain, another in the opposite sense was sent. A number of other unfavorable utterances followed affecting various Jewish communities (1423 to 1429). Even the anti-preaching statements were withdrawn. In 1427 Pope Martin threatened the Jews of the Papal State because a Jew of Jerusalem had attempted to obtain lands belonging to a Christian chapel there. In 1429 favorable influences, along with the Pope's natural goodwill, regained the ascendancy. In February, 1429, he issued his Quamvis Judaei, really a modified Sicut Judaeis, again ordering the cessation of anti-Jewish preaching, permitting social and economic contacts and renewing all former privileges. For the Jews of Rome Pope Martin reaffirmed a highly favorable series of regulations first promulgated by Boniface IX.

Pope Martin V

EUGENE IV (1431-47), by personal inclination and understanding of the needs of the times, leaned toward favorable relations with the Jews. He issued a Sicut Judaeis (1432) in which, along with the usual items, emphasis was placed on freedom from new and oppressive taxes. In 1434 he assured the Jews of Germany of his protection, and opposed baptism by force. As though to emphasize his opposition to the demands of the Council of Basel, Eugene renewed the prohibition against anti-Jewish sermons and permitted wider economic contacts (1435). To some extent, however, he yielded to the demands of the Council of Basel which, in 1434, called for anti-Jewish legislation. He ordered the enforcement of the badge (1432 and 1435), extended inquisitional power over Jews (1434), and countenanced accusations of host desecration. In 1442 politics compelled him to take the claim for zeal away from the Council and at the same time make more certain of the loyalty of Spain. Dudum ad nostram (August 8, 1442) was one of the most hostile bulls ever promulgated. It all but created a ghetto, ordered the breaking off of social and economic relations, restricted occupation, imposed limits on freedom of speech by Jews and revoked all privileges. Representatives from Italian Jewish communities met to seek ways of having the bull recalled. There was also a wave of emigration from the Papal State. This, combined with the fact that the Pope had not issued the bull from conviction, resulted in its non-enforcement. Eugene IV's real attitude came to the fore again when, shortly before his death, he prohibited forced conversions in Spain (January, 1447).

Nicholas V's (1447-55) vacillations of policy were due to a conflict between personal humaneness and advantage on the one hand and, on the other, to inability to withstand the clamors of a persecuting mob led by overzealous clerical preachers. He no sooner ascended the papal throne than the Jews of Spain complained of the monks who aroused the population against them, causing riots, destroying synagogues, and forcing baptism. The Pope thereupon issued a bull of protection (Etsi apostolicae sedis, November, 1447), ordering the cessation of anti-Jewish agitation, forced baptisms, and the discontinuance of the charge of ritual murder. Immediate pressure was exerted on the Pope by the Spanish hierarchy, so that one month later the bull was withdrawn and the Jews were again left to the mercy of their persecutors. In May, 1449, Nicholas V adjudged the Jews of Seville guilty of blasphemy for holding a religious procession in imitation of the Christians in order to stop a plague, and by March, 1451, his hostility toward the Jews of Spain became aggravated to the point of renewing the oppressive bull issued by Eugene IV in 1442. In 1449 the Pope justified the complaints of the New Christians that discrimination was practised against them in Church and State despite their conversion. In November, 1451, he ordered an investigation of laymen and clerics among the New Christians due to suspicion that they were secret Jews.

Equally subject to change by pressure was Nicholas' policy in Italy. The complaint of the Jews against the preachers and inquisitors who had stirred up a reign of terror and an economic boycott against them resulted in a detailed bull of protection. It even pointed to the advantage to Christians from commercial relations with Jews and Jewish moneylenders. However, a year and a half later (February, 1450), Nicholas took the opposite point of view and asserted that advantage was taken of papal privileges to endanger the souls of Christians. He forbade social and economic relations, Jewish physicians, office holding, and new synagogues, and ordered the enforcement of the badge.

His policy regarding the Jews of Germany and Austria underwent a change in the opposite direction. In April, 1451, this Pope let his legate at the Synod of Bamberg issue a decree against moneylending by Jews and against their failure to wear a distinctive garb. Thereafter a number of edicts rescinded this decree at the request of various secular and ecclesiastical princes. In 1452 Nicholas V was prevailed upon by the Jews of Italy to establish a statute of limitations of one year on all but criminal cases charged against them. Moreover, despite the pronouncement mentioned above, he permitted Lucca to have Jewish moneylenders. He even granted a few Jewish physicians the right to practise among Christians in the Papal State.

Calixtus III (1455-58) came to the papal throne with all the prejudices of the Spanish hierarchy in which he had been trained. The riot caused on his coronation day, when the Roman mob's greed was aroused by the beautiful decorations of the Torah scroll carried by the Jews, terrified the Pope and caused a change in the ceremony of receiving the Jews by subsequent Popes. While granting Francisco Sforza of Milan the right to enter into an arrangement with certain Jews for the establishment of banks, Pope Calixtus reissued Eugene IV's bull of 1442 with all its social and economic restrictions, specifically revoking all the privileges granted the Jews by any of his predecessors (Si ad reprimendos, June, 1456). Except in Spain, there was little effort to enforce the bull.

Pius II (1458-64) was more favorably disposed. He permitted Moses de Rieti to practise medicine among Christians, and granted the Jews of Avignon a number of privileges, including a reduction in taxes, although he also tried, unsuccessfully, to keep them from selling meat to Christians. At the same time, Pius II was more severe in the collection of taxes from the Jews of the Papal State, for he needed the money for the conduct of the Turkish War. He commended the city of Frankfort for removing the Jews from the neighborhood of a church. His successor, Paul II (1464-71), is noteworthy for just one reason. Desirous of making the city of Rome more attractive, he introduced the carnival. Every element of the population was eager to participate, including the Jews. Instead of serving as a refining influence, such as Paul hoped for, the foot races, in which Jews participated, eventually turned out to be one of the easiest means of degrading the Jews. In a letter to Frederick of Austria (1469), Paul asserted that it was not sinful for a Christian judge to direct a verdict in favor of a Jew if justice demanded it.

Sixtus IV (1471-84) left a deep mark on Jewish history through his reluctant consent to the establishment of the Inquisition in Spain (November 1, 1478). In 1475 he had tried to obviate any seeming need for such action by ordering his nuntio to visit churches and monasteries and investigate rumors of judaizing. Later, in 1482 and again in 1483, he protested to Ferdinand and Isabella against the cruelties practised by the Inquisition. His personal breadth of mind was further evidenced by his refusal to canonize Simon of Trent, the hero of a notorious blood libel in 1478. The Pope permitted a number of Jews to practise medicine among Christians and, in further proof of the approaching Humanist Age, had a number of Cabalistic books translated into Latin.

Sixtus' attention to matters of finance led to a reorganization of the taxes paid by the Jews. To the Bishop of Mantua he granted permission to welcome Jewish moneylenders (1476). In 1478 he freed the city of Frankfort from ecclesiastical punishment imposed on it for having tolerated moneylending by Jews, since the city had expressed regret for such tolerance. Pope Sixtus thus proved once more how a variable papal policy was necessitated throughout this period.

12. The Humanist Age. In theory at least the relations between the Popes and the Jews during the two generations of Humanist ascendancy reverted to the status of Gregory I or better. The Popes refused to take seriously the attitude of the politicians and reactionaries in the hierarchy, who continued to see a threat in the presence of Jews. Sometimes, however, they had to bow to the demands of this clamorous crowd. Innocent VIII (1484-92) saw himself compelled to issue threats against the Spanish Marranos (1487) and strengthen the hands of the Inquisition, although he had no hand in the expulsion of 1492. His private attitude is better illustrated by his consent to the agreement made (May 18, 1489) with the magistrate of Sienna in the matter of admitting Jewish moneylenders for the good of the poor people.

The favor of ALEXANDER VI (1492-1503) is said to have been bought. For this no evidence exists. It was quite within his own character and that of his time to use a Jewish physician, Samuel Zarfati, to permit Bonet de Lattes to dedicate to him a work on astronomy, to make the Jew badge less conspicuous, and to berate and punish the Jews of Rome for objecting to the entry of Spanish refugees. The Pope's favor was so at variance with the policy of Ferdinand and Isabella that their ambassador voiced their criticism of the Pope's kind treatment of the Jews exiled from Spain. Soon after the Jews had been tricked and forced into Christianity in Portugal, the Pope urged that they be treated with great leniency until they became accustomed to their new faith. At the same time, Alexander VI had the Jewish race course at the carnival lengthened so that he might enjoy the spectacle in comfort, and imposed a tax on the Jews for the defense of Christendom against the Turks. He used part of the income from Jewish taxation for the development of the University of Rome.

JULIUS II (1503-13) resembled Alexander in his attitude toward the Jews. He had great faith in his Jewish physician, to whom he granted many privileges. He took the Marranos under his protection, but made them pay for it. LEO X (1513-21) showed the most liberal attitude. Although, during the coronation procession, he disdainfully let the Torah scroll slide to the ground, Pope Leo had more respect for Jewish achievements in the arts and for their medical skill. He insisted on the company of a certain Jewish flute player, whom he showered with gifts. He honored also a Jewish singer and his favorite physician. An indication of the conditions of the time is the Pope's complaint about immoral relations between Jews and Christian women. The Reuchlin-Pfefferkorn controversy annoyed rather than interested him. For, while the Pope's sympathies were with Reuchlin, as may be seen from his permission, granted later, to establish a Hebrew printing-press in Rome and to reprint the Talmud, the German and Spanish hierarchies were on the side of Pfefferkorn. In 1519 Leo X granted the Jews a bull of protection, reminiscent of Sicut Judaeis, reaffirming previous privileges, removing them from subjection to inquisitors, and freeing them from undue taxation. He opposed the desire of the Bishop of Carpentras to increase the size of the badge, and made that of the Italian Papal State correspond to that of Avignon. At the same time Pope Leo X took steps against Venetian Jews accused of having published an anti-Christian work and he encouraged conversion among the Jews.

Of HADRIAN VI (1522-23), Leo's immediate successor, all that is known with regard to the Jews is his use of a Jew as personal physician and his expressed gratitude to Jewish physicians for their labor during the time of the great pestilence. In return he exempted them from wearing the badge. CLEMENT VII (1523-34) showed his favor in unmistakable form. Interested in the internal administration of the Roman Jewish community, he ratified the new constitution drawn up by a Jewish council (1524). He renewed the privileges granted to the Zarfati family by his predecessors. He extended his protection also to the Jews of the County Venaissin. After reluctantly permitting the establishment in Portugal of an Inquisition on the Spanish model (1531), Clement VII largely nullified its powers by granting the Portuguese Marranos an amnesty for their past offenses (April, 1533; July, 1534). Through his chamberlain he extended a number of personal favors to Jews. As a result of the repeated misfortunes which visited the city, the Pope gave the Jews of Rome permission to float a loan, while imposing a 5 per cent tax on the Jews of the entire Papal State for the benefit of the Turkish War. Clement VII received David Reubeni in audience several times, and seems to have developed an interest in Solomon Molcho, whom he is said to have saved from death on one occasion. The physician at the time of Clement's death being a Jew, one whom the Pope had publicly thanked for his cures, he was accused of having poisoned the Pope.

PAUL III (1534-49) continued to use a Jewish physician, Jacob Mantino, to whom he showed great favor. But influences around the Pope were urging a change in the friendly policy pursued for the previous half-century. Nevertheless, a series of favorable papal pronouncements indicated that the age of liberalism was not yet at an end. In 1535 the Jews of Ancona and of the Romagna were granted a highly favorable charter, including a reform in court procedure, permission to discard the badge, and the cessation of conversionist sermons. Couched in even friendlier terms was a bull of protection, bearing a resemblance to the ancient Sicut Judaeis, granted to the Jews of Hungary, Bohemia, and Poland (Licet Judaei, May 12, 1540). The bull is particularly vehement in denying the Blood Libel, and asserts that the charge was invented so as to permit murder and robbery under the guise of religion. About a year later Paul III issued a similar statement at the request of the Jews in northern Italy (Exhibita nobis), prohibiting the clergy to arouse the populace against the Jews. In 1543 he confirmed for the Jews of the city of Rome all the privileges granted by his predecessors, and in particular stopped the Passion Show in the Colosseum because it served to arouse the mob against the Jews. Pope Paul III also granted the Jews of Rome the right to establish a printing press. Early in 1543 he found it necessary to ask the Christians to treat with kindness the Jews but recently exiled from the Two Sicilies. Nor were these the only expressions of the Pope's broad spirit. Many purely administrative activities had been taken over and exercised by the chamberlain in the name of the Pope. Thus it was the chamberlain who admitted Sicilian exiles to Ancona on condition that they contribute to the expenses of the Turkish War. The conduct of this war proved a considerable burden for the Jews of the Papal State.

Interested in converts, whose property he protected against confiscation and to whom he extended many privileges and benefits, the Pope felt that the best interests of Christendom would be served if the full powers of the Inquisition were not let loose in Portugal. Only the insistence of Charles V caused him to make the powers of the Portuguese inquisitors equal to those of the Spanish (1542). Paul III nevertheless urged that neophytes be watched lest they stay too close to their former coreligionists, and he established a House of Catechumens in Rome (1543) which later became a burden and a source of great trouble for the Jews. Other less friendly actions of Paul III were the establishment of a Mons Pietatis (a public loan-bank) in Rome (1539) and the prohibition to sell meat slaughtered by Jews to the Christians of Beneventum (1547).

13. Counter-Reformation. Already in the reign of Paul III the breach within the Church and the Counter-Reformation to which it led brought the influence of ecclesiastical reactionaries into the foreground. The Jews did not sense the approaching change in their situation, although the difference between Paul III and Julius III gave them ample warning.

JULIUS III (1550-55) continued to use Jewish physicians, among whom was the famous Amatus Lusitanus, at the time still ostensibly a Christian. The Pope's attempt to solve the perennial problem of child baptisms without parental consent by imposing the punishment of a fine and removal from office on the guilty cleric probably was effective during his own day, but proved ineffective later. In further support of converts a bull (Pastoris aeterni vices) was issued in 1554 imposing on every synagogue of the Papal State an annual tax for the House of Catechumens. The desire to improve the economic position of the Papal State, rather than any decrease of interest in conversion, caused Julius III, in March and December, 1553, to grant the Portuguese Jews and Marranos who had settled in Ancona a number of extremely favorable religious and economic concessions, including protection against the Inquisition, whether at home or on a journey. On the basis of these grants many Marranos openly reverted to Judaism. In what he considered a purely religious matter, however, such as the continued printing and study of the Talmud, Julius III yielded to the influence of the reactionaries. With great zeal Cardinal Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV, set about to obtain the confiscation of all copies of the Talmud in the hands of Jews or Christians and to forbid its importation from Turkish territory or its reprinting in Christian lands. This led to a public burning of Jewish books, including copies of the Talmud, all over Italy (September, 1553). A Jewish synod meeting at Ferrara in 1554 attempted to obviate the worst prospects by promising to establish a censorship to remove from future copies any references objectionable to the Church.

While still a cardinal, PAUL IV (1555-59) was thus the evil genius of his milder predecessor. Burning with zeal to remove inner corruption from the Church, he considered it wrong to tolerate Jews because of economic advantage, and indignantly refused the money they offered in accordance with the then usual method of obtaining concessions. A few months after his accession (July, 1555), he issued the bull Cum nimis absurdum, the most inhuman of papal edicts. Among its regulations were the establishment of a ghetto, the stern enforcement of the badge, the prohibition of more than one synagogue in any community (although, according to a subsequent papal edict, the total amount theretofore paid to Houses of Catechumens was to remain unchanged), the limitation of Jewish economic activity to dealing in old clothes, the prohibition of the practice of medicine and of all converse with Christians. As bad as the actual restrictions were the tone and wording of the bull, the last article of which rescinded all grants of previous Popes. Having been shocked, as head of the Inquisition, by the freedom enjoyed by Jews and Marranos, Paul IV set about, as Pope, to ferret out Judaizers. On the assumption that no Portuguese could any longer be anything but a Christian, no such person was believed when claiming never to have been converted or to have been converted by force. A reign of terror was instituted among both Jews and Marranos. At the instigation of Donna Gracia Mendesia, the Sultan forced the release of some Ancona Marranos. Paul was the more violent with the rest. In May, 1556, twenty-three men and one woman were burned at the stake, going to their death with remarkable fortitude, and thirty-eight were condemned to galley-slavery. The attempt of Turkish Jewry to retaliate by organizing a boycott against the Pope's territory failed through lack of unanimity. Paul IV persecuted Hebrew books with equal zeal, not limiting his confiscations to the Talmud but causing the burning of thousands of copies of commentaries and even prayer-books. Naturally, his death brought a feeling of relief among Christians as well as Jews.

PIUS IV (1559-65), in many respects the opposite of his predecessor, received representatives of the Jewish community of Rome and listened sympathetically to their complaints. Soon thereafter (February, 1562) he issued the bull Dudum a felicis recordationis which, while not completely rescinding, in many respects softened Paul's decree, even granting the Jews the right to have shops outside of the ghetto. Heeding the plea of the Jews of Prague, presented by Mordecai Zemah, the Pope interceded with the emperor to stop the expulsion of that community. Both because of his attitude and because they would rather deal with the Pope than with the lower clergy, the Jews at a meeting in Mantua decided (1563) to petition the Council of Trent to leave the decision regarding the Talmud in the hands of the Pope. In 1564 Pope Pius permitted the reprinting of the Talmud subject to censorship.

The relief afforded by the reign of Pius IV was short-lived. His successor, PIUS V (1566-72), refused to have the Jews take part in his coronation, and immediately thereafter reestablished the restrictions imposed by Paul IV. The bull Cum nos nuper (January, 1567) ordered the sale by the Jews of their real estate. These and other additions to previous restrictions resulted in arrests and confiscations of property and books everywhere in Italy; another consequence was a considerable number of conversions, in one of which the Pope himself took a prominent part. In February, 1569, Pius V struck an even more serious blow when, in Hebraeorum gens, he accused the Jews of immorality and sorcery, and expelled them from the Papal State except Rome and Ancona, where they were needed to carry on economic life. Many exiles who sought refuge in small Italian states were forced out by the Pope. The expulsion caused the closing of 108 synagogues, but the remainder had to assume the entire burden of supporting the Houses of Catechumens. A moratorium was imposed on the Jews of the Papal State for the debts of those who enlisted in the war against the Turks.

GREGORY XIII (1572-85) permitted the Jewish community of Rome, whose constitution he approved, to base its taxation on ability to pay. Later he reduced the amount of the tax, and once more permitted moneylending at a profitable rate. Gregory extended some personal protection when, on Easter, 1573, he prevented a threatened attack on the ghetto by soldiers and when, in December, 1581, he repeated the bull of Paul III (1543) permitting Jews to travel through Italy, whether on business to Ancona or on the way to the Holy Land. He permitted Jews to return to some of the places from which they had been expelled by his predecessor. On the other hand, Gregory XIII's cardinal vicar forbade the Jews the use of a carriage.

The Pope himself renewed the old prohibition against the use by Christians of Jewish physicians and, in the bull Antiqua Judaeorum improbitas (June, 1581), encouraged the Inquisition to continue exerting authority over the Jews in cases of atheism, sorcery, blasphemy against Jesus and Mary, the support of heretics, the possession of prohibited books, and the employment of Christian nurses. This resulted at once in a further attack on the Talmud by the Inquisition in retaliation for complaints by the Jews and their promises of self-censorship. Gregory's most significant contribution to the relations between the Church and the Jews was the regulation of the conversionist sermons. In September, 1577, he ordered the Jews of Rome to listen to sermons preached, for the most part, by converted Jews (Vices eius). A school to train preachers to the Jews was established. In September, 1584 (Sancta mater ecclesia) the attendance at such weekly sermons of one hundred and fifty women from among those above the age of twelve was made compulsory. Pope Gregory also paid particular attention to the welfare of converts, arranging for the inventory of a Jew's property immediately upon his death, so that a converted relative might not be defrauded. In 1585 he came to the aid of the Jews in a matter involving the pirate-monks of Malta; these had captured a number of Jews and held them for a higher ransom than the Jews of Italy were able to collect. The Pope recommended to the grandmaster the acceptance of the Jews' offer.

SIXTUS V (1585-90) soon (October, 1586) completely forbade the Maltese monks to engage in such piratical enterprises. In other respects as well the reign of this Pope was the antithesis of those of his immediate predecessors. He employed a Jewish physician and a Marrano financial advisor. While making the Jews pay considerable sums, the Pope returned to them much of the physical and spiritual security of which they had been deprived. His policy was set forth in the bull Christiana pietas (October, 1586). It permitted them to return to and settle anywhere in the Papal State, practise the arts and engage in commerce, build as many synagogues as they had need for, and acquire and use Hebrew books. The bull also reduced to six a year the number of conversionist sermons which Jews had to attend. Among other matters, Sixtus regulated loan-banks run by Jews, and permitted an increase in the rate of interest to 18 per cent, since lower rates had proved unprofitable. He reduced the amount of the taxes paid by the Jews of the Papal State, this policy being grounded in the belief that greater freedom for the Jews would redound to the prosperity of the entire state. A reversion to the attitudes of the period of Humanism led the Pope to forbid mistreating the Jews at the annual carnivals (1588) and to yield finally to the pleas of an emissary sent to him by a synod of the Italian Jews for permission to reprint the Talmud. Censorship of the Talmud was put into the hands of a commission which called upon a number of Jewish experts for advice (1590).

Pope Sixtus V

14. The Ghetto Period. During the 17th and 18th centuries Papal-Jewish relations remained static. There were no professing Jews in Western Catholic lands, and in others the Jewish position had become stabilized at so low a social and economic level as to make further restrictive measures unnecessary. The history of the relationship between the Popes and the Jews during this period is therefore practically identical with the history of the Roman Jewish community. Church pronouncements about the Jews were, from now on, rarely made by the Pope himself, but usually by the papal vicar or the governing body of cardinals.

CLEMENT VIII (1592-1605) had a considerable influence on the fate of the Jews because his regulations and those of his vicar were the basis for the subsequent government of the Jewish communities in the Papal States. Every restriction on Jewish life was culled from previous Church legislation, so that social, economic, professional and intellectual contacts between Jews and Christians were made all but impossible. The badge was enforced; a Jew could not talk to a Christian even if the latter were his own son become a convert; meat slaughtered according to Jewish ritual could not be sold to a Christian; Jewish trade was restricted to second-hand articles (1592). More restrictions, including some on moneylending, were published in 1599. In February, 1592, the Pope renewed the Bulls of Paul IV and Pius V and ordered all Jews, with the exception of those in Avignon, Rome, and Ancona, out of his dominions. About a year later, however, he permitted the Jews of these cities to trade anywhere within the Papal State, asserting that such trade was of benefit. At the same time, the attack on Jewish books was intensified. This began with an attempt to forbid all Hebrew books (September, 1592). On the plea of the Roman Jews a delay was granted, and by 1596 it was agreed that Jews should censor their own works and that these should then be tolerated if found to contain nothing offensive. The confiscated books, however, were burned in front of St. Peter's on January 14, 1601.

So important did the Pope consider the conversion of the Jews that he himself participated in such a ceremony. He decided in favor of the legality of any conversion even if it was the result of kidnapping. The bull Caeca et obdurate (February, 1593) reverted to the enforced attendance at weekly sermons and the papal vicar issued detailed regulations as to number and seating arrangement. To the credit side of this reign must be placed the regulation of the tenant-landlord relations in the ghetto (ius gazaga) and the removal of the Jews from some of the control hitherto exercised by the Inquisition. On a number of occasions it was found necessary to defend the Jews against physical attack.

PAUL V (1605-21) did no more than ratify the restrictive edicts of his predecessors, including the prohibition of the use of Jewish physicians by Christians and the employment of Christian servants by Jews. Toward the very end of Paul V's reign (January, 1621), the cardinals issued an interpretation of the status of the Jews in Rome which might have gone far toward ameliorating their condition. It amounted to a statement that the Jews possessed in Rome the same rights as other people except insofar as such rights were limited by express governmental or Church decree. But this proved to be a purely theoretical statement, and rigorous restrictions on Jewish life continued to exist and were even amplified for the Jews of the Papal States during the reign of URBAN VIII (1623-44), when new, stringent regulations for the badge were enforced by the Inquisition and Jews were forbidden to place tombstones over the graves of their dead.

Urban VIII was particularly solicitous for the welfare of converts, to whom the Jews were compelled to pay considerable sums. This Pope's great interest in converting Jews expressed itself in an edict (July 1, 1635) that the conversion of the head of a family involved the entire family. For the next two centuries the Houses of Catechumens became houses of coercion into Christianity rather than places of instruction in the faith.

CLEMENT IX (1667-69), as a cardinal, even visited a catechumen who was wavering. In 1668 this Pope abolished the carnival races by Jews which had degenerated into a lewd and degrading spectacle for participants and observers alike. The Jews, however, had to pay for being freed from this painful game. Nor did this relieve them from danger during carnival time, and in 1672 the order granting them particular protection during this period had to be renewed.

CLEMENT X (1670-76) could not be influenced to prevent the expulsion of the Jews from Vienna, yet was somehow prevailed upon by the Portuguese Marranos to suspend the Inquisition in that country. In 1671 the old prohibition was renewed forbidding Jews to drive through the streets of Rome and any Christian to employ a Jew as driver.

INNOCENT XI (1676-89) exercised as a ruler harshness and justice which were reflected in his relations to the Jews. He frowned on forced conversions. Like his predecessors of the previous century, he strictly enforced the weekly conversionist sermons, but instructed the preachers to try not to offend the sensibilities of their audience. Christians, however, who dared attend the sermons of Jewish preachers were severely punished. He resumed the fight against usury with a singlemindedness which threat-

SEGRETERIA DI STATO
DI SUA SANTITÀ

18th October 1913

My Lord,

In reply to your letter of October 7th I am in a position to certify that the type-written copy of Ganganelli's Report to the Consultors of the Holy Office is substantially authentic. I am able to give you this assurance after inquiries made at the Holy Office where the original document is kept. As to the extract of Innocent IVth's letter, there can be no doubt of the accuracy of Raynald's quotation which is confirmed by the fact of Ganganelli citing it in his Report.

Trusting that this declaration may serve your purpose, I have the honour to be, my Lord, your obedient servant

The Right Hon
Lord Rothschild

Letter of Cardinal Merry del Val, addressed to Lord Nathaniel Mayer Rothschild, pertaining to the authenticity of Cardinal Ganganelli's (later Pope Clement XIV) Report affirming the baselessness of the blood accusation against the Jews ened the economic extinction of the community. He was compelled to modify this attitude before long, and after his death his regulation was completely forgotten. Significant of his adherence to principle was Innocent's order to the Venetian admiral Morosini (1685) to free also his Jewish captives, as he had done with the Christians, and not to enslave them.

ALEXANDER VIII (1689-91) and INNOCENT XII (1691-1700) were personally well disposed toward the Jews of the Papal State, although they did not interfere with the numerous restrictions. Innocent XII heeded the plea of Rome's rabbi and reduced the rental of houses in the ghetto. He also permitted the Jewish community to make a loan at a low rate of interest. The attitude toward conversion, however, underwent a change under CLEMENT XI (1700-21). Himself so zealous for conversion that he participated in at least one ceremony, he reversed the attitude of his immediate predecessors by declaring valid the baptism of Jewish infants by their nurses and by safeguarding the interests of neophytes. Nevertheless, his personal attitude was no less favorable than that of his immediate predecessors, sending aid to the ghetto in time of misfortune and prohibiting insults to Jews and Judaism at carnival time.

INNOCENT XIII (1721-24) and BENEDICT XIII (1724-30) were not at all well disposed. Both renewed the restrictions of such hostile Popes as Paul IV and Pius V, especially in matters concerning the objects in which Jews could trade. These bulls, however, had no appreciable effect on Jewish life. CLEMENT XII (1730-40), although not unfriendly, instituted an extensive confiscation of Jewish books (May, 1731), against which the Jews protested energetically. He freed the Jews from wearing the badge when away from home for three days. His efforts to raise the economic status of the ghetto were naturally unavailing in view of the restrictions on trade and the burden of taxes.

BENEDICT XIV (1740-58) also made attempts toward the same end, even granting the Jews permission to deal in new cloth, but with slight results. On the whole, this Pope was particularly well-intentioned. To be sure, he renewed a number of restrictions, including one on the sale of meat (1751), and also once more ordered an invasion of the ghetto in order to confiscate forbidden Jewish books. He also issued a series of bulls regulating the subject of conversion, as a result of which every advantage was with missionaries and neophytes so that almost any excuse was sufficient to justify conversion by force. He did, however, grant an audience to Jacob Selig, the representative of Polish Jewry who came to Rome in 1758 to see what could be done to put a stop to the constant Ritual Murder accusations raised against the Jews of Poland by the local clergy. Benedict XIV appointed Lorenzo Ganganelli, a learned Franciscan monk, to investigate and make a report on the entire subject. This report, a complete exoneration of the Jews, was submitted to the next Pope, the kindly CLEMENT XIII (1758-69), who issued instructions to the Polish clergy accordingly. But this had no more influence on Poland's lower clergy than had previous papal expressions on the same subject. Not even Ganganelli's eventual elevation to the Papal Throne, as CLEMENT XIV (1769-74), lent sufficient weight to the document which he had prepared to counterbalance the advantages that the enemies of the Jews thought they derived from supporting the false accusation. Clement XIV's pontificate proved to be a comparatively happy era for the Jews of the Papal State. He removed them from the jurisdiction of the Inquisition, and reaffirmed some of their old rights.

Quite the reverse relationship characterized the situation under PIUS VI (1775-99). In his very first year, on April 5, 1775, he renewed all the intolerant edicts which had been dormant under his predecessor. This was followed by a severe edict against Talmudic and Cabalistic books. It was, however, in the matter of conversion that the Jews chiefly had to suffer. As a result of a case of kidnapping and conversion of an infant, which took place in the County Venaissin in 1762, the Jewish communities of the Papal States protested, and a decree was obtained in 1764 insisting upon parental consent. As usual, this had no effect on the zealous clergy.

Pius VI then issued a bull (1775) in which such action was again forbidden. Nevertheless, the situation did not improve even in the city of Rome. The kidnapping of children for pious reasons became so common that for the first time the Jewish community of Rome reversed the age-old practice and appealed to other European communities for assistance and intervention (1784). In 1787 Pius VI appointed a commission to investigate the complaints of the Jews, but this commission never reported. Instead of making their burden lighter, the Jews suffered a further intensification of the restrictions against them (1793).

15. The Modern Era. The reaction which characterized the reign of Pope Pius VI may have been due, at least to some extent, to the revolutionary currents already noticeable. The better part of the 19th cent. witnessed a struggle of the papacy against the forces which eventually limited its sphere of activity. Inevitably the inclination of the Jews towards liberalism affected their relations with the Popes of the era.

Already at the end of Pius VI's reign the populace took it for granted that the Jews sympathized with the French who promised freedom. The ghetto was repeatedly in danger, and against this danger the Pope did nothing. Most restrictions were, indeed, removed; but if the Jews expected a complete change in their situation from the coming of the French, they were disappointed. Indeed, they hailed the arrival of PIUS VII (1800-23) who, in turn, freed them from many restrictions. But when the same Pope returned from exile, and after Napoleon's fall brought reaction to every part of Europe, the Jews of Rome were compelled to revert to their ghetto life of the previous era. An attempt was made again to force upon them the burden of the House of Catechumens. Yet the reaction suffered under Pius VII was lighter than that under his successor, LEO XII (1823-29). Convinced, like other rulers of his day, that the past could be restored by edict, Leo XII ordered the enforcement of all the hostile regulations revived by Pius VI, including the compulsory attendance at sermons and the prohibition to own real estate (1827). Property acquired during the brief period of freedom was to be sold. In return, he enlarged the ghetto. When the Jews began to emigrate from the Papal State to lands which promised greater freedom, the Pope showed his disapproval by imposing an emigration tax.

Pius VIII (1829-30) showed no inclination to ease the situation of the Jews, and Gregory XVI (1831-46) continued to display unyielding opposition to the liberalism for which his people clamored. In many matters of a humanitarian nature he treated the Jews with considerably greater mildness than had his immediate predecessors. Economic contacts between Jews and Christians were winked at, and the gates of the ghetto were not watched too carefully. But in matters of more fundamental policy or principle the Pope remained immovable. The sale of real estate to Jews was once more forbidden (1844), and their limitation to the ghetto was reaffirmed (1841). Above all, the Damascus Affair, which created a stir among liberals everywhere because of the patent falsehood of the accusation against a number of Damascus Jews that they had slain a Christian monk, occurred during his reign. The Church played a rather sorry part in the affair, encouraged by the silence of the Pope.

Pius IX (1846-78) represented the spirit and the struggles of that century. Himself imbued with the liberalism of the people, he expressed his attitude in words and deeds, calling the Jews fellow men, and abolishing compulsory attendance at sermons. His greatest gesture was the removal of the ghetto walls, on Passover, 1848. The revolutionary wave of that year drove him out of his city and, upon his return under the protection of foreign soldiers, the Pope yielded to the view of the reactionary clergy on the subject of the Jews as on other subjects, and blamed them for having supported the republic. The ghetto was reestablished in full rigor; the Jews were again forbidden to employ Christians. The extent to which the Papal State lagged behind the rest of the world was most apparent in the Mortara case. No protests by Rothschild or Moses Montefiore and no criticism by Christian liberals or petitions by Christian rulers, including Francis Joseph of Austria, moved Pope Pius to declare this baptism invalid and restore the child to his parents, or to stop similar outrages thereafter. The economic repression of the Roman Jews became such that the community had to seek assistance from other Jewish communities. The occupation of Rome by the king of Italy (1870) destroyed the last direct point of contact between the Papacy and the Jews.

This loss of contact did not result in the complete cessation of influence of the papal attitude on the life of the Jews. Embittered by the loss of the State, Leo XIII (1878-1903) never forgave the forces of liberalism with which, like his predecessor, he identified the Jews in his denunciations. The reactionary forces, particularly in Austria and France, who were openly anti-Jewish, found in him a supporter. Pius X (1903-14) was better disposed. He received Theodor Herzl in audience, but refused to give the slightest encouragement to his plan. His successor, Benedict XV (1914-22), however, yielded to pressure from the Allies during the first World War to give general endorsement to the Balfour Declaration (1917). The papacy, nevertheless, persisted in seeing danger to Christian holy places as long as the mandate was in the hands of a Protestant power which promised eventual control of the Holy Land to the Jews.

Pius XI (1922-39) retained the latter attitude. In general, this saintly and scholarly Pope brought to mind the best among his predecessors in their relations with the Jews. In disbanding an anti-Jewish organization, he expressed in no uncertain terms his disdain for anti-Semitism and his feeling that it was contrary to the teachings of the Church (1928). He also left no doubt of his sympathy with the oppressed Jews of National Socialist Germany and with the victims of Fascism in Italy. He said (September, 1938): "It is not possible for Christians to take part in anti-Semitism. Spiritually we are Semites." The reigning Pope, Pius XII (1939-), was his Cardinal Secretary of State and therefore a close collaborator. He is reported (1942) to have expressed disapproval of the treatment of Jewish refugees by Germany and German-controlled France.

Pope Pius XI

Solomon Grayzel.

Lit.: Berliner, Abraham, Geschichte der Juden in Rom (1893); idem, Censur und Confiskation hebräischer Bücher im Kirchenstaate (1891); Eubel, "Urkunden zu dem Verhalten der Päpste gegen die Juden," Römische Quartalschrift, vol. 7 (1903); Grayzel, Solomon, The Church and the Jews in the XIIIth Century (1933; cf. also the general bibliography given there); idem, "The Avignon Popes and the Jews," Historia Judaica (1940); Kisch, Guido, "The Yellow Badge," ibid. (1942); Kaufmann, D., "Leon X et les Juifs de Rome," Revue des études juives, vol. 21 (1890); Krauss, S., "The Jews in the Works of the Church Fathers," Jewish Quarterly Review (1892-93); Loeb, I., "Bulles inédites des papes," Revue des études juives, vol. 1 (1890); Newman, Louis I., Jewish Influences on Christian Reform Movements (1925); Parkes, J., Conflict of the Church and the Synagogue (1934); idem, The Jew in the Medieval Community (1938); Simonsohn, M., Die kirchliche Judengesetzgebung im Zeitalter der Reformkonzilien von Konstanz und Basel (1912); Rodoconachi, M., Le St. Siège et les Juifs (1891); idem, "La communauté juive de Rome au temps de Jules II e de Léon X," Revue des études juives, vol. 61 (1911); Roth, Cecil, in Jewish Quarterly Review, vol. 27, No. 2 (1936) 117 et seq.; idem, The Ritual Murder Libel and the Jews (1934); Stern, M., Urkundliche Beiträge über die Stellung der Päpste zu den Juden (1894-95); idem, Die päpstlichen Bullen über die Blutbeschuldigung (1900); Vernet, F., "Le Pape Martin V et les Juifs," Revue des questions historiques (1892); Vogelstein, Hermann, and Rieger, Paul, Geschichte der Juden in Rom (1895-96); Zoller, I., "I medici ebrei laureati a Siena negli 1543-1695," Rivista israelitica (1913).

POPKIN, LOUIS, journalist, b. Yonkers, N. Y., 1894. In 1914 he became managing editor of the American Hebrew, and retained this post until 1918. Popkin founded the Planned Publicity Bureau in 1919, and through it was instrumental in directing the public relations programs not only of numerous private enterprises, but of major communal and philanthropic campaigns.

Among the organizations for which Popkin supervised publicity at various times were the Jewish Welfare Board, the Federation for the Support of Jewish Philanthropic Societies, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Joint Distribution Committee. He was made a lecturer on public relations at the College of the City of New York in 1931.

ZELDA F. POPKIN, his wife, was a journalist and fiction writer. Starting with work in periodicals of Jewish interest, she subsequently wrote for secular publications and finally turned to the construction of mystery novels, including No Crime for a Lady (1942).

POPPER, DAVID, cellist and composer, b. Prague, 1843; d. Baden, near Vienna, 1913. After studying at the Prague Conservatory he joined the Court orchestra at Löwenburg. Beginning with 1863, he toured Europe extensively as cellist, and was soon recognized as one of the foremost virtuosos of his instrument. From 1868 to 1873 he was first cellist of the Vienna Royal Opera orchestra, and following this period he was a member of the world-famous Hubay Quartet. From 1896 until his death he was professor of cello at the National Academy of Music in Budapest. He received the honorary appointment of Hofrat, but the diploma reached him on the morning of his death. His numerous works for the cello, including four concertos, are neither original nor important; but they are written melodically, pleasingly and gracefully, and for these reasons have enjoyed great favor with many cellists.

POPPER, JOACHIM, EDLER VON (originally, Hayim Popper), merchant, banker and philanthropist, b. Bresnitz, Bohemia, about 1720; d. Prague, 1795. Little is known of his youth, but as a young man he must have gone to Prague, from which city it is known that he went to the Leipzig fair as early as 1744. Joachim Popper, as he was known there, became a substantial and influential merchant in Prague, dealing in woollens and potash, was a banker and manufacturer, and conducted far-flung business enterprises. He became a co-lessee of the tobacco monopoly under Empress Maria Theresa, and although he was a Jew obtained permission from Emperor Joseph II to buy houses in Prague and in Pilsen.

As a result of the influence which he came to wield among his coreligionists, Popper was, in 1775, made head of Bohemian Jewry. In the financial crisis caused by the Silesian wars (1740 on) he aided the state by turning over to it the greater part of his silver. An outstanding humanitarian and philanthropist, and noted for his services to Judaism and Jewry, Popper helped the poor of every denomination, and gave endowments without regard to religious affiliation. Leopold I ennobled him in 1790 in recognition of his ethical business conduct and his benevolence. Popper died childless, but left a marriage endowment for his sister's descendants. A synagogue in Prague, which he founded, bears his name.

Lit.: Krauss, S., Joachim Edler von Popper (1926); Wurzbach, Biographisches Lexikon des Kaisertums Österreich, vol. 23-24, p. 116.

POPPER, JOSEPH (pseudonym, Lynkeus), engineer and social philosopher, b. Kolin, Bohemia, 1838; d. Vienna, 1921. Popper was born in the ghetto; he attended the Jewish elementary school at Kolin and later went to Prague, where he studied at the Oberrealschule and subsequently at the Polytechnikum. Despite his excellence in mathematics and physics, he could not, as a Jew, obtain a position as instructor at the university. He accepted a lowly job with the National Railway in southern Hungary, fell ill and moved to Vienna. There he endeavored to eke out a living as a private tutor, as owner and editor of a scientific-technical literary agency, peddling his hand-written articles from one newspaper office to another, and in other humble jobs. He also attended lectures at the University of Vienna, where he became acquainted with the eminent non-Jewish physicist, Ernst Mach.

Popper's financial situation improved only after his invention of "Kesseleinlagen," a device which enhanced the working capacity and safety of engine boilers by preventing the accumulation of "fur." Although this mechanism proved to be highly useful, Popper did not acquire wealth through it, nor through any other of his numerous inventions, including an air-condenser which condensed the exhaust of steam machines through contact with the air, rendering possible the utilization of the condensed matter as engine fuel. Above all, Popper was the first to propound the possibilities of transmitting electric power, but he was so disappointed by the cool reception with which his inventions and discoveries met that he submitted the monograph wherein the electrical transmission of energy was foreshadowed in a sealed letter to the Imperial Academy of Sciences in Vienna, in 1862, with the proviso that it should be opened only twenty years later. He was equally ahead of others in his theories on gyroscopic motion and aeronautics. In a treatise, Flugtechnik, he discussed, as early as 1888, ways of making the conquest of the air possible by constructing lighter steam engines.

He proved to be a Lynkeus—he adopted the name of this mythological helmsman of the Argonauts, famous for the keenness of his sight, when he published Das Individuum und die Bewertung menschlicher Existenzen (1910)—in many fields of science. He was one of the first to recognize the enormous importance of the principle of energy discovered by Julius Robert Mayer, which he applied to the solution of several problems in physics (Report of the Vienna Academy of Sciences, 1875). As early as 1884 Popper raised the question of the relation between matter and energy—long before Einstein's theory of relativity. Even before Planck's enunciation of the quantum theory, Popper (in his letters to his friend Ernst Mach) had discussed the possible existence of quanta of energy, and had attempted to deduce from this the periodic table of elements.

He uttered prophetic ideas even in his only belletristic work, Phantasien eines Realisten (1899), a collection of narratives which was suppressed as "immoral" in the Austrian-Hungarian monarchy. One of his phantasies, "Träumen wie Wachen," played a part in the history of psychoanalysis. Popper, as related by Sigmund Freud, had discovered there long before him the fundamental thought of his theory of dreams.

But art, science and technology took second place with Popper as compared to social problems—such as war, the reform of criminal laws, and the liberation of mankind from bigotry. His basic social ideas are contained in his early work, Das Recht zu leben und die Pflicht zu sterben (1878). In Das Individuum und die Bewertung menschlicher Existenzen (1910; 3rd ed., Das Ich und das soziale Gewissen) he emphasized the right of every individual to exist. All life is sacred. No man has the right to sacrifice the lives of his fellow men against their will. No ideal is lofty enough to justify such sacrifice. Everybody is free to die for his own ideal; to kill for one's own ideal is murder in any case. Thus Popper was equally opposed to capital punishment and to universal military duty. He fought against the absurdity of the state which forces its subjects to die while it does not even guarantee them the necessary subsistence minimum.

Even more important was his profound sociological study, Die allgemeine Nährpflicht als Lösung der sozialen Frage (1912), in which he endeavored to solve the social problem by the establishment of a Nährarmee (minimum—or subsistence—army) "producing or procuring all that physiology and hygiene show to be absolutely indispensable. . . . This minimum is to be applied in kind, not in money, unconditionally, to every member of the community. It will be incumbent upon all the able-bodied members of the community to serve for a specified number of years in the subsistence army." In the field of luxuries, the free economic system, based on private ownership, individual enterprise and free contract, would continue, according to Popper's plan. He advocated a synthesis of socialism and liberalism, aiming at the elimination of class hatred.

Other of his writings, dealing with social and political problems, include: Die technischen Fortschritte nach ihrer ästhetischen und kulturellen Bedeutung (1886); Friedensvorschläge, Schiedsgerichte, Völkerbund (1910); Krieg, Wehrpflicht, Staatsverfassung (1921); and two works published posthumously by Margit Ornstein, Philosophie des Strafrechts (1924) and Über Religion (1924). While in the last-named work as well as in his study on his favorite philosopher, Voltaire (1906), he professed his repudiation of all existing creeds, he was deeply attached to the Jewish people. This love is expressed in his book, Fürst Bismarck und der Antisemitismus (anonymously issued, 1886; new edition, 1925), and in his Selbstbiographie (autobiography), written by the octogenarian at the suggestion of the German scientist, Wilhelm von Ostwald (1917). In Fürst Bismarck Popper attacked the anti-Jewish policy of the famous German chancellor and the anti-Semitic writings of Richard Wagner, Eugen Dühring and Eduard von Hartmann, maintaining that only the establishment of a Jewish state would dispel anti-Semitism. After the pogroms in Russia he expressed his sympathy with the victims and frequently showed his admiration for the reconstruction of Palestine; he bequeathed his exquisite library to the Jewish National Library at Jerusalem. Popper was widely regarded as a genius, whose absorptions ranged brilliantly from poetry to technology, from philosophy to the exact sciences.

Popper, who was unmarried, had many friends and admirers, among them the young physicist, Albert Einstein. In order to alleviate his financial hardships, the city of Vienna granted the old man a pension which, however, owing to inflation, lost its value. A bust of him, erected in the Rathauspark in Vienna, was destroyed by the Nazis in 1938, and the organization Allgemeine Nährpflicht, which had endeavored to disseminate Popper's ideas, was dissolved in the same year. ALFRED WERNER.

Lit.: Gespräche (reported by Margit Ornstein and Heinrich Löwy; 1925); Mises, R. von, "Popper-Lynkeus," Neue Österreichische Biographie (1930); Gelber, A., Popper-Lynkeus; Wittels, Fritz, An End to Poverty (1925); Schwarz, Richard, Rathenau, Goldscheid, Popper-Lynkeus (1919).

POPPER, JULIUS, explorer, b. Bucharest, Roumania, 1857; d. Buenos Aires, 1893. He received his elementary education at Bucharest where his father was the principal of the first Jewish-Roumanian school. He attended secondary and engineering school in Paris and after receiving his degree from the latter, he embarked on a trip around the world and, learning about the existence of gold in Tierra del Fuego, the great isle at the southern tip of South America, then practically unexplored, he went there (1882). At the head of a band of some fifty ex-convicts who had gathered round him in South America, he found gold which he extracted with the help of a machine invented by himself which has been in use ever since in South America for extracting the precious mineral. He reigned as a sovereign in the island, gave his commonwealth, which in the interim had grown considerably, a code of law and defended the mines against masses of other adventurers attracted by the gold. Exploring the island scientifically many times he made its map and described its geography and geology.

He was also a poet whose work has been likened to that of Edgar Allan Poe and Mark Twain.

Lit.: Anuarul pentru Israeliti, 1894 and 1895.

POPPER, SIEGFRIED, Austrian naval engineer, b. Prague, 1848; place and date of death unknown. He was appointed director of naval construction in 1902, naval constructor-general in 1904 and chief engineer with the rank of rear admiral. He supervised the building of many Austrian warships, several of which he himself designed. He received the Gold Cross of Merit (1887), the Ritterkreuz of the Francis Joseph Order (1895), and the Komthurkreuz of the Francis Joseph Order upon his retirement (1907). When anti-Semitism grew at the Vienna Technische Hochschule, he returned to this institution the honorary doctor's diploma which it had awarded him.

Lit.: Frühling, Die Juden in der kaiserlichen und königlichen Armee; Wininger, S., Grosse Jüdische National-Biographie, vol. 5 (1931) 72-73.

POPPER, WILLIAM, orientalist and professor, b. St. Louis, 1874. He received his Ph.D. degree from Columbia University in 1899, and later studied at various European universities. In 1901 Popper went to the Near East, and traveled through the Arabian desert, anticipating T. E. Lawrence by making the journey in the costume of a Bedouin.

On his return to the United States in 1902, Popper was made associate editor of the Jewish Encyclopedia, acting as chief of the bureau of translations. He retained this post until 1905, in the meantime serving also as lecturer in Semitic languages at Columbia University and as acting chief of the oriental department of the New York Public Library. Popper was called to the University of California (1905) to teach Semitic languages and in 1922 was made professor.

Popper's life work was an edition, from the original manuscripts, of the histories of Ibn Taghrî Birdî, an Arab chronicler of the 15th cent.; An-Nujûm az-Zâhira (5 vols., 1909-29); Hawâdîth adduhûr (1930-42). He was also the author of: The Censorship of Hebrew Books (New York, 1899); Studies in Biblical Parallelism: Isaiah 1-10 (1918); Isaiah 11-35 (1923); Isaiah 1-35, in the reconstructed Hebrew text (1923); The Poetic Prophecies of Isaiah, 1-35, translations (1931).

POPPER-LYNKEUS, JOSEF, see POPPER, JOSEF.

POPPERS, MEIR BEN JUDAH LÖB HA-KOHEN ASHKENAZI, rabbi and Cabalist, b. Prague, date of birth unknown; d. Jerusalem, 1662. He studied Cabala under Israel Ashkenazi and Jacob Zemah, and wrote a number of Cabalistic works in the spirit of Lurian Cabala, including: Or Tzaddikim (Hamburg, 1690), a mystic methodology; Or Pene Melech, a treatise on the secrets of the teachings and commandments, published in an abridged version under the title of Sefer Kavvanoth Tefilloth Umitzvoth

(Hamburg, 1690); Meoroth Nathan (Frankfort, 1709), a Cabalistic dictionary; Mesillath Hochmah (Shklov, 1785), an introduction to the Cabala.

Those of his writings which remained in manuscript include: Or Rab, a commentary on the Zohar; Or Haabukah, a treatise on Cabala; Or Zarua, a commentary on Hayim Vital's Derech Hahayim.

POPULATION STATISTICS, see STATISTICS.

PORGES, HEINRICH, writer on music and conductor, b. Prague, 1837; d. Munich, Germany, 1900. In 1863 he served as co-editor of the famous Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. He went to Munich in 1867, and became teacher of piano at the Royal School of Music. He later held also the posts of literary editor of the Süddeutsche Presse and of music critic of the Neueste Nachrichten. Porges was a devoted disciple of Richard Wagner and worked indefatigably to bring him recognition. As the conductor of the Porges Choral Society, which he founded in 1886, he also championed the music of Liszt, Berlioz and Bruckner. He wrote several books about Wagner, including a valuable treatise on Tristan und Isolde.

PORGES, NATHAN, rabbi and bibliographer, b. Prossnitz, Moravia, 1848; d. Würzburg, Germany, 1924. He served as rabbi in Leipzig from 1888 to 1917, in the interim (1913) being appointed professor in the university there. He had a profound knowledge of early Hebrew printed works and of bibliography, and owned a remarkable collection of incunabula and of other rare books. In religious matters, Porges was a moderate liberal.

His bibliographical articles appeared in the Revue des études juives, in the Zeitschrift für hebräische Bibliographie, and in the Zentralblatt für das Bibliothekswesen. Porges was an expert on Hebrew and philological literature. In addition to a number of essays on Dunash ibn Labrat and Judah Hayyuj, he wrote Bibelkunde und Babelfunde (1903) and Josef Bechor Schor.

Lit.: Brann, Marcus, Geschichte des jüdisch-theologischen Seminars (1904).

PORGES VON PORTHEIM, prominent Bohemian family. The brothers Moses Porges (1781-1870) and Leopold Judah Porges (1784-1869) were active in their youth in the Frankist movement. After its collapse they turned to industry, established large textile factories in Bohemia and played a prominent part in the Jewish community of Prague. Raised to the nobility in 1841, they received the title "von Portheim." In his final years Leopold Judah Porges was elected to the diet, while Moses Porges officiated as vice-mayor of Prague-Smichov. The son of Moses Porges, Joseph Porges Edler von Portheim (1817-1904), was a great art patron and philanthropist.

Lit.: "Erinnerungen von Moses Porges an den Frankisten Hof in Offenbach," Historische Schriften des yiddisch-wissenschaftlichen Instituts, vol. 1 (1929) 253-96; Graetz, Heinrich, Frank und die Frankisten (1868).

PORIAH, see COLONIES, AGRICULTURAL.

PORITZ, see PHRASES, POPULAR.

PORT CHESTER, a village on Long Island Sound, in the state of New York. Its population in 1940 was 27,073, of whom about 2,500 were Jews. Late in the 19th cent. a few Jewish merchants became established in the village, and later the Jewish community began to grow. Of the 1940 public school population, 8.62 per cent were Jewish.

There was (1942) one congregation in the village, Kneses Tifereth Israel, practising the Orthodox ritual. In 1942 one of its rabbis, David J. Seligson, was given a leave of absence to serve as chaplain in the United States Army, and Moses J. Shragowitz, who came in 1937, remained its rabbi. The congregation had a synagogue building, and also held services in the Jewish Center of Port Chester. The Jewish Center also housed a Hebrew school and Sunday school, and served as headquarters for the various organizations in the village which are represented on its board, among them the B'nai B'rith, Council of Jewish Women, Hadassah, Jewish War Veterans, Ladies' Aid Society and the Zionist Organization of America. There was also a Jewish Community Council.

Port Chester Jews served in various civic capacities. Abraham Tunick and Irving Wein held the office of corporation counsel; Herman N. Goldowitz, William Baruch, George Becker and Morris Karnes, police justice; Maurice Singer and Harry Wunsch, village treasurer; and David Berman, chairman of the board of education. Ralph Becker was president of the New York State Young Men's Republican Clubs. Port Chester was also the home of Mrs. William D. Sporborg, nationally known club woman, lecturer and leader in women's affairs; Judge Irving Lehman, chief justice of the New York Court of Appeals; and Governor Herbert H. Lehman.

LOUIS M. SHANOK.

PORT ELIZABETH, coastal city near the southern tip of the Union of South Africa, on the Indian Ocean. The Jewish community dates its history back to 1820, when Jews arrived with the British settlers. Those who did not go on to other parts of the Cape established themselves in the town as merchants. In 1845 Moses Britton was engaged in business on Main Street, and five years later Samuel Nathan opened a shop on Queen Street. Other early settlers were Hyam Henry Solomon, Philip Barnett, Henry Godfrey, Frederick Marcus, S. Rudolf, Nathan Moss and Joseph Carl Hess. A number of other Jews were established on Algoa Bay in commercial enterprises.

By 1855 there were enough Jews in Port Elizabeth to warrant the establishment of a temporary congregation. A rented room on Queen Street served as a place of worship during the 1850's. Two years later (1857) the Port Elizabeth Hebrew Congregation was formed. The first Jewish marriage in Port Elizabeth took place in 1856, when Deborah Moss was married to Joseph Phillips.

Through the efforts of A. M. Jackson, who arrived in Port Elizabeth in 1859, a plot of land was obtained from Sir George Grey, governor of the colony, for a cemetery. The first synagogue, which formerly had been a Lutheran church atop White's Road Hill, was acquired in 1862.

Ten years later Rabbi Samuel Rappaport was called from Portsmouth, England, to officiate. For twenty-three years he served not only Port Elizabeth but also communities in other parts of the Cape and in Natal and the Orange Free State. In 1874, two years after Rappaport's arrival, the community purchased land for the construction of a synagogue. By 1877 the building was completed. During this period the community established a philanthropic society, a social club, a Sabbath school and a branch of the Anglo-Jewish Association.

Rappaport's successor, D. Wasserzug, of Cardiff, Wales, served from 1895 to 1896. He was succeeded by Rabbi Jacob Phillips, of Sunderland, who occupied the pulpit until 1909, when he was called to Pretoria. Four years later (1913) A. Levy became rabbi of the congregation.

About the end of the 19th cent. Port Elizabeth's Orthodox congregation was organized. Services were held at first in the homes of its members and in a building on Hartman Road. A synagogue was constructed in 1912. The Benevolent Society was established in 1900 by H. Levy. Three years later it united with the Helping Hand Society; in 1913 a Hebrah Kaddisha was formed. A Hebrew school was organized in 1918 by a group of Port Elizabeth Jews, among whom were Adolph Schauder and N. W. Lurie. Other organizations included a Ladies' Association (1908), a Zionist Society, a Women's Zionist League and a Zionist Youth organization.

Jews who participated in Port Elizabeth public life included: Harry H. Solomon, founder of the Port Elizabeth Observer, who was mayor in 1875; M. Gumpert, who was the first South African-born mayor of the city, and a member of the Provincial Council; Ephraim Harris Cotton, who was a member of the city council for many years; H. J. Rogaly, J.P., who served as a city councillor (1927); Albert Sytner, who was a member of the Port Elizabeth Town Council; Nathan Adler, who was French consul in Port Elizabeth, and Adolph Schauder, who served as a corporal in the Boer War, was made city councillor in 1922 and elected mayor in 1940. LEONARD A. GREENBERG.

PORT ROYAL, city on the island of Jamaica, in the British West Indies, formerly called "Caguaya," and located seven miles southwest of Kingston. It is fraught with the romance of the sea, because of its position at the entrance of Jamaica's most important harbor. From the middle of the 17th cent. until the earthquake of 1692, the majority of the Jews of the island lived at Port Royal, which was then the ancient capital and the richest town in the West Indies.

No historian mentions a Jewish house of worship in Port Royal in the early days. However, there is a reference in one of the early volumes of Deeds in Spanish Town which gives rise to the assumption that a secret synagogue existed even six years prior to 1684, when permission was granted to erect synagogues. John Peek sold to the "Jews of Port Royal" on January 29, 1676, for £57 a "House and Land" sixty-three feet by twenty-six feet south on Cannon Street. One presumes that this house was bought for the purpose of divine worship, as the purchase was made jointly by the "Jews of Port Royal." A synagogue certainly did exist and was destroyed in the earthquake on June 7, 1692, as Edmund Heath of Port Royal wrote to the Master of University College, Oxford, on the very day of the earthquake: "I turned into ye Jewes' street in order to get home when their synagogue fell by my side."

Among the prominent members of the community in the early days were David Alvarez (naturalized in 1677), Abraham Gomes Henriques, Jacob De Leon, Jacob Henriques, Isaac Cohen de Mercado, Abraham de Leon Cohen, David Nunes, Isaac Pereira, Jacob Lopes Torres, Joshua Morais, Isaac Brandon, Jacob Mendes Gutteres and Isaac de Aguilar. These pioneers came from Portugal and were most anxious to identify themselves with the Jewish past. Hence they discarded the unfamiliar appellations assumed under the stress of the Inquisition and took once again the old Biblical names.

From an old Spanish Bible printed in 1660, formerly the property of Josef de Torres of Port Royal, there is the following note: "On Jan. 9, 1703—on the Sabbath, there occurred a conflagration in Port Royal where all the houses were burnt. May God deliver us from a similar fate." The new synagogue undoubtedly met with as untimely a fate as its predecessor.

Land was purchased in 1719 and a synagogue (with the Sephardic ritual) was erected and designated K. K. Neve Tsedek (Abode of Righteousness). The wardens were Mendez Luxino and Moses Lamego. Port Royal suffered another serious setback three years later when a great hurricane swept over the town. Only the synagogue and the Jewish quarters remained intact. In 1815 a devastating fire again broke out and this ill-fated town was reduced to a heap of ruins. The synagogue was destroyed and most of the Jews removed to Kingston.

The Honorable David Judah Alberga, grandfather of Benjamin Alberga, J.P., represented the Parish in the Old House of Assembly in the 1860's. Ellis Wolfe (1816) bequeathed £500 for the rebuilding of the synagogue, but no building was ever erected in its stead. Several other bequests were left to the synagogue, i.e. by Raphael Andrade (1726), Daniel Carvallo (1730), Judith Alvares (1732) and David Almeya (1743). Among the early rabbis, mention may be made of Haham Joshua Hezekiah de Cordova (1753-97).

The cemetery was located at Hunt's Bay. The deceased were brought in rowing boats here to their last resting place. It is one of the oldest Jewish cemeteries in the Western Hemisphere, and the monuments bear in many cases inscriptions in Hebrew, English and Portuguese. Many of the tablets continue to be legible and have survived the vicissitudes of earthquake and elements. One notices the tombstones of Dr. Jacob Rodrigues de Leon, who was the physician of the synagogue (1703), and of Moses de Lusena, the Hazan of the community (1692). HENRY P. SILVERMAN.

Lit.: The Gleaner Geography and History of Jamaica (12th ed.); Frank Cundall's Chronological Outlines; Caribbean, vol. 2; Journal of the Assembly of Jamaica (1702); Early Volume of Jamaica Deeds; Ballard Letters, vol. 39.

PORTALEONE, ABRAHAM BEN DAVID, physician who, in 1563, received the M.D. degree from the University of Pavia, in Italy. As one of the most prominent physicians in his native city of Mantua, he once received from Pope Clement VIII (1592-1605) a special letter in which the latter thanked him for medical aid which he had given to Prince John dei Medici, who had been wounded by gunfire. Portaleone's works include several Hebrew books on medicine. In addition, he published in Latin his expert opinions in reply to questions addressed to him by non-Jewish physicians in Lombardy.

Lit.: Fürst, L., Beiträge zur Geschichte der jüdischen Ärzte in Italien; Kaufmann, D., in Gesammelte Schriften, vol. 3, p. 303; Münz, I., Die jüdischen Ärzte im Mittelalter, 95; Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums (1862) 625; Vogelstein, H., and Rieger, P., Geschichte der Juden in Rom; Carmoly, E., Histoire des médecins juifs (1844).

PORTIS, SIDNEY ALEXANDER, physician, b. Chicago, 1894. He received his medical degree from Rush Medical College in 1918. In 1921 Portis was appointed an assistant in medicine at Rush Medical College; subsequently, after several advancements, he became assistant clinical professor (1926-30). He went to Loyola University in 1930 and until 1936 was professor of clinical medicine there. Then he returned to Rush Medical College, where he became associate professor of medicine at the University of Illinois (1941). Portis held many hospital posts, including that of attending physician in medicine at Michael Reese Hospital, where he had established the Bernard Portis Fellowship Foundation. In addition to writing numerous medical papers on gastroenterology for various professional journals, Portis was the editor of Diseases of the Digestive System (1941).

Lit.: Kagan, Solomon R., Jewish Contributions to Medicine in America (1939) 594-95.

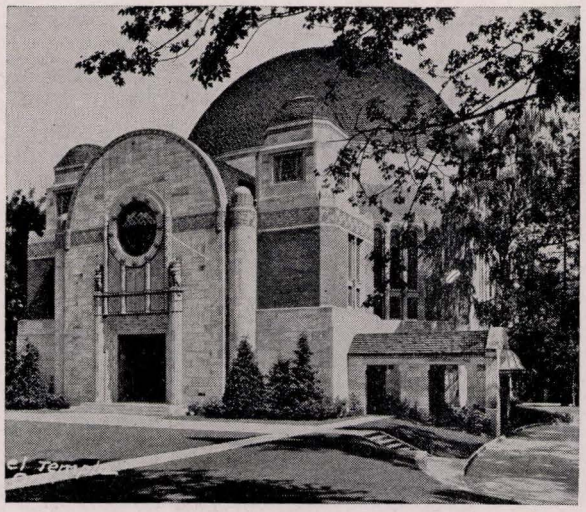
PORTLAND, a city on the southern part of the Maine coast, with a population (1940) of 73,643, of whom about 3,650 were Jews. The Jewish community of Portland did not develop until late, and was made up almost entirely of Jews from Eastern Europe. The three synagogues in the city are Orthodox; until March, 1942, they were under the rabbinical direction of Mendell Lewittes, who served from 1936. The main synagogue was Shaarei Tefiloh. A Kehillah-like organization known as the Vaad Hair engages the rabbi and Shohetim for the community. One of the earlier prominent rabbis of Portland was Nathan Shochet, a rabbinic scholar originally from Europe.

In Portland are housed the Jewish Home for Aged, supported by the entire Maine community, the Portland Hebrew School, and the Jewish Community Center. Various fraternal organizations and branches of the different Zionist groups were in existence in Portland in 1942. Despite the comparative smallness of the Jewish population, many Jews held public office.

Louis Bernstein was chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Cyrus Jacobson, Udell Bramson and Richard Wilkes were members of the Maine House of Representatives, Morris Sacknoff, Henry M. Taylor and Samuel Davis were aldermen, Jacob Harrison Berman was United States Commissioner for Maine, and Max Pinansky was a municipal judge, state senator (1934-36), a member of the Regional National Labor Relations Board and a member of the Portland board of education.

PORTLAND, a city on the Columbia river, in the interior of Oregon, near the Washington borderline. Its population in 1940 was 305,394, of whom about 10,000 were Jews. The Jewish settlement of Portland was an aftermath of the gold rush that brought many Jews out to the West Coast. Some German Jews arrived from San Francisco in 1849. Among these early settlers was Louis Fleischner, who came in 1852, and subsequently (1893) was made state treasurer of Oregon. In 1858 Congregation Beth Israel was formed by H. F. Bloch, Simon Blumauer, L. Cahn, L. Cohn, Abraham Frank, Samuel Levy, M. Lyon, M. Mansfield, Leopold Mayer, Jacob Mayer, J. Micholup, S. M. Lyon, B. Simon and D. Simon. The Orthodox ritual which was originally adopted by the congregation was later changed to the Reform. A small wooden building, dedicated in 1861, was the first home of the congregation; later, in 1889, a substantial structure was built. When this building was destroyed by fire in 1923, the construction of a new Temple was undertaken, and the new building was dedicated in 1928. S. M. Laski was the first rabbi of Beth Israel; among those who held the post in later years were Stephen S. Wise and Jonah B. Wise. Henry J. Berkowitz was rabbi in 1942. The Mt. Sinai Cemetery Association, organized even before Beth Israel, was taken over by the congregation. The Beth Israel School was established in 1867.



The synagogue of Congregation Beth Israel at Portland, Ore.

Congregation Ahavai Sholom was founded about 1867, and ultimately adopted the Conservative ritual. Among its founders were several members of the original Beth Israel synagogue. The first synagogue was constructed in 1869, the second in 1904. Julius Eckman was the first rabbi, and among those who occupied the pulpit later was R. Abrahamson, who served from 1880 to 1884, from 1886 to 1895 and from 1898 to 1922 as both cantor and rabbi. E. Charles Sidney was rabbi in 1942. The congregation had a school, established in 1895, a sisterhood, men's club and other affiliated groups.

With the arrival of immigrants from Russia in the 1880's, the need for another synagogue was felt, and Congregation Neveh Zedek was formed (1889). Its synagogue was built in 1911. Philip Kleinman was rabbi in 1942, and the synagogue followed the Conservative ritual. In 1901 Congregation Talmud Torah, which had been established in 1895, was combined with Neveh Zedek. Congregation Shaarei Torah, an Orthodox synagogue, was established in 1905, and built its own synagogue that same year. Joseph B. Fain, who became rabbi in 1916, was the incumbent in 1942. The congregation had a ladies' auxiliary and other groups. Almost all the synagogues had their own cemeteries.

A Hebrew Benevolent Association was founded in Portland in 1859, a Ladies' Hebrew Benevolent Society in 1874. Early in the 20th cent. there were six such organizations in existence, besides fraternal and social groups. The number had grown to more than fifty by 1942, at which time Portland had within its Jewish community also representative divisions of the various branches of the Zionist movement. The B'nai B'rith building was opened in 1915. Neighborhood House, established in 1903 by the Portland section of the Council of Jewish Women, is an educational and social center. There is an Old Peoples Home and a Jewish Educational Association. Portland serves as the headquarters for the Federated Jewish Societies, which include Oregon and adjacent Washington communities, and is the headquarters also for the Oregon Jewish Welfare Fund. The Scribe, which superseded The Jewish Tribune in 1919, is a weekly publication.

Coming into Portland at almost the very inception of its existence, the Jews entered the merchandising field. One of the earliest trading stores was that of Meier and Frank, founded in 1857. Members of the Frank family remained associated with the store, known (1942) as one of the largest department stores in the country. Aaron M. Frank, a grandson of the founder, was in 1930 elected Portland's first citizen. Another Jew who won this honor was Ben Selling, who was for eight years state senator and was nationally renowned for his philanthropies.

Joseph Simon served on the Portland city council (1877-80), then was a state senator for eighteen years, serving as president of the senate four times, and finally was sent to Washington as a Senator from Oregon (1897-1903). Solomon Hirsch was a member of the state senate, and its president in 1884. David Solis Cohen was a member of the state assembly, and later, from 1896 to 1898, mayor of Portland. Other Jewish mayors of Portland were Phillip Wasserman (1914-16), who had previously served in the state assembly, and Bernard Goldsmith (1916-18). Albert Abrahams, Sigmund Sichel, George W. Friede and Harry M. Kenin were members of the state senate; Henry Blackman and Richard Neuberger were members of the state assembly. Otto Julius Kraemer was a judge in the Portland District Court from 1898 to 1902; Julius L. Cohn was a municipal court judge, and in 1942 became a judge of the county court. Henry Blackman served in the state assembly, and from 1916 to 1919 was postmaster of Portland; Ralph C. Clyde was a member of the city council. One of Portland's best-known Jewish citizens was Julius L. Meier, who was governor of Oregon from 1930 to 1934.

The University of Oregon is located in Portland, and there were several Jews on its faculty, particularly in the Medical School. Among them were Adalbert G. Bettman, Isidor Cherniac Brill, Jerome Leopold Holzman, William Levin, Leo Ricen and James Wendel Rosenfeld.

PORTNOFF, ALEXANDER, sculptor and painter, b. Tomashpol, Russia, 1887. He studied art first in Odessa, then, after coming to the United States (1907), he continued his studies in Philadelphia. In 1912 and again in 1913 Portnoff was awarded scholarships for European study. He exhibited in various cities throughout the United States, and is represented in museums in the United States as well as in Russia. Among his pieces are portrait busts of Sholom Aleichem, Louis D. Brandeis, Carl Sandburg and John Dewey. He lived in Philadelphia.

PORTNOFF, MISCHA, composer, b. Berlin, 1901. He received most of his music education from his father, Leo Portnoff, a well-known teacher of the Stern Conservatory. After concertizing in Europe with his violinist brother, Wesley, he came to the United States (1924), settling permanently and becoming a citizen. He divided his time between the teaching of the piano and composition. He wrote many works for two pianos, including a solo concerto successfully introduced by Bartlett and Robertson in New York in 1937, and many smaller works performed by most of the leading two-piano teams. To the writing of two-piano works he brought an extraordinary flexibility of musical writing, an ability to think of two pianos as an integrated voice, and remarkable harmonic and contrapuntal resources.

Portnoff's concerto for piano and orchestra was successfully introduced by Nadia Reisenberg at a concert of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra conducted by John Barbirolli on February 23, 1940. Other solo works for piano were performed by such artists as Robert Goldsand, Selma Kramer and Bernardo Segall.

Georges de Porto-Riche

PORTNOY, ANTONIO, Argentine writer, b. Dniepropetrovsk, Russia, 1907. He went to the Argentine in 1913 and received his Ph.D. degree from the University of Buenos Aires. His most important study, Ariosto y su influencia en la literatura española, was awarded a prize by the university in 1932. Portnoy wrote also on other aspects of the cultural history of Latin America, and was author of a textbook on logic. Among his work in the Jewish field were collaborations on Maimonides, Judah Halevi and other Jewish scholars.

PORTO RICO, see PUERTO RICO.

PORTO-RICHE, GEORGES DE, playwright and poet, b. Bordeaux, France, 1849; d. Paris, 1930. The publication of his early poetry led to his imprisonment by the government as a dangerous agitator. On his release from prison he wrote his first dramatic success, Un drama sous Philippe II (1875), produced at the Odéon in 1878. The success of La chance de Françoise, produced in 1888, was repeated in play after play, and Porto-Riche soon became known not only as the father of the contemporary French drama but as the most distinguished practitioner of the art.

His works, which are virtually unique in French literature and center around the love motif, tore the mask of altruism from love, and thus restored it to the powerful spring of fate which constitutes the grandeur of classic tragedy. Among his numerous disciples were Henri Bataille, Henry Bernstein and Edmond See. The Théâtre d'amour, a published collection of his plays, includes Amoureuse, Le passé and Le vieil homme, all of which are in the repertory of the Comédie Française. In 1923 Porto-Riche was elected a member of the French Academy. For many years he was librarian of the Bibliothèque Mazarin.

Lit.: Goldberg, Morris, in American Hebrew, Sept. 12, 1930, p. 429; Qui êtes-vous (1924); Lanson, G., Histoire de la littérature française (1926).

PORTSMOUTH, a maritime city in Virginia, facing Norfolk. Its population in 1940 was 50,745, of whom about 1,500 were Jews. Congregation Gomley Chesed, organized in 1892, was one of the three synagogues in existence in Portsmouth in 1942, all of them Orthodox. The other two synagogues were the Chevra Thilim and the Gmelith Chesed. Eugene Greenfield was rabbi of Gomley Chesed in 1942; his service began in 1936. A United Jewish Welfare Fund was organized in Portsmouth in 1941.

Early German Jewish settlers in Portsmouth belonged to the Norfolk Jewish congregations. Among the Lithuanian immigrants who came to Norfolk between 1888 and 1895 were Eler Kirstein, Reuben Berman, Meyer H. Jacobson and H. Goodman.

PORTUGAL, republic in southwestern Europe, with a total population of seven million, of whom about 3,000 were Jews (1940). It was colonized by Jews before it became an independent state under this name early in the 12th cent., created out of a Castilian province under the rule of Burgundian princes. While the Jewish communities in Portugal could not match themselves in number and importance with those in Spain, their economic and social positions were almost equal. They were organized under a stricter state supervision in Portugal than was customary in the Middle Ages. At the head of the communities, from the end of the 13th cent. on, stood the chief rabbi as supreme judge to the government; he bore the coat of arms of Portugal, made laws in the name of the king and was required to travel about the country annually in order to control its judicial system and administration; a judge, a chancellor, a clerk and a messenger of the court accompanied him. There were seven provincial judges in the seven provinces of the country, who were appointed by him and under his jurisdiction. He had to approve of the rabbis of the local communities, while the rest of the community officials were chosen independently.

Until the beginning of the 13th cent. the Portuguese laws granted the Jews the same legal equality as the Spanish laws. However, the succeeding centuries are filled with the opposition of church and population toward the support given the Jews by the crown. The demands of the church were still successfully rejected by King Diniz (1279-1325), and not until Alfonso IV (1325-57) did the influence of the church gain greater power. He denied the Jews the right to take interest; on the other hand, he taxed their properties heavily, and in order to prevent the wealthy Jews from avoiding these burdens by emigration he issued a prohibition against it and introduced the wearing of an identification mark by the Jews.

During the struggle for the succession to the throne in 1383 to 1385, the anger of the people took the form of outbursts against the Jewish treasurers and tax collectors. David Negro and others, who had served the defeated Castilian party, lost their properties to the state and had to leave the country.

In spite of this, the new king, João I (1385-1433), took the Jews energetically under his protection. He prevented the anti-Jewish movement then raging in Spain from overflowing to Portugal, and encouraged the immigration of Jews who had fled from Spain; the Jews who were baptized during the persecutions were permitted to return to their old faith in Portugal. Not until this time did the culture of the Jews in Portugal gain importance for all Jewry. There lived a family in Lisbon named Abravanel which, like other Jewish merchant families of the city, maintained a lively commercial relationship with Italy and Flanders and assisted the state administration with the revenues. The fall of this family on account of alleged participation in a conspiracy against the nobility (1483) also did not change the Jewish situation.

In spite of the increasing aversion of the people and the agitations of the clergy, King João II (1481-95), motivated solely by reasons of state, opened his country to the converted Jews (Marranos) who fled from the Spanish Inquisition and who, in 1492, were driven out of Spain. In 1492 he made the following agreement with the Spanish immigrants: 600 wealthy families received, in exchange for 60,000 gold cruzados, the right to permanent residence in the country. A number of metal workers and armorers needed by the warlike state were admitted for a low fee. However, the majority, upon payment of a head tax, were granted the right of temporary stay of eight months. After the expiration of this period the king would place ships at their disposal for a moderate fee for further transportation. Thus approximately 100,000 Jews passed the Portuguese border. After almost all their money had been extorted from them at transit-stations by the authorities, a great number of them found themselves unable to pay the cost of the continuation of their journey to Africa. Consequently, the king issued a proclamation according to which they were to become slaves and their children exiled to the newly discovered Isle of São Thomé.

His successor, Manuel (1495-1521), followed a wavering policy toward the Jews. In the beginning he favored them. The astronomer Abraham Zacuto played an important part at his court. However, under the influence of Queen Isabella of Castille, whose daughter he married, he issued a decree (December 4, 1496) which ordered all Jews to vacate the country by the end of October, 1497. Since, however, he was anxious to obtain for the state the valuable assets of the Jews he had the Jewish children snatched away from their parents and forcibly converted, over the opposition of his counselors. The adults who wished to emigrate, according to contemporary figures, approximately 20,000 persons, were summoned by him to Lisbon and declared slaves, inasmuch as the fixed term for their departure had expired. He sent them priests to convert them, and had them dragged by force to the baptismal font. Many preferred martyrdom to baptism. But there was left nothing else for the great mass than to surrender, in the hope of a future escape.

Thereby a group of New Christians was formed which was distinguished from the rest of the population more sharply even than in Spain. This group consisted chiefly of merchants, physicians and pharmacists, and there was a smaller group of mechanics, especially armorers, which, however, later entirely disappeared. Soon they entered also the careers of law and administration. The sudden compulsory conversion of the Jews who at heart were still devoted to their old faith made a speedy amalgamation impossible such as could be noted in Spain under the pressure of the inquisition. In the hope of facilitating this procedure the king, in 1497, promised the New Christians protection and freedom from persecution because of their faith for the duration of twenty years, yet prohibited their emigration, which still could never be entirely abolished.

The rage of the nation, agitated by Dominicans, reached its climax in Lisbon in 1506 in a massacre of the New Christians, in which about 2,000 were killed. Manuel now took severe measures and renewed the New Christians' privileges; however, since any other solution of the Jewish problem seemed impossible, he concerned himself, in the last years of his government, with the thought of enforcing the Inquisition. This plan materialized in 1531 under João III, his successor, after frequent negotiations with the pope which the New Christians vainly attempted to defeat by diplomatic counter-actions. After that the New Christians increased their efforts to buy permission to leave the country, which was always granted to them, however, only temporarily. Through the union of Portugal with Spain (1580) they attained the right to emigrate to the neighboring country. Since that epoch the history of the secret Jews in Portugal merges with the history of the Jews in Spain.

The Kadoorie Synagogue at Oporto, Portugal

From the beginning of the 19th cent. on there again existed a small Jewish community in Lisbon. Besides this, there remained at various places communities of Marranos who observed many Jewish rites and whose prayers denote unfailing Jewish origin.

Although they attained religious freedom through the revolution of 1910, they did not avail themselves of this opportunity openly to avow their affiliation with Judaism. Through the endeavors of Arthur Carlos de Barros Basto, himself a descendant of a Portuguese Marrano family, however, numerous Marranos were encouraged to return to Judaism and, supported by pro-Marrano committees abroad, Jewish communities were established in several cities, notably in Lisbon, Oporto, Coimbra, Bragança and Belmonte. A monthly journal, Ha-Lapid (The Torch), founded by Barros Basto in 1927, offers educational material in Jewish history and customs and serves as a common organ of communication among the new communities.

At the beginning of the 20th cent. there were about fifty Jewish families living in the city of Faro, in the province of Algarve. Faro had been famous in previous centuries as a center of Hebrew printing; the first Hebrew book printed in Portugal was the Pentateuch published at Faro in 1487 in the printing establishment and at the expense of Don Samuel Gacon. A number of Jews settled in Faro at the beginning of the 19th cent.; in 1820 they established a cemetery, and in 1850 a synagogue was built.

After the advent of the Nazi regime (1933) thousands of German Jews and in later years Jews from Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland and other Nazi-occupied countries moved to Portugal, the majority of them, however, with the intention of embarking at Lisbon for the United States. The Portuguese press denounced the persecution of the Jewish minorities and denied the rumors that the government was planning anti-Jewish legislation. But after the fall of France (1940), when the stream of refugees into Portugal was about to increase, the country closed its doors to Jewish refugees, excepting only those who had ship-tickets. In 1941 even the issuance of transit visas was discontinued, and a number of refugees, who, owing to the War, were prevented from leaving for the United States or South America, were shifted from the capital to smaller places in the country. In 1942 the Joint Distribution Committee had still its European headquarters in Lisbon.

FRITZ BAER.

Lit.: Lindo, E. H., The History of the Jews of Spain and Portugal (1848); Kayserling, M., Geschichte der Juden in Portugal (1867); Mocatta, Frederick David, The Jews of Spain and Portugal and the Inquisition (1928); D'Azevedo, I. L., Historia dos Christãos Novos Portugueses (1921); Schwarz, Samuel, Inscricões hebraicas em Portugal (1923); idem, Os Cristãos-Novos em Portugal no śeculo XX (1925); Dos Remedios, Mendes, Os Judeos em Portugal (1895); idem, Os Judeos portugueses perante a legislação inquisitorial (1925); Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 4 (1927). Dubnow, Simon, Weltgeschichte der Juden, vols. 5 and 6 (1927).

PORTUGEESCH-ISRAELITISCH SEMINARIUM ETS HAIM. The Seminary, founded in Amsterdam, Holland, in 1637, grew out of a society called Talmud Torah, established before 1610 for the purpose of providing religious instruction. In its early days Ets Haim was an institution of general Jewish education, and its student body consisted of children as well as adults. Among the teachers at the school were Isaac Aboab, Saul Levi Morteira, Manasseh ben Israel and Jacob Sasportas. Its pupils became rabbis in Hamburg, London, the West Indies, Brazil and other parts of America. From 1728 to 1808 the Seminary edited a series of responsa of its pupils, Peri Ets Haim. A collection of these responsa, Otzar Peroth Ets Haim, was published in 1937.

A. van Loen, an Ashkenazic rabbi, was invited to reorganize the Seminary in 1877. He remained its rector until 1888, when Isaac Palache, Haham of the Sephardic Congregation, became its head, serving until 1925. Palache was succeeded by Benjamin Israel Ricardo. The Seminary, in the 20th cent., had two departments; in the lower department students received a high school secular education in conjunction with Jewish studies; in the upper division students who matriculated for the University entered the rabbinical classes or the teachers' classes. Instruction was entirely from the Orthodox point of view.

The Seminary library included the private collection of David Montezinos, bibliographer and once librarian of the institution. He presented it to the Seminary, where it was known as Livraria Montezinos. J. S. da Silva Rosa succeeded Montebinos in the librarian's post. The Seminary, as far as it was known, was still in existence in 1942, despite Nazi occupation of Holland.

Lit.: Gedenkschrift Dr. M. C. Paraira en J. S. da Silva Rosa (1916).

POSEKIM, general name for all the rabbinical teachers after the Talmudic period who drew up codes or who gave a legal decision (pesaḳ) to questions that were submitted to them; in Yiddish they were said to paskenen shailoth, "settle problems." Their activity bridges the interval between the completion of the Talmud (about 500) and the completion of the Shulhan Aruch (1575). Those of the period up to the end of the 15th cent. are usually called Posekim Kadmonim ("earlier Posekim"); those of a later time, Posekim Aharonim ("later Posekim"). The earliest Posekim are the Geonim; among their last representatives was Abraham Danzig of the 19th cent.

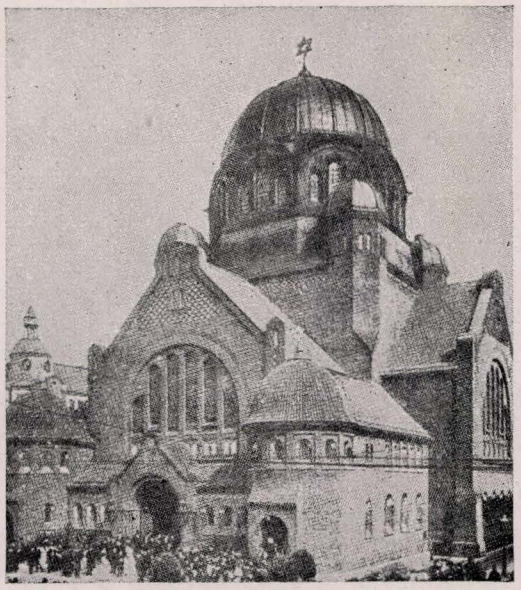
See RESPONSA AND DECISIONS.

POSEN, a province incorporated into the German Reich in 1939; it was formerly a part of the republic of Poland. Jews came to the province in the 13th cent. together with the German settlers in Great Poland, which covered a somewhat larger area than the province of Posen. In 1264 Boleslav, Duke of Great Poland, granted legal status to the Jews and took them under his protection. This was the first historic legal document concerning the Jews in Poland, and became the basis of future acts by the Polish king recognizing Jewish rights. The statute of Boleslav, called also the Statute of Kalisz, was confirmed by Casimir the Great in 1334 and extended to the entire territory of Poland.

However, the later centuries were not free of anti-Jewish outbreaks. Especially in times of wars or national crises, the position of the Jews became very precarious. Thus, anti-Jewish riots broke out during the wars against the Teutonic Order in the 15th cent. and at the time of the Swedish-Polish War in the 17th cent. However, on the whole the situation of the Jews in Posen and in Poland was better than in Germany and in the west. A further influx of Jews into Posen came in the 15th cent., when the Jews were expelled from the various German territories. The settlement of Germans in the Polish cities also brought about a substantial immigration of Jews.

The Jews enjoyed a great measure of autonomy and self-government insofar as their communal life was concerned. The Synod of Posen was a part of the Council of the Four Lands which was recognized by the Polish rulers as the representative body of the Jews in the country and enjoyed large autonomous rights.

In 1772 Prussia annexed the northern part of the province, and in 1793 also the southern part came under Prussian rule. With the short interval between the Treaty of Tilsit (1807) and the downfall of Napoleon, when Posen was a part of the Duchy of Warsaw, the province remained under Prussia until 1918. Under the Prussian rule Posen lost most of its Jewish population, which emigrated to the west. The censuses of the Jews in the province were as follows: 43,315 in 1804; 77,102 in 1840; 40,019 in 1900. By 1931 only 7,200 Jews were left in the province. While at the time of the partitions of Poland at the end of the 18th cent. the Jews formed about 5 per cent of the total population of the province, at the outbreak of the second World War in 1939 they were less than 0.3 per cent. In the 16th cent. the Jews, numbering 3,000, formed nearly one-half of the population of the city of Posen; in 1939 there were less than 2,000 Jews in the city, or 0.6 per cent of the population.



The principal synagogue in the city of Posen, which was desecrated by the occupying Germans in 1939

In spite of the small number of Jews in the province of Posen under the Polish Republic, it was the stronghold of anti-Semitism in Poland. When the Germans occupied Posen in 1939, they expelled almost all the Jews from the province and sent them eastward. The city of Posen became the capital of the Warthegau, which included the former province of Posen plus the city and district of Lodz. The synagogue in Posen was converted into a swimming pool for the use of Nazi party members.

While in former centuries the Jewish community of Posen was quite important, and Jewish communal and religious life flourished there, from the middle of the 19th cent. on a general decline of the Jewish population was evident until the almost complete disappearance of Jews from the province and city of Posen.

SIMON SEGAL.

Lit.: Graetz, H., Geschichte der Juden, vol. 7, pp. 402-3; Bergmann, Zur Geschichte der Entwicklung der deutscher, polnischer und jüdischer Bevölkerung in der Provinz Posen; Feilchenfeld, "Die innere Verfassung der jüdischen Gemeinde zu Posen im 17. und 18. Jahrhundert," Zeitschrift der historischen Gesellschaft für die Provinz Posen, vol. 11, pp. 122-23; Meyer, Geschichte des Landes Posen (1881).

POSENER, SALOMON, historian and writer, b. Minsk, Russia, 1876. He was educated at the University of St. Petersburg. Although Posener left Russia for Paris in 1903, he had already by that time become prominent in Russia as a writer and communal leader. He wrote for Novy Voshod, of which he was for a time managing editor. In France he was editor of La correspondance russe and later of La tribune juive. His biography of Adolphe Crémieux appeared in France, in two volumes, in 1933 to 1934, and was published in the United States in an English translation in 1940. Posener was living in Nice in 1942.

VLADIMIR POZNER (b. Paris, 1905), a son of Salomon Posener, was a critic and historian. He was educated at the Sorbonne and subsequently wrote for periodicals in France and the United States. Pozner's works included: Panorama de la littérature russe (1929); U.S.S.R. (1932); Tolstoi est mort (1935); Le mors aux dents (1937), published in the United States as The Bloody Baron (1938); Les États-Désunis (1938); Deuil en 24 heures, published in the United States as The Edge of the Sword, a study of the downfall of France (1942). He came to the United States in 1941.

GEORGES POSENER (b. Paris, 1906), another son of Salomon Posener, was an Egyptologist. Among his published works were: La première domination perse en Égypte (1936); Catalogue des ostraca hiératiques littéraires de Deir el Médineh (3 parts, 1934-38); Princes et pays d'Asie et de Nubi (1940).

POSHE YISRAEL, see PHRASES, POPULAR.

POSIDONIUS, see GREEK WRITERS ON JEWS.

POSNER, LOUIS SAMUEL, lawyer and communal worker, b. London, 1878. He was brought to the United States in 1882. In 1902 he was admitted to the bar, and entered practice in New York city. Posner was a member of the New York city board of education from 1931 to 1935; from 1935 to 1937 he was a member of the New York State Mortgage Commission. Among his other posts were his chairmanship of the Teachers' Retirement Board and of the Committee for the Relief of Home Owners.

Posner was active in Jewish affairs, acting as a director of the Hebrew Sheltering Guardian Orphan Asylum and also as delegate to the World Zionist Congress in 1920. He wrote for various law periodicals, and was a trustee of the Law Review of St. John's College.

POSSESSION (reshuth). Possession and ownership are two different concepts in Jewish law. The owner of a thing is its real master (ba'al dabar), and enjoys the exclusive and unrestricted right of dominion over it. The possessor, on the other hand, has only actual, but not legal control over the object: he may make use of it and exclude every other party from the use of it. In Jewish law, possession is designated as reshuth, sphere of control; the possessor is the individual in whose sphere of control an object usually is.

As a rule, the owner is also the possessor of the object, so that the ordinary colloquial usage puts both concepts on an equal plane. Very often, however, the owner is deprived of its actual use and enjoyment. In that case he lacks the actual possibility of making use of his dominion over the object; the use belongs rather to the possessor, regardless of whether he actually acquired the object with the owner's knowledge and consent or without it.

There are four groups of possessors with the owner's consent, having control without ownership. These are so-called "guardians," the gratuitous custodian, the custodian for pay, the hirer, and the borrower without pay. Thieves, burglars and those who borrow without the consent of the owner obtain possession of an object against the owner's will and are without claim to legal protection. Possession is acquired by the actual transfer into the sphere of control. Possession effects no change whatever in the relations of ownership, but is ground for increased responsibility on the part of the possessor.

If the owner is not in possession of an object, it is impossible for him, according to Talmudic law, to transfer it to another party; "Nobody can transfer an object which is not in his possession" ('en 'adam maḳneh dabar she'eno bireshutho). From this legal principle is derived the clear distinction in Jewish law between possession and ownership. Thus it is settled that the ownership right to an object obtained by theft or robbery which the owner still hopes to regain and which, therefore, has not yet become the property of the thief can not be transferred to a third party by the owner, because he is not in possession of it, nor by the thief, because he is not the owner (B.K. 70a; B.M. 72). For a valid separation of the priest's dues there must be, not only possession, but also ownership of the fruits (Ter. 1:1). This distinction between possession and ownership refers, however, to personal property only, according to Jewish law; possession of real estate can not be changed without the ownership being changed at the same time; therefore, real estate can not be stolen.

Protection of factual possession is not as strongly marked in Jewish as in Roman law. Jewish law grants protection only when the possessor can bring satisfactory proof that the object in question does belong to him. Possession only affords the possessor the advantage of the legal presumption (Hazakah) that it has been legally secured. One who desires to force the possessor to vacate or surrender what is in his possession must prove that he (the former) has a better right to it (B.B. 30a et seq.). Jewish law, in contrast to Roman law, does not recognize the protection of mere possession; according to Jewish principles, sheer power and mere force without proper legal basis will not be afforded protection under the law.

See also: APPROPRIATION; BAILMENTS; HAZAKAH; PROPERTY. MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Genebah 2:16; Gezelah 9; Mechirah 22:5 et seq.; Toen Venittan 8 et seq.; Arachim 6:22 et seq.; Hoshen Mishpat 140; 209:5; 211; 361; Bloch, Moses, Das mosaisch-talmudische Besitzrecht (1879), section 1 et seq.

POSTAL, BERNARD, editor and public relations director, b. New York city, 1905. He was educated at the College of the City of New York, at the University of Wisconsin and at New York University. He began writing in 1925 for the New York World and the New York Times, becoming exchange editor for the latter newspaper in 1926 and serving until 1928. From 1929 to 1931 Postal was editor-in-chief of the Jewish Daily Bulletin and the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, and from 1931 to 1933 editor of the Jersey City Jewish Standard. He served as managing editor of the Seven Arts Feature Syndicate (1933-38) and of the Jewish Veteran (1936-38). In 1938 he became public relations director of B'nai B'rith, a position he held in 1942.

He edited the B'nai B'rith News from 1939 on. He was also an associate editor of, and contributor to, the Americana department of the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (1939-42). In 1942 Postal was chairman of the interfaith publicity advisory committee to the Church Press section War Savings Staff of the Treasury Department, and special consultant to the Office of Strategic Services. He was also a member of the advisory board of the Bureau of War Statistics of the Jewish Welfare Board. In addition to numerous contributions to the American and British press, Postal published: Jews in World War I (1938); Youth and National Defense (1941); This is B'nai B'rith (1942).

POSTPONEMENT (dehiyah). Due to the peculiarities of the Jewish calendar, and the desire not to have certain observances fall on the Sabbath day, there are several occasions on which festivals or their observances are postponed to a later time. The principal one of these postponements is that of Rosh Hashanah, which naturally affects all the other days of the year that follows. There are four such postponements, as follows: 1. if the onset of the new moon of Tishri is later than noon; 2. if the onset is on Sunday, Wednesday or Friday (on which Rosh Hashanah can not fall); 3. if the onset is on Tuesday in an ordinary year, between about 3:12 A.M. and noon; 4. if the onset is on Monday in a leap year, between about 9:30 A.M. and noon. In some cases more than one of these postponements occurs in the same year, so that Rosh Hashanah is two days later than the actual new moon date.

If the first day of a festival falls on the Sabbath, certain ceremonies are postponed to the second day. The principal one of them is the blowing of the Shofar on Rosh Hashanah. When this festival falls on the Sabbath, the blowing takes place on the second day only in Conservative and Orthodox synagogues (Reform congregations, which observe only one day, ignore this rule). Similarly, the ceremony of shaking the Lulab is postponed to the following day if the first day of Sukkoth is on Saturday. On the other hand, such a ceremony as circumcision is never postponed, even for Yom Kippur, unless the health of the child requires it.

POTIPHAR, court official of Pharaoh who, according to the story in Gen. 37 and 39, purchased Joseph from the Midianites and put him in charge of his household. As a result of the false accusations of his wife, however, he cast Joseph into prison. The name Potiphar is probably the Egyptian Petep-re, "gift of Ra"; he is called saris, which probably is merely a general term for official, and not "eunuch," and sar hatabahim, "chief of the bodyguard." The Midrash and the Koran have elaborated on the Biblical story.

Lit.: The Biblical dictionaries; Ginzberg, L., Legends of the Jews, vols. 2 and 5.

POTI-PHERA, priest of On, and father of Asenath, the wife of Joseph (Gen. 41:45; 46:20). The meaning of the name Poti-phera is the same as that of Potiphar, and the later Midrash has identified the father-in-law of Joseph with Potiphar, his former master; but the Bible regards them as two separate persons.

POTOCKI, VALENTIN, COUNT, Polish nobleman, legendary proselyte to Judaism. He was buried about 1746 in the Jewish cemetery in Vilna. The text of the legend was not printed until 1862 in Johannisburg, Prussia (Maaseh Ger Tzedek); twenty years previously the same text had been published in a Polish translation by Ignatz Kraszawski (Wilna od poczatkow jego, vol. 3; cf. Biblioteka, 1873).

According to the legend, Potocki, who studied in Paris, and his colleague Zaremba became friends with an old Jew there, who taught them the Bible and other Hebrew texts. Both fell so much in love with Judaism that they promised each other to move to Amsterdam and there embrace Judaism. Potocki fulfilled his vow; Zaremba, however, returned home after the conclusion of his studies, and married the daughter of a rich Pole. But he soon remembered his vow; he moved with his wife and child to Amsterdam and became a Jew. Potocki, in the meantime, wandered about his home country as a Ger Tzedek from town to town. However, in Ilja, a small city near Vilna, he was recognized, turned over to the authorities, brought in chains to Vilna and there brought to trial. Because he remained true to Judaism despite tortures he was sentenced to death at the stake and was burned. A Jew salvaged his ashes and buried them in the Jewish cemetery. An immense tree grew upon his grave, to which the Jews of Vilna went in great numbers; some years ago this tree was sawed off by evil hands.

Many historians have attempted to trace this legend, but could not find in the archives any vestige of historical events, although the case is very probable and has several analogies in Jewish history. Alter Kacizne wrote a drama on this theme (Der Dukus, Warsaw, 1926), which was produced at Warsaw in 1925 and later in the United States.

Lit.: Yevreiskaya Entziklopedia, vol. 6, p. 429; Balaban, "Der Ger Zedek im Judentum," Naier Haint, 1925, Nos. 68, 80, 81, 94, 99, 113, 119 and 134.

POTOFSKY, JACOB SAMUEL, labor leader, b. Russia, 1894. In his youth he became active in the labor movement, and at twenty was elected secretary-treasurer of the Chicago Joint Board of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. Subsequently he held high positions in that organization in New York city; in 1916 he became assistant general secretary, serving until 1934, when he was elected assistant general president, and then general secretary treasurer, a post he still held in 1942. Potofsky attained prominence also in the cooperative ventures of the clothing workers, becoming a vice-president of the Amalgamated Bank of New York in 1923, secretary of the Amalgamated Housing Corporation, director of Amalgamated Dwellings, and treasurer of the Amalgamated Investors.

Potofsky became a member of Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia's Business Advisory Committee, and was active in the United Service Organization work of the city. In 1941 he was co-chairman of the drive of the Federation for the Support of the Jewish Philanthropic Societies. Potofsky's writings, besides contributions to the labor press, included the pamphlet John E. Williams, Arbitrator (1930).

POUGHKEEPSIE, a city in New York State, with a population (1940) of 40,478, of whom about 2,500 were Jews. The first Jewish settlers in Poughkeepsie arrived from Germany during the first half of the 19th cent. Among them were Jacob Baker, Isaac Haiman, Herman Hart, Aaron Morris and Solomon Schildburgher. In 1848 the Congregation Brethren of Israel was founded, meeting for the first four years in the upstairs part of a building on Main Street. The same year ground for a cemetery was acquired. From 1852 until 1862 the congregation used the upstairs of the Law Library on Market Street. In 1862 it moved into its own building, which had formerly been occupied by a church. With the acquisition of its own building, the congregation engaged a resident rabbi, Joseph Heilbron. Jerome Unger, who became rabbi in 1935, held the post in 1942. The Congregation follows the Reform ritual and is now known as Vassar Temple. There are also, in Poughkeepsie, several Orthodox congregations; among them are B'nai Israel, of which E. H. Minsberg is rabbi, and Shomre Hadath. The city has local branches of various national Jewish organizations and a United Jewish Appeal division as part of a Poughkeepsie Jewish Welfare Fund.

Among the Jews who have held public office is Ely Lazar Gellert, who was assistant district attorney of Dutchess County. Moritz A. Geiger was head of the department of philosophy at Vassar College in Poughkeepsie.

JEROME UNGER.

POUISHNOFF, LEFF, pianist, b. Odessa, Russia, 1891. He received a comprehensive musical training at the St. Petersburg Conservatory with such masters as Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadov, Glazunov and Tcherepnine, graduating in 1910 with highest honors and several awards. He toured Russia in sonata recitals with Leopold Auer, then as solo pianist. In 1919 he was the first major concert artist to tour Persia, and in 1921 he made a successful debut in London. Following this, he toured all of Europe with outstanding success, receiving acclaim for his interpretative insight. In 1924 he made his American debut, returning the following season for a second tour of the country. His cycle devoted to all the piano music of Chopin, undertaken in 1926, was considered by many as the leading artistic event of the London season, and was so successful that he repeated it one year later.

In 1934 Pouishnoff scored triumphs in Ceylon, Australia and New Zealand. Pouishnoff was one of the first important concert artists to broadcast over the radio; this took place in London in 1923. In 1938 he again proved his pioneering spirit by being the first major concert artist to permit himself to be televised.

POVERTY. From Judaism's peculiar, positive this-worldly view of life is derived its judgment of poverty. It is not glorified as an ideal, as it is in the New Testament, but looked upon as a misfortune or a punishment. The same word, 'oni, signified poverty and suffering. Among the punishments mentioned in the Bible to be visited upon Israel in case of disobedience toward God, the threat is expressed: "He (the stranger) shall lend to thee, but thou shalt not lend to him" (Deut. 28:44). "Let his children be vagabonds, and beg" (Ps. 109:10)—this is to be the punishment of the godless. Not only as punishment, but also as a test, was poverty conceived. God tested Job by making him poor.

Indigence is considered in the Bible likewise as the outcome of laziness and epicureanism. "'Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep'—so shall thy poverty come as a runner, and thy want as an armed man" (Prov. 24:33-34). "He that loveth pleasure shall be a poor man; he that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich" (Prov. 21:17). "Poverty and shame shall be to him that refuseth instruction" (Prov. 13:18). The sad state of the poor man is described by the following precepts: "All the brethren of the poor do hate him; how much more do his friends go far from him!" (Prov. 19:7). "The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender" (Prov. 22:7). The prayer of the writer of Proverbs points to the moral dangers of poverty: "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with my allotted bread; lest I be full, and deny, and say: 'Who is the Lord?' Or lest I be poor, and steal, and profane the name of my God" (Prov. 30:8-9). Material want, however, is not considered by Judaism to be an unavertable lot. "The rich and the poor meet together—the Lord is the maker of them all" (Prov. 22:2). God "raiseth up the poor out of the dust, . . . that He may set him with princes" (Ps. 113:7-8).

Man himself can free himself from poverty. "In all labor there is profit" (Prov. 14:23). If his strength is not sufficient for this, human love must help him. "And if thy brother be waxen poor, and his means fail with thee; then thou shalt uphold him" (Lev. 25:35). "Thou shalt not harden thy heart, nor shut thy hand from thy needy brother; but thou shalt surely open thy hand unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need in that which he wanteth" (Deut. 15:7-8). The social legislation of the Bible illustrates Israel's systematic struggle against human distress. It is intended to prevent impoverishment. In spite of this the Torah declares: "The poor shall never cease out of the land" (Deut. 15:11). Resolute as the Bible is in insisting on the abolition of economic want, it seeks also to protect the human dignity of the poor man and to keep mental suffering far from him. "Whoso mocketh the poor blasphemeth his Maker" (Prov. 17:5). "Better is the poor that walketh in his integrity, than he that is perverse in his ways, though he be rich" (Prov. 28:6); thus the Bible admonishes against the overvaluation of riches.

The Talmudic conception is expressed in these words: "He who must eat the bread of grace of his neighbor, for him does the world become dark." "A poor man is considered as a dead man" (Ned. 64b). Maimonides taught: "Let even a scholar and a man of high position adopt an occupation if he becomes poor, even though it be one of the humblest, in order that he may not have to rely on the assistance of men" (Mishneh Torah, Hilchoth Matnoth Aniyyim 10:18-19). "Let us not have to rely on the assistance of any man," reads a prayer in the grace after meals.

See also: SOCIAL LEGISLATION.

JULIUS LEWKOWITZ.

Lit.: Lazarus, Moritz, The Ethics of Judaism (1900); Moore, G. F., Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era (1927).

POWER OF ATTORNEY (harsha'ah), a special arrangement in Jewish law by which the client (marsheh) gives to an attorney ('entelar) or authorized agent (mursheh) the right to act in his behalf. It is applied only in civil cases, as in criminal cases it was regarded as absolutely essential that both parties be actually present. Even in civil proceedings the admission of a representation was met with serious doubts. The defendant can not, according to the recognized view, be represented by an authorized agent, because he may offer his objections before the court only in person. Important principles of the law of evidence, chiefly the taking of oaths, are applicable only to the accused in person. In this Halachah the idea was undoubtedly decisive that the accused, from a certain sense of propriety, would have less courage to raise deceitful objections in the presence of the accuser than would be the case if he were represented by an agent in the court. The admission of representation for the accused would thus make it more difficult for the judge to ascertain the truth, the real object of Jewish trials. For the same reason, in order to guarantee the directness of the impression, in the examination of the accused and of the witnesses the calling in of an interpreter was to be avoided as much as possible. A limitation of this Halachah is made only in favor of prominent sages, for whom it would be undignified to enter into a wrangle before a tribunal with ignorant people, and also, in favor of noble and outstanding women, whose sense of propriety would be offended by their having to appear publicly before a court (Hoshen Mishpat 7:6). These persons, when accused, it is true, may not appoint a representative, but it is established in their favor that the clerk of the court is to proceed to their homes in order to record their testimony.

The objections which were originally made to the admission of a representative for the accuser were more of a formal nature, in that to these representatives in the trial the accused could raise the valid objection:

lav ba'al debarim didi 'at ("You are not my adversary in these proceedings"; B.K. 70a). Originally, therefore, the accused could not be forced to deal with an authorized agent of the plaintiff. With the increase in traffic and intercourse the lack of the power of representation must have been unpleasantly felt by the creditor, since he was thereby always compelled to follow the debtor personally to the court under the jurisdiction of which his place of residence stood.

However, this must indirectly have led to more disadvantageous consequences for the debtor or credittaker, since thereby "the door of the giver of credit remained closed to the debtors," and this legal condition must have led to increased difficulties in the obtaining of credit. For this reason it was not only to the interest of the plaintiff, but also to that of the accused, if the representation of the plaintiff was made possible in Jewish law. This was effected by the application of the power of attorney, whose task it was to oppose the objection of the opponent to the effect that he was unwilling to enter into proceedings with the representative, as well as also to exclude the possibility of the recall of the power of attorney. In contents this power of attorney was the transfer of the right of a claim or of the object in dispute to the representative through a formal and legally valid act. However, this effected only an external transfer, while in actuality it was merely a power of attorney. Thus it was a question of a so-called fiduciary act, since for the legal foundation of a condition which granted one the power to act as a representative, a fictitious transfer of property was made. After the acquisition of property by means of the grasping of the mantle (Kinyan Sudar) was once recognized, the fictitious transfer of the property no longer presented any special difficulties.

A survey of the development of the power of attorney shows that the formal regulations for this fiduciary transfer of property were facilitated all the more according as the merely trusteeship-like character of the transfer of the property became recognized consciously by the Jewish teachers of jurisprudence. The granting of the power of attorney for contested claims (loans, deposits) and loan claims for the confirmation of which no documentary proof existed was still impossible under Talmudical law, and was made possible for the first time in the Gaonic period by the fiction that every Jew was at least the owner of a piece of ground four ells in size in Palestine, and by virtue of that supposition was able to transfer property in movable objects. Only in one respect did the institution of the power of attorney remain limited during the Gaonic period, i.e. the authorized agent in the legal proceedings did not have the right to demand the taking of the oath by the accused party. This right, a highly personal claim of the creditor, is rather considered to be non-transferable.

The authorization of a partner for the execution of a legal action was unnecessary, since each person who is even partially empowered does not need a power of attorney for the enforcement of the full claim (presumption in favor of silent power of representation; Keth. 94a; B.K. 70a). Similarly, the husband is without further ado authorized to be a representative in a law-suit with regard to the property brought to him by his wife for administration.

The document of power of attorney had to be executed in written form by the client or conferrer of the power of attorney, and had to contain the formula which had its origin in the academy of Nehardea: zil don uzechi ve'appeḳ lenafshach ("Go, bring action and win, and collect for yourself"). If this clause is missing, then the opposing party is entitled, although not obligated, to enter into dealings with the person having the power of attorney. Furthermore, the document, for the protection of the representative, had to contain the declaration of the one who conferred the power of attorney that he would assume all the liabilities which the court should impose, for example the restitution of the costs and the recognition of the judgment. In the power of attorney there is applied in general the principle that the representative had to be of advantage to the one conferring the power of attorney, and that he was not to harm him.

See also: AGENCY, LEGAL. MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Sheluhin, 3; Shulhan Aruch, Hoshen Mishpat, 122-28; Auerbach, Jüdisches Obligationsrecht, sections 48-49; Cohn, "Die Stellvertretung im jüdischen Recht," Zeitschrift für vergleichende Rechtskunde, vol. 36; Levinthal, "The Jewish Law of Agency," Jewish Quarterly Review, vol. 8, p. 130 et seq.

POZNANSKI, GUSTAVUS, rabbi, b. Storchnest, Poland, about 1805; d. New York city, 1879. In Hamburg, where he was educated, he came strongly under the influence of the Hamburg Temple, then the chief exponent of the Reform Movement in Europe. Coming to the United States, he settled in New York, and it was from there that he was called to Charleston, S. C., in 1836 to the pulpit of Congregation Beth Elohim. Two years later he was elected to serve for life. There had already been discord in the congregation on the question of reforming the ritual, and Poznanski became one of the leaders in further efforts toward Reform. Finally the question of the installation of an organ violently split the congregation; the conservative seceders left to form Congregation Shearith Israel, and instituted the famous lawsuit which in the end upheld those who had installed the organ.

The ensuing dissensions of the Jewish community involved Poznanski in persecution and personal slander, but he was in time vindicated, and when he finally retired after thirteen years of service he was publicly honored. He stayed on in Charleston for some years thereafter, remaining a member of the congregation, until he finally left for New York city.

Lit.: Elzas, Barnett A., The Jews of South Carolina (1905) 208-18.

POZNANSKI, SAMUEL ABRAHAM, Biblical and Talmudic scholar and rabbi, b. Lubranice, Poland, 1864; d. Warsaw, Poland, 1921. After studying at the Gymnasium in Warsaw he went to Berlin, where he studied at the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, and at the university. His development at this time was strongly influenced by his friend and teacher Moritz Steinschneider. Poznanski received his doctor's degree from the University of Heidelberg in 1894; three years later he was ordained rabbi, and appointed to head the Jewish community in Warsaw, where he remained the incumbent until his death.

In Warsaw he became a leading factor in Jewish life. With particular zeal he devoted himself to the growing Hebrew cultural movements; he organized and taught Hebrew courses, and supervised the government training school for Jewish teachers. He became one of the early propagandists for Zionism, and a vigorous proponent of that movement all his life. He was a member of the political councils of the Zionist National Organization, and a delegate to the first congress. Poznanski's scientific works deal chiefly with the history of Hebrew philology and exegetics in medieval times, commentaries on the Bible, the investigation of the Palestinian Geonim, the late Babylonian Geonim, the Karaites, and Jewish-Arabic literature.

They include: Mose ben Samuel Hakohen Ibn Chiquitilla nebst den Fragmenten seiner Schriften (1895), a treatise on the history of Bible commentaries and Hebrew philology in the Middle Ages; Tanhoum Yeruschalmi et son commentaire sur le livre de Jonas (1900); Tehilah le'Dawid (1902); Zur jüdisch-arabischen Literatur (1904); Rab Dosa ben Saadja Gaon (1906); Nouveaux renseignements sur Abou-l-Faradj Haroun ben al-Faradj et ses ouvrages (1908); The Karaite Literary Opponents of Saadiah Gaon from the 14th to the 19th Century (1908); Die karäische Literatur der letzten dreissig Jahre, 1878-1908 (1910); Kebutzath Maamarim meeth Abraham Geiger (1910); Al Debar Hayalkut Talmud Torah (1913). In addition, Poznanski published essays and critical reviews in newspapers, collected works and encyclopedias.

The last ten years of his life were spent compiling a bibliographic and biographic dictionary of the entire Karaite literature, a work cut short by his death. A bibliography of his writings and publications, numbering more than 300 works, was published by Edward Poznanski and Alexander Marx in the Revue des études juives (April-June, 1922). In the same year a biography of him by Meyer Samuel Balaban appeared in Warsaw.

Lit.: Poznanski, Eduard, and Marx, Alexander, "Samuel Poznanski," Revue des études juives, No. 74-75 (1922); Poznanski memorial volume, Livre d'hommage à la mémoire de Samuel Poznanski (1927); Tygel, Z., Geshtalten (1928) 19-34.

POZNER, VLADIMIR, see POSENER, SALOMON.

POZSONY, see PRESSBURG.

PRAAG, VAN, see VAN PRAAG.

PRADO (family), see PARDO.

PRADO, ABRAHAM, merchant and philanthropist, d. 1782. He resided at Twickenham, England, about the middle of the 18th cent., and was greatly respected by the townsmen because of his large donations to charitable purposes. His knowledge of gardening was extensive, and he was a celebrated cultivator of the vine. In 1756 Prado became a commissary of the army, and during the first years of the Seven Years' War he was the head of a consortium which was represented with the British armed forces in Germany by David Mendes da Costa. In 1774 Prado became a neighbor of Horace Walpole at Strawberry Hill. Walpole mentioned Prado more than once in his letters, praising his generosity and his horticulture.

PRAEFECTUS JUDAEORUM, title of a Jewish fiscal official at the court of the Hungarian kings, during the years 1482 to 1539. This office was established by King Mathias. Those who occupied this office, members of a family by the name of Mendel, represented the Hungarian Jews at the royal court and were responsible for the payment of the Jews' taxes. They had the right to impose fines upon the Hungarian Jews, and were exempted from wearing the Jew badge. In the sources the title alternates with the title Princeps Judaeorum or Supremus Judaeorum. The title Praefectus Judaeorum is unknown in other countries.

Lit.: Kohn, Magyar Zsidók Története, p. 216 et seq.; Engel, Geschichte des ungarischen Reiches, vol. 1, p. 80 et seq., Büchler, A Zsidók Története Budapesten, 50 et seq.; Venetianer, A Zsidóság Szerverete, 273 et seq., 326 et seq.

PRAGER, BENJAMIN, American soldier, b. Pittsburgh, 1878. His father, Julius, served in the Confederate Army during the Civil War. Prager himself saw service with the United States Army in the Spanish-American War in 1898, and subsequently during the Philippine Insurrection from 1899 to 1902, for which he was awarded the Silver Star medal. He was again on duty in the Mexican punitive campaign in 1916, and, following that engagement, saw action in the first World War from 1917 to 1919. For extraordinary heroism in the World War he was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross; he was recipient also of the Purple Heart Medal with Oak Leaf Cluster.

In 1926 Prager was elected national adjutant of the Army and Navy Legion of Valor of the United States; in that year he published History of the Legion of Valor of the United States. In 1922 he was appointed tipstaff, or court attendant, in the criminal courts of Allegheny County.

PRAGUE, capital of Bohemia and, from 1918 on, of Czechoslovakia; until 1918 it belonged to Austria, as did the whole of Bohemia. In 1942 Prague had about 35,000 Jewish inhabitants.

1. From the Earliest Period (906) to 1918. Prague is the oldest Jewish community in Bohemia, and one of the oldest and most important in Europe. For a long time it was the metropolis of the Jewish settlements in Europe, especially in regard to the number of Jews settled there and the importance of its spiritual leaders and learned men. It is probable that Jews lived in Prague as early as the 1st cent.; however, the first definite historical proof of the presence of Jews in Prague comes from the beginning of the 10th cent., in 906. In 1096 the Crusaders did much damage to the city; some of the Jews of Prague were killed, and the others had to accept baptism, but soon returned to their faith.

In the 12th cent. the Prague Jewish community was visited by the world traveler Pethahiah of Regensburg. A report dating from the year 1124 mentions the synagogue. The privilege granted by Sobeslav II (1174-78) to the German settlers in Prague makes express mention of the Jews.

The first settlement of the Jews in Prague was on the left bank of the Moldau, in the suburbs. After the beginning of the 13th cent. and up to the time of the abolition of the ghetto (Judenstadt; in Czech, Židovské Město), the Jews lived in peace upon their own territory within the Altstadt (in Czech, Staré Město); it was essentially an independent city. The reports are more abundant after the 13th cent.; they tell principally of the persecutions suffered by the Jews, which now occurred rather frequently, such as those of 1298 and 1338. Wenceslaus II and John of Luxembourg often seized their property. When the Neustadt (in Czech, Nové Město) was founded, Charles IV (1347-78) permitted the Jews to settle there, and granted them freedom from taxation for twelve years on condition that they build their houses of stone. From the 13th cent. on there was a Jewish cemetery in the Neustadt, which was laid out at the same time as that in the Altstadt; on its walls were five houses, which were the property of the Jewish community of the Altstadt.

It was at this time that the church began to take a hostile attitude toward the Jews. Although the Prague synod of 1349, presided over by Archbishop Ernst of Pardubice, forbade acts of violence against the Jews, it renewed the anti-Jewish regulations of the Vienna provincial council of 1267. This attitude explains the great attack on the Jews in 1389, which was stirred up by a cleric on a trivial pretext, and in the course of which 3,000 Jews are reported to have been killed. Abigdor Kara, the noted Cabalist, was an eyewitness of this fearful occurrence; his account of it in the elegy "Eth Kol Hatelaah" contains valuable descriptions of the topography of the Jewish quarter of that period, and in particular gives a glimpse of the rich spiritual life of the Jews.

During the Hussite wars the Jews of Prague, who sympathized with the Hussites and were not molested by them, were forced to assist in the work of digging the city moat. In 1421, 1448 and 1483 the Jews were plundered by the Prague mob; in 1494 the diet passed a resolution limiting their freedom to transact business. At this time there began the attempts to expel the Jews from the city; these attempts took place in 1507, 1510, 1517 and 1524.

It was at this period, in which their sufferings were the worst, that the Jews of Prague started the first print-shop for Hebrew books in countries belonging to the German sphere. This was opened up by Gershon ben Solomon Cohen in 1512, and rendered noteworthy services. The successors of Gershon, who were called "Gersonides," kept on printing Hebrew books, with occasional brief interruptions, up to the 19th cent. The elegy written by Rabbi Abraham ben Abigdor, "Ana Elohe Abraham," refers to the expulsion which took place in 1542. Another expulsion occurred in 1560.

In 1562 the Jews were again tolerated under certain restrictions. From that time on there was an uninterrupted censorship of Hebrew books. The Prague provincial synod of 1605 passed a number of new and more stringent regulations, which were intended to make all intercourse between Jews and Christians impossible. Yet Zunz rightly characterized this period as "the golden age of the Prague Jews." Financiers and philanthropists such as Mordecai Marcus Meisel, the Gersonide Mordecai ben Zemah Kohen, and Jacob Bassevi von Treuenberg, who lived somewhat later, provided for the welfare of the community and its institutions. Spiritual leaders such as "Der Hohe Rabbi Löw," Rabbi Ephraim Solomon of Lencziza, Rabbi Isaiah Horowitz (SheLoH), the author of the Shene Luhoth Haberith, and Rabbi Yomtob Lipmann Heller, who wrote Tosafoth Yomtob, and learned men such as the chronicler and astronomer David Gans, made the Prague ghetto a spiritual center for Jewry over several generations.

In 1627, under Ferdinand II, the Prague ghetto was expanded, a thing which had long been desired. As a result of the intermediation of the governor, Prince Liechtenstein, the Jews were permitted to purchase certain houses which were close to the Jewish quarter; these were known as the "Liechtenstein houses." The Catholic emperor also introduced the compulsory attendance of the Jews at a Christian sermon which was delivered every Sabbath. As a result of the proportionately favorable situation of the Jews, which became still better by reason of the privilege granted by Ferdinand III in 1648, foreign Jews began to immigrate into Bohemia, and to Prague in particular; in 1650, therefore, may be seen the beginnings of the endeavors to limit the number of the Jews in the city.

In 1680 the city of Prague was visited by a severe pestilence, to which more than 3,000 Jews succumbed; accordingly, a plan was projected whereby all the Jews were to be transferred from their quarter to the suburb Lieben (Libenj). Shortly afterward, in 1689, the Jewish quarter burned down, and 318 houses and eleven synagogues were destroyed. In 1694 Prague Jewry was set in great excitement by the case of the twelve-year-old boy Simon Abeles, who, it was said, had desired to be baptized and had therefore been killed by his father. Simon Abeles was buried in the Prague Teinkirche (Tynov).

In the following period, up to 1729, there was waged against the Jews of Prague an economic war which had begun somewhat previously. In 1744 Maria Theresa issued an order expelling the Jews from Bohemia and Moravia; this was actually carried out in the case of the Jews of Prague, who had been plundered by both friend and foe during the War of the Austrian Succession. From 1745 to 1748 the Jews of Prague were in exile; after that, as a result of the intercession of influential parties, they were allowed to return, provided that they promised to pay exorbitantly high taxes (204,000 gulden). In 1752 the regulations as to the wearing of the Jew badge were made more strict; in 1754 the greater part of the ghetto burned down.

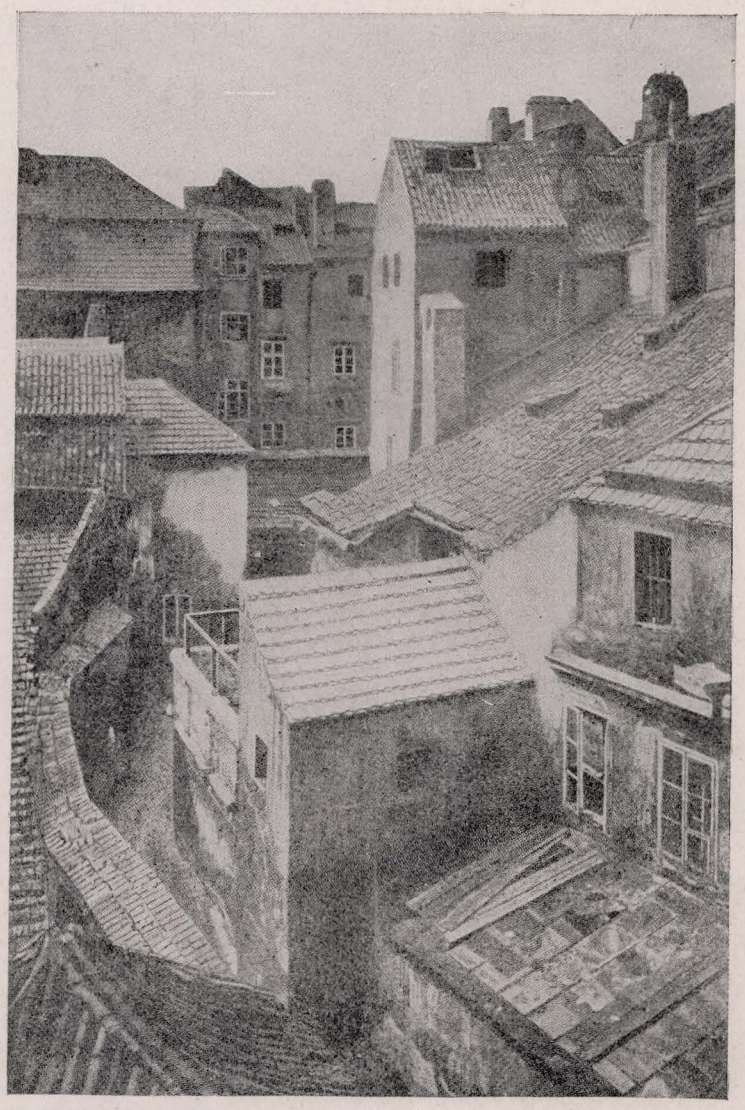
During this mournful period of the 17th and 18th centuries Prague Jewry retained its intellectual eminence. It furnished a welcome retreat to Joseph Delmedigo (d. 1655); its rabbis were Simon Spira (d. 1679), Elijah Spira (1712), David Oppenheim, the great bibliophile (d. 1736), Abraham Postelberg (1746), Jonathan Eybeschütz, Bumsla Meir Fischels (1769) and Zarah Eidlitz (1786). There were several large and exceedingly prosperous Yeshivas; the most famous was that of Chief Rabbi Ezekiel Landau (1755-93).

Under Emperor Joseph II (1780-90), who issued the Edict of Toleration, the Jews became subject to military duty; they were also compelled to establish normal schools, and were required to cease using Hebrew and Yiddish in conducting their businesses; on the other hand, he secured for them many alleviations in commercial life, especially for those who engaged in manufacture.

The first act of decisive importance for the Jews of Prague was the ordinance of 1841, which partly permitted the acquisition of land, and was inspired by a certain liberalism toward the Jews. The next was that of 1846, which provided for a progressive removal of the taxes imposed upon Jews. In 1848 the Jews of Prague received full equality; in 1852 the ghetto was abolished as a separate quarter and was united with the other four "cities" of Prague under the name of Josefstadt (Jozefov). In 1869 the proportion of Jews in the population of the Josefstadt quarter was 53 per cent.

In 1896 a number of alterations were made in the old Jewish quarter for sanitary purposes; the only parts which remained untouched were the Altneuschul, founded in the 13th cent., the old ghetto cemetery, containing about 15,000 tombstones, and the Wolschau (Volšany) cemetery, which was founded in 1680 as a cemetery for the victims of the plague, and was used as a community cemetery from 1786 to 1890. In the course of the last centuries a number of synagogues, such as the Meisel synagogue, the Klaus synagogue and the Hochschule (Vysoká Špola), were considerably altered. The Jewish "Rathaus" (Radnice), founded by Meisel, is the most characteristic token of the Prague Jewish community. The Jewish Museum preserved various mementos and ancient works of art from the Prague ghetto.

The following were the most prominent rabbis and learned men of the 19th cent.: Michael Bacharach,



An alley in the Jewish section of old Prague (right) known as the Shames-Gasschen, photographed prior to slum clearance under the Czech Republic; (below) a glimpse of the old Prague ghetto at the corner of Meisel and Karpfen streets

[For further illustrations see vol. 1, p. 213; vol. 2, pp. 440-41; vol. 3, pp. 439-41]

Jacob Ginzburg, Eleazar Fleckeles, Baruch Jeiteles, Bezalel Rauchburg, Samuel Landau, Ephraim L. Teweles, Samuel Freund, Simon Lasch, Hirsch Teweles, Judah Teweles, and the chief rabbis Solomon Judah Löb Rapoport, Markus Hirsch, Alexander Kisch and Nathan Ehrenfeld.

The intellectual and material development of the Prague Jews from 1848 to the beginning of the 20th cent. was similar to that of Jewry in central Europe. During that time Jews adopted German culture, which was then the dominating one; beginning with the 1880's there were timid attempts to establish an assimilation to Czech culture. The leaders of the German majority group were such men as David Kuh, and at a later period Arnold Rosenbacher, a lawyer and the president of the Jewish community of Prague, and Ludwig Bendiener. The Jews of Prague took an unusually large share in German cultural life, since the German population in Prague was small. German institutions were especially dependent upon Jewish support, and the Jews formed a large percentage of those attending German secondary schools. Nevertheless, anti-Semitism increased toward the end of the century; its chief supporters were those students at the German academies in Prague who came from the provinces. On the other hand, the movement for assimilation to Czech culture started with those Jewish students who came to Prague from the country towns. Its spiritual founder was the author Siegfried Kapper. Chief Rabbi Nathan Ehrenfeld (1890-1912) was succeeded by his son-in-law, the eminent scholar Heinrich Brody (1912-34). SALOMON HUGO LIEBEN.

2. From 1918 to 1942. The prosperous development of the Jewish population of Prague during the twenty years of the Czechoslovak Republic, from 1918 to 1938, was founded on the declaration by Eduard Beneš ". . . in our young republic the Jews will, in the same way as other national minorities, enjoy all minority rights in addition to civil equality."

The Jewish community established itself upon the foundations of the old Jewish ghetto under the administration of such men as Augustin Stein, Ludvig Singer, Gottlieb Stein, Max Reiner and Emil Kafka. A statue of Der Hohe Rabbi Löw symbolically adorned the entrance to the new town hall (Radnice). A number of Jews representing different political sections were in the administration of the city of Prague (Langer, Wiesmeyer, Strauss). Leading economic positions were held by the bank managers Feilchenfeld, Engländer, Otto Freund, Moravetz, Emil Benedict (in 1942 he was in New York city), Leopold Stein (in 1942 he was in Canada), Stutz, and Petschek. Jews were appointed in large numbers as scholars and teachers at the Czech and German universities of Prague, including Arnold and Friedl Pick, Kafka, Spiegel, Arnošt and Oskar Kraus, Ottokar Fischer, Philip Frank (in 1942 he was at Harvard University), R. Fürth (in 1942 in England), Utitz, Löwenstein, Starkenstein, Steinherz, Přibram, Hermann (in 1942 in New York city), Walter Redisch, and Hans Kohn (subsequently of Smith College, Northampton, Mass.). From 1933 on a large number of Jewish scholars, physicians and educators exiled from Germany settled in Prague. Leaders in the press were: Arne Laurin, editor-in-chief of the Prager Presse; Rudolf Keller, publisher; S. Blau, editor-in-chief of the Prager Tagblatt; F. Bacher; Hlavač; E. Münzer.

Many Jews of Prague achieved fame in literature. Among them were the ghetto novelists Salomon Kohn, who wrote in German, and Vojtech Rakous, who wrote in Czech.

Among the poets and writers were Friedrich Adler, Hugo Salus, Franz Kafka, František Langer, Oskar Baum, Max Brod, Rudolf Fuchs, Egon Erwin Kisch, Franz Werfel, Ludwig Winder, František Gottlieb, Richard Weiner, Josef Kodiček, Hostovsky, and F. C. Weisskopf. Some began their career under the Austrian empire; some of them wrote in German, others in Czech. The composer Jaromir Weinberger; the artists Orlik, Justic, Gutfreund, and H. Steiner (in 1942 in New York city); the theatre director Angelo Neumann (1885-1910) and, under him, the conductors Gustav Mahler, Leo Blech and Arthur Bodansky; the directors H. Teweles, L. Kramer and P. Eger and, under them, the conductors A. Zemlinsky and Georg Széll; and the actors Hugo Haas (in 1942 in New York city), Ernst Deutsch and Franz Lederer (in 1942 both in Hollywood) were prominent in their respective branches of art. In the field of motion pictures, Auerbach and Kossek (in 1942 both in New York city); in broadcasting and adult education, Oskar Frankl (in 1942 in New York city), Nettl (in 1942 in Princeton), Fischer (in 1942 in London) and M. Deutsch (in 1942 in New York); in the field of education, the college and secondary school principals G. Flusser and H. Perutz (in 1942 in New York city); in government and politics, the government secretaries and political leaders L. Czech, S. Taub (in 1942 in the United States), Meisner, Winter and Stransky, and the master of protocol G. Guth achieved outstanding positions.

In 1921 there were 31,751 Jews in Prague (16,342 gave their nationality as Czech, 7,406 as German, 5,900 as Jewish, and 1,795 were foreigners). In 1930 33,620 Jews were counted at Prague (among them 17,200 of Czech, 5,700 of German and 8,470 of Jewish nationality). Fifty-one per cent of the Jews of Prague were engaged in commerce, 9.1 per cent in banking, 20 per cent were lawyers, and 8.4 per cent were physicians.

Organizations began to flourish in Prague as early as the 16th cent. Every synagogue had its societies under such names as Baruch Sheamar, Shibeah Keruim, Hebrath Mishnayoth and Hebrath Tehillim; in addition, there were in some cases a Hebrath Hatzoth and even societies for receiving the Sabbath with song and instrumental music. Among the old societies the Hebrah Kaddisha retained its priority and importance; for more than 400 years it gave an example of good work. It also had numbers of auxiliaries.

Philanthropic work was administered by the centralized Israelite Social Service. In addition, the Prague community had the Lämmel Foundation, several orphanages, a home for the aged, the Social Institute and a Hospital Committee (chairman, H. Lieben). The cultural institutions included the Jewish school society which, apart from the religious schools of the community, maintained a Jewish public school with Czech as the language of instruction; the Jewish Museum, one of the oldest institutions of its kind; and the Society for the History of the Jews in Czechoslovakia. The Afike Judah society for the advancement of the science of Judaism was founded in 1896. A number of student societies represented various religious and political opinions. Zionist societies played a great role in Prague under the Czechoslovak republic, in addition to the Svaz Českých Židu (Corporation of Czech Jews). The Beth Haam (House of the People) Society erected a fine society building.

Prague was the seat also of the Supreme Council of the Communities of Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia, of the union of Czech congregations and of the rabbinical union of Bohemia. From 1933 on the Prague Jewish community built up an organization for aid to refugees from Germany.

Jewish periodicals published in Prague were: Rozvoj, the organ of the Czech Jews; Selbstwehr (Felix Weltsch, editor); Židovské Zprávy (Jewish News), the organs of the Zionists.

After the signing of the Four Power Pact in Munich (September, 1938), about 15,000 Jews immigrated into Prague from the Sudeten district ceded to Germany. The anti-Semitic measures adopted by the Second Republic (under Hacha and Beran) under German pressure, including the dismissal of state officials, school teachers and university professors, greatly affected the Jews of Prague. On March 15, 1939, the Germans entered Prague. On the same day, within an hour, all Jews were driven out of the editorial offices of Czech newspapers, and out of the theatres and film studios. Jewish-owned bank accounts as well as safe deposits were blocked; Jews were ordered to give up all precious stones; the transfer of Jewish-owned real estate without official consent was prohibited. Jews were forbidden to enter coffee houses and restaurants, with very few exceptions; they were barred from visiting certain parks and baths; subsequently they were excluded from theatres and moving picture theatres, and a curfew was imposed upon them.

Jews were arrested by thousands without any reason, and sent to concentration camps. An attempt was made to demolish the Altneuschul and the historic Jewish cemetery in Prague, but these attempts were frustrated by the Czech police despite express orders to the contrary received by them from the German authorities. A public exhibition organized by the Gestapo under the general title of "The Jew as an Enemy of Humanity" was widely publicized and used as an instrument to revive the blood libel. A Jewish emigration center was established in July, 1939, in order to force the Jews out of the protectorate. All Jews living in the protectorate were ordered to liquidate their businesses at short notice and to remove to Prague. The non-Jewish public of Prague demonstrated against these acts of violence by visiting the Jewish coffee houses and supplying the Jews with food.

Up to the outbreak of the second World War (September, 1939) about 10,000 Jews succeeded in emigrating from the protectorate; from 1940 on about the same number were deported to Poland and approximately 10,000 more were relegated to the old fortress of Terezin from the middle of 1941 on. A new anti-Semitic wave followed the appointment of Protector Reinhard Heydrich. Although hundreds of Jews were arrested, there were about 65,000 Jews left in Prague in April, 1942, according to a report of the Jewish delegate of the Czech government in exile, Emil Frischer. Following the assassination of Heydrich, more than 25,000 Jews were killed, arrested or deported up to July, 1942. The number of Jews left at Prague at that time was supposed to be 35,000, all in miserable condition. According to a London report of the United Press, only about 15,000 Jews were still living in Prague, in September, 1942.

OSCAR FRANKL.

Lit.: Kopelz, Versuch einer systematischen Darstellung der in Böhmen bezüglich der Juden bestehenden Gesetze (1846); Teige, Prager Ghetto (1903); Bondy, G., and Dworsky, F., Zur Geschichte der Juden in Böhmen, Mähren und Schlesien von 906 bis 1620 (2 vols., 1906); Wolf, Gerson, Ferdinand II und die Juden (1859); Hock, Die jüdischen Familien Prags (1892); Lieben, S. H., Handschriftliches zur Geschichte der Juden in Prag (2 vols., 1904-5); Die Juden in Prag, edit. Samuel Steinherz (1927); Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft für die Geschichte der Juden in der tschechoslowakischen Republik (9 vols., 1929-38); Gold, Hugo, Die Juden und Judengemeinden Böhmens (1934); Kisch, Guido, Die Prager Universität und die Juden (1935); Moskowits, Moses, "The Jewish Situation in the Protectorate of Bohemia-Moravia," Jewish Social Studies (1942); Ripka, Hubert, We Think of You (a pamphlet; 1941 and 1942).

PRATO, DAVID, rabbi, b. Livorno, Italy, 1882. He conducted the Jewish school in Florence, Italy, for twenty years before being appointed to the chief rabbinate of Alexandria, Egypt, in 1927. In 1924 the Italian government entrusted him with a special mission to Tripoli. Prato, an ardent Zionist, sponsored the organization of the Palestine Foundation Fund and the Jewish National Fund in Italy. As a delegate to the Twelfth Zionist Congress (Carlsbad, 1921) he served as private secretary to Chaim Weizmann during the peace negotiations.

The Yeshiva which Prato headed in Alexandria was thoroughly modernized. In 1929 he founded the French and Hebrew periodical L'illustration juive, which was superseded in 1933 by the Cahiers juifs. A record of his work in Egypt appeared in 1933, as Cinque anni di rabbinato. In 1936 Prato was made chief rabbi of Rome, but in 1939 he resigned and went to Palestine, where he became a rabbi of the Sephardic community of Tel-Aviv.

PRAYER (tefillah). 1. Concept. Prayer, as the ethical monotheism of Judaism conceives it, is the expression of child-like trust in God, of submission and resignation to the will of God, and, within certain movements in Judaism, the proper means of union with God. Jewish prayer is based upon the idea of the covenant between God and Israel, the hope in the future deliverance, the feeling of exaltation, and the doctrine of the kingdom of God; it is the intuitive and voluntary expression of that inner connection with God which remains indestructible despite all the vicissitudes of destiny which have befallen or may befall the Jewish people and the individual Jew.

2. Origin and Forms. The origin of prayer was the same in Judaism as in other religions. It was originally a request, asking the deity for deliverance, assistance or the granting of a definite need or desire. This form evolved, in a rather early stage of religious development, out of the customary forms of adjuration. The first stage of religion was that of the belief in demons, and the rite of adjuration was in accordance with such a belief. The petition, on the other hand, as well as other forms of the cult, expresses the belief in gods who were powerful and as a rule benevolently disposed toward man when the conduct of the latter had been worthy. The ancient Egyptians still regarded prayer as a magical act. The Babylonian hymns and prayers were generally bound up with ceremonies of adjuration, and appeared solely as the liturgical parts of magical acts. Brahma among the ancient Hindus was both a word of magical potency and a prayer. Even today the prayer-wheels and prayer-machines of the Tibetans betray the connection of prayer with magic.

In ancient Israel, however, there were only faint survivals of such an original connection, such as the zecher, the name used in invoking the deity, which was the opening word of the prayer (Gen. 24:12; 32:10, Num. 12:13; I Sam. 1:11) as it had been of the adjuration, the designation of worship as calling upon the name of the Lord (Gen. 4:26), and the fact that the prayer was still frequently couched in the form of an imperative (Num. 10:35-36; 12:13). On the other hand, in most ancient times, as evidenced by Homer, the latter appears in by far the greater number of cases in its original form of the prayer of petition. It was only in later times that the prayer of thanksgiving, which stands at a higher religious level, and which speaks of favors which had already been received, becomes a form of prayer side by side with that of petitions. At a still later period we find the penitential prayer, asking God for forgiveness of sins; this represents a further development of the moral consciousness. Both here and in the Babylonian penitential psalms the consciousness of guilt was first felt in connection with suffering and external oppression, and so the prayers express the longing that God may turn away these evils.

Next, as the result of a more elevated moral feeling and a more refined conception of God, it proceeded beyond this and appeared independently as the expression of an oppressing distress of mind (Ps. 130). At this stage in religion, the petition for God's help and favor in the battle against sin comes into prominence (Ps. 51). Sometimes the prayer is entirely content with enunciating the moral ideals that rest on a religious basis (Ps. 15 and 101); sometimes it merely gives expression to faith in God (Ps. 23 and 121) or to submission and humility before God (Ps. 131). Again, following the example of Jeremiah, it portrays the struggle of the soul to resist temptation and doubt as well as to obtain the truth of faith (Ps. 38 and 73).

Like the penitential prayer, the doxology, or prayer of praise, was a rather late form of prayer. The difference between this form and the praise offered to the divinity in the polytheistic stage lay in the fact that the latter nearly always resulted from obviously egotistic motives, while in the former these motives completely disappear. This unselfish praise of God is characteristic of the literature of Jewish hymns which developed so abundantly subsequent to the activity of the great prophets. These hymns arose out of a feeling of exaltation which, in contrast to paganism and its many gods who were by no means always ideal, was necessarily called forth by the assurance of the One, righteous, merciful, holy and eternal God.

3. Divine Prayer Service. In the oldest times prayer appeared only occasionally in Israel; it had its birth in the needs of the moment or in an especial cause. It was only after the destruction of the First Temple (586 B.C.E.) that a regular public and private divine service of prayer began to develop. Although the official sacrificial service was cherished as the precept of the Torah even after the destruction of the Second Temple, the souls of the pious could no longer find a complete satisfaction in it. Beginning with Jeremiah, there had developed a new and more personal relationship between the pious man and his God. At a very early period pious individuals seem to have prayed to God within their homes (Ps. 42:9; 63:6-7; 119:62; 149:5). There is also reference to praying three times a day, facing either toward Jerusalem or the Temple (Dan. 6:11; Ps. 55:18). The bringing of the sacrifices in the Temple, as can be seen from Chronicles, was accompanied by prayers and sacred songs, which little by little assumed a more and more fixed form and arrangement (cf. the superscriptions to Ps. 30, 47, 70, 92 and 100; Tamid 7:2). However, the origin of the divine service in the synagogue seems to have been the reading of the Scriptures, to which were later attached the prayers as they developed. These prayers were arranged so as to correspond with the order of the sacrifices and the times of the day. Little by little this liturgy acquired a more and more fixed form, first in private devotions and then in public, a form which eventually took on a statutory character. Private prayer developed before public prayer; even after the latter had become common, it remained in the public devotions in the form of silent prayer after the congregational prayers.

God is often addressed in prayer as Abinu Shebashamayim (Our Father, Who art in heaven), El Male Rahamim (God, rich in mercy), El Harahamim (God of mercy), Ab Harahamim (Father of mercy), Ribbono shel Olam (Lord of the world), and the like.

4. Evaluation. The Talmud, commenting on Deut. 11:13, designates prayer as the "divine service of the heart" (Taan. 13a). It is often regarded as superior to all sacrifices (Ber. 32b; Tanhuma to Vayera; Midrash Ex. 38:4; Pesikta Rabbathi 198b). God loves prayer, especially that of the pious man (Yeb. 64a); but it must be performed in the right spirit, not as a fixed task that has to be done, but as a fervent pouring out of the soul of the pious man which comes from the heart which is truly moved (Aboth 2:18). The worshipper must feel that he is standing in holy awe before the majesty of God (Sanh. 22a). "When you pray, know before Whom you are standing!" (Ber. 28b). One should enter upon prayer in the spirit of deepest humility and holy reverence (Ber. 5:1), and one should pray only when one has a longing to do so in one's own heart and is attuned to it by reason of a devotional mood (Pesikta Rabbathi 195b; Ber. 3b).

Since everything depends on devotional fervor (Kavvanah) in prayer, the prayer of the pious man is always brief (Mechilta 53a; cf. Ber. 61a). However, there are also other views: There are hours in which one should pray at greater length, and those in which one should pray more briefly (Ber. 35b). Another utterance which determined actual practice more and more, especially under the heavy pressure of the later times, recommends longer prayer, but always under the presupposition that this prayer comes from the heart and that it may have a better hope of being answered because of its urgency and insistence (Ber. 32b). Prayer must be performed, not only in a spirit of devotion (Tos. Ber. 3:4), but also in religious joyousness (Ber. 31a) and in that silent trust in God which brings about the quieting of the spirit (Erub. 65a). Since prayer means the raising of the soul upward to God, the prayer of praise is always superior to the prayer of petition (Ber. 32a; Yer. Ber. ii, 4d; Midrash Deut. 2:1). The hymn of praise to God is always regarded as the highest form of prayer. "If all other prayers cease, the song of praise will nevertheless not cease" (Midrash Lev. 9:7).

In order to obtain inward devotion one should preferably pray in the house dedicated to God (Pesikta Rabbathi 158a; Yer. Ber. iv, 8b). In order to be sure of humility, one should not pray in a lofty place (Midrash Eccl. to 4:17). The worshipper should be dressed in clean garments (Yer. Meg. i, 71a), should pray silently (Tanhuma to Vayetze; Ber. 24b), with lowered eyes and with heart directed upward (Yeb. 105b), and recite the prayers before he begins his daily work or takes his first morning meal (Ber. 14a; 10b). Because of holy reverence for the divine majesty, prayer must not be interrupted in the most urgent cases, unless there be the gravest danger (Sab. 1:2; Ber. 6b). In accordance with the strict monotheism which was the fundamental principle of Judaism, prayer must always be directed to God only and not to the angels or any other intermediary (Yer. Ber. ix, 13a; Yoma 52a). It was only under the influence of mysticism that during the Middle Ages the role of intermediary in prayer was sometimes given to the angels.

5. Posture in Prayer. In the earliest period of Judaism it was customary, both at the beginning and at the end of a prayer, to bow the head, kneel down (Ezra 9:5) and touch the ground with one's forehead (Gen. 24:26, 52; Neh. 8:6). The prayer itself was uttered in a standing position (I Sam. 1:26; I Kings 8:22) or while kneeling (I Kings 8:54). In it one spread forth and stretched out the hands and raised them (Ex. 9:29; Isa. 1:15). This was perhaps the rudimentary remains of an original stroking of the idol. The gesture subsequently disappeared, but remnants of the other postures in worship have survived up to today. In the same way the covering of the head, which was observed by the Romans but not by the Greeks and is referred to in the Talmud as a mark of reverence (Kid. 31a), has been preserved in all Conservative and Orthodox congregations. Prayer was never bound up with a stipulated place; however, in the Middle Ages people preferred to go to the sanctuary which had been dedicated to God. Even today praying in the house of God and with the congregation is preferred to private prayer in one's own home. In this case there are additional underlying motives—the greater degree of devotion, the glorification of God by the community and the promotion of the feeling of fellowship in things religious and communal.

6. Efficacy of Prayer. For that simple piety which has never been disturbed by doubts it is the very essence of belief that God hears prayer; thus the question of the efficacy of prayer is directly connected with the belief that God can perform miracles. The Jewish philosophers of the Middle Ages attempted to solve the problem of how the prayer of entreaty was to be reconciled with the view that the world was governed by reason and in accordance with law. Since they themselves believed in miracles, they did not have any fundamental doubts as to God's hearing of prayer. Bahya ibn Pakuda, the widely read and deeply religious moral philosopher, emphasized the inner effects of prayer—humility, the strengthening of trust in God and the elevation of the soul to God. Like the Jewish Aristotelians of a later period, he makes all ritual of lesser import than morality and sincere religious feeling. Maimonides makes the former inferior to the latter and still more so to the knowledge of God. The followers of Maimonides were even accused of rejecting prayer, and Isaac Albalag actually expressed the idea that prayer is only for the masses. In general the Jewish philosophers agreed with Bahya in paying more attention to the spiritual effects of prayer; this has been the case also in modern Jewish theology. German Jewish mysticism of the Middle Ages regarded prayer as the ascent of the soul to God which was achieved in a state of enthusiasm and ecstacy. It regarded fervent and enthusiastic prayer as the highest expression of piety, and so always preferred doxologies. The Cabala, with its picture of a world made up of a higher and a lower sphere, also speaks of the inner effects of prayer, but emphasizes the magic effects produced within the higher sphere by human prayer. The same was done by Hasidism, which regarded prayer as the release of the soul from the body, the way to highest inspiration and union with God; at the same time, it saw in prayer a force by which pious Jews could exert an influence upon the higher world and thus affect the destinies of men and nation upon earth.

See also: ADORATION; DEVOTION; KAVVANAH; LITURGY; LITERATURE, DEVOTIONAL.

MAX JOSEPH.

Lit.: Elbogen, I., Der jüdische Gottesdienst, 232-44; Ziegler, Die sittliche Welt des Judentums, vol. 2 (1928), chap. 4; Kohler, K., Jewish Theology (1918); Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 164-71; Moore, G. F., Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era, vol. 2 (1927) 212-36; Hodge, Prayer and its Psychology (1932).

PRAYER FOR THE DEAD, see KADDISH.

PRAYER, DIRECTION OF, see MIZRAH.

PRAYER FOR THE GOVERNMENT. In his letter to the Jews who had been carried away to Babylonia with Jehoiachin, the prophet Jeremiah admonished them to pray for the welfare of the city of their exile (Jer. 29:7). That the Jews recited prayers for foreign magistrates is likewise presupposed by Darius, the king of Persia, in the edict in which he granted them permission to continue building the Temple in Jerusalem (Ezra 6:10). Thus the custom was maintained in the Persian period and even later.

The prayer-books, even in the oldest manuscripts, contain a prayer for the welfare of the ruler of the land which was recited every Sabbath morning after the reading of the Torah; the Sephardim recited it also at the beginning of Yom Kippur. In the German and Polish ritual this prayer begins with the words hanothen teshu'ah lamelachim ("Who giveth salvation to kings"). The text varies in other rituals, but the general tenor of the prayer is the same; it consists of a prayer that God may guide the government in ways of justice and righteousness and grant it His protection, as well as a prospect of the Messianic time.

During the 19th cent. many congregations introduced the recitation of this prayer in the vernacular; this was done even in congregations which are otherwise Conservative. After the revolution of 1918 the former Hebrew prayer was no longer recited in many Orthodox congregations of Germany, even though this prayer was always customary in previous centuries in republics such as Venice and Hamburg. Reform congregations, like the Sephardim, also recite the prayer on festivals after the reading from the Torah.

In the Union Prayer-Book as employed in the United States a prayer for the government is placed in the Saturday and holiday morning service immediately after the reading from the Scriptures; this prayer for the government forms the second paragraph of a prayer whose first paragraph is a prayer for the congregation.

Lit.: Frumkin, in Seder Rab Amram, vol. 2, p. 78; Dembitz, L. N., Jewish Services (1898) 217-18; Singer, S., and Abrahams, I., The Authorised Daily Prayer Book (1922) clx-lxi.

PRAYER, HOUSE OF, see SYNAGOGUE.

PRAYER OF MANASSEH, see MANASSEH, PRAYER OF.

PRAYER-BOOKS. Prayer-books in the modern sense appeared comparatively late in Judaism. In ancient times it was absolutely forbidden to note down the prayers. The expression seder ("order") and its derivatives, which are frequently used in the Talmud in connection with prayers, refer to a closely related group of prayers joined together to constitute a uniform sequence. In ancient times the leader in prayer went over the text and the sequence of the prayers in his mind before he recited them, but he was not permitted to make use of a written arrangement; even portions of the Bible which were used as prayers were recited by heart. As the synagogal poetry, or Piyutim, came more and more into use, no doubt in course of time it became increasingly necessary to note down the individual songs; but it was not until the original prohibition of writing down the "oral tradition" had become antiquated, about 500 C.E., that prayer-books were composed and came into general use.

Even after that period the prayer-books did not contain all the prayers, as they do today, but were merely collections of legal introductions to prayers and the most important prayer formulas. The oldest example of such an order of prayer is found in chaps. 10 to 20 of the tractate Soferim. This contains regulations for the reading of the Torah and the Haftarah, as well as directions concerning the most important prayers to be recited on the festivals and other special days. The prayer-books proper are arranged following the sequence of the "hundred benedictions" which, according to a statement of Rabbi Meir which is contained in the Talmud, everyone is obligated to recite daily. They therefore not only deal with the prayers in the narrower sense, but also, like modern prayer-books, contain the benedictions to be said before partaking of anything pleasant (birchoth hanehenin, benedictions for enjoyment), grace at meals, and the like.

The oldest preserved formulation of this sort is the "Hundred Benedictions" of Natronai Gaon; the best-known is the "Compendium of Prayers and Benedictions for the Entire Year" of Gaon Amram, into which later copyists inserted the texts of the prayers which each one of them found in use in his own country. It is striking that both these orders of prayers were composed as the result of an inquiry sent from Spain, which shows that at this time there was no demand for prayer-books in the original seats of Jewish tradition.

The growth of synagogal poetry and the development of deviating prayer-books in the individual countries undoubtedly led to the creation of prayer-books with a complete text. Saadia compiled his "Collection of Prayers and Songs of Prayers" for this very purpose. He gives the rules and individual explanations in Arabic and inserts the prayers, and often the synagogal poems as well, in the corresponding places. In course of time the prayer-books developed into compendia of the religious life over the entire religious cycle, and were called, like the cycle itself, Mahzor ("repetition"). The best-known and most comprehensive of such collections is that made by Simhah ben Samuel of the school of Rashi and called Mahzor Vitry after the home of the author. This book contains the rules, the prayers themselves, an explanation of the text, the scriptural readings for the holidays together with their Aramaic paraphrases, as well as detailed supplements such as the Sayings of the Fathers (Pirke Aboth), the basic features of the calendar, prescriptions and regulations concerning the manufacture of ritual objects, and a large number of synagogal poems, which are divided into groups.

In course of time two sorts of prayer-books came into use. One contained only the original prayers; it was intended for private use and therefore sometimes was provided with a translation; these prayer-books went under the name of Siddur. The others were more comprehensive collections of the original prayers and the Piyutim, and went under the name of Mahzor. At times commentaries were added to both sorts of compilations. Wealthy men and patrons of art had their prayer-books adorned with beautiful pictures, especially in the artistic decoration of the first pages of the various divisions of the service. A number of these magnificently illustrated manuscripts have been preserved. Gradually the amount of Piyutim of every sort became greater and greater; this made the collections larger and larger. In the older period the prayer-books had gathered together a number of poems, from which the leader in prayer was free to make his selection; gradually the congregations began to take a stubborn and paltry attitude and to insist on local usage, or Minhag, so that they singled out those poems which they had chosen for their own Minhag.

As a result of this, there arose in course of time an extraordinarily large number of Minhagim, or rituals, all different and all jealously guarding their own individuality, which introduced a decidedly great diversity into the literature of prayers. The copyists of the manuscripts were usually not experts in their subject, and made frequent errors in the texts by often altering, abridging and garbling the original prayers and the poems. This did not always happen wantonly; frequently enough it was due to the pressure of ecclesiastical censorship and of the Inquisition.

The invention of printing and the migrations of the Jews which took place about the same time checked the multiplying of the medieval Minhagim. On the one hand, the Jews were so scattered that it was impossible to find in their new homes sufficient worshippers who clung to a definite local Minhag. On the other hand, the printers of books naturally sought as great a sale as possible for the products of their presses. Thus it came about that in the course of the centuries only a few of the Minhagim rose to the dignity of print; these were the Italian or Roman, the Sephardic and the Ashkenazic. Prayer-books of other rituals, such as the Roumanian or Roumelian ritual used in the Balkan countries or that for Avignon and certain localities in Southern France, were occasionally printed; but in the long run these won no great support. Still others, such as the Palestinian ritual and the old French ritual which had become traditional in Asti and other cities of Upper Italy, never appeared in print.

The printing of prayer-books produced a certain rigidity in the formerly flexible material of the liturgy; above all, the printers were frequently not scrupulous about exercising the necessary care and employing the required intelligence. Accordingly they transmitted the old prayers, and to a still more considerable degree the poems, in a distorted form. At first the printed books had the same contents as the manuscripts; they furnished the original prayers and the Piyutim, and often the legal introductions; gradually they added commentaries and translations into the vernacular.

After 1560 Cabalistic explanations and injunctions began to infiltrate to an ever-increasing degree into the prayer-books. After the teachings of Isaac Luria had become widespread, there were printed Kavvanoth, words used in concentrating the thoughts at prayer on a definite name of God, and Yihudim, the art and the manner of having that name of God which was best fitted for the occasion appear and be pronounced in the combination of the words of a prayer. From this time on all the prayer-books contain special prayers for this purpose which are interpolated into the liturgy, and are printed in this form in all countries from about 1600 to 1800. Even today the prayer-books of the Sephardic ritual are full of these embellishments which are for the most part based upon superstition.

In the field of the Ashkenazic ritual Wolf Benjamin

Heidenheim rendered great services by being the first to print correct editions of the Siddur and the Mahzor; he freed them from all the artificialities of past centuries and provided them with a commentary which was as thorough as it was intelligible. He has therefore rightly been called the Mendelssohn of the prayer-book. For more than a century his text has been the basis for the prayer-books of Western Europe and the United States. At the same time he prepared a German translation of the prayer-book which was adequate for his time, and in this field he also labored as a pioneer. In the course of the last 150 years the Jews of all countries, sometimes in the face of strong opposition on the part of the rabbinical authorities, have prepared translations into the vernacular and disseminated them through printing. Seligmann Baer sought to produce a critical edition of the prayer-book; similarly, a number of scholars have come forward with more or less scientific commentaries. In the 20th cent. A.L. Frumkin published an extraordinarily learned, though uncritical, commentary on the prayer-book.

The Reform prayer-books, the first of which was the Hamburg Prayer-Book (1818), were a new phenomenon in the liturgy. These prayer-books have aimed to bring the ritual into harmony with the aesthetic and intellectual standards of the time. Although the various Reform prayer-books have differed greatly from each other, they have a common tendency. Generally, they have shortened the service and supplanted a number of the Hebrew prayers with paraphrases in the vernacular. The changes have not been merely aesthetic, but have also been based upon definite theological ideas. The prayers for the coming of a personal Messiah have been supplanted by prayers expressing a hope for the coming of a Messianic age. Petitions for a return to Palestine and for a restoration of the sacrificial cult have been omitted. Prayers expressing the belief in a bodily resurrection have been replaced by prayers voicing the hope in the immortality of the soul. From the liturgical point of view, the traditional division between the morning service (Shaharith) and the additional service (Musaf) has been given up, and a single service is based upon component parts of both. Most of the Piyutim have been omitted. In most Reform prayer-books the Hazkarath Neshamoth, the prayer in memory of the dead recited on the last days of the three festivals and on Yom Kippur, has been concentrated into one enlarged Memorial Service in the afternoon of Yom Kippur.

In the United States the various Reform prayer-books such as the Wise Minhag America, the Szold-Jastrow Abodath Yisroel, and the Einhorn Olat Tamid, have been gradually supplanted by the Union Prayer-Book published by the Central Conference of American Rabbis, which is now used by over 300 congregations.

In addition to the Siddur and the Mahzor for the whole year, there were also, even as early as the period of manuscript tradition, special collections for separate occasions. Thus Kinoth, Selihoth, or the prayers for Purim were written down and printed separately. In the Lurian period there appeared the Tikkunim for special occasions, and especially at that time in Italy and the Orient countless booklets appeared with prayers and songs for all conceivable occasions.

The prayer-books of the Karaites originally and almost exclusively contained psalms and prayers composed of Biblical passages. However, at a very early period these too admitted Piyutim as well and thus came to have an extremely rich content. The Karaites also have brief prayer-books after the manner of the Siddur, and prayer-books in several volumes and very rich in content after the manner of the Mahzor. The latter are greatly amplified by Piyutim, which are taken over at random both from Karaite and Rabbinite sources. The Samaritans also have adopted many Piyutim.

ISMAR ELBOGEN.

Lit.: Dembitz, L., Jewish Services (1898) 15-56; Singer, S., and Abrahams, I., The Authorised Daily Prayer Book (1922) i-iv; Elbogen, I., Der jüdische Gottesdienst (2nd ed., 1931); "The Union Prayer-Book; A Symposium," Central Conference of American Rabbis Year Book, vol. 40 (1930) 251-303; Eisenstein, J. D., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 171-80.

PRAYER SHAWL, see TALLITH.

PRAYERS, SPECIAL. During the course of the religious year special prayers are recited on various occasions in the synagogue at stated times. Some of these special prayers are:

1. The Prayer for Rain (tefillath geshem). In the Orient, the growth of the new crops is utterly dependent on a sufficient rainfall in the autumn. For this reason the Jews prayed for rain in their daily prayers. This prayer for rain was begun at different seasons in Palestine and in Babylonia, according to the individual needs of the land. In addition, perhaps as early as in the pre-Christian times, such prayers emphasized God's omnipotence, as expressed in the rain, in the Eighteen Benedictions (Shemoneh Esreh) which was recited daily beginning with Shemini Atzereth (the Feast of Conclusion, the eighth day of Sukkoth). On this day then a Piyut was inserted into the beginning of the Tefillah telling of the importance of the rain, and solemnly introducing the formula Mashib Haruah ("He Who Causes the Wind to Blow"). Many poets utilized this material for elaborations and variations, the best-known of whom was Eliezer Kalir. Kalir's poetry presents a grandiose picture of the significance of rain in nature and in the history of Israel. In the treatment of the theme there are reminiscences of very ancient myths which connect the creation and water.

2. The Prayer for Dew (tefillath tal). As for rain, so too, in Palestine, was it necessary to pray for dew. For this reason, in Palestine, both in winter and in summer, the formula Mashib Haruah Umorid Hatal ("He Who Causes the Wind to Blow and the Dew to Fall") was inserted into the Eighteen Benedictions. On the first day of Pesach, when this formula is first begun, it is introduced by several poetical portions. Those poetical creations, found in the German-Polish Mahzor and composed by Kalir, treat, as do those for rain, the importance of the dew for nature and for the history of Israel. Only incomplete portions of these poetical pieces are preserved in the prayer-books.

3. The Prayer for a Journey (tefillath haderech), to be recited by a Jew before or at the commencement of a journey of at least one and one-quarter hours from his home. This prayer is a very old one; with slight variations, it is found as early as in the Talmud. If the journey is a dangerous one, the prayer closes with a benediction. The prayer for a journey requests aid and protection from God, and mentions the wonders which were performed for the ancestors of Israel while they were journeying or when they were in danger. The Priestly Blessing (Birkath Hakohanim) forms its conclusion.

Lit.: Elbogen, I., Der jüdische Gottesdienst, 214-15, 550; idem, Die Wallfahrtsfeste (1929), appendix; Hebrew Union College Annual, vol. 3 (1926) 215 et seq.; Baer, Seligman, Seder Abodath Israel (1868) 580-81; Meah Berachoth (containing the texts of all special prayers).

PRAYER-STRAPS, see PHYLACTERIES.

PREACHING, the delivery of sermons or homilies during divine services. The oldest expressions for preaching are limmed, "to teach," hebin, "to cause to understand," and higgid, "to relate"; in later times the usual term is darash, "to interpret the Scriptures."

The earliest preachers in Israel were the prophets. However, their speeches differ from the true sermon by reason of their shorter and often poetic form, their ecstatic origin and their direct inspiration. Priests and sages gave religious speeches on certain occasions, of which the opening chapters of Deuteronomy and Proverbs furnish examples.

When prophecy ceased after the death of Ezra, the reading of the Scriptures and the explanation that accompanied it became the rule. The true sermon developed out of such expositions of the Scriptures in the vernacular, which it expanded independently; thus the sermon became an artistic structure after the manner of the Greek address. Although anyone was permitted to preach, nevertheless from the 2nd cent. on there were professional preachers who spoke while seated on elevated chairs in the synagogues (Luke 4:20). One of the most important of such preachers was Ben Zoma (Sotah 9:15).

In the period of the Amoraim (200-500) the preacher was called hacham, "wise man." In Babylonia he did not usually deliver the sermon himself, but communicated his ideas briefly and in a low voice to the speaker (Amora; Meturgeman), who expanded them in a loud tone of voice and often to an immoderate length. The preacher delivered his sermons in the house of prayer or the house of study, on Sabbaths, festivals and fast days. Although he did not confine himself to a single theme, he dwelt mainly on fidelity to the Law and steadfastness in suffering. The funeral oration (hesped) was delivered by the funeral orator (sapdana), and might be given in the house of prayer, the house of study, the house of mourning, or at the cemetery.

After 200 C.E. there arose in Palestine a class of preachers called "Masters of Sermons" (Rabbanan de 'Aggadata or Baale 'Aggada), who were known for their preaching ability. In addition to the customary themes, they indulged in polemics against the rising sect of Christianity and against the minim ("heretics"). Tanhuma, the last important member of this class, was also the first to make literary collections of sermons.

Among the Jews of the Occident the institution of preaching spread to such an extent that Christians came to listen, and Church Fathers even imitated them (Dubnow, S., Weltgeschichte des jüdischen Volkes, vol. 3, section 41).

In the course of time, Jewish preaching gradually declined, however, and finally the "singing Meturgeman," as Zunz calls him, gave the sermon its death blow by preparing the way for the Piyut (poetical insertion); for centuries this replaced the sermon. The last height of preaching was reached by the author of Tanna Debe Eliyahu, a migratory preacher who lived about 975.

Preaching reached its nadir in the first rabbinic period, especially in France and Germany. Although Moses of Narbonne and his son Judah (11th cent.) had the honorary title hadarshan, it probably indicated either that they were rare exceptions or that they were learned in Midrash. The only speakers who achieved fair renown were Moses ben Jacob of Coucy and Jacob ben Moses Mölln (Maharil) at the end of this period.

Beginning with the 13th cent. a new type of preaching developed, which based the sermon on a true text and utilized the Midrash only as an ornament. This style of preaching is exemplified in Jacob Anatolio's Malmad Hatalmidim, in the writings of Nahmanides and Nissim Gerondi of Rome, in the Kad Hakemah of Bahya ben Asher, and in the Menorath Hamaor of Isaac Aboab. This second period flourished through the 17th cent. in Spain and in the countries to which the Jews fled when expelled from Spain in 1492.

The first Hebrew book on homiletics was written by Joseph ibn Shemtob (En Hakore, about 1450). This was followed by Messer Leon's book on rhetoric, Nofeth Tzufim (about 1470), and by other works of a similar nature. The following are the most prominent of a large number of preachers: in Spain, Isaac Arama (b. 1420), author of Akedath Yitzhak; in Italy, Jacob ben Hananeel Sekili, author of Terumath Haminhah; Judah Moscato (16th cent.), author of Nefutzoth Yehudah; Azariah Figo (or Piccio; 16th cent.), author of Binah Laittim; in Turkey, Solomon ben Isaac Levi, author of Dibre Shelomoh; Moses Almosnino, author of Meammetz Koah; and Moses Alshech.

Beginning with the 17th cent., there were "Portuguese" Jewish preachers in England and Holland, including Manasseh ben Israel, who wrote 450 sermons; Isaac Aboab III, who wrote 886 sermons; and the Spinozist David Nieto in London. Such sermons, delivered in the vernacular, were generally printed in Hebrew. As a rule, the rabbi was the preacher; he received a special honorarium, and his ability as a speaker was considered at the time of his election.

The sermon did not reach such a development in either Germany or Poland. Nevertheless, beginning with the 17th cent. there were some preachers who gave fine sermons, especially rabbis in the larger communities who were called darshanim. In later times the title darshan was reserved only for the rabbi delivering the Halachic sermon, which was generally held on the Sabbaths before Passover and Yom Kippur, while the moral preacher was called mochiah ("admonisher") or maggid ("narrator").

A group of powerful preachers arose, the most famous of whom were: in Germany, Jonathan Eybeschütz (b. 1690), author of Yaaroth Debash, and Meir Eisenstadt; in Austria, Eleazar Fleckeles, author of Olath Hodesh; the three Prague preachers, Hayim ben Bezalel, author of Sefer Hahayim, Judah Löw ben Bezalel, author of Beer Hagolah, and Ephraim Solomon of Lencziza, probably the best Northern European preacher of his time and author of Oleloth Efrayim; in Poland, Zebi Hirsch Waidislow and Jacob ben Wolf Kranz of Dubno ("the Dubner Maggid"), author of Ohel Yaakob. The latter two, as well as many other Maggidim, were especially famous for their parables taken from every-day life.

With the introduction of German into Jewish life by Moses Mendelssohn, the sermon began a third period of ascendancy. Mendelssohn himself wrote three sermons which were read aloud in the Berlin synagogue by the rabbi. Joseph Wolf of Dessau, the first to deliver a sermon in German which he himself had written (1806), was followed by a number of men who introduced the sermon into the services: Israel Jacobson, Isaac Levin Auerbach, Leopold Zunz, Eduard Kley and Gotthold Salomon. Later classic preachers arose, such as Isaac Bernays, Isaac Noah Mannheimer, Ludwig Philippson, Solomon Plessner, Samson Raphael Hirsch, Michael Sachs, Samuel Holdheim, Abraham Geiger, Manuel Joel, Adolf Jellinek and Sigmund Maybaum.

See also: HAGGADAH; MAGGID; MIDRASH; MINIM; SERMON.

LEONARD A. GREENBERG.

Lit.: Bäck, S., in Winter, Jakob, and Wünsche, August, Die jüdische Literatur seit Abschluss des Kanons, vol. 2 (1892) 614 et seq.; Kayserling, M., ibid., vol. 3 (1892) 772 et seq.; Freudenthal, J., Die Flavius Josephus beigelegte Schrift (1869); Graetz, H., History of the Jews, vol. 3 (1927) 164 et seq.; Gunkel, in Gressmann, Schriften des Alten Testaments, vol. 2, part 2, p. lxiv et seq.; Haller, ibid., vol. 2, part 3; Zunz, Leopold, Die gottesdienstlichen Vor- träge der Juden (1832) 324, 429, 433; Waxman, Meyer, A History of Jewish Literature, vol. 3 (1936) 735-57; Bettan, Israel, Studies in Jewish Preaching (1939).

PRECEDENCE. The question of precedence arises in Jewish law in the discussion of conflicting claims, particularly in the case of debt and the judgment to be executed upon the debtor. The Mishnah (Keth. 9:2-3) takes up the question of the conflicting claims of such persons as the wife, the ordinary creditors and the heirs to an estate. According to Tarfon, preference is to be given to the person who has the greatest need of the money; Akiba, however, gives precedence to the heirs, since these can receive their inheritance immediately after death without taking the oath required of the wife and the ordinary creditors (Keth. 84a et seq.).

The Mishnah (Keth. 10:4-5) further goes on to give an exact order of precedence for the case when a deceased husband has left several widows, all of whom have claims to their marriage portions. The general principle is that the claim (the sum provided in the Kethubah) which is earliest in point of time receives the preference, even though the difference in time be but a single hour. Thus it is stated that documents of debt written in Jerusalem were dated not only by the day but by the actual hour, in order that it might be possible to establish precedence on a basis of time for debts contracted on the same day. If the exact times can not be determined, it is the view of Rab that the assets must be prorated among the creditors, but Samuel holds that it is to be decided by the opinion of the judges (Keth. 94a et seq.).

A similar question arises in case of a catastrophe in which several related persons die, and it has to be determined which of them died first, in order to determine the question of inheritance. This question is taken up in the Mishnah (B.B. 9:9), where different views are expressed. Shammai is in favor of dividing the inheritance; Hillel holds that the property must pass to the most likely heir, and it is his unless a rival heir can prove that his own right to the property is justified.

The question of precedence arises also in Jewish custom in matters outside of the law. Thus in the reading of the Law precedence is given first to the priest, then to the Levite, before calling on Israelites to recite the benedictions. The same order is preserved in the case of conflicting claims of captives to be ransomed; in the case of the family, precedence is given to the mother over all the others, and to a teacher over a father; in general, women are given precedence over men when captives. There is also an interesting case of precedence in the provision of clothing for a family: a man should dress his children better than he can afford to, his wife as much as he can afford, and himself less than he can afford.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Ishuth 17; Hilchuth Malveh Veloveh 18 et seq.; Shulhan Aruch, Eben Haezer 102; Hoshen Mishpat 107 et seq.; Baneth, E., "Soziale Motive in der rabbinischen Rechtspflege," Festschrift der Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums zum 50 jährigen Bestehen (1922).

PRECEPTS, THE 613 (Hebrew, taryag mitzvoth; the numerical value of the letters of TaRYaG is 613). According to an old tradition going back to the Tannaitic period (Mechilta, Yithro, Bahodesh; Sifre, Deut. 76), a well-known saying of the Haggadist Simlai (3rd cent. C.E.) begins with these words: "613 commandments were revealed to Moses, 365 prohibitions, equal to the number of the days of the astronomical year, and 248 commands, equal to the number of the members of the human body" (Mak. 23b). The parallels named for the numbers 365 (SheSaH) and 248 (ReMaH) are supposed, according to Judah ben Simeon, to say as follows: Every day speaks thus to the human being: "I pray you, do not transgress this prohibition on me!" And every member speaks thus to the human being: "I beg of you, fulfill this commandment through me!" (Pesikta 101a; Tanhuma, Ki Thetze 2, edit. Buber).

A specific array of the 613 commandments and prohibitions was not handed down from the Mishnaic-Talmudical period. Such an enumeration was presented first by Simon Kahira (8th cent. C.E.) in his work Halachoth Gedoloth. His example was followed by Saadia, Ibn Gabirol, and synagogal poets in their Azharoth. In his Sefer Hamitzvoth (Book of the Commandments) Maimonides rejected the method in accordance with which his predecessors had proceeded as uncritical and set up fourteen guiding principles which he made the basis for his enumeration. Nahmanides, again, opposed Maimonides critically, and he, Moses ben Jacob of Coucy, and Isaac ben Joseph of Corbeil (13th cent.) for this reason made arrangements which often differed from Maimonides and also from each other. In the following list of Maimonides groups of laws are comprised under separate headings in order to facilitate their perspective.

The List of Maimonides with the Biblical Sources.

I. The 248 Positive Commandments.

God

1. Acknowledgment of the existence of God, Ex. 20:2.
2. Acknowledgment of the unity of God, Deut. 6:4.
3. Love of God, Deut. 6:5.
4. Fear of God, Deut. 6:13.
5. Prayer, Ex. 23:25.
6. Adherence to God, Deut. 10:20.
7. Swearing by the name of God, Deut. 6:13; 10:20.
8. Walking in the ways of God, Deut. 28:9.
9. Hallowing of the name of God (Kiddush Hashem), Lev. 22:32.

Prayer and the Torah

10. Daily reading of the Shema in the morning and in the evening, Deut. 6:7.
11. Learning and teaching the Torah, Deut. 6:7.
12.-13. The laying of the phylacteries (Tefillin) on the head and the hand, Deut. 6:8.
14. The making of the fringes (Tzitzith), Num. 15:38.
15. The making of the door-post inscription (Mezuzah), Deut. 6:9.
16. Assembling of the people for the reading of the Torah at the end of each year of release, Deut. 31:10-13.
17. The making of a copy of the Torah for himself by each person, Deut. 31:19.
18. The making of a copy of the Torah for himself by the king, Deut. 17:18.
19. Prayer of thanksgiving after the meal, Deut. 8:10.

Temple and Priests

20. Building of a sanctuary, Ex. 25:8.
21. Reverence for the sanctuary, Lev. 19:30.
22. The charge of the sanctuary, Num. 18:1-3.
23. The service of the Levites in the sanctuary, Num. 18:23.
24. The ablutions of the priests in the service, Ex. 30:19-20.
25. Lighting of the lights (Hadlakah) in the sanctuary by the priests, Ex. 27:20-21.
26. Blessing of the people by the priests, Num. 6:23.
27. The showbread and incense every Sabbath, Ex. 25:30.
28. Offering of incense every morning and evening, Ex. 30:7-8.
29. The continual keeping up of the fire on the altar, Lev. 6:6.
30. Removing the ashes from the altar, Lev. 6:3.
31. Removal of the unclean from the sanctuary, Num. 5:2.
32. The holy position of the priests, Lev. 21:6, 8.

33. Clothing of the priests in special garments, Ex. 28:2.
34. The bearing of the Ark of the Covenant by the sons of Kohath on their shoulders, Num. 7:9.
35. Anointing of the high-priests and kings, Ex. 30:30.
36. The order of the priestly service according to divisions, Deut. 18:6-8.
37. Defilement of the priests through the bodies of their relatives, Lev. 21:2-3.
38. Obligation of the high-priest to take only a virgin to wife, Lev. 21:13.

Sacrifices and Festivals

39. Daily morning and evening sacrifice, Num. 28:3-4.
40. Daily meal-offering by the high-priest, Lev. 6:13.
41.-43. Additional offering (Musaf) on the Sabbath, New Moon, and the festival of Passover, Num. 28:9, 11; Lev. 23:8.
44. Offering of the sheaves (Omer) on the second day of Passover, Lev. 23:10.
45. Additional offering on the Feast of Weeks (Shabuoth), Num. 28:26.
46. Two wave-loaves among the offerings of this festival, Lev. 23:17.
47. Additional offering on the 1st of Tishri, Lev. 23:25; Num. 29:2.
48. Additional offering on the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), Lev. 23:27; Num. 29:8.
49. Service of the high-priest on the Day of Atonement, Lev. 16:3.
50. Additional offering on the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkoth), Lev. 23:36; Num. 29:13.
51. Additional offering on the Feast of Conclusion (Shemini Atzereth), Lev. 23:36; Num. 29:36.
52. Celebration of the three pilgrimage festivals, Ex. 23:14.
53. Making of pilgrimages by all the males on these three festivals, Ex. 23:17.
54. Rejoicing on the Feast of Tabernacles, Deut. 16:14.
55. Slaughtering of the paschal offering, Ex. 12:6.
56. The eating of it on the night of the 15th of Nisan, Ex. 12:8.
57. Celebration of the second Passover (Pesach Sheni), Num. 9:11-13.
58. Eating of the second Passover offering with unleavened bread (Matzah) and bitter herbs (Maror), Num. 9:11.
59. Blowing with trumpets over sacrifices and general need, Num. 10:10.
60. Selection of sacrificial animals at least eight days old, Lev. 22:27.
61. Faultlessness and freedom from blemish of all sacrificial animals, Lev. 22:21.
62. Salting of all sacrifices, Lev. 2:13.
63. The law of the burnt-offering, Lev. 1; 6:1-5.
64-67. The law of the sin-offering, guilt-offering, peace-offering, and meal-offering, Lev. 2 to 7.
68. Offering of a community because of a sin committed through error, Lev. 4:13.
69. Offering of an individual because of a sin committed through error, Lev. 4:27.
70. Offering because of uncertainty whether one has become guilty of a trespass against the law, Lev. 5:17-18.
71. Offering for offenses committed through inadvertence or an error from haste, Lev. 5:15.
72. Variety of the guilt-offerings in accordance with one's means, Lev. 5:7, 11.
73. Confession of sin (Viddui) at the presentation of the guilt-offering, Num. 5:7.
74-75. The offering of a man or woman suffering from an issue after their cleansing, Lev. 15:13-15, 28-30.
76. The offering of the leper after his cleansing, Lev. 14:10.
77. The offering of a woman who has given birth, after her purification, Lev. 12:6.
78. Tithing of animals, Lev. 27:32.
79. Sanctification of the first-born of clean animals, Deut. 15:19.
80. Redemption of the first-born of man (Pidyon Haben), Num. 18:15.
81-82. Redemption of the first-born of asses or the killing thereof, Ex. 34:20.
83. The offering of every sacrifice of the individual at the next festival, Deut. 12:5-6.
84. The presentation thereof at the chosen place, Deut. 12:14.
85. The bringing in of the offerings likewise from foreign parts to the chosen place, Deut. 12:26.
86. Redeeming of offerings with blemishes, Deut. 15:21.
87. Holiness of changed offerings, Lev. 27:33.
88. Appointment of the remnant of the meal-offerings for the priests, Lev. 6:9.
89. Eating the flesh of sin- and guilt-offerings, Ex. 29:33.
90. Burning of defiled sacrificial flesh, Lev. 7:19.
91. Burning of the remnant of the flesh of the sacrifice on the third day, Lev. 7:17.

Vows

92-93. The obligation of the Nazirite to let his hair grow and to have it cut off at the end of his Naziriteship or in case of defilement, Num. 6:5, 9.
94. The keeping of a vow, Deut. 23:24.
95. The law regarding release from vows, Num. 30.

Laws of Purification

96. Uncleanliness of everything which touches a carcass, Lev. 11:39.
97. Uncleanness of the eight small animals mentioned in Lev. 11:29-30.
98. Defiling of food through contact with unclean things, Lev. 11:34.
99. Uncleanness of a woman in menstruation, Lev. 15:19.
100. Uncleanness of a woman in child-birth, Lev. 12:2.
101. Uncleanness of the leper, Lev. 13:3.
102-103. Uncleanness of clothing and of houses, Lev. 13:47-52; 14:33-47.
104. Uncleanness of the flow of seed, Lev. 15:2-18.
105. Uncleanness of the discharge of seed, Lev. 15:16.
106. Uncleanness of a woman with an issue of blood, Lev. 15:19.
107. Defilement through a human corpse, Num. 19:14.
108. Law regarding the waters of purification for the cleansing of him who became unclean through touching a corpse, Num. 19.
109. Immersion for purification in running water, Lev. 15:16.
110. Law regarding the purification of the leper, Lev. 14.
111. Cutting off of all the hair of him who has been cured of leprosy, Lev. 14:9.
112. The obligation of the leprous man to make himself distinguishable externally, Lev. 13:45.
113. Preparation of the ashes of the red heifer (Parah Adumah) for the making of the waters of purification, Num. 19.

Sacred Property

114. Redemption for a vow of persons through money, Lev. 27:2.
115-117. Redemption of an offerable animal, and of a sanctified house or field, Lev. 27:9, 14, 16.
118. Restitution of illegally appropriated holy property, together with a fifth of its value, to the sanctuary, Lev. 5:16.
119. Sanctification of the fruit of trees in the fourth year, Lev. 19:24.

Portions for the Priests and the Poor

120-124. Allowing the corner of a field (Peah) to stand during the harvest, allowing fruits which have fallen off and ears of corn which have been forgotten (Leket) to lie, allowing individual clusters of grapes to remain hanging, the leaving behind of separate grapes, Lev. 19:9-10.
125. Offering of the first-fruits (Bikkurim) in the sanctuary, Ex. 23:19.
126. Separation of the heave-offering (Terumah) for the priest, Deut. 18:4.
127. Setting apart of the tithe (Maaser) for the Levite, Lev. 27:30; Num. 18:24.
128. Setting apart of the second tithe (Maaser Sheni), Deut. 14:22.
129. Setting apart of a tithe of the Levites' tithe for the priests, Num. 18:26.

130. Setting apart of the tithe of the poor (Maaser Ani) in the 3rd and 6th year instead of the second tithe, Deut. 14:28.
131. Pronouncing the confession of the tithe, Deut. 26:13-15.
132. Confession at the offering of the first-fruits, Deut. 26:3-10.
133. Setting apart of the heave-offering of the priests from the dough (Hallah), Num. 15:20.

Year of Release and Jubilee Year

134-135. Letting the ground lie fallow in the seventh year and letting it be free, and refraining from the cultivation of the soil, Ex. 23:11; 34:21.
136-138. The hallowing of the Jubilee year, the blowing of the trumpet for the Jubilee, and the giving back of all the real estate which has been sold, Lev. 25:9, 10, 24.
139. Redemption of a house in a city surrounded by a wall in the year of sale, Lev. 25:29.
140. The counting of the Jubilee year and the year of release, Lev. 25:8.
141. The release of the loan in the year of release, Deut. 15:2.
142. The exaction of the loan from the non-Israelite, Deut. 15:3.

Emoluments of the Priests

143. The giving of portions of the sacrifices to the priests, Deut. 18:3.
144. The first of the fleece of the sheep for the priests, Deut. 18:4.
145. Different treatment of that which belongs to God and of that which belongs to the priest, Lev. 27:28.

Dietary Laws

146. The slaughtering (Shehitah) of the animals and fowl which are to be eaten, Deut. 12:23.
147. The covering of the blood poured out in the slaughtering of game and fowl, Lev. 17:13
148. Letting the mother of the birds fly away in the taking away of the eggs or young of her nest, Deut. 22:7.
149-152. The determination of the characteristics of mammals, birds, locusts, and fishes for permission to enjoy their flesh, Lev. 11:2, 9, 21; Deut. 14:11.

Holidays

153. Consecration of the new moon and the fixing of the calendar, Ex. 12:2.
154-155. The Sabbath rest and the hallowing of the Sabbath, Ex. 20:8, 10; 23:12.
156. The clearing away of all leaven (Hametz) before the Passover festival, Ex. 12:15.
157-158. The narrating of the Exodus from Egypt and the eating of unleavened bread (Matzah) in the night of Passover, Ex. 12:18, 13:8.
159-160. Celebration of the first and seventh days of Passover, Ex. 12:16.
161. The counting (Sefirah) of the forty-nine days from the cutting of the first grain, Lev. 23:15.
162. Celebration of the fiftieth day (Shabuoth) which then follows, Lev. 23:21.
163. Celebration of the first of Tishri (Rosh Hashanah), Lev. 23:24.
164-165. The fast and the celebration on the tenth of Tishri (Yom Kippur), Lev. 23:27, 32.
166-167. Celebration of the first and eighth days of the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkoth), Lev. 23:35, 39.
168. Dwelling in booths seven days, Lev. 23:42.
169. The festive palm-branch (Lulab) on the Feast of Tabernacles, Lev. 23:40.
170. Blowing of the trumpet (Shofar) on the first of Tishri, Num. 29:1.
171. The annual giving of a half a shekel as ransom money, Ex. 30:13.

Magistrates and the Court

172. Obedience towards every prophet insofar as the latter remains within the prescriptions of the Torah, Deut. 18:15.
173. The law regarding kings, Deut. 17:15.
174. Obedience to the highest court of the land, Deut. 17:11.
175. Decision according to the majority, Ex. 23:2.
176. Appointment of judges and officials in every city, Deut. 16:18.
177. Impartiality in judgment, Lev. 19:15.
178. The obligation to give testimony before the court, Lev. 5:1.
179. Careful examination of the witnesses, Deut. 13:15.
180. Infliction on false witnesses of the same punishment which they had devised against the accused, Deut. 19:19.
181. The killing of a heifer (Eglah Arufah) as an atonement for an unsolved murder, Deut. 21:3-4.
182. The establishment of cities of refuge for the authors of unintentional murders, Deut. 19:3.
183. Ordinance concerning the cities of the Levites, Num. 35:2.
184. The building of parapets around roofs in order to avoid danger to life, Deut. 22:8.

Idolatry and War

185-186. The extermination of idolatry and the destruction of the city which has been seduced to idolatry, Deut. 12:2; 13:16-17.
187. The extermination of the seven nations in the land of Israel, Deut. 20:17.
188. The extermination of Amalek, Deut. 25:19.
189. Remembering the deed of Amalek, Deut. 25:17.
190. The law regarding the waging of war against a city, Deut. 20:10.
191. The anointing of a priest for the war, Deut. 20:2.
192-193. Regulations concerning keeping the camp clean, Deut. 23:11-14.
194. The restoration of that which has been stolen, Lev. 5:21-26.

Social and Ethical Laws

195. The assisting of the poor, Deut. 15:8, 11.
196. The giving of presents to the slave who is allowed to go free, Deut. 15:14.
197. Lending to the poor, Deut. 15:8.
198. Lending to non-Israelites at interest, Deut. 23:21.
199. The restoration of a pledge which is absolutely necessary to the debtor, Deut. 24:13.
200. Paying the day-laborer his wages on the day of his labor, Deut. 24:15.
201-202. Permission for the day-laborer to eat from the produce of his labor during work in the field and vineyard, Deut. 23:25-26.
203. Giving assistance when a beast of burden falls down, Deut. 22:4.
204. Restoration of that which has been found, Deut. 22:3.
205. The rebuking of the sinner, Lev. 19:17.
206. The loving of neighbors, Lev. 19:18.
207. Love for the stranger, Deut. 10:19.
208. Strict integrity in weight, Lev. 19:36.
209. Honoring of the wise men (old men), Lev. 19:32.
210. Honoring of parents, Ex. 20:12.
211. Reverence for parents, Lev. 19:3.

Marriage Laws

212. Obligation to marry, Gen. 1:28.
213. Marriage in legal form, Deut. 24:1.
214. The exemption of the newly married man from military service for a period of one year, Deut. 24:5.
215. Circumcision on the eighth day, Gen. 17:10, 12; Lev. 12:3.
216-217. The marriage of the brother-in-law (Levirate Marriage) in the case of the brother's widow who has been left childless, and the drawing off of the shoe (Halitzah) in case of a refusal, Deut. 25:5, 9.
218-219. Obligation to marry one who has been ravished and the indissolubility of marriage with her, Deut. 22:29.
220. Indemnification on account of a virgin who has been seduced, Ex. 22:16.
221. Legal position of a captive woman who has been brought home, Deut. 21:12-14.
222. Divorce by means of a bill of divorcement (Get), Deut. 24:1.

223. Law regarding a woman accused of infidelity (Sotah), Num. 5:30.

PUNISHMENTS

224. The scourging (Malkuth) of the wrong-doer, Deut. 25:1-3.
225. Creation of a refuge for the manslayer, Num. 35:25.
226-230. Execution by the sword, by strangulation, fire, stoning, and hanging, Ex. 21:20; Lev. 20:10, 14; Deut. 21:22; 22:24.
231. Burial before nightfall of one who has been executed, Deut. 21:23.

SLAVERY

232. Law regarding Hebrew slaves, Ex. 21:2.
233-234. Treatment of Hebrew slaves and their redemption, Ex. 21:7-11.
235. Perpetual slavery of Canaanitish slaves, Lev. 25:46.

INDEMNIFICATION

236. Indemnity for corporeal injury, Ex. 21:18-19.
237. Indemnity for injury through animals, Ex. 21:35-36.
238. Indemnity for injuries received through falling into a pit, Ex. 21:33.
239. Law regarding theft and the stealing of a human being, Ex. 21:16, 37; 22:1-3.
240. Indemnity for pasturing in another man's field, Ex. 22:4.
241. Indemnity for arson, Ex. 22:5.
242. Law regarding property which has been given in charge, Ex. 22:6-7.
243. Law regarding paid keepers of an animal, Ex. 22:9-12.
244. Law regarding anything lent, Ex. 22:13-14.

PURCHASE, CLAIMS, INHERITANCE

245. Regarding purchase and sale, Lev. 25:14.
246. Law regarding claims of every kind, Ex. 22:8.
247. Freeing of one whose life is threatened, even through the death of the pursuer, Deut. 25:12.
248. Law regarding inheritance, Num. 27:8-11.

II. The 365 Negative Commandments, or Prohibitions

IDOL-WORSHIP AND MAGIC, ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE FOREIGN NATIONS, WAR

It is prohibited:

1. To assume the existence of another God, Ex. 20:3.
2. To make or to have an image of God, Ex. 20:4.
3. To make any image at all for the worship of idols, Ex. 34:17.
4. To make an idol, Ex. 20:20.
5. To prostrate oneself before idols, Ex. 20:5.
6. To practice idolatrous customs, Ex. 20:5.
7. To sacrifice one's child to Molech, Lev. 18:21.
8. To practice necromancy, Lev. 19:31.
9. To practice divination, Lev. 19:31.
10. To incline oneself to idol-worship, Lev. 19:4.
11. To set up a pillar, Deut. 16:22.
12. To tolerate figured stones, Lev. 26:1.
13. To plant trees in the sanctuary, Deut. 16:21.
14. To swear by idols, Ex. 23:13.
15-16. To seduce or incite one to idolatry, Ex. 23:13; Deut. 13:12.
17. To accede to him who incites to idolatry, Deut. 13:9.
18. To show pity to him who incites to idolatry, Deut. 13:9.
19. To spare him who was seduced to idolatry, Deut. 13:9.
20. To protect the instigator, Deut. 13:9.
21. To let the instigator alone in silence, Deut. 13:9.
22. To make use of the gold and silver plates, ornaments, or mountings on the idols, Deut. 7:25.
23. To rebuild a city which has been led astray to idolatry, Deut. 13:17.
24. To make use of its property, Deut. 13:18.
25. To make use of any of the things used in the worship of idols, Deut. 7:26.
26. To prophesy in the name of idols, Deut. 18:20.
27. To prophesy falsely, Deut. 18:20.
28. To follow an idolatrous prophet, Deut. 13:4.
29. To shrink back from the slaying of a false prophet, Deut. 18:22.
30. To adopt the customs of the worshippers of idols, Lev. 20:23.
31-38. To practice magic, to interpret on the ground of clouds and omens and signs of all kinds, to pronounce magical formulas or formulas of exorcism, to consult necromancers, diviners and the spirits of the dead, Lev. 19:26; Deut. 18:10-11.
39-40. To put on the clothing or the adornments of the other sex, Deut. 22:5.
41. To imprint writing or marks on the skin, after the manner of the worshippers of idols, Lev. 19:28.
42. To wear clothing made of wool and linen mingled (Sha'atnez), Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:11.
43-44. To round off the corners of the hair of the head and of the beard, after the manner of the worshippers of idols, Lev. 19:27.
45. To make incisions in the flesh for the sake of a dead person, after the manner of the worshippers of idols, Deut. 14:1.
46. To settle down in Egypt permanently, Deut. 17:16.
47. To follow after one's own heart and eyes, Num. 15:39.
48-49. To make peace with the seven nations of Canaan or to let them live, Ex. 23:32; Deut. 7:2; 20:17.
50-52. To show pity to the worshippers of idols, to suffer them in the land, and to make marriages with them, Ex. 23:33; Deut. 7:2-3.
53. To give a daughter in marriage to an Ammonite and a Moabite, Deut. 23:4.
54-55. To exclude the Edomites and the Egyptians of the third generation and on from the assembly of Israel, Deut. 23:8-9.
56. To offer peace to the Ammonites and the Moabites in war, Deut. 23:7.
57. To destroy fruit-trees in war, Deut. 20:19.
58. To be afraid of the enemy, Deut. 3:22; 7:21; 20:3.
59. To forget the evil deed of Amalek, Deut. 25:19.

GOD

It is prohibited:

60. To blaspheme the holy name of God, Lev. 24:16.
61. To break a promise bound by oath, Lev. 19:12.
62. To swear thoughtlessly or in vain, Ex. 20:7.
63. To profane the name of God, Lev. 18:21; 22:32.
64. To tempt God, Deut. 6:16.
65. To destroy anything holy, such as temples, synagogues, schools, holy writings, the names of God, Deut. 12:4.
66. To allow one who has been hanged to remain hanging over night, Deut. 21:22-23.

SANCTUARY AND PRIESTS, SACRIFICES AND HOLY TAXES

It is prohibited:

67. To leave the sanctuary unwatched, Num. 18:5.
68. For the priests to enter the sanctuary at all times, Lev. 16:2.
69-71. For priests afflicted with bodily blemishes to come near to the altar of the sanctuary and to perform the service there, Lev. 21:23, 17-21.
72. For the Levites to perform priestly services, Num. 18:3.
73. To enter the sanctuary or to teach the law after the drinking of wine, Lev. 10:9, 11.
74. For the stranger to approach the sanctuary, Num. 18:4.
75. For the priests to perform the service in uncleanness, Lev. 22:3.
76. For the priests to perform the service before the evening, after the bath of purification, in the case of uncleanness, Lev. 22:7.
77-78. To enter upon the fore-court and the court of the Levites as a priest in uncleanness, Num. 5:3; Deut. 23:11.
79. To build an altar of hewn stones, Ex. 20:22.
80. To go up to the altar by steps, Ex. 20:23.
81. To offer sacrifices and frankincense on the golden altar, Ex. 30:9.
82. To permit the fire on the altar to go out, Lev. 6:6.
83-84. To imitate the composition of the anointing oil and to anoint unauthorized persons with it, Ex. 30:32.
85. To imitate the composition of the incense, Ex. 30:37.
86. To take out the staves of the Ark of the Covenant, Ex. 25:15.

87. To loose the breastplate (Hoshen) from the ephod, Ex. 28:28.
88. To rend the robe of the priest, Ex. 28:32.
89-90. To offer sacrifices and to slaughter sacred animals without the forecourt of the sanctuary, Deut. 12:13; Lev. 17:3-4.
91-95. To consecrate animals with blemishes, to sacrifice them, to sprinkle their blood upon the altar, to bring the parts of their offerings upon the fire of the altar, even in the case of passing blemishes, Lev. 22:20, 22, 24; Deut. 17:1.
96. To accept anything with a blemish from idolators and to sacrifice it, Lev. 22:25.
97. To bring anything with a blemish as a sacrifice, Lev. 22:21.
98. To bring leaven or honey upon the altar, Lev. 2:11.
99. To offer up anything unsalted, Lev. 2:13.
100. To offer up cattle acquired for the hire of a harlot and the price of a dog, Deut. 23:19.
101. To slaughter an animal and its young one on the same day, Lev. 22:28.
102-103. To put olive oil and frankincense on a sin meal-offering, Lev. 5:11.
104-105. To put oil or frankincense on the meal-offering of a woman (Sotah) suspected of adultery, Num. 5:15.
106-107. To change or alter offerings or to use them for offerings of another kind, Lev. 27:10, 26.
108. To redeem the firstlings of clean animals, Num. 18:17.
109. To sell an animal which is appointed for the tithe (Maaser), Lev. 27:32, 33.
110-111. To sell or to redeem a consecrated field, Lev. 27:28.
112. To divide asunder the head of a bird used as a sin-offering, Lev. 5:8.
113-114. To use a holy animal for work or to shear it, Deut. 15:19.
115-117. To slaughter the Passover offering with leavened bread (Hametz), to allow its fat to remain over night and its flesh to remain over till morning, Ex. 34:25; 23:18; 12:10.
118. To allow anything of the festival offering of the day of preparation to remain over till the second day of Passover, Deut. 16:4.
119. To allow any of the flesh of the second Passover offering to remain over till morning, Num. 9:12.
120. The same with regard to the sacrifices of thanksgiving and other offerings, Lev. 22:30.
121-122. To break a bone of the first or second Passover offering, Ex. 12:46; Num. 9:12.
123. To bring any of the flesh of the Passover offering outside of the common house, Ex. 12:46.
124. To leaven what is left of the meal-offering, Lev. 6:10.
125-128. To eat the Passover offering raw or cooked, and to give a portion of it to strangers who are sojourners, to uncircumcised people, or to Israelites who have become worshippers of idols, Ex. 12:9, 43, 45, 48.
129-132. To eat in uncleanness that which is holy, holy food which has become defiled, what is left over of the holy, or anything detestable, Lev. 7:18, 19, 21; 19:8.
133-134. For the non-priest, even if he is a tenant of a priest or a hired servant, to eat of the heave-offering (Terumah), Lev. 22:10.
135. For the uncircumcised person to eat of the heave-offering or anything else that is holy, Lev. 22:10.
136. For the unclean priest to eat of the heave-offering, Lev. 22:4.
137. For the daughter of a priest who has been married to a layman to eat of the heave-offering, Lev. 22:12.
138. To eat the meat-offering of the priest, Lev. 6:23.
139. To eat of sin-offerings the blood of which is sprinkled on the inner altar, Lev. 6:23.
140. To eat animals which can not be used for sacrifice and which have intentionally been rendered faulty, Deut. 14:3.
141-144. To eat the second tithe of corn, wine, and oil and of firstlings without blemish outside of Jerusalem, Deut. 12:17.
145-147. For the priest to eat the sin- and guilt-offering, the flesh of the burnt-offering, and that of other holy offerings, before the sprinkling of the blood, outside of the sanctuary, Deut. 12:17.
148. For the non-priests to eat of the holy of holies, Ex. 29:33.
149. For the priest to eat the first-fruits before they are set down in the sanctuary, Deut. 12:17.
150. For an unclean person to eat of the second tithe before he has been redeemed, Deut. 26:14.
151. To eat of the second tithe in mourning, Deut. 26:14.
152. To use the amount for the redemption of the second tithes for any other purpose than for the needs of life, Deut. 26:14.
153. To eat the fruits of the grain before the tithe and the heave-offering have been separated from them, Lev. 22:15.
154. To change the prescribed order in the separation and the bearing away of the holy taxes of the products of the harvest, Ex. 22:28.
155. To delay in the paying of a vow and a free-will offering, Deut. 23:22.
156. To make a pilgrimage on a festival without an offering, Ex. 23:15.
157. To transgress a vow of renunciation, Num. 30:3.
158-160. For a priest to marry a harlot, a profaned woman, or a divorced woman, Lev. 21:7.
161-162. For the high priest to marry a widow, Lev. 21:14.
163-164. For priests to enter the sanctuary with uncovered head or with rent garments, Lev. 10:6.
165. To leave the sanctuary during the service, Lev. 8:33.
166-168. For priests to defile themselves for the dead or to go into the house to dead persons; for the high priest to defile himself for nearest relatives who have died, Lev. 21:1, 2, 11.
169-170. For the tribe of Levi to have a share in the land or in the spoil in conquest, Deut. 18:1-2.
171. To cut a bald spot on oneself for the dead, Deut. 14:1.

Dietary Laws, Naziriteship, Prohibited Mixtures, Animals

It is prohibited:

172-179. To eat unclean animals, fishes, birds, flying swarming things, whose characteristics are given, creeping animals and worms, worms in fruit and in the water, Lev. 11; Deut. 14:4-19.
180-182. To eat an animal which has died of itself or which has been torn, and to eat parts of a living animal, Ex. 22:30; Deut. 14:21; 12:23.
183. To eat the sciatic vein, Gen. 32:33.
184-185. To eat blood or fat, Lev. 7:23, 26.
186-187. To cook or to eat meat in milk, Ex. 23:19; 34:26; Deut. 14:21.
188. To eat the flesh of oxen which have been stoned, Ex. 21:28.
189-191. To eat bread and parched or rough-ground corn of the new grain before the Passover, Lev. 23:14.
192. To eat the fruit of a tree during the first three years, Lev. 19:23.
193. To eat the intermediary growth of the vineyard, Deut. 22:9.
194. To drink the wine of the drink-offerings of idols, Deut. 32:38.
195. To eat and drink to excess, Deut. 21:20.
196. To eat on the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), Lev. 23:29.
197-199. To eat leaven (Hametz) and anything mingled with leaven on the Passover, and to eat leaven on the day before Passover from noon on, Ex. 12:15, 20; Deut. 16:3.
200-201. To have leavened bread or leaven in the house on the Passover, Ex. 13:7.
202-206. For the Nazirite to drink wine or mixtures of wine, and to eat grapes, raisins, or parts thereof, Num. 6:3-4.
207-209. For the Nazirite to defile himself for the dead, to enter the house of a dead person, and to cut off the hair of his head, Num. 6:5-7.
210-214. To cut off the fruit of the field at the corner of the field, to gather the fallen ears (Leket), to gather the individual clusters of grapes which have remained, to gather up the grapes, to eat forgotten sheaves or fruit, Lev. 19:9-10; 23:22; Deut. 24:19-20.

215-216. To mingle seeds and to sow grain or plants in a vineyard, Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:9.
217. To cross-breed cattle, Lev. 19:19.
218. To allow animals of different species to work together, Deut. 22:10.
219. To muzzle animals that are laboring, Deut. 25:4.

Landed Property, Social and Slave Laws

It is prohibited:

220-223. To cultivate the field, to plant trees, to cut the after-growth, or to gather fruit in the year of release (Shemittah), Lev. 25:4-5.
224-226. The same in the Jubilee year, Lev. 25:11.
227. To sell land in the land of Israel in perpetuity, Lev. 25:23.
228. To change the boundaries and the fields of the cities of the Levites, Lev. 25:34.
229. To leave the Levites without support, Deut. 12:19.
230. To demand payment of a loan after the year of release, Deut. 15:2.
231. To refuse a loan to a poor man out of regard for the approach of the year of release, Deut. 15:9.
232. To refuse a poor man assistance, Deut. 15:7.
233. To allow a Hebrew slave who has been made free to go without a present, Deut. 15:13.
234. To press a poor man for a debt, Ex. 22:25.
235-236. To take interest from an Israelite or to agree to it, Lev. 25:37; Deut. 23:20.
237. To cooperate in interest agreements as a witness, surety, or in any other form, Ex. 22:24.
238. To postpone the payment of the worker's wages, Lev. 19:13.
239-242. To seize the debtor forcibly, to keep from him an indispensable pledge, to take a pledge from a widow, to take in pledge utensils necessary for the preparation of one's livelihood, Deut. 24:6, 10, 12, 17.

Sins Against Human Beings and Animals

It is prohibited:

243. To steal human beings, Ex. 21:16.
244. To steal property, Lev. 19:11.
245. To rob one of one's property, Lev. 19:13.
246. To remove a landmark, Deut. 19:14.
247-249. To withhold another man's property through cunning or force, to deny it, or to deny it by oath, Lev. 19:11-13.
250. To injure any one in business, Lev. 25:14.
251. To wrong any one by means of words, Lev. 25:17.
252-253. To wrong a stranger or to injure him in business, Ex. 22:20.
254-255. To deliver over a runaway slave to his master or to wrong him, Deut. 23:16-17.
256. To oppress orphans and widows, Ex. 22:21.
257-259. To constrain a Hebrew slave to perform actual slave-labor, to sell him for such, or to treat him severely, Lev. 25:39, 42, 43.
260. To allow a heathen to treat a Hebrew slave with rigour, Lev. 25:53.
261. To sell a female slave, Ex. 21:8.
262. To refuse her her conjugal rights, Ex. 21:10.
263-264. To sell as a slave a captive woman whom one has at first espoused, or to treat her as a slave, Deut. 21:14.
265. To covet another man's wife, Ex. 20:14.
266. To covet another man's property, Ex. 20:14.
267-268. To forbid the day-laborer to pluck something off or to take it along with him after his work is done, Deut. 23:25.
269. To withhold anything that is found from its owner, Deut. 22:3.
270. To forbear to help an animal that is succumbing to its burden, Ex. 23:5.
271-272. To do unrighteousness in weight and measure, Lev. 19:35; Deut. 25:13-14.

Courts

It is prohibited:

273. To do unrighteousness in judgment, Lev. 19:35.
274. To accept a bribe as a judge, Ex. 23:8.
275-276. To have regard as a judge to the rank of a person, or to be afraid, Lev. 19:15; Deut. 1:17.
277. To spare the poor in judgment, Ex. 23:3.
278. To refuse a sinner his rights, Ex. 23:6.
279. To treat the guilty man indulgently, Deut. 19:13.
280. To pervert the justice of strangers or of orphans, Deut. 24:17.
281. To hear a man who is carrying on a lawsuit except in the presence of his adversary, Ex. 23:1.
282. To decide in accordance with the majority in criminal cases, Ex. 23:2.
283. To appear as the accuser of an accused man after defending him, Ex. 23:2.
284. To appoint as judges persons ignorant of law, Deut. 1:17.
285. To give false testimony, Ex. 20:13.
286. To accept the testimony of a wicked person, and to take it into account for the judgment, Ex. 23:1.
287. To accept the testimony of relatives for and even against relatives, Deut. 24:16.
288. To decide on the testimony of one witness, Deut. 19:15.
289. To condemn innocent people to death, Ex. 20:13.
290. To decide cases involving the death penalty on circumstantial evidence alone, Ex. 23:7.
291. To express a judgment as a witness in capital lawsuits, instead of confining oneself exclusively to one's testimony, Num. 35:30.
292. To execute a criminal without due process of law, Num. 35:12.
293. To have pity or indulgence for him who pursues after a person to kill him, Deut. 19:11-13.
294. To punish one who has been ravished, Deut. 22:26.
295-296. To accept a ransom from a murderer and a manslayer, Num. 35:31, 32.

Sins Against Human Beings and Animals

It is prohibited:

297. To stand aside unconcernedly in case of danger to another person's life, Lev. 19:16.
298-299. To be guilty of endangering the life of another person or to put a stumbling-block in his way, Deut. 22:8; Lev. 19:14.
300. To render the scourging (Malkuth) of the guilty person more severe, Deut. 25:3.
301. To slander, Lev. 19:16.
302. To hate one's neighbor, Lev. 19:17.
303. To humiliate one's neighbor, Lev. 19:17.
304-305. To exact vengeance or to bear a grudge, Lev. 19:18.
306. To take away the mother of the birds together with the young in taking away a bird's nest, Deut. 22:6.

Miscellaneous

It is prohibited:

307-308. To destroy hairs or signs of skin-leprosy, Deut. 24:8.
309. To plow or to sow in a valley in which there has been found a person killed by someone unknown, Deut. 21:4.
310. To permit sorcerers to live, Ex. 22:17.
311. To take a newly married man for military service, Deut. 24:5.

Sins Against Public Authorities

It is prohibited:

312. To refuse obedience to the highest court, Deut. 17:11.
313-314. To add anything to the law or to detract from it, Deut. 13:1.
315-316. To curse a judge, prince, king, or school-head, Ex. 22:27.
317. To curse any Israelite at all, Lev. 19:14.
318-319. To curse or to strike one's father or mother, Ex. 21:15, 17.

Holidays

It is prohibited:

320. To work on the Sabbath, Ex. 20:10.
321. To go beyond the Sabbath limits on the Sabbath, Ex. 16:29.
322. To carry out an execution on the Sabbath, Ex. 35:3.
323-329. To work on the first and seventh days of the festival of Passover, on the Feast of Weeks, on the festival of Rosh Hashanah, on the festival of the Day of Atonement, and on the first and eighth days of the Feast of Tabernacles, Ex. 12:16; Lev. 23:7, 21, 25, 28, 35, 36.

MARRIAGE AND SEXUAL REGULATIONS

It is prohibited:

330-345. To marry certain relatives, Lev. 18:7-18.
346. To have relations with one's own wife during her menstruation, Lev. 18:19.
347. To have sexual relations with the wife of another, Lev. 18:20.
348-352. To practice unnatural intercourse, Lev. 18:7, 14, 22, 23.
353. To perform acts which might incite one to forbidden intercourse, Lev. 18:6.
354. To marry off a daughter of Israel to one born in incest (Mamzer), Deut. 23:3.
355. To be a harlot, Deut. 23:18.
356. To take back one's divorced wife after she has entered into a second marriage, Deut. 24:4.
357. For the childless widow to marry any one except the brother of her husband, Deut. 25:5.
358. For the man who has had to marry a woman because of violence to divorce her, Deut. 22:29.
359. For the man who has falsely accused his wife of infidelity to divorce her, Deut. 22:19.
360. For a castrated person to marry an Israelitish woman, Deut. 23:2.
361. To perform an act of castration, Lev. 22:24.

THE KINGDOM

It is prohibited:

362. To make a non-Israelite king in Israel, Deut. 17:15.
363-365. For the king to have too many horses, to take too many wives, or to heap up gold and silver to excess, Deut. 17:16-17.

See also: LAW, SOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT OF; MITZVAH.

MAX JOSEPH.

Lit.: Broyde, I., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 4, pp. 181-86; Schechter, S., Studies in Judaism (1896); Bloch, M., "Les 613 lois," Revue des études juives, vol. 1, p. 197 et seq.; vol. 5, p. 25 et seq.; Creizenach, Thariag (1883); Jellinek, Konteris Thariag (1878).

PRECIOUS STONES, see GEMS.

PREDESTINATION, the doctrine that all the acts of men are previously determined by the will of God. This doctrine is foreign to Judaism which, although it believes to a greater or less extent in destiny, is careful to preserve the idea of freedom of will. In particular, Judaism does not accept the doctrine that certain individuals are predestined by God to be righteous and therefore share eternal bliss. According to Josephus, the Essenes held to a doctrine of fatalism that was close to predestination; but since Josephus seems to model his Jewish sects after the current movements in Greek and Roman philosophy, his statements are questionable. It is questionable whether the Essenes believed in anything more than an absolute submission to the will of God. Similarly, although the Talmudic literature betrays a belief in astrology, from which the future of man might presumably be predicted, it does not believe in absolute predestination.

See also: FATALISM; FREE WILL; PROVIDENCE.

PRE-EXISTENCE, the previous existence of persons or objects before they appear on earth or even before the creation of the world. The only case of pre-existence in the Bible is that of wisdom (Prov. 8:22-31), which is pictured as the first creation of God and as witnessing the creation of the world. Although this conception can be traced back to ancient mythology, it is doubtful whether this passage is a case of an actual representation of wisdom as a separate entity or merely a poetic flight of fancy. Sirach (24:8-12) identifies this wisdom with the divine wisdom revealed to Israel at Sinai, thus preparing the way for the later doctrine of the pre-existence of the Torah. The Hellenistic Wisdom of Solomon has much the same idea. However Philo, the philosopher of Jewish Hellenism, took over from Plato the concept of a world of ideas, created before the present world and serving as its model. This later had its influence on Palestinian Jewish thought, which taught that the Torah was the architect's plan into which God looked when he created the world.

The Palestinian idea of pre-existence was not limited to the Torah in the post-Biblical period. In apocryphal literature there appears the doctrine that the Messiah, who is depicted in Dan. 7:13 as a supernatural being, was already in existence before the creation of the world (cf. John 8:58). A passage in the Talmud (Pes. 54a) declares that the following seven things existed before the world: the Torah, repentance, paradise, hell, the divine throne, the Temple and the name of the Messiah. A later passage in the Midrash (Midrash Gen. 1:1) mentions six: the Torah, the divine throne, the Patriarchs, Israel, the Temple and the name of the Messiah; only the first two were actually created, the others merely being original in the intention of God.

The origin of such ideas in Palestinian Jewish thought is doubtless the Persian religion. The main idea is that those persons and things which are regarded as the basis for religious ideas and the divine world plan are considered therefore to be pre-existent. The elaborate ideas of pre-existence in the later Midrash essentially lost their metaphysical meaning in post-Talmudic Judaism, and were used for the most part merely as poetic symbols.

Another type of pre-existence is that of the soul before birth. It appears in Wisdom of Solomon (8:19-20), was held, according to Josephus (Jewish War, book 2, chap. 8, section 11), by the Essenes, and appears frequently in Talmudic literature. It is based on ideas derived from Plato and the Persian religion. During the Middle Ages, the influence of Neo-Platonism led individual Jewish philosophers such as Solomon ibn Gabirol and Joseph ibn Zaddik to assert the pre-existence of the soul. In the case of Ibn Gabirol it was perhaps in connection with the transmigration of the soul, which is otherwise generally rejected in Jewish philosophy and gained acceptance only in Cabala. The majority of Jewish philosophers reject the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul, despite the Talmudic passages that uphold it.

See also: SOUL; TORAH.

JULIUS GUTTMANN.

Lit.: Volz, P., Jüdische Eschatologie von Daniel bis Akiba; Charles, R. H., The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (1913); Ginzberg, L., Die Haggada bei den Kirchenvätern.

PREGEL, SOPHIE, poet and editor, b. Odessa, 1900. Educated at Odessa, St. Petersburg and Paris, she lived at Berlin and Paris as a co-editor of literary magazines, such as Tshisla (Figures) and Russkiye zapiski (Russian Notes), published by and for Russian emigres.

A poet of note and author of the volumes Razgovor s pamiatyu (Talk with My Memories; 1935); Solnetshni proizvol (Happy-Go-Luckiness; 1937) and Poldien (At Noon; 1939), she also espoused other emigre Russian poets. In Paris she also served on the executive board of a home for the Jewish aged and was associated with the OSE. In 1940 she came to the United States where she published the literary magazine Novoselye (New Home).

PREGNANCY. In early Jewish thought pregnancy was regarded as the gift of God to grant or to refuse as He saw fit. According to the Talmud, God never lets go of three keys: that to the resurrection of the dead, that to the opening of the womb, and that for rain. According to Toledoth Adam, which goes back to Israel Baal Shemtob and is expanded by similar books, there are seven evil spirits that prevent pregnancy. Childlessness was regarded as little better than death, and even as a disgrace, as elsewhere in the Orient; ten years' childlessness is grounds for divorce. Thus Rachel appeals to Jacob in desperation: "Give me children, or else I die!" (Gen. 30:1). According to Josephus, prevention of conception was a capital crime; Meir desired to allow it in special cases in the interest of the health of the wife, but his colleagues decided against him.

In order to assure the bridal pair of fertility, it was customary to strew the bridal couple at Jewish weddings with hops, wheat or barley at the time the bride is veiled; another similar custom was to place a hen in front of them. It was thought that the husband could influence the sex of the embryo; another proposed method for having male children was to have the pregnant woman bite an Ethrog. It was believed that the sex of the embryo could change during pregnancy, and that there was no differentiation of sex until the forty-first day of pregnancy. A male embryo was thought to lie on the right side of the uterus, a female on the left. Jewish law grants a pregnant woman dispensation from fasting and taking an oath.

Lit.: Löw, L., Die Lebensalter; Preuss, J., Biblisch-talmudische Medizin (1911).

PRENOWITZ, JOSEPH SOLOMON, writer, b. Aleksot, province of Kovno, Russia, 1871; d. New York city, 1938. He came to the United States in 1888, and after traveling throughout the country on various jobs, he finally settled in Philadelphia in 1895. Prenowitz had begun to write in 1891, when his first articles appeared in the Folks-Advokat. Subsequently he wrote for other literary periodicals. In 1906 Prenowitz became associated with the Forward, and was for many years editor of its Philadelphia edition.

He was the author of Gedichte, a volume of poems (1910). A second volume of poetry, Lieder, and a book of sketches, Fun Leben, appeared in 1921 under the auspices of a jubilee committee for his fiftieth birthday.

Lit.: Reisen, Z., Lexikon fun der Yiddisher Literatur, Presse un Filologie, vol. 2 (1930), cols. 971-73.

PRESBYTER JUDAEORUM, title of the official chief representative of the Jews in England before their expulsion in 1290. He was responsible for the keeping of the records of the Jews' treasurer, and was nominated for life by the crown. He had both judicial and financial powers in the king's interest. There were six Presbyteri Judaeorum from 1199 to 1290.

PRESENCE OF GOD, see FACE OF GOD; SHEKINAH.

PRESOV (in Hungarian, Eperjes), city in Czechoslovakia, with 4,300 Jews in a total population of 16,200. Until 1918, as capital city of Sáros county, Presov formed a part of Hungary.

In the 15th cent. the merchant guild of Presov obtained from King Mátyás the privilege of barring Jewish brokers from its fairs. Jews had lived in Sáros county under feudal protection ever since medieval times, and had taken care of the trade with Poland. Resting upon their ancient privilege, the guilds kept the Jews out of the city down to the 19th cent. Eventually, however, they were admitted to the annual fairs, at which occasions they were permitted to stay in the city for three days. In 1928 the synagogue with Hebrew inscriptions and mural decorations, which the Jews used during those brief stays, was discovered and turned into the Jewish Museum of Presov. In 1765 Jacob Lefkovits, a tenant farmer of Ádámfölde, involved in the blood accusation of Orkuta, met a martyr's death under torture by the executioner of Presov.

About 1790 Marcus Holländer, a wealthy Jew from Tarnopol, Galicia, who had influence with the imperial and royal chanceries at Vienna, received citizenship rights in Presov. In 1806 he called a convention of the Jews of Sáros county, organizing them into a community of which he became prefect. When, in addition to the toleration tax, a special tax was imposed upon the Jews of Hungary in a dearth, Holländer paid the total amount due from the Jews of Sáros county. His son, Leó Holländer, in 1843, assisted by several merchants who had come to Presov from other places, founded the Jewish community of Presov, for which a school and synagogue were built forthwith. Both the secular and the spiritual leaders of the young community distinguished themselves in the national revolution (1848-49), the former, Leó Holländer, being war commissioner-in-chief of Kossuth's army, while the latter, Rabbi Solomon Schiller-Szinessy, encouraged Jews to volunteer, himself serving in the engineer corps. The works of his successor, Mayer Auszterlitz (1860-1913), a Talmudist, orator and Hebrew scholar of national reputation, fill a book-case in the Presov Museum.

Due to its Liberal past, the community of Presov accepted the reforms ordered by the Jewish National Congress (1868-69); but a fraction of dissenting Orthodox (forty-five), who formed a community of their own (1871), grew to number 3,200 persons within fifty years, as against only 1,100 in what had once been the main community. The first synagogue of the Orthodox had been adapted from a mill, but they proceeded at once to organize a school and built a synagogue in 1898. The Yeshiva founded by Rabbi M. C. Lau had one hundred students (1927). Both under Francis Joseph of Hungary (1867-1916) and under the Czechoslovak republic (1918-39) the many institutions of the two communities prospered; Jews of Presov were prominent in economic, cultural and public life.

Under the puppet state of Slovakia (from 1939 on) the synagogue of Presov was set on fire by bombs. Jewish-owned property was confiscated, the Jews were crowded together into camps and barracks, and the board of the Jewish community had to cease its activities. The Jews of Presov, like other Jews of Slovakia, were destined for deportation to German-occupied regions of Poland and Russia. ANNA BETTELHEIM.

PRESS, see PERIODICALS AND PRESS.

PRESSBURG (in Hungarian, Pozsony; in Czech and Slovakian, Bratislava), a city which, until 1918, belonged to Hungary, from 1918 to 1939 to the republic of Czechoslovakia as capital city of the region of Slovakia, and from 1939 on was the capital of the Slovakian state. It is one of the oldest, and the most important Jewish community of Hungary.

1. From the 13th Cent. to the Dismemberment of Hungary (1526). Memorbuchs refer to Jews' dying the death of martyrs at Pressburg between 1250 and 1280; a Rabbi Jonah is mentioned by name. A letter of patent issued in 1291 by Endre III granted Jews the same rights as the citizens of Pressburg. From the 13th cent. to 1526 the Jews were serfs of the royal chamber, and as such a source of income to the kings.

The economic importance of the Jews of Pressburg was great. Lajos the Great, a devout Catholic, expelled the Jews from Hungary in 1360, but readmitted them in 1363. Those of Pressburg had lent the city 118 pounds, and upon their readmission this amount was refunded to them. King Zsigmond pawned the city of Pressburg to the princes of Moravia; these delegated their attorney, the Jew Izsák, to go to Pressburg to collect the revenue for them. Thus Izsák became owner (1387) of what was, down to the 20th cent., the Pressburg city hall.

As early as 1376 the city had created a "Jew law" which required Jews participating in commercial law suits of major importance to take an oath on the Pentateuch. Funds borrowed from Jews were listed officially in the so-called Judenbuch.

In the 15th cent. Jews owned many houses in Pressburg. They paid the Jew tax, the tithe due the clergy, their share of the city taxes, and various special taxes, such as that on kosher wine. The weak kings of the 15th cent. allowed the city greater control over the Jews. Queen Elizabeth and Regent Hunyady ceded the royal revenue of 1440 to 1452 to the city, which promptly cancelled its debts to the Jews; László V cancelled the interest owed to the Jews by the city, and granted it a delay for the payment of the principal (1452), but insisted that the Jews pay the various taxes imposed on them.

King Mátyás prohibited the pawning of real estate owned by Christians to the Jews of Pressburg (1475). A census taken of the Pressburg Jews in the 15th cent. was called "List of Wicked Jews." Toward the end of that century the wearing of a special Jewish garb consisting of a cloak and hood was enforced. Even after Lajos II (1520) issued an order abolishing it, the city continued to enforce it.

In 1503 Ulászló II cancelled all interest owed to Jews, and authorized "poor" debtors to pay to Jews as much of the principal as they could. From 1502 on Jew-baiting was frequent in the Pressburg streets. The Jewish prefect Jacobus Mendel and his relative Israel Mendel, although possessed of royal passports, were attacked in the streets (1505). The king ordered Peter, count of Szentgyörgy and Bazin, upon whose estate some Pressburg Jews sought refuge, to return them. When the Jews prepared to seek the protection of a headstrong rebel, the Count of Szepes, the king had his treasurer write them, pointing out the damage which would be done to the royal treasury through such a step on their part. Lajos II forbade Jews to trade in cloth, horses and other commodities "prohibited to Jews."

A synagogue was erected in 1399. According to some sources, the Jews then had a bathhouse, bridal house (Tanzhaus), hospital and cemetery. Toward the end of the 14th cent. from 800 to 900 Jews lived in Pressburg. Jews expelled from Austria (1421) and Carniola and Styria (1496) increased their number. In 1526, after the lost battle of Mohács, more refugees augmented their number to 3,000. About the year 1420 Isaac Tyrnau was head of the rabbinical school at Pressburg.

2. From the Dismemberment of Hungary (1526) to the Emancipation of the Jews (1867). After the catastrophic battle of Mohács, Maria of Hapsburg, widow of Lajos II, expelled the Jews from Pressburg. Some of these and their descendants lived in the vicinity of the city for the following 150 years, somewhat insecurely protected by noble landlords. A pamphlet published in Germany in 1591 telling of a case of host desecration by Pressburg Jews is purely apocryphal, since there is no historic record of such accusation. Jews expelled from Vienna in 1670 increased the number of the Pressburg Jews. Settling in the suburb of Zuckermandl, they formed a community distinct from that settled on the estate of the Counts Pálffy, the Schlossgrund. These communities had synagogues of their own in 1719.

The ancient ghetto in Pressburg

The Pressburg Jews supplied the imperial court with money and supplies in the campaign against the Turks. In 1688 the court factor Samson Wertheimer mentioned as Jewish traders of Pressburg Moses of Donauworth and Koppel of Holics. In 1693 Archbishop Kollonitsch obtained from the city permission for the financier Simon Michel to settle in a suburb. In 1699 the latter became head of the Pressburg Jews. From 1695 on the community had a rabbi, Yomtob Lippmann; he and Simon Michel drew up the communal statutes. In 1710 a Hebrah Kaddisha (burial society) was founded. Two years later Charles VI ordered the ghetto gates closed; they were not opened until it was so ordered by the Hungarian Diet of 1834 to 1840.

123 Jewish families (about 800 persons) lived in Pressburg in 1736 under the protection of the Counts Pálffy; more Jews lived outside of their jurisdiction. These counts gave the Jewish community a kind of constitution; in return for their protection, the Jews paid them taxes, and assessments to the court. The ghetto had its own judicial administration; protected by the Pálffy police, which was at the disposal of the rabbis and communal leaders for the enforcement of the religious laws, the ghetto had its own fire and sanitation department, and its own hospital.

Pressburg maintained excellent relations with the imperial court, and the Jews of Hungary utilized the Pressburg community as clearing house for petitions and grievances. Abraham Theben (d. 1786) and his son Koppel (1732-99), believed to be descendants of the Praefecti Judaeorum of the 15th cent., and Abraham Hirsch Lemberger (1776-1834) bore the title of Manhig Ufarnas Hamedinah (leader and president of the country). These men, who had access to the Vienna court, devoted their energy and wealth to the service of the Jews of Hungary.

Although national conferences of Jews deliberated in Pressburg on the amount and division of the toleration tax imposed by Empress Maria Theresa (1740-80), and on memoranda to be submitted to the Diet, Pressburg owed its chief fame to its rabbis and its Yeshiva.

After Yomtob Lippmann the following served as rabbis of Pressburg: Jacob Reckendorf (1709-27); Moses Lwów (Moses of Lemberg, or Moses Charif, 1736-58); Akiba Eger (1758); Isaac Dukla (1759-62); Meir Barbi (1768-89); Meshullam Tysmenitz (1794-1801); Moses Sofer (Hatham Sofer; 1807-39); Samuel Schreiber (Kethab Sofer; 1839-72); Simhah Bunem Schreiber (Shebet Sofer; 1872-1906); Akiba Schreiber (from 1906). The brilliant era of Talmudic learning began with Moses Lwów, and was fostered by learned Jews from Moravia who came to Hungary to escape the Familianten law. It reached its height under Moses Sofer, when life in the Pressburg community was marked by high ethical standards and by a rigidly negative attitude toward secular education. Under Hatham Sofer the Yeshiva students numbered about 400, attracted to Pressburg from all parts of Hungary and the neighboring countries.

The first Hungarian Jewish printed text, a translation of the oath of excommunication pronounced by Ezekiel Landau, was printed at Pressburg in 1757. The Hebrew printing-office established at Pressburg by the non-Jew Anton von Schmidt published fine editions of many Hebrew works. In 1833 Samuel Neumann translated into German and published Maimonides' Milloth Hahiggayon.

Several great fires damaged the Pressburg ghetto in the early 19th and early 20th centuries. After the shelling of the city by Napoleon in 1809 and the destruction of a number of houses of Jews in the suburb of Wödritz Neustift, some of the Jews fled the city. It was demanded of those who remained that they pay 52,000 gulden as their share of the war indemnity required by Napoleon. The Jews agreed to pay 30,000 gulden, although there were only half a dozen wealthy house-owners among them. In 1811 a fire destroyed the Jewish hospital and community house. The archives of the community, believed lost in that conflagration, were found by Rabbi Lázár Schönfeld in 1907. In 1913 a fire destroyed ninety-seven Jewish-owned houses and the Yeshiva Beth Hamidrash, with its great library.

For a long time the ghetto was self-sufficient, with Jewish learning flourishing there, and tendencies toward seeking contact with the outside world were suppressed. In 1783, by edict of Joseph II, a "German national school" was opened, but it was closed in 1790 after that enlightened emperor's death. The opening of the Primärschule by progressive Jews in 1820 was the signal for a cultural dispute. In 1827 the progressives obtained an imperial order for the closing of the Pressburg Yeshiva. Two trustees of the community, Moses Bettelheim and Wolff Pappenheim, offered 20,000 gulden for the revocation of the order, which was granted. When the Casino club for the propagation of secular culture among the Jews was established, the Orthodox combatted it and caused its dissolution. In 1848 anti-Semitic elements of the city protested against the intended emancipation of the Jews by organizing bloody riots and forcing them back into the ghetto. In 1851 some Jews succeeded in opening stores outside of the ghetto, which was incorporated into the city territory. In 1859 the Pressburg Yeshiva was made a public rabbinical school by the government.

3. From the Emancipation of the Jews (1867) to the Fall of the Czechoslovak Republic (1939). After the Jews' emancipation in 1867, the Pressburg Jews took part in local and national economic and political life. In 1872 a Reform congregation had been organized, but the Orthodox congregation retained its preponderant role. Riots occurred in 1882 and 1883 at the time of the Tiszaeszlár blood accusation. The first Zionist group of Hungary was organized at Pressburg in 1897, when Samuel Bettelheim founded the Ahavath Zion Club among Yeshiva students. The first national conference of Hungarian Zionists was held there in 1903, the first World Mizrachi Congress in 1904. The leaders of the Orthodox community observed the old custom of presenting the king-emperor at Vienna with several geese yearly on St. Martin's Day.

Under the Czechoslovak republic (1918-39), Pressburg (now called Bratislava) became the capital of Slovakia. The Jews there benefited both economically and politically from the new government's democratic policy. From 10,973 in 1921 their number rose to 12,800 in 1927; in the latter year, the high point of economic prosperity of the period, the Orthodox community of Pressburg maintained seventeen charitable institutions, six schools, including the Yeshiva, eleven associations for Bible and Talmud study by adults, eleven synagogues, and six houses of prayer. The progressive community maintained two synagogues, two schools, a Hebrah Kaddisha and a library. In 1933 a large modern hospital was dedicated.

Several Jewish periodicals were published in Pressburg, including the Jüdische Volkszeitung, organ of the Jewish Party (nationalist) of Czechoslovakia. In 1931 it elected Julius Reisz, a Pressburg lawyer, as a deputy. In the same year an anti-Zionist party of Slovakian Jews was organized with headquarters in Pressburg. Pressburg was the headquarters also of the national associations of the Orthodox, progressive and status quo communities of Slovakia, as well as of the Mizrachi, Zionist, Agudath Israel, Jewish Economic and Jewish Culture groups. In 1937 a Pressburg street was named after Max Stein (d. 1930), a merchant and president of the progressive community.

Anti-Semitic riots occurred sporadically, especially at the Komensky University. In 1934 a division of Judaica was founded there from donations by Pressburg Jews.

4. Under Nazi Influence (1939-). When, in March, 1939, the Czechoslovak state was broken up by German invasion, Pressburg became the capital of the nominally independent state of Slovakia. At once anti-Semitic rioting set in, fomented by the Hlinka Guard, a military formation of Slovakian fascists, and by foreign and resident Germans. Jews were attacked in the streets and in their homes, tortured and publicly humiliated, in Pressburg and in other cities and towns throughout Slovakia.

On August 11 to 13, 1939, the two main synagogues of the Orthodox and progressive communities were wrecked; valuable historical documents in the archives of the latter community and the furnishings and books of the Yeshiva were destroyed. In 1940 the process of depriving the Jews of their civil rights began. In August, 1941, the evacuation of Jews from Pressburg began; many were transferred to temporary concentration camps and to "ghetto towns" along the Polish border. All property of the expelled Jews was confiscated. In October, 1941, the Jewish public school was closed. Jews were dragged from synagogal services and forced to clean the school building on Rosh Hashanah.

In December, 1941, a typhus epidemic raged among the Jews crowded into inadequate quarters in the town of Sered, near Pressburg. Their number, according to reports, was about 15,000. In March, 1942, there began the deportation of Jews from the "ghetto towns" into German Nazi-controlled Galicia and White Russia, allegedly for labor purposes; the deportees were allowed to take along only hand luggage. In April, 1942, a Jewish community council was set up in Pressburg to take over the work of sixty Jewish communal boards dissolved by the government; immediately after its formation its officers and employees were sent to labor camps, leaving the Slovakian Jews without representation. Jewish physicians and engineers, and Jews who had embraced Christianity, were exempted from deportation in May, 1942. The latter were ordered segregated into separate groups. Some Jews tried to escape deportation by joining the Catholic or Protestant church; others took to the woods, where hundreds died of starvation. In the same month Jews were forbidden to enter Pressburg without a special written permit. It was assumed that no Jews were living in Pressburg by that time. ISAAC SCHWARTZ.

Lit.: Greenwald, Leopold, Koroth Ir Pressburg Ugedoleha (1912); Gold, Hugo, Juden und Judengemeinde Bratislava in Vergangenheit und Gegenwart (1930); the issues of Judaica for 1934 to 1937; Monumenta Hungariae Judaica, vols. 1 to 4 (1903-38); Löwinger, Hermann, Pressburger Ghettobilder (1900); Mayer, Sigmund, Die Wiener Juden (1917).

PRESSBURG, SIMON, see MICHEL, SIMON.

PRESSMAN, LEE, attorney, b. New York city, 1906. After receiving his law degree from Harvard University in 1929, he started practice with the firm of Chadbourne, Stanchfield and Levy; in 1933 he became a member of Liebman, Blumenthal and Levy, and three years later entered the firm of Liebman, Robbins and Pressman. He began to serve as a public counsel when Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace appointed him to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in Washington, D. C., in 1933; two years later he became general counsel for the Works Progress Administration and for the Resettlement Administration. In 1936 he took up the post of general counsel for the Congress of Industrial Organizations, a position he still held in 1942.

He was also made general counsel for the Steel Workers and the Textile Workers Organizing Committees. In these capacities Pressman was a close adviser of John L. Lewis, and later of Philip Murray, and the frequent representative in public meeting and conference of the views of the trade unions.

PRESUMPTION, LEGAL. The extensive use of legal presumption is an especial feature of Jewish law. This arises out of the fact that evidence is strictly limited to the two classical witnesses in criminal cases, and to oath, document and admission in civil cases, which makes it necessary to enlarge the basis for rendering a judgment by other measures. Legal presumption consists of taking for granted a certain intention or condition of affairs on the basis of probability. There are a number of such legal presumptions in Jewish law, of which the following are the best known.

1. Miggo (literally, "from within"). This is a term which occurs frequently in the Talmud, and means that a legal consideration is derived from a fact or a legal possibility and justifies the plea that the admission of a fact makes credible further statements on the same subject. The one who makes the statements can point to the fact that he was not compelled to make the admission and can therefore merit belief as to his other statements. Miggo is also used as a designation for conclusions made on the principle of analogy, for instance it may be assumed "since a person is suspected in matters of money, he is also to be suspected in matters of an oath" (B.M. 5b).

Miggo also serves as a presumption of the argumentative power and legal recognition of plea in a process, in case the statement given in the plea, generally to the disadvantage of the one who makes it, was given without compulsion, although other statements which would have been indisputable might have been given. The statement thus obtains creditability, even though it is not sufficient proof in itself, because it would have been possible to make another statement which had more of proof and was more favorable to the maker. The Mishnah and Tosefta (Keth. 22a) adduce a legal principle which at the same time gives the psychological side of the Miggo idea: "The mouth that forbids is the mouth that permits," that is, if one makes a statement that would lead to a prohibition, he can be believed about a statement that would lead to a permission.

2. Majority (rob). This plays an especially important role in ritual law. It is based on the fact of experience that purely on the basis of numbers there is a certain presumption in favor of whatever is in the majority.

3. Continuous Condition (hazaḳah ḳamaitha). The basic presumption in this case that an object or a person will continue to be in the same condition as it has been in the past, and accordingly is presumed to be in that condition unless proof is brought to the contrary.

4. Normality. This very extensive presumption is based on the idea that no one does things outside of the normal range of human behavior. Thus it is assumed that nobody will boldly present a completely fictitious assertion in the presence of the opposing party, and that no debtor will pay a debt before the time that it falls due.

5. Hazakah. This very important presumption furnishes proof for the ownership of property. If one desires to establish his legal right to certain property, but lacks the proper documentary proof, he can do so by coming before the court and establishing the fact of his undisturbed possession of the property over a length of time.

See also HAZAKAH. MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Toen Venitan; Fink, D., Miggo als Rechtsbeweis im babylonischen Talmud (1891); the literature under HAZAKAH.

PREUSS, HUGO, German deputy, and jurist, b. Berlin, 1860; d. Berlin, 1925. He was an instructor of constitutional and administration law at the University of Berlin. In 1906 he became professor of public law at the Berlin Handelshochschule, and in 1918 its rector. Immediately after the revolution of 1918 he became secretary of the interior, and in 1919 minister of the interior.

Preuss drew up the law governing elections to the constituent assembly of the German Reich, introducing reforms in woman's suffrage and proportional representation. He can justly be regarded as the creator of the German republican constitution, the so-called Weimar Constitution. In the summer of 1919 he resigned from the government because of the signing of the Versailles Peace Treaty, but he concluded his constitutional work as commissary of the government.

In 1895 he had been elected a member of the Berlin city council, and in 1910 a city councillor without pay; later he was a delegate to the Prussian Diet. He contributed many works on constitutional law; his Entwicklung des deutschen Städtewesens (1906-9) is considered an authoritative work. His many other writings deal mainly with the problem of administration.

Lit.: Feder, E., Hugo Preuss, ein Lebensbild (1926).

PRIBRAM, ALFRED, physician, b. Prague, 1841; d. Prague, 1912. In 1869 he became assistant at the Second Clinic and lecturer at the university in Prague. In 1873 he was appointed assistant professor and in 1877 chief of the polyclinic. From 1881 on he was associate professor of pathology and chief of the First Clinic of the university in Prague. An eminent teacher and clinician, Pribram worked especially in therapy. Among his numerous scientific works, those dealing with febris recurrens, abdominal and spotted typhus and rheumatic fever are the most important.

His published works include Therapeutische Zeitfragen (1889); Beiträge zur Lehre vom Cruraldoppelton (1891); Grundzüge der Therapie (1895); "Der akute Gelenksrheumatismus" (in Nothnagel's Spezielle Pathologie und Therapie, vol. 5, part 2, 1901); "Chronischer Gelenksrheumatismus" (ibid., vol. 7, part 2, 1903); "Krankheiten des Darmes" (in Epstein-Schwalbe, Handbuch, 1901).

Lit.: Biographisches Lexikon hervorragender Ärzte, vol. 2 (1933).

PRIBRAM, ALFRED FRANCIS, historian, b. London, 1859. In 1894 he became professor of modern history at the University of Vienna. Shortly afterward he was elected a member of the Vienna Akademie der Wissenschaften. He was invited several times to deliver lectures at British universities. His historical works throw much light on the European diplomacy and system of government which produced the catastrophe of 1914. Pribram contributed to the 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th editions of the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

His numerous published works include: Österreich und Brandenburg (2 vols.); Secret Treaties of Austria-Hungary 1879-1914; England and the International Policy of the European Great Powers 1871-1914 (1931); Materialien zur Geschichte der Preise und Löhne in Österreich (1938). He also completed and issued the second and third volumes of Friedjung's important work, Das Zeitalter des Imperialismus. His two-volume Urkunden und Akten zur Geschichte der Juden in Wien (Vienna and Leipzig, 1918) is a valuable contribution to the history of the Jews in Vienna.

In 1941 Pribram was reported to be still living in Vienna.

PRIBRAM, ERNST, serologist, b. Prague, 1879; d. Chicago, 1940. In 1911 he established himself in Vienna as specialist for general and experimental pathology, became assistant professor at the University of Vienna in 1915, and was appointed associate professor at the University of Chicago, Rush Medical College, in 1925. From 1928 on he was professor of bacteriology and preventive medicine at Loyola University, Chicago. Pribram occupied himself with studies of bacteriology, serology, colloid chemistry, pharmacology, physiology and pathology.

His published works include: Darstellung der Antikörper mittels chemischer und physikalischer Methoden (together with M. V. Eisler); "Hämotoxine und Antihämotoxine der Bakterien" (in Handbuch der pathologischen Mikroorganismen, 1913); "Anlegung und Pflege einer Kulturensammlung," ibid., 1930); "Die wichtigsten Methoden beim Arbeiten mit Bacterien" (in Handbuch der biologischen Arbeitsmethoden, 1925); Culture Media for Bacteria and Fungi (1925); Classification of Bacteria (1933).

Lit.: Biographisches Lexikon hervorragender Ärzte (1933) 1247.

PRICE, GEORGE MOSES, physician and medical officer, b. Poltava, Russia, 1864. He came to New York city in 1882, and after receiving his medical degree from New York University in 1895, established a private practice, which he continued until 1915. As an expert in the problems of public health Price was appointed inspector in the New York Health Department (1895-1904) and director of the investigations of the New York State Factory Commission (1911-12). From 1910 to 1928 he served as director of the Joint Board of Sanitary Control. In 1913 he was appointed director of Union Health Center, a post he still held in 1942.

Among Price's published writings are: Russian Hebrews in the United States (St. Petersburg, 1891); Handbook on Sanitation (1901); Tenement House Inspection (1904); Hygiene and Public Health (1914); Modern Factory (1914; published also in Russian and Japanese); Protection of Workers in Russia (1927).

PRIESTLY BLESSING (birkath kohanim), formula of benediction prescribed in Num. 6:24-26 for Aaron and his descendants, and beginning with the word yebarechecha ("The Lord bless thee"). This blessing was part of the daily ritual in the Temple at Jerusalem. Each morning and evening, before the thank-offering was made, the priests would stand on the steps of the entrance hall and pronounce this blessing. This place was called duchan ("tribune"); from this is derived the customary term duchenen for the saying of the priestly blessing, which is current among German-speaking Jews even today. The priests raised their hands aloft when they recited this blessing; therefore old Jewish sources designate it by the term nesi'ath kappayim, "raising of the hands."

The priestly blessing was transferred in later times from the sacrificial cult to the service of the synagogue. The Temple in Jerusalem even had a room which was used as a synagogue, in which, on certain occasions, such as the public fasts, the blessing was given as often as four times a day; that is, at the two offerings mentioned above, at the time of the additional offering (Musaf) at noon, and at evening when the gates were closed (Neilah).

Even during the time when the Second Temple was still in existence the priestly blessing was pronounced in the synagogues outside of Jerusalem, although there were certain differences in its manner of delivery. It did not cease after the Temple was destroyed, but was preserved in the services in the synagogue; it was declared that it was the religious duty of the Aaronides to pronounce this blessing. This was made a part of the Eighteen Benedictions (Tefillah) and incorporated in it before the beginning of the last section; sometimes this last part went under the name of Birkath Kohanim.

The priests were required to act as they did in the Temple, to take off their sandals, to wash their hands, to spread out their fingers, and to stand opposite the congregation. At times there were strange notions current about the magical effects of the blessing, which led to the order that the people should not look at the priests while they were reciting it. The spreading out of the hands became a characteristic symbol of the Aaronides and was often carved on their tombstones. In the synagogue the blessing is first said by the precentor before the priests do so, but they themselves utter a special benediction first.

Originally the congregation listened attentively to the blessing, but in course of time they were unwilling to listen and not do anything themselves. This difficulty was solved by assigning certain Biblical verses for them to say at the same time. However, this had the result that in the post-Biblical time a corresponding verse for the congregation to each word uttered by the priests had been introduced and all the warnings not to disturb the blessing by the loud utterance of these verses had been disregarded.

A by no means slight evil was caused by the fear of bad dreams which was widespread in Babylonia. If anyone had forgotten what he had dreamt he was ordered by an Amora to say a prayer at the time of the blessing, in order that his dream might have a favorable meaning. In course of time this prayer was added to the priestly blessing and recited twice by the congregation. Finally, in a later period, when the Cabala had great influence, a still longer prayer was introduced at the close of the third sentence; this even included some completely incomprehensible Greek words in Hebrew form. The result of all these improper additions was that the Aaronides no longer pronounced the blessing, but sang it, and protracted the singing for a long time. Accordingly the blessing lost its original meaning and aroused much opposition.

Originally the blessing was to be said every time the Eighteen Benedictions were recited in the synagogue; soon, however, it was limited to the morning prayer. The only exception was on Yom Kippur, when it was recited four times in Palestine and three times in other countries. The Jews of Yemen still maintain the practice of having the Aaronides recite the blessing every day. In Europe the giving of the blessing on weekdays was discontinued at an early period, and it was restricted to the holidays. In Spain, however, it was given also on the Sabbath, but during the Musaf service. In congregations using the Polish and German rituals it is omitted even on holidays if these fall on the Sabbath. When the Aaronides do not pronounce the blessing the reader recites it. It is pronounced outside of the synagogue on festive occasions like births and weddings. In this use it has been introduced into the church as well. ISMAR ELBOGEN.

Lit.: Singer, S., and Abrahams, I., Authorised Daily Prayer Book (1922) 238a; Elbogen, I., Der jüdische Gottesdienst (1924; 2nd ed. 1931) 67. Dembitz, L., Jewish Services (1898) 126-27.

PRIESTLY CASTE, the division of the sacerdotal officiants of Judaism in the period of the First Temple (950 to 586 B.C.E.) and of the Second Temple (520 B.C.E. to 70 C.E.) into special classes. The earliest legal differentiation of a special priestly class occurred with the Deuteronomic Law during the reign of Josiah of Judah (639 to 608 B.C.E.), when the descendants of Levi were designated as the legitimate priests. Except for the Blessing of Moses (Deut. 33:8-11), outlining the privileges and prerogatives of the Levites (which scholars date around the beginning of the 8th cent. B.C.E.), the priestly officiants might have been the head of a family or clan, the king himself, or a member of any one of the tribes of Israel.

Gradually the landless group of the Levites assumed the priestly functions, de facto if not de jure, at the various sanctuaries from Dan to Beer-sheba. As a result, while non-Levites, like Samuel, David, Solomon and Jeroboam acted in priestly capacities, the sons of Levi claimed the priesthood on the basis of their loyalty to God at the incident of the golden calf (Ex. 32:25-29). Many years later Deuteronomy (10:8) was to refer to the event: "At that time the Lord set apart the tribe of Levi, to bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord, to stand before the Lord to minister unto Him, and to bless in His Name." The historical and prophetic writings of the 8th cent. B.C.E., while having much to say about officiating priests, never designated them as of Levitical descent. Deut. 33:8-11 forms the notable exception, and may be taken as Levitical propaganda put into the mouth of Moses. It proclaims Levi as the priestly caste, because of its devotion to God at Massah and Meribah, and because fidelity to God was placed above devotion to kindred. Therefore Levi is to have the privilege of the Urim and Thummim, and shall be charged with the responsibility of making known the will of God, of teaching Israel His laws and ordinances, and of officiating at His altar. God is to bless the sons of Levi and put down their enemies.

Following the promulgation of the Deuteronomic Code (621 B.C.E.), the prevailing custom of Levitical priesthood was made law. While the legislation made the Levites exclusively the priests of God, it set up almost unwittingly a distinction within the Levites themselves. Not all the sons of Levi did or could officiate in Jerusalem, where stood the only legal sanctuary. In actual practice the rural priests, whose sanctuaries were destroyed by royal order, were not given full rights at the Temple. The Jerusalem authors of the Deuteronomic Code jealously guarded their incumbent privileges. Not long thereafter they sought to establish a further distinction in the priestly class. The test of legitimacy became Levitical descent through Zadok, the high priest of David. To officiate then at the royal sanctuary one had to be not only a Levite but a Zadokite as well. While it is not likely that all non-Zadokite priests were excluded from the Jerusalem court, it is certain that by the turn of the 7th cent. the Temple priestly caste was elaborate and well set. The last days of the First Temple are reflected in the priestly legislation of Ezekiel (40 to 48). In the elaboration of a theocratic state that is to be set up in and around a restored Jerusalem and a rebuilt sanctuary, sharp distinction is to be made between the priests, "sons of Zadok among the sons of Levi, who alone may approach God and minister unto Him" (44:15), "the keepers of the charge of the altar" (40:46), and the ordinary Levites, "who went far from God, when Israel went astray" (44:10). As with Deuteronomy, the non-Levitical groups are prohibited from ministering, offering sacrifice or approaching the altar. The Levites were to serve the people, slay the burnt offering, and sacrifice for them (44:11-14). The Zadokite priests alone might enter the sanctuary and minister at the table. Such a rite required linen attire, trimmed hair, and sobriety. Ezekiel's differentiation of three classes is apparent in the projected division of land for inheritance. A sector for the priests 25,000 by 10,000 reeds, the holy portion of the land, shall be set apart for a sanctuary and for residence (45:1-4). A section of similar size is to be appointed for Levites and their twenty chambers (44:5). And an adjacent public domain of half this size is to be appointed for "the whole house of Israel" (verse 6). A separate parcel was to be given to the prince, "who is to rule his people justly" (44:7-9).

The Holiness Code (Lev. 17 to 26), written to serve the needs of the new Temple (516 B.C.E.), continues the priestly caste distinction of Ezekiel, except that the officiating priests are designated as the "sons of Aaron" (Lev. 21:10-15 is a repetition of Ezekiel). The purity of the priesthood and meticulous ceremonial conduct are likewise emphasized. The later books of Nehemiah (444 B.C.E. and Ezra (457 B.C.E.) list over 4,000 priests who returned from the Exile, drawn chiefly from four families of priestly caste: Jedaiah-Jeshua, Immer, Pashhur, and Harim (Ezra 2:36-39; Neh. 7:39-42). Practice and cult requirement brought differentiation in the priestly caste that was to achieve its fullest development in the Priestly Code (P), and its observance. The chief priest or high priest became differentiated at the time of the return, and it remained for P to trace the institution back to Eleazar, Phinehas, through Zadok, Jehoiada (II Kings 11-4) and Jeshua (Haggai 1:1). Nehemiah establishes for us a line of chief or high priests for his day: Joiakim (12:10), Eliashib (3:1), Joiada, Johanan, and Jaddua (12:22). Constituting one-tenth of the returning exiles, the priesthood, and particularly the high priest, could exert temporal as well as spiritual power, and as time went on the high priest's family grew to be the most powerful in the Judean community, followed by the balance of the priesthood, who in turn were served by the Levites, and a host of lesser altar servants, notably the singers and sons of Asaph, porters, and Nethinim (Ezra 8:18-20).

The Priestly Code (500-400 B.C.E.), which gave final form and ideology to all Biblical legislation, fixed Israel's priestly caste for almost a millennium. So strongly was the distinction between priests, Levites, and the balance of the household of Israel drawn, that long after the fall of the Temple in 70 C.E. and the subsequent dispersion of Israel (in fact, in Orthodox Jewish communities still today), that ancient caste differentiation is still felt. Aaron and his male descendents constitute the priesthood which alone "can approach the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar" (Lev. 2 to 7). The duty of the priestly caste was primarily sacrificial (see Lev. 1 to 7, manual of worship). Theirs was the exclusive prerogative of the altar, sanctuary, and holy things. Sanctified unto God, they avoided the general practices of Israel that might lead to defilement (Lev. 10:8-9; 21:1-24), they taught ceremonial law (Lev. 10:11), and had the prerogative of blessing the people (Lev. 9:22; Num. 6:22-27). Their revenue was derived from first-fruits, tithes and redemption money. The quality of their holiness, like that of the code itself, was principally ceremonial rather than moral (Ex. 29:24, Lev. 2:3, 10; 6:16-18; 7:6-10; Num. 5:9-6).

Within the priesthood itself, P differentiates the "priest that is highest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil is poured, and that is consecrated to put on the garments" (Lev. 21:10; see Ex. 29:1; Lev. 6:20-23). Not only he, but his sons also, are anointed to distinguish them from the rank and file of the priesthood (Ex. 28:41; 29:21; 40:13; Lev. 7:35; 8:30). The high priest himself is a lineal descendant of Aaron, continuing through the line of Eleazer and Phinehas (Num. 20:28-29; 25:10-13). While Ezekiel had referred to "the priest," hakohen, entrusted with the two-day purification of the altar, no special title is given him. Even the chief priests of the monarchies, Abiathar, Zadok, Jehoiada, Urijah, and Hilkiah, hardly attained the stature of the high priest of P. It must be remembered that Abiathar was removed by Solomon, and Zadok, the friend of David, put in his place. The high priest of P could hardly have been subordinate to a temporal monarch. Joshua, the spiritual leader of the return, appears to have enjoyed the prominence P ascribes to the high priest (Zech. 3; Haggai 1:12). The high priestly garb receives elaborate description (Ex. 28:1-38; 39:5-9; Lev. 8:6-9). He wore the ephod over white linen, and six tribes were represented in onyx on each shoulder (Ex. 28:6-14). Over the breastplate was the Urim and Thummim. On the mitre of the high priest were inscribed the words kadosh ladonai ("sacred unto the Lord"). On the Day of Atonement the high priest, in special garb, entered the inner sanctuary to plead for his people (Lev. 16:1 et seq.).

The Levites, as the third sacerdotal caste, were sharply distinguished from the priests in P by both precept and example (Num. 18:1-7). They were to be given to the priests as servants (Num. 3:10-13), and under no circumstance could they aspire to the priestly office, as the stories of Korah in Num. 16 and of Dathan and Abiram in Num. 17 show so clearly. The Levites were charged with the external care of the Mosaic sanctuary and with the court and its furniture (Num. 4:20). That their services were really intended for the elaborate rituals of the Second Temple may be gleaned from the assignment of 22,000 Levites to the care of the small Tabernacle in the wilderness. That the Levitical class greatly outnumbered the priestly caste, even as "the sons of Aaron" outnumbered the high priestly family, may be seen in P's assignment of forty-eight cities to the Levites (Lev. 25:32-34; Num. 35:1-8; Josh. 21:1-42). The body of Levites was, furthermore, divided into three great eponymous clans, Gershom, Kohath, and Merari. Reflecting the period of the return as well as his own, the Chronicler assigns to the Levites the music service of praise and that of doorkeepers of the Temple (I Chron. 6:33; 9:14-34; 15:5-24; 24 to 26). After the return, two other clerical bodies, who may later have been absorbed by the Levites, are mentioned, namely, the Nethinim and "the children of Solomon's servants" (Ezra 2:43-58; Neh. 7:46-60; I Chron. 9:2).

The priestly caste, as established by the Priestly Code, continued relatively undisturbed until the overthrow of the sacrificial cult with the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E. While the high priest Eliashib seemed to enjoy little prestige under Nehemiah (Neh. 3), the priestly families that moved into Jerusalem and aided in the promulgation of the law at the time of Ezra continued to function until the Roman campaign under Titus swept away priesthood and Temple. The twenty-four courses or relays (I Chron. 24:1-6), sixteen stemming from Eleazar and eight from Ithamar, continued to the end (Josephus, Life, book 1; Antiquities, book 7, chap. 14, section 7; Taan. 2:6-7; 4:2; 27b; Suk. 5:6-8; 25ab. On the high priest in the pre-Maccabean period, see Josephus, Antiquities, books 11 to 15). In Maccabean times the old temporal aspects of the high priesthood reached their zenith in the regime of the Hasmoneans, Jonathan, Simon, John Hyrcanus, Aristobulus, and Alexander Jannaeus. Jewish temporal power, however, came to an end with Hyrcanus II and the beginning of Roman overlordship in 63 B.C.E. From the reign of Herod (37 B.C.E.) under the tutelage of Rome until the fall of the city of Jerusalem, the high priest was the appointive underling of the Herods or of the Roman procurator.

Rabbinic law maintained the prerogatives of the high priest and the caste distinctions of the Priestly Code. The priestly privilege of blessing the people (Num. 6:22-27) was reserved for those of priestly descent (kohanim) even after the destruction of the Temple.

The Priestly Blessing (the birkath kohanim of R.H. 4:5; now called Duchan) in the synagogue is still the prerogative of those claiming priestly descent, by virtue of the name Cohen (or some derivative, such as Kahn, Kagan, Katz, Kaplan, and the like). In this sense, the name is an indication of descent from Aaron, the original high priest of P. They are likewise accorded the honor of being first called to the Reading of the Torah in the synagogue, to be followed by a Levite (usually one named Levy, Levine, Levitt, or the like), in accordance with the caste distinctions of D and P, and then by any other Jew. To the Kohen, also, there remains the prerogative of receiving five shekels for the redemption of the first-born son on the thirtieth day.

Rabbinical authorities of the Diaspora often questioned the priestly caste pretentions of those bearing the title Hakohen, or a derived name. In the 14th cent., Isaac ben Sheshet distinguished between ancient and contemporary Kohanim, stating that it was only usage and not law that maintained their distinctions and prerogatives (Responsa 94). Samuel de Medina, in the 16th cent., concurred in this view, basing it on the unlikelihood of a pure heredity for the contemporaneous Kohen, since, desipte restrictions, miscegenation had occurred among Kohanim as among other Jews (Responsa 235). Solomon Luria also felt that it was impossible for Kohanim to maintain their purity of descent through the centuries, and thus, in accordance with Talmudic law, they were disqualified from priestly privileges. Jacob Emden recommended that a Cohen return the five shekels given him for the redemption of the first-born, because the priest's doubtful origin precluded his keeping the money. Some rabbis contend that Kohanim must not even pronounce the priestly blessing.

See also: PRIESTLY BLESSING; PRIESTS.

ADOLPH J. FEINBERG.

Lit.: See the literature under PRIESTS. Additional information may be found in the following: Moore, G. F. "Sacrifice," Encyclopaedia Biblica, vol. 4 (1903), cols. 4183-4233; Eissfeldt, O., Erstlinge und Zehnten im Alten Testament (1917); Loisy, A., Essai historique sur le sacrifice israélite (1921); Elbogen, I., Der jüdische Gottesdienst (1924); Oesterley, W. O. E., Sacrifices in Ancient Israel (1937); Westphal, G., Jahwes Wohnstätte (1908); Arnold, W. R., Ephod and Ark (1917); Möhlenbrink, K., Der Tempel Salomos (1932); Morgenstern, Julian, "A Chapter in the History of the High Priesthood," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, vol. 55 (1938), Nos. 1, 2 and 4; article, "Cohen," Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 4, p. 144.

PRIESTLY CODE (P), name given by Bible critics to a stratum of the Hexateuch (the first six books of the Bible), which they hold to be written by priestly writers in the 5th cent. B.C.E. as a historical commentary on the embryonic Pentateuch (JED). P includes a group of narratives, illustrative legislation, and a body of ritual laws, pertaining chiefly to sacrifices and purifications. One of the fundamental documents of the Hexateuch, the Priestly Code was identified as early as 1853 (Hupfeld) by modern Bible scholars, who propounded the widely accepted documentary theory of Pentateuchal composition. While Hupfeld, followed by Dillmann (1875) and Delitzsch (1880), recognized what was later known as P, he called it First Elohist and placed it chronologically before J and E. It remained for K. H. Graf (1866), guided by the researches of George and Vatke, to demonstrate the lateness of the Levitical legislation. Bishop Colenso of Natal (1862-79) proved the narrative portions of P to be unhistorical and post-Exilic, as did A. Kuenen (d. 1891) for the Priestly Code as a whole. It was the brilliant and incisive writings of Wellhausen (1876-84) that led the majority of Bible critics to accept the "Graf-Wellhausen" theory, which places the composition of the Hexateuchal documents as follows: J (about 850 B.C.E.) and E (about 750) were combined by a redactor (RJE) about 650 B.C.E.; the Deuteronomic Code (621) was added to JE about 550, to which the Priestly Code (500 to 450) was joined about 400 B.C.E., when the Pentateuch received essentially its present form. Since the days of Wellhausen, scholars have recognized that none of the four great sources of the Hexateuch is a literary unit. As early as 1862 Graf identified the Holiness Code or H in Lev. 17 to 26, and later writers identified a primary source (P) and a secondary stratum (Ps) in the Priestly Code itself.

The Priestly Narratives. Bible critics include the following within the Priestly document:

A. From the Creation to Noah. 1. "These are the generations of the heaven and of the earth when they were created" (Gen. 2:4a) should precede the story of Creation in six days (1:1 to 2:3). 2. The list of the eight first-born descendents of Seth, son of Adam, ending with the three sons of Noah (5:1-28, 30-32).

B. From Noah to Abram. 1. "These are the generations of Noah" (6:9a) begins the Flood Story (6:9-22; 7:6, 11, 13-16a, 17a, 18-21, 24; 8:1-2a, 3b-5, 13a, 14-19; 9:17, 28-29). 2. The table of the nations of mankind begins with the "genealogy of the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth" (10:1a), wherein are given the Japhethite peoples (10:2-5), the Hamite (10:6-7, 20), the Semite (10:22-23, 31), who inhabited the earth after the flood (10:32), but who in reality were nations contemporary with a 5th or 7th cent. B.C.E. writer. 3. The descendents of Shem (11:10-26) bring the narrative down to Abram.

C. From Abraham to the sojourn in Egypt. 1. "The genealogy of Terah" (11:27a) tells of the journey from Ur to Haran (11:27, 31-32). 2. Abraham and Lot (12:4b-5; 13:6, 11b-12); the birth of Ishmael (16:1a, 3, 15-16). 3. God's Covenant (17:6-8) and the rite of circumcision (17:9-14); concerning Isaac and Ishmael (17:15-22), and the circumcision of Abraham's household (17:23-27). 4. The deliverance of Lot (19:29). 5. The birth of Isaac (21:1b, 2b-5). 6. The death and burial of Sarah (23:1-20), and of Abraham (25:7-11a). 7. Ishmaelite tribes and localities (25:12-17). 8. Data on Isaac and his family (25:19-20, 26b). 9. Esau (26:34-35). 10. Jacob (27:46 to 28:9; 29:24, 28b-29; 30:4a, 9b, 22a; 31:18a$^{\beta}$b; 33:18a$^{\beta}$; 35:6a, 9:13, 15, 22b-29; 37:1). 11. The family of Esau (36:1-5); migration to Seir (36:6-8); Edom's chiefs (36:40-43). 12. Jacob's genealogy (37:2a$^{\alpha}$); Joseph (37:1-2; 41:46a). 13. Israel in Egypt (46:6-7); seventy souls (46:8-27, Ps). 14. Blessing of Jacob, his death and burial (48:3-6; 49:1a, 28b-33; 50:12-13).

D. Moses and Joshua. 1. Oppression of Israel in Egypt (Ex. 1:1-5, 7a$^{\alpha}$b, 13-14a$^{\alpha}$; 2:23a$^{\beta}$b-25). 2. The revelation of the name of God (6:2-12, 13, 28-30). 3. Chiefs of Reuben (6:14), Simeon (6:15), Levi 6:16-27), all Ps. 4. God's instructions to Moses and Aaron (7:1-13). 5. The plagues (7:19-20a$^{\alpha}$, 21b-22; 8:1-3, 11-15; 9:8-12; 11:9-10). 6. The Exodus and Passover (12:1-28, 40-51; 13:1-2, 20; 14:1-2, 4, 8-9, 10b, and part of 14:15-18, 21-23, 26-29). 7. Manna (most of 16:1-36). 8. The journey to Sinai (17:1ab$^{\alpha}$; 19:1-2a). 9. Revelation on Sinai (24:15b-18a); instructions about the Tabernacle (25:1-31); Moses' shining face (34:29-35); and the building of the Tabernacle (35 to 40, Ps). 10. Levitical laws: sacrifices (Lev. 1 to 7), priesthood (8 to 10), purifications (11 to 15), the Day of Atonement (16), Holiness Code (17 to 26), vows and tithes (27). 11. The organization of the camp at the foot of Sinai, mostly Ps (Num. 1:1 to 10:10). 12. The departure from Sinai (10:11-12, P; 10:13-28, Ps). 13. The spies and their pessimistic report (13:1-17a, 21, 25-26a, 32ab$^{\alpha}$; 14:1a, 2, 5-7, 10; most of 14:26-38). 14. Miscellaneous laws (15:1-41). 15. Korah's rebellion (16:1a, 2a$^{\beta}$b, 3-11, 16-24, 27, 35; 17:1-28; P, Ps, and RP). 16. Prerogatives of the priests and Levites (18:1-32). 17. Ashes of a red heifer (19:1-22, Ps). 18. Waters of Meribah at Kadesh (20:1aα, 2, 3b-4, 6-8a, 10, 11bβ, 12-13); death of Aaron at Mt. Hor (20:22-29); itinerary (21:4a, 10-11a; 22:1). 19. At Moab; Phinehas kills an Israelite and a Midianite woman (25:6-18, Ps); the second census (25:19 to 26:65); the daughters of Zelophehad (27:1-11, Ps); announcement of the death of Moses and the succession of Joshua (27:12-23, Ps); laws (28:1 to 30:17, Ps). 20. War with Midian (31, Ps). 21. The allotment of Transjordania (32:1a, 2b, 4a, 6-15, 18-19, 28-33, mostly Ps); Moses recounts Israel's itinerary (33:1-49, mostly Ps); cities of refuge (35, Ps); instructions for allotting the land (33:50 to 34:29, Ps); on the inheritance of daughters (36, Ps). 22. The death of Moses (Deut. 32:48-52; 34:1-4 in part, 7-9). 23. Conquest of Canaan (Josh. 4:10, 16, 19; 5:10-12; 9:15b, 17-21, 27a); the list of thirty-one kings (12:1-24; at least the second part is P). 24. Partition of the land among the tribes of Israel (13:15-33; 14:1-2, 3-5 in part; 15:1-12, 20-62; 16:4-8; 17:1-6 (partly Ps); 18:1-28; 19:1-51 (almost all); 20:1-21, 42; 22:9-34 (Ps). 25. The death of Joshua and Eleazar (24:29-30, 33).

The intentions of the writers of the Priestly Code were purely legislative in an effort to orient history and contemporary Jewish literature to the requirements of the priestly hierarchy of the 5th cent. B.C.E. Jerusalem community. Even the narratives of the code served to show the origin of some prescribed institution or to establish some legal precedent.

Inasmuch as all of the document, narrative and legislation alike, was projected back into the days of Israel's early origins, it bore the stamp of divine authority and the sanction of antiquity. Some thirty stories of the saga serve the priests' didactic purpose.

In Genesis, the Creation story points to the origin of the Sabbath; the deluge account prohibits murder and the eating of blood; the covenant story requires the circumcision of male infants on the eighth day. Abraham's purchase of Machpelah gives Israel legal title to Canaan. The marriages of Esau and Jacob give precedent for the prohibition of intermarriage.

In Exodus, the departure from Egypt ordains Passover and certifies the divine ownership of the firstborn. The story of the manna and the quails illustrates Sabbath observance.

In Leviticus, the ordination of Aaron and his sons is in accordance with the Priestly Law. The dire punishment of Nadab and Abihu is a warning against unauthorized officiating by priests. The story of the error of Eleazar and Ithamar, the surviving sons of Aaron, serves the same purpose. A blasphemer is stoned as a precedent for the law.

In Numbers, the census of the tribes and their arrangement in camp serves as a precedent for their geographical location in Palestine. The gifts of the princes to the priests commend pious generosity. The purification and installation of the Levites, the second celebration of the Passover, and the stoning of the Sabbath breaker have the force of law. The story of the condemnation of the hapless ten spies warns against ingratitude toward and mistrust of God. The stories of the consuming of Korah and his followers and of the budding of Aaron's rod served the purpose of excluding laymen from the priestly service and of subordinating the Levites to the sons of Aaron. Lack of faith on the part of Moses and Aaron at Meribah deprived them of the privilege of entering Canaan. Phinehas is rewarded with an "everlasting priesthood" for slaying Zimri, who apostasized by his intermarriage. The daughters of Zelophehad are a precedent for the inheritance of property by women. God's word is fulfilled in the succession of Eleazar to Aaron and Joshua to Moses. The war against Midian gives precedent to the law concerning the distribution of spoils. The allotment of Transjordania to Reuben and Gad comes after their promise of assistance in the final conquest. The apportioning of Levitical cities and cities of refuge supports the law. A final word in the narrative makes the heritage of daughters contingent upon their marrying within their tribe.

The Legislation of the Priestly Code. The legal sections proper of P are those revealed to Moses at Sinai (Ex. 25:1 to 31:17; see 35 to 40; Leviticus, and the laws in Num. 1:1 to 10:10), on the journey from Sinai to Kadesh and at Kadesh (Num. 15:1-13, 37-41; 19), and in the plains of Moab (Num. 28 to 30). In Exodus, there are the instructions to Moses for the building of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25 to 27), the organization of the priesthood (Ex. 28 to 29), and a Ps appendix (30:1 to 31:17). The legislation in Exodus governs the ark, the table of shewbread, the candelabrum, the Tabernacle, the altar, the court of the Tabernacle, oil for the lamps, the vestments of Aaron the high priest and of the priests, the ordination of Aaron and his sons, the daily burnt offering, the altar of incense, the tax of half a shekel per person (see Neh. 10:33, where the tax is one-third of a shekel), the laver of brass, the aromatic anointing oil, the incense, and the appointment of Bezalel and Oholiab over the Tabernacle and the holy objects. There follows in 35 to 40 a badly preserved section of Ps, representing the instructions of the earlier section with additions, omissions, and summaries. The parallel chapters of the Septuagint, 36 to 39, differ from the Hebrew in arrangement.

In Lev. 1 to 5 there are the laws pertaining to the five principal sacrifices; 1. The 'olah, or burnt offering, for atonement; 2. the minhah, or meal offering, as a votive or free will sacrifice of fine wheat flour, unleavened cakes mixed with or smeared with oil, baked or fried; 3. the shelem, or peace offering, whose meat is eaten anywhere by the worshipper (the fat and blood belong to God); 4. the hattath, or sin offering, to expiate inadvertent sins of the high priest, the congregation, the ruler, or any Israelite; and 5. the 'asham, or trespass offering, to atone for the misappropriation of property belonging to another or to God. Chaps. 6 and 7 give instructions for officiating priests, concerning the offerings, prohibit an Israelite from eating fat or blood, enjoin the officiating priest from drinking wine, and specify the priest's share in the meal and peace offerings. The laws of chaps. 11 to 15 pertain to clean and unclean, purifications, animals fit and unfit for food, quadrupeds, aquatic life, birds and insects, pollutions through contact with unclean animals, uncleanness after childbirth, leprosy and its symptoms, symptoms of scall, tetter, baldness, the segregation of the leper, mold in garments, the cleansing of the recovered leper, supplementary sacrifices, adjustments for the poor, mold in a house, and secretions of men and women. Chap. 16 contains the laws for the observance of the Day of Atonement and the high priest's entrance into the Holy of Holies. Chaps. 17 to 26 are of the Holiness Code.

Supplementary and miscellaneous laws are found in the P portions of Numbers. In 5 and 6, legislation pertains to the exclusion of lepers and the unclean from the camp, to the payment to the priest of fraud compensation when the injured party dies without kin, to the ordeal of a wife suspected of adultery, to the Nazirite vow and its fulfillment, to purification from defilement through a corpse, to completion of a vow and to the text of the priestly blessing. Other supplements to the P Code in Num. 8:1-4; 15:1-31; 19:1-13; 28:1 to 30:17, all Ps, deal with ritual laws: placing the seven lamps in the candelabrum, oblations and libations which accompany animal sacrifice, heave offerings of the first dough of the year, sin offerings of congregation and individuals, fringes on the corners of a garment, purification by means of the ashes of a red heifer, the calendar of festivals, the new moons, and the validity of vows, particularly those of women.

The Outlook and Theology of P. From the above

outline of the Priestly Code, the document may be seen to be a sketchy history of the origin of Israel and its sacred institutions, beginning with the creation and ending with the division of the Promised Land among the tribes. At the same time, it is an elaborate code of ritual and ceremonial laws, constituting Judea a theocratic state and Israel "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex. 19:6). Scholars are agreed that the code arose in the 5th cent. B.C.E., when the Persian empire permitted full cultural and religious development as long as no attempts were made to regain political freedom. The dreams of political restoration under Zerubbabel in 521 B.C.E. had been short-lived. The more realistic priests of the newly organized second temple (516) made a virtue of necessity, determined to make of Israel a holy nation, a Kingdom of God realized in the present rather than in some future messianic era. Israel was to be a distinct religious people, indifferent to political events about them. The legislation of P and Ps constitutes the basic law of this theocracy, and the narratives describe the steps by which God ordained it all in the days of Moses and Joshua. The Priestly Code shows essentially how the one God of the universe became the spiritual sovereign of Israel. From the first act of Creation, according to P, God's one purpose was to separate Israel from the nations, make His covenant, reveal His law, and usher the people into its own land. Dogmatic rather than historical, the document portrays the establishment of a priestly Utopia, planned and organized by God. This ideal state, like mundane ones, has a King, people, country, and a body of laws.

God, to P, is the supreme and absolute sovereign of Israel and of mankind. The concept is a combination of three views of previous centuries: the national God of Israel as conceived by Moses and Deborah; the universal God of justice and righteousness of Amos; and the Creator of heaven and earth Who is the source of all life (Ps. 104). God is likewise the Lord of history, as conceived by the Second Isaiah, but above all He is the God of holiness, enjoining this most perfect of all virtues upon his priest people. It is in this synthesis of the worthiest concepts of deity that the Priestly Code makes its loftiest contribution to Jewry and to religion. P reaches a high point in its view of the majesty, absoluteness and transcendence of God. Unlike J and E, God needs only speak and it is done. Not only are the anthropomorphisms of early documents avoided, but also idolatry, holy places (except the Temple), angels, sacred springs and trees, and Matzeboth are carefully excluded.

While God "appears," it is never in a material form, or even in a dream. His theophany is a "glory" or radiant light (Ex. 24:16-17; 34:29-35); even anthropopathisms are avoided. (Gen. 2:2-3 and Ex. 31:17b may be exceptions.) It is the worship and adoration of this God of supreme might and glory that P made the ideal of religion. Yet such devotion implies blind obedience to God's command and the fulfillment of the complicated requirements of the ritual law. For P is distinctly priestly, written in the interest of the sacerdotal class, its functions, its prerogatives, and its perquisites. In this sense the ideal state is a hierocracy, rather than a theocracy.

The code indicates no direct interest in ethics or the moral life, for it is primarily concerned with rites and ceremonies. While it is greatly concerned with the prevalence of sin and its expiation through sin offerings, the derelictions are ritual rather than moral. While there is an ethical background behind the cultus, it is clearly of secondary importance. P, like E, eliminates stories about the Patriarchs that are morally offensive and makes them models of good behavior, but P is more concerned with correct deportment than with inner righteousness. P shows, too, little interest in the origin of evil, so important to J. Unlike Jeremiah and the author of Job, the priestly writer is unconcerned about the relation of the ethical life to religion and theology. The prophetic ideal of ethical religion and the intimate relationship of God and man have become greatly weakened in the work of the priestly school.

The Priestly Code's attitude toward history is a novel one. As indicated in the outline above, P conceives of four eras of origins: From the creation to Noah; Noah and Abraham; from Abraham to the Exodus; Moses and Joshua. While Wellhausen found a covenant to introduce each of these periods, it is evident that a true covenant is made only with Noah and with Abraham. In the first era, God is known as 'Elohim; both men and animals are vegetarian (Gen. 1:29-30); the Sabbath is ordained (2:2-3). In the second era, God, still known as 'Elohim, reveals himself to Noah and covenants with the patriarch and all living beings that never again would a deluge destroy His creatures (9:8-17). He allows men to eat meat, but without blood (9:3-4), and prohibits murder (9:5-6). In the third period, God is known as 'El Shaddai, as in Job. God reveals himself to Abraham with the high ethical injunction, "Walk before Me, and be thou whole-hearted" (17:1). Circumcision is the sign of the covenant with Abraham, which promises his seed the land of Canaan (17:2-8). In the fourth period, the name Yahveh is revealed to Moses for the first time. The prophet is sent on his mission as Israel's liberator (Ex. 6:2-8). Subsequent revelations instruct Moses in the building of the Tabernacle and fulfillment of Levitical law.

To P, these four stages in Israel's religious growth are adequate for all humanity. Noah's covenant embraced all creatures, and Abraham's made Israel a chosen people. The rainbow and circumcision were eternal signs of God's benevolence to mankind and to Israel. The first three eras disclose an early religion without cultus, sacrifice (Noah does not sacrifice in P), or distinction between clean and unclean. Even the priesthood and the name Yahveh are unknown. This is because P conceives of all legitimate cultus as starting with Moses at Sinai. The pre-Mosaic era had only non-priestly customs, such as the rites of Sabbath and circumcision. Pfeiffer points out that the religion of the first three eras corresponds to the Judaism of the Babylonian Exile, consisting of private observance and simple moral imperatives, whereas the fourth period reflects the religion of the second Temple with its elaborate ritual and priestly hierarchy.

P traces the origin of Israel back to Adam. Purity of Israel's stock was assured by a series of eliminations from the time of Noah, when the interest of God in man was universal, to the period of the Patriarchs, when it centered in the sons of Jacob. P's racial history has been described as a funnel of ten rings of decreasing size, terminating in a small but important neck, the theocratic community of Israel. Ten genealogies bring us to the twelve tribes. From Adam to Noah, the eldest son alone is mentioned, thus making Israel the first-born among the nations. The line was maintained by those who avoided mixed marriages and were of pure blood. Hence, Ishmael and Esau were eliminated. In this racial selective process, P supplements further single out the sons of Jacob and Leah (Ex. 6:14-26), and among the sons of Levi (Num. 3:14-39) the high priestly family of Aaron and his sons (3:1-4), the apex of Israel's racial history.

While P describes four stages of progressively higher religious development in Israel's history, paradoxically enough, P started with an idyllic world, recognized by God as good, only to continue with a world become progressively more corrupt, as the span of human life shortened. In the first period, man lived from seven to ten centuries; in the second, from two to six; in the third, from one to two; and in the fourth age, that of Moses and the priesthood.

only seventy or eighty years. P no doubt held the view of Proverbs, "The fear of the Lord prolongeth days; but the years of the wicked shall be shortened" (Prov. 10:27).

Another element in the priestly theocratic state is land. Here again the priestly writers sacrifice history and reality for theory and ideals. The land is acquired by simple act of covenant, rather than by slow and laborious infiltration and conquest. In God's covenant with Abraham, He gave him "all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession" (Gen. 17:7-8). A divine promise would naturally make acquisition of the land easy, so Joshua and his men make a miraculous crossing of the Jordan, and as if the native population did not exist, each tribe is arbitrarily assigned its land. P records no battles and only a few references to conquest (Josh. 4:10, 16, 19; 9:15b, 17-21, 27a; 12:1-24). While the covenant was sufficient title to the land, the legalistic P writers made Israel's claim more binding through Abraham's purchase of Machpelah. That P has Abraham insist on paying for the cave and the adjoining property validates Israel's claim to the land on the basis of the ancient contract with Heth. When the land is subdued, Israel sets up its Tabernacle at Shiloh. Joshua and Eleazar then proceed to assign the land west of the Jordan to the tribes that were to occupy it into post-Exilic times (Josh. 14:1-2). The P narrative ends with a statement on the exact boundaries of each tribe, reflecting the post-Exilic environment of its writer.

If the narrative portions make evident the fact that the land, its produce, and its inhabitants belong to God, the legal sections carry this thought to its ultimate fulfillment. If all that Israel has or is belongs to God, certain fixed dues, tribute, or rental would have to be set aside for the exclusive use of the Deity. "For the land is Mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. 25:23). Only the fulfillment of certain conditions enables Israel to use the land. A limited territory must be reserved for God's sanctuary and His priestly representatives. The camp at Sinai became a model of the land, including four zones: one for the people; a forecourt for priest and Levite (Ex. 27:9-19); a court reserved for the priests (Ex. 26:3-33, 35); and the Holy of Holies (26:33), entered only by the high priest on the Day of Atonement. The assignment of forty-eight important cities to priests and Levites is a late priestly afterthought, never observed, and out of consonance with Num. 18:20-21. Israelites might own a tract of land, provided that it "rested" in Sabbatical years (Lev. 25:1-7), that it was restored to its former owner in the jubilee year (25:23-24, never enforced), and that a rental was paid to God in firstlings, first fruits, tithes and other offerings to the Temple (Lev. 18:8-9; Ex. 13:1; Lev. 27:26-27).

Festivals and holidays were a tax paid to God for the use of His times and seasons. The celebration of the Sabbath and festivals in earlier periods had been a privilege; for P, it became a solemn duty, a sacred debt to be discharged through abstention from all work on the important days of the festivals, on the Day of Atonement, and on the Sabbath. The Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Feast of Weeks, the New Year, the Day of Atonement and the Feast of Tabernacles are marked by P for solemn convocations. Now dated exactly, these festivals are made either memorials of historical events, or sacramental celebrations (as the Day of Atonement). Passover, celebrated before the sacrificial system was adopted at Sinai, is represented as a family feast, not an occasion for sacrifice (Ex. 12:3-14).

Since God had liberated Israel from Egyptian bondage (Lev. 23:43), all Israel belonged to Him. Therefore the people must submit to circumcision (Lev. 12:3), and to numerous purifications and atonements, so that they may be consecrated to God as a dutiful congregation. As such a congregation Israel must be kept free of various types of pollution (Lev. 15) by means of purifications specified in each case. As further evidence of God's ownership of the people, Israelites could not be held in perpetual slavery (Lev. 25:39-40, 42-43, and other passages), but must be freed in the jubilee year (25:40b-41, 44-46 and other passages). All first born males belong to God, and must be redeemed (Ex. 13:1; Num. 18:15) for five shekels. Furthermore, every Israelite, at twenty or above, had to pay a head tax of one-half shekel to make atonement for his soul. Israel must devote the entire priesthood to the service of God for release, and any layman may also serve for a period of a year as a Nazirite (Num. 6:1-21).

The priestly hierarchy is carefully differentiated in P. While H (Holiness Code) makes no distinction between priest and Levite, P considers only Aaron and his sons as priests (Ex. 28:1; Num. 18:7 and other passages), and the Levites are to be their servants. While the title "high priest" is not known in the early writings of P, Aaron and Eleazar after him were virtually high priests in function, continuing on through the line of Zadok and Jeshua. The high priest was the apex of the hierarchical community, followed by the priest, then the Levites, and then the holy congregation. In the second Temple days of the priestly writer, the high priest was the princely head of the theocratic state (Num. 27:21). He and his sons wore special vestments and were specially ordained (Ex. 28 to 29; Lev. 8). Typified by Aaron, he performed a solemn sacrifice and entered the holy of holies on Yom Kippur. Priestly law also provides for a priest's portion in a meal offering and peace offering (Lev. 10:12-15), other emoluments (Num. 18:8-32), and various priestly taboos. Priestly duties are also contained in the manual of sacrifice (Lev. 1:7).

While Num. 16 to 18 emphasizes the distinctions of priests, Levites, and laymen, Ps emphasizes the wide breach between priests and Levites. Levites were offered to the priests as ransom for the first-born, and Aaron presented them to God as a wave offering to make atonement for Israel (Num. 8:5-22). Unlike the priests, they were not consecrated to God, and could not officiate in the worship nor touch the holy vessels.

The P principle of divine ownership of everything meant, furthermore, regular token payments, fixed arbitrarily for all that Israel had or used. Part was assumed to go directly to God, but the bulk of the fixed offerings, first-fruits, and first-born went to the priests or were redeemed. The Levite received the tithes (Num. 18:21), and they in turn paid to the high priest "a tithe of the tithe" (18:25-32). The national taxes paid by Israel, according to P, were all sacramental. There was the tamid, or daily sacrifice of lamb, cereal, and wine morning and evening (Ex. 20:38-42), and additional sacrifices on the Sabbath, new moons, and the annual festivals (Num. 28:9 to 29:38).

In addition to the fixed dues, another major source of revenue for the altar, according to P, was the public and private sacrifices which may be classed as fines. The constitution of the sacred theocracy, the Priestly Code, punished with death those who deliberately and wittingly violated the holy law (Lev. 10:1-5; Num. 15:32-36; 25:6-18), but exacted a sacrificial fine for inadvertent sins of commission or omission.

There was, first of all, the great Day of Atonement (Lev. 16) for the national expiation of sin, provided through fasting, resting, and the sin offering of a goat, in addition to other sacrifices of the day: a bullock for the high priest and the priesthood (16:3, 6), and a ram for the people (16:5). There was the sin-offering of a he-goat on new moons and festivals, as well as that of a bullock at the consecration of priests (Ex. 29:14). A similar offering might be made for the high priest (Lev. 4:12), for the congregation (4:13-21), for the ruler (4:22-26), or for the individual (4:27, 35). The last category was the broadest, for in the life of the average Israelite there were scores of unwitting sins that could be expiated only by sacrificial atonement. There was the hattath (sin-offering) for unconscious violation of certain taboos (Lev. 5:1-6, Ps), for purification after childbirth (Lev. 12:6), for cleansing after organic secretions, leprosy, contact with a carcass, and for a Nazirite after contact with a corpse. The 'asham (trespass offering) of a ram (or less if one was poor) atoned for misappropriations of property belonging to God (5:14-16) or to man (6:1-7), after restitution of the value of the theft, plus one-fifth. The 'olah (kalil), burnt offering, and the shelem, peace offering, the principal sacrifices of earlier times, lost much of their significance in P. The Passover with the sacrificial meal as its chief rite survived as a family celebration. The fulfillment of vows or free-will gifts was made with the burnt offering (Lev. 1:1-17), with a peace offering (3; 7:11-34), with a thank offering (todah; Lev. 7:12-15; 22:29). There was also the vegetable or meal offering (minhah), offered along with other sacrifices or as an independent offering for purification or the expiation of sin. Wine, incense and salt were used in P only in connection with sacrifices and oblations.

No explanation is given by P as to why or how these offerings effect atonement or achieve purification. They were the will of God, and that was explanation enough. The priestly sacrificial system was devised as a means of payment of the sacred dues of God, owner of all creation, and to expiate the sins of man and people.

To P, the most holy God had distinguished Israel from among the nations and made it holy (Lev. 20:8; 21:8). As "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Lev. 19:6, redactional), it was imperative for Israel to be free of sin, ceremonial as well as moral, and to observe the minutiae of God's law, however incomprehensible, lest His anger be kindled again against His people and He destroy them and their sanctuary.

The Dating of the Priestly Code. The dating of P in the 5th cent. B.C.E., as first proposed by Wellhausen, has the agreement of almost all Bible scholars. (Eerdmann, Smend and Probsch would place it at about 600 B.C.E.). The argument may be summarized in the consideration of other Biblical writings. P is clearly later than D (621), which indicates no knowledge of P and proposes a different and clearly earlier calendar. H, the earliest document associated with P, is clearly later than Ezekiel (597-570) and dependent on it (Ezek. 40 to 48). H, written after 550, was the theoretical code put into use when the second Temple was completed in 516. P was certainly not known to the returning exiles of 521, nor apparently even to the writers of the first period of the second Temple (516-458), namely, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. While it is claimed by some scholars that the book which Ezra read in 458 was H, by others that it was P or Pg (the Grundschrift or original recension), and by still others that it was only a part of the latter, practically all are agreed that the Priestly Code was known some few years later, reflecting the reforms of Nehemiah (444 B.C.E.), just as Deuteronomy reflects the reforms of Josiah in 621. The book read in those days is not known, but indisputably it contained Lev. 23 (Neh. 8:13-18 refers to Lev. 23:39-40, H). Some of Nehemiah's measures are based on P, others on earlier codes, and a few have no parallels in any document. A papyrus from Elephantine (Sachau No. 6), dated 419 B.C.E., gives instruction on the celebration of Passover in accordance with P (Ex. 12:1-20), as a new departure in observance. This would be our first dated reference to the Priestly Code. We may consider Pg or the earlier strata of P as a product of Palestine in the middle of the 5th cent. B.C.E., reflecting the early Persian period and the corresponding days of the second Temple. Ps and RP must have been written within two generations thereafter and prior to the final work of Pentateuchal redaction in the first half of the 4th cent. B.C.E.

The Sources of the Priestly Code. While at one time many Bible scholars (Budde, Holzinger, Smend) believed that the Priestly school used as sources only JED and its own fertile imagination, more recent critical opinion (Kittel, Sellin, Eichrodt, Steuernagel) holds that a wide variety of sources no longer extant were at the disposal of the erudite authors of P. We have already observed the dependence of the theology of P on Ezekiel and the Second Isaiah. Gen. 1 is an example of P's use of a mythological creation story of Babylonian or Phoenician origin, the original of which is lost to us.

An extra-Biblical source is apparent in P's version of the antediluvian descendents of Adam. Gen. 5 (P) adds Seth, Enosh, and Noah to the genealogy which parallels Gen. 4 (J). Scholars have found a similarity between the P genealogy and the ten kings of the Babylonian pre-Flood era, listed by Berossos. Besides the similarity of listing and the derivation, somewhat obliterated, from the Babylonian originals, the Biblical worthies lived to fabulous ages as did the Babylonian patriarchs to a considerably greater degree. Ten Bible worthies from Adam to the Flood accumulated the grand total of 1,656 years, whereas the ten Babylonian kings lived the cumulative total of an amazing 432,000 years, which, as one writer has pointed out, corresponds to the Hebrew chronology if one Bible week is made to equal sixty months in the Babylonian lists.

The dependence of the Flood stories in JE as well as in P upon the old Babylonian legends has long been known. The wide differences and contradictions between the P account and that of JE shows P to be quite independent of the earlier documents. The descendents of Shem, Ham and Japheth in P, furthermore, are quite different from those in J, showing, as with the antediluvian patriarchs, the use of an independent source. Also, P's table of nations, descendants of the sons of Noah, reflects an international situation of the 7th cent. B.C.E. rather than of the 5th cent., apparently based on a 7th cent. document, no longer extant, which dealt with the Mediterranean and Near Eastern areas of that day.

Literary Characteristics of P. The literary style of the Priestly document is governed by its purpose and general character. The style is marked and entirely different from J and E. Only when P is attempting to rewrite an earlier source (as in Gen. 17:15-22; 23; 28:1-9) is the style picturesque and dramatic, as in J and E. As a rule, however, P is formal, precise, pedantic, repetitious, and abstract in its descriptions of God (yet concrete in describing the Tabernacle). It is legal and statistical, but usually dignified and elevated (as in Gen. 1). P has a great interest in genealogy. "There is a tendency to describe an object in full each time that it is mentioned; a direction is followed, as a rule, by an account of its execution, usually in the same words" (Driver). The style is prosaically literal, avoiding metaphors and similes, as well as all poetic or dramatic elements. In places P reads like a register of vital statistics (Gen. 5; 11:10-26) or a real estate deed (23:17-18); or like a lesson in botany or zoology (1:11-12, 20-21, 24-25), although the remainder of Gen. 1 has a sublime majesty. P's prolix tendency may be seen in its numerous characteristic expressions. Egypt and Canaan are always "the land of . . ." "Sinai (with J) is preferred to "Horeb" (with E and D). Until Gen. 17, the names Abram and Sarai are used. The original home of the Hebrews is Paddan-aram (not the Aram-Naharaim of J). Only P tells of Ur of the Chaldees as the city of Abraham. The divine name in P follows E, not J, but frequently P uses J's expression, "El Shaddai." Driver lists some fifty characteristic expressions of P, such as anoint, atonement, burn, between the two evenings, congregation of Israel (exclusively H and P, 115 times), dwell, dwelling, families (after your or their), generations, glory of God, heave, holy, holiness, incense, offer, act as priest, prince, Sabbath observance, this self-same day, soul (meaning person, not in JE, but almost 100 times in P), stranger (as against priest), swarm, testimony, and tribe (meaning, literally, "staff," not in JE, but 150 times in P). P's terms are found outside the Pentateuch chiefly in Ezekiel and in Chronicles. In evaluating the style of the Priestly Code, which contrasted so sharply with the prophetic literature which preceded it, Professor Louis Finkelstein writes (The Pharisees, vol. 2, 1938, p. 463): "There is only one loss in the substitution of legalism for prophecy; poetry was replaced by prose."

ADOLPH J. FEINBERG.

Lit.: Driver, S. R., An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (7th ed., 1898); Eissfeldt, O., Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1934); Pfeiffer, R. H., Introduction to the Old Testament (1940); Westphal, A., Les sources du Pentateuque (2 vols., 1888 and 1892); Wellhausen, J., Die Composition des Hexateuchs (3rd ed., 1899); Holzinger, H., Einleitung in den Hexateuch (1893); Carpenter, J. E., and Harford-Battersby, G., The Hexateuch (1900); idem, The Composition of the Hexateuch (1902); Smend, R., Die Erzählung des Hexateuchs (1912); Yahuda, A. S., The Language of the Pentateuch in its Relation to Egyptian (1933); Eichrodt, W., Die Quellen der Genesis (1916); Morgenstern, J., "The Sources of the Creation Story," American Journal of Semitic Languages, vol. 36 (1920) 169-212; Von Rad, G., Die Priesterschrift im Hexateuch (1934).

PRIESTS (Hebrew, kohen; plural, kohanim, also designating "prince" or "minister"), those duly consecrated to officiate in sacred things, to offer sacrifices at the altar or sanctuary, and to serve as mediator between man and God. While the priestly classes were almost exclusively drawn from the tribe of Levi in the days of the Hebrew commonwealths, in early Israel any Israelite might approach the altar and offer sacrifices. It might be the eldest son who ministered for the family, or the leader of a tribe who officiated for his fellows. Noah in his capacity as head of his house and priest of his family built an altar and offered sacrifice (Gen. 8:20). Abraham offered the ram "for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son" (Gen. 22:13). Melchizedek was designated a priest of El Elyon (God Most High; Gen. 14:18). Both Isaac and Jacob built altars (Gen. 26:25; 33:20) in their capacity as ministering patriarchs. Similarly, Gideon, of the tribe of Manasseh, offered sacrifice at the command of God (Judges 6:25-26), and Manoah, of Dan, officiated likewise (Judges 13:16, 19). Scripture records the priestly ministration of David and Solomon (II Sam. 24:25; I Kings 3:15; II Sam. 6:13, 17-18; I Kings 9:25). Priestly offerings by Ahaz, also of the house of Judah (II Kings 16:12-13), and by Elijah, never designated as a Levite, are recorded (I Kings 18:32 et seq.).

Priestly functioning by laymen is in keeping with the Code of the Covenant (about 842 B.C.E.), which addresses the people as a whole concerning altar and sacrifice (Ex. 20:21-23). Samuel, of Ephraim, became priest at Shiloh, officiated without the slightest disqualification, and wore all the priestly attire (I Sam. 2:18; 3:1). The power of kings to invest priests (I Kings 12:3) was demonstrated by David, who ordained Ira of Manasseh (II Sam. 20:26), as well as his own sons (II Sam. 8:18).

The historical development of the priesthood in Israel may best be seen in the concept of each historical stratum of the Bible, starting with J (about 850 B.C.E.) and E (about 750 B.C.E.) and continuing through the historical books of Judges, Samuel and Kings, including the JE redaction (about 650 B.C.E.). We have already observed the priestly functioning of patriarchs and other laymen (Gen. 12:8; 15:9 et seq.; Ex. 19:22), and that nothing is said about priests in the old accounts of Mosaic legislation (Ex. 20:19 to 23:33; also Ex. 34:10-26, of about 899 B.C.E.). Differentiation of Levi comes in JE's commendation of the tribe for its loyalty during the golden calf incident. Deut. 10:8, in a later generation, states that this incident "set apart the tribe of Levi to bear the ark of the covenant, to minister unto Him, and to bless in His Name." Yet in the notice about the tent of meeting (Ex. 33:7-11), it was Joshua, not priest or Levite, who takes charge. Judges 17, on the other hand, implies that while anyone might serve as priest, it was a Levitical function (verse 13). A Judahite by birth and a Levite by profession, the wanderer was glad to accept Micah's invitation to serve as priest of Dan. His function was caring for the sanctuary and consulting the oracle.

Eli also functioned as keeper of the ark, as seer, and as judge. But as important as was the shrine at Shiloh, it had no priestly hierarchy; Eli's own servants prepared the sacrifices, and his sons Hophni and Phinehas officiated (I Sam. 1:3). Samuel's ministry, too, is without reference to priest or Levite. Yet Eli bequeathed a priestly heritage, for his descendants Ahijah (I Sam. 14:3, 18 et seq.) and Abiathar (I Sam. 23; 6-10) consulted the oracle for Saul and David, respectively. Throughout this period the sanctuaries at Nob, noted for its shewbread and the sword of Goliath (I Sam. 21:1-7), Gibeon (I Kings 3) and Bethel (I Sam. 10:3) continued to function along with Shiloh, and the Davidic altar at Jerusalem.

While David established Abiathar and Zadok at this latter altar (II Sam. 8:17; 20:25), David himself officiated on occasion (II Sam. 6:12-19). The king was supreme, for the aged Abiathar was readily deposed by Solomon and banished to Anathoth (I Kings 2:26-27). The king was the chief functionary at the dedication of the Temple, the priests being charged with the menial work, including conveying the ark to its new quarters (I Kings 8:3-6). However, censure of the wicked Jeroboam (933-912 B.C.E.) for making priests from among the people, not only the sons of Levi (I Kings 12:31), shows that Levitical claims were coming into their own. The book of Kings gives us little additional information. A high point of power was achieved in the priesthood of Jehoiada, who organized a revolt against idolatrous Athaliah and placed Joash on the throne of Judah (I Kings 11:14-16). Yet the king soon asserted his control over the numerous, but badly organized, Jerusalem priesthood (II Kings 12). Ahaz (735-720 B.C.E.) had Urijah, the chief priest, erect a pagan altar in place of Solomon's altar to God (II Kings 16:10-16).

The 8th cent. prophets give us an insight into the weakness and corruption of the priests of the commonwealths. Amos rebukes Israel for its zeal for the priestly cult, for corruptions at the sanctuary (2:7-8), for its delight in formal sacrifices, tithes, and free will offerings (4:4-5), and for its observance of altar service (5:21-24) in place of justice and righteousness which God requires. No mention is made of priests, when God in His grace raised up prophets and Nazirites (2:11). The prophet's denunciation of Azariah (7:14-17), although personal, may well apply to the entire official priesthood. Hosea's quarrel with Israel's priests is not with their non-Levitical descent, but with their failure to teach the people to know God (4:4-9). They are iniquitous, feeding on the people's sins (4:8), interested in emoluments, not morality (5:1-6; 6:9). Isaiah and Micah show their distaste for the priestly cult, and charge the priests with inebriation (Isa. 28:7) and with teaching for hire (Micah 3:11).

With the 8th cent. there began the differentiation of the priestly class. Deut. 33:8-11, usually assigned to the beginning of the century, sets forth the prerogatives of the tribe of Levi, projected back into the Blessing of Moses. Because of their faithfulness at Massah and Meribah, the Levites are to have charge of the Urim and Thummim, to teach Israel God's word, and to officiate at the altar. Thus, while Jacob condemns the secular Levi in Gen. 49:5, Moses is made to praise the priestly tribe within sight of the Promised Land.

While the priests were usually subordinate to the king, they were still a most influential class, for from their group came not only altar and Temple officiants, but many of the prophets as well. While the earlier historical books contain evidence of the offerings, tithes and perquisites of the priesthood (Gen. 28:22; I Sam. 10:3; Amos 4:4), it remained for the later codes to make these customs law. The redactor of J and E (about 650 B.C.E.) read back into Mosaic times the Levitical prerogatives of the Jerusalem priesthood, for after 722 B.C.E. the priestly practices of Israel remained only in the few documents that were the last legacy of the destroyed kingdom.

In the Deuteronomic Code, instituted by Josiah (638-609) in 621, the tribe of Levi was set apart by God to bear the ark, to minister at the altar, and to bless in His Name (Deut. 10:8), to dwell among the tribes on special grants, sustained by Israel's good-will offerings (18:1-5). While all Levites were priests by law, they might officiate only in Jerusalem, the sole legitimate sanctuary. The priestly perquisites were explicit: of the sacrifice, a shoulder, two cheeks, and the maw; the first-fruits of grain, wine, oil; the first fleece of the sheep (18:3-4); a share of the tithes every three years (12:11; 26:12-15); and gifts like those to strangers in the cities (16:11, 14). While there was no cult except in Jerusalem, rural priests might exercise a judicial function (17:9, 12). Although the code was put into force and the high places destroyed, the unemployed priests who flocked to Jerusalem were denied their rights (II Kings 23:9). The incumbent priests, to protect their prerogatives, claimed descent from Zadok and made it the test of legitimacy. Although subordinate to such monarchs as Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, the Jerusalem priesthood remained powerful and well-organized until the destruction of the Temple in 586 B.C.E.

While Ezekiel's concept of the priesthood is purely theoretical, it represents a development of the concept of priesthood that found its practical realization in the days of the Second Temple. Chaps. 40 to 48 present an idyllic picture, and while some scholars (Hölscher, Mowinkel and others) attribute these chapters to a later hand, they are certainly Exilic and in keeping with Israel's developing concept of priesthood and Temple service. The priests, sons of Zadok, are clearly differentiated from the rest of the sons of Levi. Levites are to be overseers of the gates, to "minister in the house, slay the burnt-offering and sacrifice for the people" (Ezek. 44:10-14). But the priests, who stood fast when Israel went astray, are allowed to enter the sanctuary, minister at the table, and to teach the people to distinguish between "holy" and "profane." There are also special priestly instructions, governing the wearing of linen, trimming of hair, abstaining from wine in the inner court, and circumspection in marriage. Ezekiel's is the dreamer's picture of an idyllic, theocratic state, centering in a restored Jerusalem.

The Holiness Code (Lev. 17 to 26), written for the service of the Second Temple (completed in 516 B.C.E.), traces the descent of the legitimate priests from Aaron and refers to them as "sons of Aaron." As a practical measure, the code, attributed to Moses, gave support to the claims of the four priestly families of the return; namely, Jedaiah-Jeshua, Immer, Pashhur, and Harim (Ezra. 2:36-39; Neh. 7:39-42). A total of 4,289 priests are cited among the returning exiles, or about one-tenth of the total. Headed by the priestly leaders, Jeshua and Zerubbabel, and the prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, no doubt the elaborate law of Holiness was for a time at least put into effect. Yet, seventy-five years later, when Ezra sought to set up religious observance in Palestine, the reforms of 516 had disappeared. Only eighteen Levites and 220 Nethinim could be found, willing to return to the beleaguered Temple site.

But the final pattern of priestly law and practice for the post-Exilic period is that of the Priestly Code and of the priestly editors who recast all the extant legislation in the mold of their thinking. Written at a time (500-400 B.C.E.) when Israel had no temporal ruler of its own, it was an attempt to make Israel "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation," a thoroughly theocratic state under the dominance of its priestly class. Only through the priest might God's will be known, sin be expiated, and salvation be attained.

Whereas Deuteronomy had made a distinction between Levites and laymen, Ezekiel distinguished the sons of Zadok from the rest of Levi, and H differentiated between sons of Aaron and their fellow tribesmen, P made the last distinction final and binding: Aaron and his sons alone could be priests and approach "the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar" (Num. 18:1-7; Ex. 29:9). Levites were given to the priests only as servants. The stories of the hapless Korah and the unfortunate Dathan and Abiram show the seriousness of any resistance to the exclusive claims of the Aaronides.

Within the priestly class there was one further differentiation; namely, in the designation of the high priest, "upon whose head the anointing oil is poured and who is consecrated to wear the garments" (Ex. 29:7). Aaron's sons are accorded the honor after him (Ex. 40:13, 15; Lev. 8:30). The garb of the high priest is presented in detail (Ex. 28:1-38; 29:5-9), coat and breeches of linen, robe of blue, golden bells on the shirt, an ephod, a breastplate with Urim and Thummim, and an inscribed mitre. In special dress, the high priest would enter the Holy of Holies to pray for his people on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:11-17).

The Priestly Code states most specifically and elaborately the duties and functions of priests and Levites. The priest's manual of worship is found in Lev. 1 to 7. They alone could officiate at the altar, enter the sanctuary, teach the ceremonial law, and bless the people according to formula (Num. 6:22-27). The Levites, servants of the priesthood, had charge of the Mosaic sanctuary and the Tabernacle, a token of their responsibility in the service of the Second Temple, in caring for its court and furniture (Num. 4). The 22,000 of Num. 3 and 4 points indisputably to their elaborate service in the 5th cent. B.C.E.

In the later Persian period, the Priestly Code must have been in force, but the extent of its observance is unknown. The high priest began at this time to assume greater leadership, not only in the religious but in the temporal realm as well. Eliashib aided Nehemiah in building the city wall (Neh. 3:13, 21) and in promulgating the Law (Neh. 8:4-8; 10:1-8). Temple service was divided into twenty-four courses or relays (I Chron. 24:1-19), sixteen descendants of Eleazar, and eight descendants of his brother Ithamar, a system which continued until 70 C.E. (Josephus, Life, section 1).

Little is known of the Greek and Roman periods. From 432 to 168 B.C.E., we have only a list of the names of high priests, most of them corrupted by Hellenistic influences, and a few incidents about some of them. Josephus gives us the order of succession as follows: Jaddua, Onias I, Simon I, Eleazar, Manasseh, Onias II, Simon II, the Just, who is so well spoken of in Sirach and Aboth, Onias III, who is reputed to have founded the Temple at Leontopolis, Jason, who replaced his brother through bribery (175), only to be supplanted by an even more corrupt Menelaus, who was in turn followed by another usurper, Alcimus. With the victory of the Maccabees, of Judaism over Hellenism, Judas Maccabeus restored "blameless priests" to the sanctuary in 165 B.C.E. (I Macc. 4:42). In 153 Jonathan, brother of Judas, accepted the office of high priest, to be succeeded by his brother Simon in 143. Both had assumed temporal power as well, but it was not until 105 that the high priest Aristobulus I assumed the title of king. Priestly kingship ceased with Hyrcanus II in 63 B.C.E. The high priest was thereafter, until 70 C.E., subordinate to the Roman governors and to the house of Herod. In the 107 years prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, there were twenty-eight high priests, appointed from four or five leading families. Under the aegis of the Priestly Code and Greek influences, the priesthood was a lucrative profession. It developed into an aristocratic class of wealth and influence known as the Sadducees, who supported the Herods and Rome, often contrary to the best interests of the people. Nothing was strong enough to uproot them or their prerogatives till the calamity of 70 C.E.

Rabbinic Judaism tended to follow the Priestly Code in its attitude toward the priestly functions that could still be fulfilled and in priestly and Levitical prerogatives. Oral tradition held the sanctuary to be the manifestation of God's presence in Israel, and the priest was the mediator through whom the sins of the community and the individual were expiated (Ber. 55a; Suk. 55b; Keth. 10b; Zeb. 85b; Midrash Lev. 16:2; Tanhuma to Ex. 27:2; Yalkut 2:565, and compare with Ex. 29:42-46; Lev. 9; 15:15; Num. 6:27; Mal. 2:7). As "emissaries of God" rather than the people, priests might make atonement and sacrifice for even the man who had vowed to eschew priestly service (Yoma 19a; Ned. 4:3; 35b). As in P, rabbinic law was scrupulous about the pedigrees of officiating priests (Keth. 13ab; 14a; 27a; Kid. 73a; Shulhan Aruch, Eben Haezer 3, 6, 7) and the women they married (Kid. 4:et seq.; 77ab; Eben Haezer 2, 3). In addition to P's list of women disqualified from marriage to a priest (Lev. 21:7), rabbinic law enjoined a priest from marrying a Halutzah, a proselyte, a freed woman, or even the daughter of the latter two, in the opinion of some rabbis (Yeb. 6:2,5:54a,60a; Sotah 6:1; Eben Haezer 6:1,8).

Other P legislation observed and expanded in Talmudic law includes the prohibition against contact with a corpse (Num. 19:11, 14-16), priestly disqualification due to physical defects (Lev. 21:17-21) and division of the priesthood into twenty-four classes (I Chron. 25). Priests are prohibited, by rabbinic ordinance, even indirect contact with the dead, such as entering the house of a deceased person, touching anything unclean through contact with the dead, or entering a cemetery (Nazir 7:2, 4:42b, 56ab; Shulhan Aruch, Yoreh Deah 369, 371). In the case of a deceased wife or other near relative, however, the priest is required to participate in the funeral (Yeb. 22b; 90b; Nazir 47b; 48ab; Yoreh Deah 373). The priest may not become defiled in the case of a non-relative except if he come across a corpse in a deserted vicinity, which he is required to bury, or in the case of the funeral of a prince in Israel (Nazir 7:1; 43b; 47b; Yoreh Deah 374; 1, 2, 11). Disqualifying defects which render a priest temporarily or permanently unfit for service are described in detail (Bech. 7; Sifra, Emor 3; Zeb. 12:1; 102ab). The Talmud and Josephus show not only the retention of the twenty-four priestly courses until 70 C.E., but that these were changed each Sabbath, except on the festivals, when all officiated simultaneously (Antiquities, book 7, chap. 14, par. 7; Life, section 1). These relays were further subdivided into smaller groups in elaborate pattern (Yer. Taan. 2:6 et seq.; 4:2; 27b; Suk. 5:6-8; 25ab; Yoma 3:9). In addition to the duties of high priest, priest and Levite, enumerated in P, the Talmud speaks of numerous other officials of minor or major rank. They include the segan, who was to substitute for the high priest on Yom Kippur in the event the latter became defiled (Tos. Yoma 1:6; Nazir 47b; Sotah 42a), gizbarim, Temple treasurers, and amerkelin, cashiers (Josephus, Antiquities, book 14, chap. 7, section 1; book 15, chap. 11, section 4; Peah 1:6; 2:8; Shek. 2:1; see Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, p. 196 for discussion of segan, and his identity with the memunneh, appointed one or auxiliary priest on the Day of Atonement). The laws of pedigree and Levitical purity applied to men of priestly descent long after the destruction of the Temple, according to rabbinic law. The priests (ones whose name bore the honorary title hakohen) were to be ready for service immediately upon the advent of the Messiah and the rebuilding of the sanctuary. Ritual purity and fulfillment of priestly requirements qualified Kohanim to utter the threefold priestly blessing in the synagogue, to officiate at the redemption of the first-born, and to be called up to the reading of the Torah before the Levite and the ordinary Jew, practices which still prevail in Jewish life today.

See also: PRIESTLY BLESSING; PRIESTLY CASTE; PRIESTLY CODE.

ADOLPH J. FEINBERG.

Lit.: Gabriel, Johannes, Untersuchung über das alttestamentliche Hohenpriestertum (1933); Hoschander, Jacob, The Priests and Prophets (1938); Welsh, A. C., Prophet and Priest in Old Israel (1936); Soltau, Exposition of the Tabernacle, the Priestly Garments, and the Priesthood; Martin, Atonement; Davidson, A. B., Hebrews; Moorehead, Mosaic Institutions; Baudissin, Die Geschichte des alttestamentlichen Priestertums (1889); the articles on Priests, Priesthood, and Priests and Levites in such standard works as Cheyne and Black, Encyclopaedia Biblica (1899-1903); Hastings, James, A Dictionary of the Bible (1898-1904); Vigoroux, Dictionnaire de la Bible (1895-1912); Orr, International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (1925); Jewish Encyclopedia (1901-6).

PRILUZKI, NOAH, see PRYLUCKI, NOAH.

PRIMOGENITURE (mishpat habechorah). According to the Bible and Talmudic law, the first-born child of the father, whether he is the first-born child of his mother or not, has a claim to a double portion of the inheritance. This double right of inheritance, which is unique in Jewish law, and hardly found in other legal systems, is probably founded on the great significance attached to firstlings in general, whether they be fruits of the soil, animals or human beings. In ancient times all these firstlings were regarded as consecrated to God. In the case of humans this took the form of serving as the family priest, prior to the establishment of the hereditary Levitical priesthood. Another factor which seems to have played a part was that after the Israelites had become a settled people, the first-born succeeded his father upon the latter's death as head of the household, and therefore took upon himself the responsibility of maintaining those members of the family who were in need—the widows, orphans and those who were physically or mentally handicapped. Thus the double portion of the first-born would be a sort of compensation for the extra duties which he was required to assume.

In Bible times the principle of primogeniture was generally recognized in the succession to the throne, though there is evidence that on occasion exceptions were made (as in the case of Solomon and Jehoahaz). Bible stories contain some interesting episodes in which the headship of the family passes from the first-born to another member; thus Esau is replaced by Jacob, Reuben by Joseph, Manasseh by Ephraim. This circumstance has led the ethnologist J. G. Frazer to suggest that the earliest form of inheritance was a system of ultimogeniture, in which the youngest, not the eldest, had the chief inheritance. On the contrary, however, these stories are witness to the strength of the idea of primogeniture; for the narrative writer profits by the element of surprise in that, contrary to all custom or even right, the younger son, by means of his superior merits or achievements, wins through to the right of superior inheritance.

The law codes constantly stress the right of primogeniture, and one passage (Deut. 21:15-17) goes so far as to deprive the father of the right to change the inheritance in favor of his younger son by a beloved wife.

The Talmud lays down especial requirements for primogeniture. To be recognized as a first-born son, a child must be born during the lifetime of his father (B.B. 142a). If twins are born, the declaration of the midwife, the mother or the father is sufficient to decide which of them was born first. However, the midwife's declaration must be made immediately (since later on her memory may be defective), and the mother's within the first week, whereas the father may make his declaration any time after the eighth day (Kid. 74a). The double portion of a first-born who dies before his father is inherited by his children.

A rather unusual requirement is that the right of primogeniture is given only to one who is born in a normal manner, that is, not by an operation. If the mother has a miscarriage or the child is born dead or too feeble to survive, the next child that is normally born is regarded as the first-born (Bech. 8:1).

The double portion of the first-born is taken only from property actually on hand at the time of his father's death, and not from claims that are later collected. It is determined by dividing the estate into one more portion than there are children present or living at the time of their father's death; he then takes two of the portions. He can not sell or dispose of his birthright, since this is contrary to the law of the Torah (B.B. 8:5); but a father can indirectly curtail the rights of the first-born by giving away part or all of his property prior to his decease. MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Nahaloth 2 and 3; Shulhan Aruch, Hoshen Mishpat 277 and 278; Jacobs, Joseph, "Junior Right in Genesis," Studies in Biblical Archaeology (1894); Frazer, J. G., Folklore in the Old Testament, vol. 1 (1919) 429 et seq; Casanowicz, I. M., in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 198-99.

PRINCE AND DERVISH, see BARLAAM AND JOSAPHAT.

PRINCE, LEOPOLD, official municipal court referee, and musical amateur, b. Konitz, Germany, 1880. From 1905 to 1907 he served in the New York State Assembly. In 1907 he was elected justice of the municipal court of the city of New York, retaining this post for ten years; he was reelected in 1927 for another ten-year period. On January 1, 1938, he was appointed official referee of the municipal court. He distinguished himself as founder and conductor of the City Amateur Symphony Orchestra which, over a period of many years, gave free public concerts at the Museum of Natural History (in the winter) and (in the summer) in the public parks.

PRINCEPS JUDAEORUM, see PRAEFECTUS JUDAEORUM.

PRINGSHEIM, ALFRED, mathematician, b. Oblau, Silesia, Germany, 1850; d. Munich, Germany, 1941. He was the son of the railroad magnate Rudolf Pringsheim. He studied at the University of Heidelberg, where he received his Ph.D. degree in 1872. He was appointed instructor of mathematics in 1877, was assistant professor in 1886, and served as associate professor at the University of Munich (1901-2).

Pringsheim contributed to the theories of numbers, functions and infinite processes. He was regarded as a connoisseur of art and music. Pringsheim was baptized. He was the father-in-law of Thomas Mann.

Lit.: Poggendorf, Biographisch-Literarisches Handwörterbuch (1926) 1006; Wininger, S., Grosse Jüdische National Biographie, vol. 5 (1931) 98-99.

PRINGSHEIM, NATHANAEL, botanist, b. Wziesko, Upper Silesia, 1823; d. Berlin, 1894. In 1851 he became instructor at the University of Berlin; in 1856 he was elected a member of the Berlin Academy of Science. In 1864, as professor of botany at the University of Jena, he founded an institute of plant physiology in Jena, and in 1868 settled in Berlin. His most important works include Grundlinien einer Theorie der Pflanzenzelle (1854) and Über die Befruchtung and Keimung der Algen und das Wesen des Zeugungsaktes (1855-57).

Pringsheim discovered the sexual process among lower plant life, in which parts of cells, which are without any sexual qualities, function as sexual organs. His researches were devoted chiefly to chlorophyll. From 1857 on he edited various annuals of scientific botany. His collected treatises appeared in four volumes (Jena, 1894-96).

Lit.: Roth, E. in Bettelheim, Anton, Biographische Blätter (1895) 227-33; American Naturalist, vol. 29, p. 96.

PRINGSHEIM, RUDOLPH, railroad builder and operator, b. Oels, Silesia, 1821; d. Berlin, 1901. Originally the forwarding agent of the Upper Silesian railroad, he later leased the Upper Silesian small-gauge railway. His model management and activity in the reconstruction and modernization of the network of railway lines in the Upper Silesian industrial district made the enterprise highly successful, and the Prussian state, which gained control of the Upper Silesian railways in 1884, continued his lease until 1904. His name became well-known by reason of the "Pringsheim House" (with the mosaic frieze after Anton von Werner) which he built in the Wilhelmstrasse, Berlin.

PRINTERS AND PRINTING. It was scarcely twenty-five years after the invention of printing in the middle of the 15th cent. that Jews began to employ this art for the printing of books in Hebrew characters. With a religion and a culture largely based upon literature, they quickly realized the value of the new mode of reproducing books, hailing it as "the crown of all knowledge," "the work of God" and the "holy art." The earliest Hebrew term for printing is defus (from the Latin typus), and the printer was called madpis; later, the additional terms hakok, "to print," and mehokek, "printer," were employed.

1. The Beginnings (1475-1500). Hebrew printing began about 1475 in three separate places in Italy: Reggio di Calabria, Pieve di Sacco, and Mantua. The first Hebrew book that can be definitely dated was the commentary of Rashi on the Pentateuch, which was completed at Reggio on February 17, 1475; the next is the Turim, completed at Pieve in July of the same year. About the same time Conat was printing a Tur in Mantua, which was continued by Abraham the Dyer (Abraham ben Hayim dei Tintori) at Ferrara. It is still uncertain whether Hebrew books were being printed at Rome in the period before 1480. Other localities soon took up the art of Hebrew printing. Abraham the Dyer opened another print-shop in Bologna in 1482, while the Soncinos, immigrants from Germany, soon acquired such an ascendancy in the field that their form of Hebrew character became the predominant one. They operated printing presses at Mantua, Soncino (1483), Casal Maggiore (1486), Naples (1487), Brescia (1491) and Barco (1496). In Naples they were preceded by Joseph ben Jacob Ashkenazi Gunzenhausen, who began his work not later than 1485.

Hebrew publishing in Spain and Portugal began a little later than that in Italy; it was brought to a close after a short existence by the persecutions of the Jews and their expulsion from the Iberian peninsula. The first Hebrew printer was Juan de Lucena, probably at Montalban, in the 1470's (the most probable date is about 1476). A print-shop was opened by Abraham ben Garton and Solomon Alkabitz at Guadalajara in 1476, which lasted until 1482. There were also Hebrew printers at Zamora (1487) and at Hijar (Ixar), where Eliezer ben Abraham Alantansi established a press in 1485.

Faro, in Portugal, has the distinction of printing a book which was at the same time the first Hebrew book printed, and the first book of any language to be printed, in that country. This was a Hebrew Pentateuch, issued by Samuel Porteira in 1487. Jews also produced the first book to be printed at Lisbon, the commentary of Nahmanides on the Pentateuch, published by Eliezer ben Jacob Toledano in 1489. In 1492 Samuel de Ortas and his son established another print-shop at Leiria.

Constantinople seems to have had a Hebrew printing press at an early period, an edition of the Turim of Jacob ben Asher having probably been printed in 1493.

These various Hebrew books show three main forms of type: the German type, with letters rather square and generally all of the same size; the Spanish type, rounder and making use of extensions in letters to fill out the line; the Soncino type, a compromise between the two, more rounded than the German, but showing a tendency to follow it in keeping the letters of a uniform size. The pages in this early period are not numbered; there are no title pages, and the information as to place and date of publication is found, if at all, in the colophon. Decorations, ornamental borders and decorative initials are frequent.

2. Expansion (1500-1550). During the 16th cent. the Soncinos continued as the leading Hebrew printers. They opened up new establishments at Fano (1503-6), Pesaro (1507-15), a second time at Fano (1516), Ortona (1517), a second time at Pesaro (1517-20) and at Rimini (1521-27). The Jews who were expelled from Spain went to Turkey and began to print Hebrew books there; Judah Nachmias and his son Samuel were at Constantinople about 1500, and Judah Gedaliah was at Salonika.

In 1515 Daniel Bomberg of Antwerp opened up a large Hebrew print-shop in Venice, which soon superseded the Soncinos as the chief publisher of Hebrew books. He was the first to attempt a systematic edition of all the important works of Hebrew literature from the Bible on. In 1527 Gershon Soncino moved his press to Constantinople. Bomberg was supreme in Italy until 1545, when the Christian Marco Antonio Giustiniani, with the aid of such Jews as Cornelio Adelkind, started to print Hebrew books, and continued until 1552. Another Christian, Aluise (Aloisio) Bragadini, opened a Hebrew press at Venice in 1550. Rivalries ensued between the printers, and an appeal to Rome led only to a total suppression of Hebrew printing in Venice for about ten years beginning in 1554.

Minor print-shops in Italy during this period included those at Mantua (Samuel Latif, 1513-15), Padua (1518), Trino (1525), Rome (Samuel Zarfati, 1540-45) and Bologna (1537-40). Hebrew books with Lisbon types were printed at Fez, in Northern Africa, from 1516 to 1522.

During the same period Hebrew printing was spreading to the north of the Alps. In 1512 Solomon Kohen, the ancestor of the Gersonides, founded a Hebrew print-shop at Prague, which printed ritual and other works for local use. Hayim Schwartz, who worked for a time with Kohen, set up a press of his own which migrated to Oels (1530), Augsburg (1533), Ichenhausen (1544) and Heddernheim. Three Hebrew books were printed at Cracow in 1530 to 1531, but the printer is unknown. In 1534 the brothers Halicz established a new print-shop, which continued even after they were baptized. A prayer-book according to the Polish ritual was issued at Lublin in 1536.

In addition to these Hebrew presses, there were a number of places in Europe which printed Hebrew Bibles or parts of them for the use of Christians. The printers were Christians, but in many cases had the help of Jews; the most important sites of these presses were Paris, Basel, Lyon, Tübingen, Augsburg, Cologne, Wittenberg, Mayence, Solingen, Genoa and Rome.

3. Up to the Founding of the Amsterdam Press (1550-1627). At the beginning of this period there occurred the prohibition of the printing of the Talmud in Italy. This had the effect of stimulating the presses in other countries, and of breaking up the monopoly which Bomberg at Venice had enjoyed. Thus Lublin began to print the Talmud in 1559, Salonika in 1563, and Basel in 1578.

In 1551 Samuel Zarfati, who had previously been a printer in Rome, established a Hebrew print-shop in Ferrara, which he sold two years later to Abraham Usque. In the same year (1551) Tobiah Foa established another press at Sabbioneta, which lasted until 1559. In 1556 Vincenzo Conti established a Hebrew press at Cremona; he published about forty books, of which the most important was the Zohar (1559). An interesting Hebrew press of the time was that at Riva di Trento (1558-62), which flourished under the protection of the enlightened Cardinal Christoforo Madruzzi, despite the general hostile attitude of the Catholic church toward Hebrew printing at that period.

In 1563 the prohibition against printing Hebrew books in Venice was lifted, and activity in this direction began again on the part of such printers of Giovanni di Gara, Zanetti, Grifio and Cavalli. The Bragadinis, however, were the leaders in this field; they issued, among other works, the first edition of the Shulhan Aruch (1565). Two books were issued at Verona in 1594 to 1595.

While Italy was paramount in the field of Hebrew publishing during this period, causing the presses elsewhere to remain idle from about 1550 to 1565, in 1569 the Prostitz printery was founded at Cracow, where it lasted until 1626. A new Hebrew press was founded in Lublin by Kalonymus Jaffe in 1562. There were also a few publications at Prossnitz (1603-5) and Bistrowicz (1592). After 1562 the Gersonides renewed their activity at Prague, and in 1605 the Bak family established another Hebrew print-shop there.

Israel Zifroni of Italy came to the Froben press at Basel about 1578, and through his influence the latter began to print important works of Jewish literature (up to 1584). In 1610 a Hebrew press was set up in Hanau, which published a number of Cabalistic and Judeo-German works.

During this same period the Hebrew presses at Constantinople and Salonika were continuing to publish various Jewish books under the direction of Solomon and Joseph Yaabetz and others. The last work of the Soncino family appeared at Cairo in 1562. A few works were printed at Safed (1577-78 and 1587) and at Damascus (1605).

4. The 17th and 18th Centuries. The beginning of the 17th cent. was marked by the formation of a new community in Amsterdam, consisting of the Marranos who could once more openly practise Judaism. At first they used only Spanish books; but as they learned more Hebrew, they began to require more and more Hebrew literature, which at first they had to import. In 1626 Manasseh ben Israel established a Hebrew press in Amsterdam; another was set up in the same year by Daniel da Fonseca, although this was of minor importance. The types and format of the works issued by Manasseh ben Israel were so excellent and so easily available that they found a wide market and soon replaced the Hebrew works published in Italy.

The fame of the Amsterdam printing encouraged others to become competitors of Manasseh ben Israel. Immanuel Benveniste published a number of Hebrew books between 1641 and 1660. Uri Phoebus ben Aaron Halevi, who had formerly worked with Benveniste, set up a press of his own which lasted from 1658 to 1689. In 1692 he moved to Zólkiew in Poland, where he founded a print-shop in which he used "Amsterdam" type. Joseph Athias (1658-98) and his son Immanuel (1698-1709) continued the fine tradition of the Amsterdam printers. David de Castro Tartas was active from 1660 to 1695; his books of the year 1666 are especially interesting, as the title pages show a vignette of Sabbatai Zevi as king, and are dated "in the first year of the Messiah."

There were a number of minor Hebrew print-shops in Amsterdam at the time. The most important proprietors of these were Moses Coutinho, Isaac de Cordova, Moses ben Isaac Dias, Kosmann Emmerich, Moses Frankfurter, Isaac ben Solomon Templo, and Naphtali Herz Halevi.

During the 18th cent. the Hebrew book market was chiefly in the hands of the Amsterdam printer Solomon ben Joseph Proops, who gradually took over the type of the other important printers. The firm lasted until 1849.

There were a number of presses in Germany, where there was a great demand for Hebrew books due to the frequent persecutions of the Jews and the loss of books which resulted from attacks and expulsions. The Hebrew presses in Germany during the 17th and 18th centuries included those at Altona (1727 on), Berlin (1697 on), Dessau (1694 on), Dyhernfurth (1689-1718), Frankfort on Main (1677 on), Frankfort on Oder (1695 on), Fürth (1691 on), Gotha (1707), Halle (1709-14), Hamburg (1686 on), Hanau (1709 on), Homburg (1736-1757), Jessnitz (1718-25 and 1738-44), Neuwied (1735-52), Offenbach (1714 on), Sulzbach (1664 on), Wandsbeck (1726-33) and Wilhermsdorf (1669 on). In many instances these printers of Hebrew books were Christians, since local laws frequently did not allow Jews to own printing presses; however, they made frequent use of Jewish assistants. They printed not only Hebrew but also Judeo-German works.

During this period the Bragadinis continued to print at Venice, with Vendramini as a competitor from 1631 on; but the activity of the presses here became less and less, and Amsterdam printers captured their business. A new Hebrew press arose in Leghorn (Livorno) in 1650. The press at Prague, to the north, had ceased issuing books between 1630 to 1650, after which it followed Amsterdam type forms. Menahem Nahum Meisels founded a new Hebrew press in Cracow in 1631, and Uri Phoebus ben Aaron Halevi, as mentioned above, established one in Zólkiew.

Comparatively few books were published in the Orient during this period. Solomon Franco started a Hebrew press in Constantinople in 1638, the first in fifty years; it lasted until 1683. In Salonika, books were published by such men as Abraham Hager (1650), Abraham ben David and Moses Falcon (1713 on). Abraham Gabbai (1657) and Jonah ben Jacob Ashkenazi (1729) set up presses in Smyrna for short periods. In 1734 the first Karaite press was established in Kale, in the Crimea.

5. Rise of East European Printing (1750-1850). After the middle of the 18th cent. Hebrew printing became so widespread and so decentralized that it becomes impossible to treat in detail. The chief feature of the next hundred years was the transfer of the center of printing from Amsterdam to Eastern Europe. As the Jews of Western Europe began to take up secular knowledge and neglect Hebrew, the Eastern centers became the chief markets for Hebrew books, and at the same time Poland and Russia began to expand their activities.

Among the new locations of Hebrew presses during this period were the following: in Austria, Vienna, Brünn (1754), Lemberg and Czernowitz; in Poland, Nowydwor (1781), Jozefow (1822), Alexinez (1760), Kopys, Grodno, Vilna, Korzec, Shklov, Polonnoye, Poritzk, Dubno, Berdichev, Ostrog (1790) and Radziwilow (1810). In the middle of the 19th cent. Vilna presses took first rank in Jewry, and Krotoschin also was an active center, although the exact time at which Hebrew printing began is uncertain; in the Crimea, Eupatoria (Goslow, 1833); in Germany, Berlin (1780), Königsberg (about 1782), Breslau (about 1790) and Rödelheim (about 1800), famous for its editions of the prayer-book; in France, Metz (about 1760), Strasbourg (about 1770) and Paris.

From this time on the history of Hebrew printing merges into that of publishing houses. See PUBLISHING HOUSES.

SIMON COHEN.

Lit.: Encyclopaedia Judaica, vol. 6 (1930), cols. 39-81; Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 12, pp. 295-335 (with lists of printers and specimens of typography); Amram, D. W., The Makers of Hebrew Books in Italy (1909); Bloch, Joshua, Venetian Printers of Hebrew Books (1932); idem, Early Hebrew Printing in Spain and Portugal (1938); idem, Hebrew Printing in Riva di Trento (1933); idem, "Hebrew Printing in Naples," Bulletin of the New York Public Library, June, 1942 (also reprinted separately); Yaari, Abraham, Hebrew Printing in the East (1936 and 1940); the files of Kiryath Sefer; Friedberg, B., History of Hebrew Typography (1937). A list of articles on Hebrew printing may be found in the Index to Jewish Festschriften, edited by Jacob R. Marcus and Albert Bilgray (1937) 107. On Hebrew printing in Rome, cf. Freimann, Aron, in Festschrift zum 70. Geburtstag von Jakob Freimann (1937) 53 et seq.

6. Printers' Marks. In accordance with the general usage of the times, printers of Hebrew books affixed their marks to the book, a feature which is often of considerable importance in determining the place and date, otherwise unknown, of a book. Such marks are found on the title-page, in the colophon, preface, or at the beginning or end of individual sections. The most common form is a seal; often they are framed by ornamental decorations.

The oldest known Jewish printer's mark is believed to be one dating from 1485 by Eliezer Alantansi of Hijar (Ixar), Spain, consisting of a lion on a shield. Some marks contain animal figures derived from the coat of arms of the city or the name of the printer. A peacock was used by Foa at Sabbioneta, by de Gara in Venice (1588) and Mantua; a small white lion on a black square appears in books of Constantinople (1514); a lion with two tails, the coat of arms of Prague, is used with or without imperial globes in Prague prints, but is found also in many other places (Leghorn, Mantua, Sabbioneta, Amsterdam, Safed); a griffin was used by Grypho (Venice, 1544-47), an elephant by Giorgio di Cavalli (Venice), a deer at Cracow (1569) and Lublin (1622), and fishes by Isaac ben Aaron at Cracow and by Uri Phoebus at Amsterdam. Even definitely Christian themes appear; thus Sabbatai Bass at Dyhernfurth used St. George and the Dragon. The candelabrum with signature was used by Meir ben Jacob (Venice), the Temple by Giustiniani (Venice, 1545), and the sun by Daniel Gianetti (Venice, 1605). A widely used printer's mark was that of three crowns. Abraham Usque at Ferrara used an astronomical picture of the solar system, together with a Hebrew verse and his initials. Other frequent emblems are the Shield of David, palms and various emblems. Prints issued by the Soncino society occasionally have a tower, and this has been adopted by the modern Soncino Society for its own books.

See also: BOOKS; INCUNABULA.

PRINZ, GYULA, theologist and geographer, b. Rábamolnári, Hungary. He studied at several universities, including that of Budapest, served as an assistant at the geological institute of the University of Breslau, was lecturer on geology from 1908 on at the University of Budapest, and full professor of geography from 1918 on at that of Pécs, Hungary. From 1906 to 1909 he conducted two expeditions to Central Asia, and another in 1914 to Iceland. Prinz published a great number of books on geology and glaciers and on the natural and economic geographies of Europe and of Hungary in particular. The most important were published also in German. They include:

Die Vergletscherung des Zentral-Tientschan Gebirges (1909); Beiträge zur Morphologie des Kuldschaer Nanschan (1910); "Beiträge zur Glaziologie Zentral-Asiens" (in Mitteilungen aus dem Jahrbuche der königlich-ungarischen geologischen Anstalt, 1927). A map of the hitherto unknown mountains which he discovered in Inner Asia was published in Perthes' Geographen-Kalender (1910). The petrographical results of his travels were published by Zsigmond de Szentpétery in Beiträge zur Topographie Zentralasiens (1915), while Prinz himself published the ethnographical results and several diaries and travel books. He edited Magyar Földrajz, an encyclopedia of Hungarian geography.

PRIORITY, see PRECEDENCE.

PRIVILEGES. Until the 19th cent. the legal position of the Jews in European countries was not uniformly regulated by legislation. They were strangers and aliens who stood outside of the pale of the prevailing national rights, and consequently were usually without rights of their own, deprived of a peaceful existence, and could receive no compensation for damages. They might at any time be robbed of their goods, expelled, or killed with impunity. On the basis of the "game laws," if they were not under the protection of any native, they were declared to be the vassals of the king. Furthermore, since Christianity was the state religion, and they were the adherents of a different faith, they also lost their rights because they were unbelievers. They had no national rights of their own. The Jewish Law was valid only for the regulation of legal matters between Jew and Jew.

The Jews soon came to recognize the danger of being handed over to the severities of the law about foreigners, and accordingly petitioned the lords of the various countries in which they lived for privileges which would serve the purpose of protecting their persons and their property and securing the toleration of their religion. Sometimes the rulers, of their own accord, granted them special rights and favors, either to reward them for their services or to attract them to the country because of their importance for trade and business or financial gain. In exchange for these privileges the Jews had to pay taxes or furnish certain specified services. The privileges, however, were not granted systematically and from a definite point of view, but quite arbitrarily, depending on whim or calculation, and varying with place and conditions. The protectors also possessed the right of withdrawing their favors at any time. It was therefore correctly said of the Jewish rights in the Middle Ages that it was "a privilege right made up of casual and heterogeneous favors and limitations."

A number of such privileges are extant, from the time of Louis the Pious of France, which promise certain Jews protection for their lives and property, freedom from tolls and other taxes, the right to dispose of their property as they wished, and an acceptance as witnesses in law-courts which was superior to those who were in bondage. In return, these Jews were obligated to furnish services to the imperial palace (cf. Zeumer, "Formulae Imperiales e Curia Ludovici Pii," in Monumenta Germaniae historica formulae Merovingici et Carolini aevi, 1882, vol. 1, p. 309 et seq.; Boretius, Capitularia regum Francorum, 1883, vol. 1, p. 152; Simson, Jahrbücher des fränkischen Reiches unter Ludwig dem Frommen, 1874, vol. 1, p. 394).

In course of time such privileges, which were originally given only to individual merchants of good standing or to court purveyors, were granted to all the Jews who had settled in the cities; this became general after the 11th cent., and resulted from the flaring up of religious fanaticism at the time of the Crusades, and the fear of the rising merchant trade that the Jews would become formidable rivals. Both these reasons made it necessary for the rulers to interfere and to give a general protection to the Jews. To present a history of the Jewish privileges is very much the same as writing a history of the Jews. Instead, only the most important Jewish privileges will be mentioned here; their contents may be found by consulting the subjoined literature.

A. For Germany.

1) September 13, 1084. Privilege granted by Bishop Rudiger Huozmann to the Jews of Speyer.

(Hilgard, Urkunde zur Geschichte der Stadt Speyer, vol. 1, p. 11, note 11; Würdtwein, Nova subsidia diplomatica, vol. 1, p. 125; Remling, Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte der Bischöfe von Speyer, vol. 1, p. 57; Aronius, J., Regesten zur Geschichte der Juden im fränkischen und deutschen Reiche bis zum Jahre 1273, no. 168.)

2) February 19, 1090. Privilege granted by Emperor Henry IV to some Jews of Speyer.

(See the literature given above and Aronius, ibid., no. 170. The authenticity of this privilege has been sometimes doubted, and its exact significance is the subject of dispute. Beseler, in Zeitschrift für Rechtsgeschichte, vol. 2, p. 374 et seq., considers it to have been a general privilege for the Jews of Germany; Stobbe thinks that it applied to all the Jews of Speyer; Bresslau, in Zeitschrift für Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland, vol. 1, p. 154 et seq., says that it was only for certain individual Jews.)

3) About 1090. Privilege granted by Emperor Henry IV to the Jews of Worms.

(Zeitschrift für Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland, vol. 1, pp. 138 et seq., 208, 210 et seq.; Aronius, ibid., no. 171. It was confirmed by Emperor Frederick I, April 6, 1157; Aronius, ibid., no. 280.)

4) September, 1182. Privilege granted by Emperor Frederick I to the Jews of Regensburg.

(Scheffer-Boichorst, in Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung, vol. 10, p. 459 et seq. and under no. 403; Aronius, ibid., no. 314a.)

5) July, 1236. Emperor Frederick II extended the Worms privilege of Henry IV to all the Jews of Germany.

(Zeitschrift für Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland, vol. 1, pp. 137, 142; Boos, Urkundenbuch Worms, vol. 2, p. 740; Weyden, Geschichte der Juden in Köln, 129; Aronius, ibid., no. 496.)

6) April 27, 1252. Privilege granted by Archbishop Conrad to the Jews of Cologne.

(Ennen and Eckertz, Quellen zur Geschichte der Stadt Köln, vol. 2, pp. 321-22, no. 308; Gengler, Codex juris municipalis Germaniae medii aevi, vol. 1, p. 357, no. 86; Weyden, ibid., p. 353, no. 6; Aronius, ibid., no. 588.)

7) 1265. Privilege granted by Margrave Henry the Illustrious of Meissen.

(Stobbe, Otto, Die Juden in Deutschland während des Mittelalters, p. 305 et seq.; Fabricius, Rerum Misnicarum, vol. 7, p. 112 et seq.; Sidori, Juden in Sachsen, supplement, p. 140 et seq., no. 1; Aronius, ibid., no. 711.)

8) December 13, 1380. Privilege granted by Duke Frederick of Bavaria.

(Wiener, Meir, Regesten zur Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland während des Mittelalters, pp. 146, no. 308, and 179, no. 505.)

9) February 6, 1412, and April 25, 1744. Privileges granted by Bishops Johann II and Gottfried of Würzburg.

(Heffner, Die Juden in Franken, appendices L and W.)

10) April 4, 1416. Privilege granted by Emperor Sigismund to the Jews of Nuremberg, Winsheim, Nördlingen, and Weissenburg.

B. For Austria.

1) August, 1238. Privilege granted by Emperor Frederick II to the Jews of Vienna.

(von Meiller, "Österreichische Stadtrechte und Satzungen aus der Zeit der Babenburger," in Archiv für Kunde österreichischer Geschichtsquellen, vol. 10, pp. 127-28; Hormayrs Taschenbuch, 1812, p. 70; Aronius, ibid., no. 518.)

2) July 1, 1244. Privilege granted by Duke Frederick II of Austria.

(This privilege was the model for the Jewish laws of the following monarchs and countries: of Béla IV of Hungary, December 5, 1251, and March 22, 1256; of Ottocar II of Bohemia, March 29, 1254, March 8, 1255, and August 23, 1268; of Boleslav of Kalisch, August 16, 1264; of Henry III of Glogau; of Casimir the Great of Poland, October 9, 1334, July 15, 1364, and April 25, 1367; of Prince Witold of Lithuania, June 24 and July 2, 1388.)

3) December 6, 1624. Privilege granted by Ferdinand II.

(Pribram, A. F., Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte der Juden in Deutsch-Österreich, vol. 1, 1918, p. 84 et seq.)

4) March 1, 1625. Privilege granted by Ferdinand II.

(Pribram, ibid., p. 91 et seq.)

5) January 12, 1645. Privilege granted by Ferdinand III.

C. For England.

April 10, 1201. Carta Judaeorum Angliae, granted by King John.

(Blunt, J. E., A History of the Establishment and Residence of the Jews in England, 1830.)

D. For France.

1360. Privilege granted by Charles V.

(Laurière Secousse, Ordonnances des roys de france de la troisième race par ordre chronologique, 1723-1849, vol. 3, pp. 473-81.) SELMA STERN-TÄUBLER.

Lit.: Stobbe, Otto, Die Juden in Deutschland während des Mittelalters (1866); Scherer, J. E., Die Rechtsverhältnisse der Juden in den deutsch-österreichischen Ländern (1901); Schröder, Richard, Lehrbuch der deutschen Rechtsgeschichte (5th ed., 1907); von Frisch, Hans, Das Fremdenrecht (1910).

PROBUS NATIONAL, service club, founded at New Haven, Conn., in October, 1921. The New Haven club is, therefore, the original Probus Club. It followed, in pattern and in organization, the general service club movement, which, at that time, had gained considerable strength. The structure of service clubs in general, although not exclusively on racial or religious bases, is such that they have had to exclude from the membership members of the Jewish community in any town. This is true, with the exception that there are isolated individual instances where Jews are members of other service clubs in the professional or business men's categories not already occupied by others. Thus the Probus Club accepts into its membership only two members of any business or profession. Specialists are admitted on the basis of one per specialty, and the standard of requirements is very high.

The active clubs in 1942 were located in New Haven, West Haven, Bridgeport and Hartford, in Connecticut; Worcester, Springfield, Fitchburg and Pittsfield, in Massachusetts; and Detroit, in Michigan. In each case they constituted the group of Jewry which represented its people to the community, without conflict with any other Jewish organization or activity. Its membership were leaders in inter-racial or interfaith and other communal of community endeavor. Candidates for membership, as well as members themselves, are under constant self-imposed scrutiny. At the original meeting, this was the code adopted: "The object of this club is to affiliate business and professional men into an organization, so that ideas might be exchanged, and to create greater cooperation in spirit, in feeling, and in action among its members."

The original charter members were: James M. Kent, Abraham H. Rubin, William Silver, Louis Lehman, Morris Rubin, Louis Stovin, Samuel Unger, Harry Goldfarb, Julius Kronish, and Lawrence L. Jaffe. James M. Kent was the first president. The national officers in 1942 were: president, Maxwell Lear, vice presidents, Samuel Lopatin, David Kosh, Irwin Dorman, Samuel Gershenson, treasurer, Bert Adler, and secretary, Benjamin D. Novak. MAXWELL LEAR.

PROCEDURE AT LAW. In Jewish civil law, the summons of the defendant had to be made from the court sitting at the defendant's residence. However, the plaintiff had the right to refuse to try the case at the defendant's residence but instead at a larger court (beth din hagadol); later on, however, it was established that every case should be tried in the court of the residence of the defendant. At first the plaintiff had to appear before the court in person and was not permitted to send a representative; later he might do so by authority of a written power of attorney (Harshaah). On the other hand, the defendant had to appear in person, and could not have a representative. Exception was made only for certain persons, such as women, priests and scholars, who were allowed to be represented by an attorney (Entelar).

Procedure at law began with the bringing forward of the cause of the dispute on the part of the plaintiff (tobea or to'en). The defendant (nitba or nit'an) was then summoned to appear before the court by a court official (sheliah beth din). This summons might be written or oral. If the defendant refused to heed the summons of the court, or remained away, without proper excuse, from the trial for a certain period of time, the lesser ban (Niddui) was laid upon him, and was not removed until he had promised to put himself at the disposal of the court.

In criminal cases the injured party became the plaintiff. In a case of homicide, the witnesses were required to make the complaint before the court. In the original Biblical law, it was the "avenger of blood," that is, the next of kin, who had the duty of bringing the perpetrator of the crime to punishment; in which case the community was to judge between "the murderer and the avenger of blood."

Basic Biblical laws insist on absolute equality before the court. Natives and strangers, rich and poor, and all others, are declared to be equal (Lev. 24:22; Deut. 1:17). It is especially required that the court give the same conscientious attention to small disputes as to large ones. The hearing of the parties had to take place in the presence of both sides. The various plaintiffs must appear in court in the order of their appearance; however, preference is given to widows, orphans, scholars and women.

In general provision was made only for an oral procedure and the parties had to appear directly before the court. A report of the proceedings was made by the court; it was only in exceptional cases that the process could proceed by means of writing. The plaintiff was required to present his claims and his evidence for them, while the defendant had to make answer to these. Either party could make further additions or explanations as long as both parties were still in the courtroom.

The court was obligated to attempt to bring about a compromise first, in which the parties abandoned part of their claims. Jewish legalists are of the opinion that even a correct decision leaves the parties embittered and lets them leave the court as enemies, whereas a compromise combines justice and moderation. If the parties refused a compromise, the court then proceeded to try the case. In criminal cases, the only testimony permitted was that of witnesses; in civil cases, this was supplemented by documents and the taking of an oath. After this was done, the public was excluded, the parties left the hall, and the judges retired to deliberate. In criminal cases the lowest in rank of the judges was required to cast his vote first, in order that he might not be influenced by the opinion of the others. In case of a division of opinion among the judges, the majority ruled. In criminal cases certain provisions were made for the purpose of making the acquittal of the defendant as easy as possible.

The announcement of the verdict was made by the chief judge in the presence of the parties; however, the opinions expressed by the judges in the course of their deliberations had to be kept strictly secret. During the announcement of the verdict the judges sat, while the parties and their witnesses remained standing. The announcement of the verdict closed the case and the legal proceedings; an appeal was permitted only in certain very limited cases.

If a defendant did not comply with a definite court decision as to a claim for debt, a document was given to the creditor empowering him to confiscate part of the property of the debtor. This document was known as Adrachta and had to be drawn up according to certain specified provisions. An execution could be ordered by the court on the petition of the creditor; in such case Jewish law took care that the execution did not press too heavily on the debtor. In the case of an attachment of property, the debtor must be left enough provision for thirty days, his most necessary articles of furniture and clothing, as well as his most important tools. The creditor himself could not enter the home of the debtor. Movable property must be seized first in an execution, and real estate can only be seized if the claim is still unsettled. In case of real estate, the first to be seized was that of middle quality, next that of inferior quality, and only if still further were required could property of the best quality be confiscated. There was also a difference of procedure in regard to "free immovable property" and "mortgaged immovable property"; the latter could be sold again after the promissory note had been receipted.

See also: APPROPRIATION; APPEAL; ASSIGNMENT; LAW, CIVIL; LAW, CRIMINAL. MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Sanhedrin I to 3; Maimonides, Hilchoth Toen Venitan and Hilchoth Sanhedrin; Mayer, Samuel, Die Rechte der Israeliten, Athener und Römer (3 vols., 1862-76); Bloch, Moses, Die Zivilprozessordnung nach mosaisch-rabbinischem Rechte; Fassel, H. B., Das mosaisch-rabbinische Gerichtsverfahren; idem, Das mosaisch-rabbinische Strafrecht.

PROCESSIONS. The procession is a natural and simple form of public celebration, providing an orderly and impressive way for a number of persons to participate in the same ceremony. Processions have, therefore, occupied an important place in the social ritual of all peoples and at all times. In its original sense, the procession must be considered a form of the sacred dance, which, according to historians of religion, was the primitive mode of public worship in all religions.

Processions formed an important element in the public worship of the Israelites. In connection with this worship two types of processions may be distinguished: one, which encircled a sacred object, the altar (Ex. 32:6, see Samaritan Pentateuch and Septuagint; Ps. 26:6; 48:13); the other, in which the sacred object, the Ark, was carried at the head of the procession (II Sam. 6:3-5; I Kings 8:1-7; Ps. 68:25-26).

The occasions of public worship among the Israelites were the three great harvest festivals, which they adopted from the inhabitants of Canaan when they settled in the land and adapted to the worship of their national God. The procession was an integral part of the folk celebration at these festivals. It is highly probable that the term hag, used to denote these festivals, comes from the root meaning "to dance in a circle," usually around the sacred stone or cult object (Brown, Driver and Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament, 1906, p. 290; Wellhausen, J., Reste arabischen Heidentums, 2nd ed., 1897, p. 110). Indeed, Pesach, or Passover, is considered the "feast of leaping," and was undoubtedly celebrated by means of processions. At the Passover feast observed by Josiah the Levites carried the Ark in procession, followed by the rest of the congregation (II Chron. 35:3-5). Ps. 118, the last of the Hallel (Ps. 113 to 118), which was sung on all festivals, appears to be a Passover hymn, sung antiphonally by a procession, headed by the Ark, approaching the Temple and the Levites who respond from within. The psalm, celebrating a miraculous deliverance which fits the type of victory commemorated in the Passover story, is closely connected with Ps. 113 and 114, which are clearly Passover hymns, and quotes directly from the Song of Moses (cf. verse 14 with Ex. 15:2).

A feature of the celebration of these festivals was the pilgrimage ('ole regel) and the bringing of the first-fruits (bikkurim), in early times to the local shrines, and later, after the centralization of national worship, to the Temple in Jerusalem. The first-fruits were taken from the seven principal products of the soil enumerated in Deut. 8:8, and were carried in great state to Jerusalem. In post-Exilic times it was customary for the faithful bringing the offerings to gather in the principal towns of the districts to which they belonged and then march, to the accompaniment of music, in a procession, headed by the sacrificial bull, his horns gilded and his head wreathed in a garland of olive-branches. At the gates of Jerusalem the procession was met by members of the priesthood, who accompanied it to the Temple mount. There the owners of the offerings decorated the baskets containing the first-fruits with wreaths, and carried them on their shoulders as far as the court, where they were met by the Levites singing Ps. 30:2. Each person then proceeded to hand his basket to the priest, and as he did so recited Deut. 26:5-10, whereupon the priest took the basket and put it down beside the altar.

The procession was the most important rite in the various ceremonies of the Feast of Tabernacles, which assumed preeminence among the festivals in a comparatively early period. The celebration of this joyous festival began with the water-drawing ceremony at dawn of the first day. A priest would fill a golden pitcher with water from the pool of Siloam and carry it at the head of a jubilant procession of worshippers through the water-gate up to the altar where, amid the blowing of trumpets and the singing of Isa. 12:3 by the faithful, the water, together with a wine oblation, was solemnly poured. The ceremony was performed on each of the seven days of the festival.

At the same time, another procession wended its way to a place outside Jerusalem called Motza, where the participants gathered willow branches and decorated the altar with them. The service then began. At the close of the additional sacrifices prescribed in Num. 29:12-38, the priests, in the presence of the worshippers who were holding the palm-branch (Lulab) in their right hand and the citron (Ethrog) in their left hand, formed in procession and made a circuit around the altar, singing Ps. 118:25.

The festivities reached their height at the close of the first day in the Simhath Beth Hashoebah, which H. St. John Thackeray (The Septuagint and Jewish Worship, 1921, p. 63) regards as an integral part of the day-time proceedings, the indoor celebration of the ceremony of the water-drawing. In the brilliantly illuminated court of women a great multitude gathered to witness the processional torch dance in which only the most prominent Israelites took part. The celebration ended at dawn with the procession of the two priests from the Nicanor gate to the eastern gate, amid the blowing of trumpets. The ceremony was repeated on the five succeeding nights.

The celebration of the festival reached its climax on the seventh day. On that day the priests made a sevenfold circuit of the altar. The worshippers shook the leaves off the willow boughs and beat the palm-branches at the side of the altar. The pilgrims then left the Temple and returned to their homes.

Attempts to continue the procession of the palms on the Feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem were made after the destruction of the Temple (70 C.E.) and the dispersion of Israel. In the time of Hai Gaon (939-1038) it was customary to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and walk in procession around the Mount of Olives. However, for most Jews, to whom Jerusalem was inaccessible, the synagogue replaced the Temple and the Torah replaced the altar as the center of the procession. On the first seven days the Additional Service (Musaf), which takes the place of the additional sacrifices in the Temple, is followed by a palm-branch procession around the reading-desk (bimah), on which the scroll of the Torah is held in an upright position. As in the old days, the joyous character of the festival finds its fullest expression on the seventh day, popularly known as Hoshanah Rabbah (The Great Hosanna) because of the sevenfold procession around the Bimah and the consequent frequent exclamation of Hoshanah.

A procession of palms among Marranos on Passover is described by Isaac Landman (American Hebrew, April 25, 1930, p. 892). This rite is observed by the entire community, which gathers on the shores of a stream, and then each one beats the water with a palm-branch. This ceremony, a peculiar mixture of the Christian Palm Sunday and the procession of the palms on Tabernacles, undoubtedly commemorates the crossing of the Red Sea.

The procession of the Torah on Simhath Torah (the Rejoicing of the Law), on the ninth day of the Feast of Tabernacles, differs essentially in origin from the procession of the palms. The festival is post-Biblical in origin. The distinctive feature of the celebration of this day is the procession with the Torah-scrolls around the reading-desk in the Morning Service. All the scrolls are taken out of the Ark, a lighted candle being left in their place. A procession is formed, headed by the reader and followed by men bearing the scrolls and by all the little boys in the synagogue carrying paper flags, representing the twelve tribes. When one circuit has been completed, other men are invited to carry a scroll during the next. After all the men have been given the opportunity to carry a scroll in procession, all but three of the scrolls are returned to the Ark and the regular reading begins. In the Ashkenazic ritual these processions are anticipated in the previous Evening Service.

The custom of inducting the Sabbath (Kabbalath Shabbath) with a procession originated in the Cabalistic circles of Safed, Palestine, at the end of the 16th cent. Taking literally the injunction to go out to meet the Sabbath (Sab. 119a), the Cabalists, under the leadership of Isaac Luria, were wont to go outside the city limits into the open fields singing psalms and songs. This custom was later abandoned and the Sabbath was received in the synagogue court in the open air. Today it is customary in all congregations for the worshippers to turn to the door and bow at the last refrain of the Lechah Dodi as a reminder of the original procession into the open.

In addition to public worship, processions accompanied the celebration of important events in the life of the people and of the individual members of the faith. These celebrations were, inevitably, given a religious significance and were closely related to the worship of God. In the old days, processions and processional dances were prominent features in the celebration of victories of the Jewish people over its foes (Ex. 15:20-21; I Sam. 18:6; 21:12).

In modern times the dedication of a synagogue is among the most important events in the life of a Jewish community. The event is marked by a procession in which all, young and old, participate. The procession is headed by the most prominent men in the community bearing the Scrolls of the Law, and is accompanied by music. Similarly, the donation of a Torah-scroll is celebrated by a procession from the home of the donor to the synagogue. These customs are widespread among Jewish communities in Eastern Europe and also in the United States. The ritual of Reform Judaism expressly provides for processions in the celebration of both these events (Rabbi's Manual, issued by the Central Conference of American Rabbis, 1928, pp. 109-16).

Among the outstanding individual rites among the Jews are marriage and burial. The procession is an important element in the celebration of both. The bridal procession was probably known in Biblical times. Originally the procession accompanied the actual transfer of the bride to the home of her husband. All who could do so were obliged to join the procession as it wended its way through the streets. The procession changed its character in the Middle Ages and led to the synagogue rather than to the bridal chamber. The marriage ceremony today, whether performed in the synagogue or in the home, still retains traces of the old procession, which leads to the Huppah, or canopy, beneath which the wedding is solemnized. In some Jewish communities the old custom of having the bride walk seven times in circuit around the bridegroom in the Huppah, is still retained (Higger, Michael, Tractate Semahoth, 1936, p. 76).

The funeral procession is nowhere mentioned in the Old Testament, but it is known to have been in existence in the Talmudic period. It was considered an act of piety to accompany the dead to their last resting place, and all were obliged to join the procession from the home of the deceased to the cemetery even if only for a short distance. In some places it is still the custom for the mourners to make seven circuits around the body of the deceased in the house (Higger, ibid., p. 76). Among Sephardic Jews it is customary for the mourners to make seven circuits around the bier at burial. According to Rashi (commentary on Ber. 17b), friends of the mourners used to console them by encircling them in a circuit after the return from the grave.

MORRIS LEHRER.

Lit.: Oesterley, W. O. E., The Sacred Dance (1923); idem, "Early Hebrew Festival Rituals," in Hooke, S. H., Myth and Ritual (1933) 111-46; Schmidt, Hans, Die Thronfahrt Jahves (1927); Abrahams, Israel, Festival Studies (1906) 13-19; Higger, Michael, "Hakkafoth Veiggulim," Horeb, vol. 1 (1934) 207-16; Hastings, James, edit., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, vol. 10 (1919) 356-58.

PROCHOWNIK, ABRAHAM, legendary hero of a story from the early history of Poland, which runs as follows: In 842 the Polish tribe of Polani met at Krushwitz to elect a successor to their king Popiel. Since no one of the candidates received a majority, they decided to hail as king the first person who entered the city gate the following morning. This turned out to be a Jew named Abraham Prochownik ("powder-maker"). The Polani hailed Abraham as their king; the latter asked two days for consideration and then refused to leave the fortress in which he had retired for deliberation. The Poles stormed the fortress headed by a certain Piast, whom Abraham thereupon declared to be worthy of rulership. His advice was followed and the Piast dynasty was founded.

This legend, which is widespread among the Jews of Poland, is perhaps a reminiscence of the confusion after the death of the last Jagellon, Sigismund Augustus (1572), when a certain Abraham Zbaski was one of the candidates. It is noteworthy that the legend about Saul Wahl is also placed in that period. Gumplowicz connects the story with the issuing of early Polish coins, bearing Hebrew characters, by Jewish mint-masters. Abraham is reputed to be the ancestor of the families bearing the name of Prochownik and its equivalents Pulvermacher and Powdermaker.

Lit.: Orgelbrand, in Encyklopedja Powszechna, vol. 1; Kronthal, A., "Jüdische Königssagen," Jüdische Familienforschung, June, 1926, No. 6; Gumplowicz, M., Poczatki religji zydowskiej w Polsce, 22-23.

PROCURATORS, imperial Roman officers of equestrian rank, in whose hands lay the administration of Judea from 6 to 41 C.E., and that of all Palestine from 44 to 66 C.E. The procurator was the direct representative of the emperor; while Palestine lay nominally within the area subject to the governor (legate) of Syria, the latter was not required to exercise supervision over the territory under the procurator, except in an emergency. The power of the procurator therefore was subject only to the good will of the Roman emperor.

From his seat in Caesarea, where he resided in a palace once occupied by Herod the Great, the procurator exercised jurisdiction over all the secular courts, Jewish or Gentile, in his dominion; until 41 he controlled the Temple and even selected the high priest; above all, he saw to the collection of the Roman taxes (from which function the title originally was derived), and commanded the army which enforced his orders and maintained public order and Roman rule. His authority in legal affairs was required to be exercised only in extraordinary cases, but he alone had the power of deciding matters of life or death, even over Roman citizens, although these had the right of appeal to Rome.

In religious affairs and strictly local legislative matters it was enjoined upon the procurator not to interfere, and to respect local custom. Unfortunately, the boundary line between Roman law and Jewish law was hard to define, and fundamentally conflicting in principle. The imposition of the one upon the other was obnoxious to the Jewish populace, whose religious and national ideals were inseparable. On the other hand, the nature of Roman political affairs was such that the procurator was not chosen on the basis of any special qualifications for a post which required extreme tact, understanding and integrity, but through political influence. The very basis of the procuratorship was therefore tenuous. Having attained the post, by a method which favored an unprincipled character whose personal welfare was his aim, the procurator's interest lay in enriching himself, as thoroughly and speedily as possible, for no doubt another would soon supersede him by methods similar to his own. Thus the complex situation in Palestine, which had developed to explosive proportions under Herod and his immediate successors, was further aggravated by a series of governors who added their own rapacity to the burdens of an already overladen people.

The first procurator was Coponius (6-9 C.E.). During his administration occurred the taking of the census, which, however, was not done by him, but under the direction of Quirinus, the legate of Syria, under orders from Rome. The census was undertaken for the purpose of establishing a poll-tax, payable by every adult, and a property tax. Aside from the fact that such an enumeration was contrary to a Biblical injunction and to deep-seated tradition, it was the first time the Romans had demanded direct taxation of Judea. A great uproar was aroused; the high priest succeeded in persuading the people to yield, but many new adherents flocked to the revolutionary Zealots, who were headed by Judas of Galilee.

Of the administration of the two following procurators, Marcus Ambibulus (9-12 C.E.) and Annius Rufus (12-15 C.E.), little is known. A conspicuous feature of the administration of the next procurator, Valerius Gratus (15-26), is the impunity with which he took advantage of his authority to corrupt the institution of the high priesthood to his personal advantage. During his term of office he installed five high priests, selecting them from the various favored families whose prerogative that office had grown to be.

Gratus' successor was Pontius Pilate (26-36). The entire ten years of his administration were replete with acts of murderous cruelty, abuse of justice, graft and evils of many kinds. Some characteristic acts were his design to introduce idols into Jerusalem by retaining the images of Caesar on the banners of the troops, which were ordinarily removed before entry into Jerusalem; in this instance he was forced to yield to the protests of the entire people, but on a later occasion, when the Jews were in an uproar as a result of his diversion of the sacred treasure of the Temple to a secular purpose, he carried his point at the edge of the sword, ordering a great massacre of a mob of protesters. It was another senseless slaughter, this time of Samaritans, that finally brought about the intervention of Vitellius, the Syrian legate, and Pilate was recalled to Rome.

Vitellius then himself undertook the procurator's functions, and showed himself to be of high integrity and understanding, with a respect and sympathy for Jewish susceptibilities that contrasted sharply with the attitude of his predecessors. Soon after Vitellius had taken command of Judea he won the good will of the inhabitants by his remission of the tax on the fruits sold in Jerusalem. On the same occasion, which was the Feast of Passover in the year 36, the procurator turned over to the priests the keeping of the robes of the high priest, which had been kept under Roman guard for the preceding thirty years. Later, in undertaking a campaign against the Arabian king Aretas on behalf of one of Herod's heirs, Antipas, Vitellius again responded to the feelings of the Jews by detouring his army through the Transjordan country, thereby avoiding the carrying of the image-bearing standards of the Roman troops through Judea. He himself at this time journeyed to Jerusalem, where he paid sacrifice at the Temple, and was received with good feeling by the citizenry. While Vitellius himself actually superintended the government, he installed as procurator Marcellus (36-37), who held office with limited power.

A new procurator was then sent from Rome, Marullus (37-41). Nothing is known of the activities of this figure, although important events occurred during his term of office, especially the dispute about the statue of Caligula.

After the death of Caligula and the accession of Claudius, the series of procurators was broken by the reign of Agrippa I. Following his death, the procuratorship was reestablished, and the country's autonomy, highly cherished by the Jews, was again reduced to its former limits.

The first incumbent was CUSPIUS FADUS (44-48), whose sphere of authority was extended to Galilee and Perea, as well as Judea and Samaria, for the two former tetrarchies had been added to Agrippa's kingdom, as they had been to that of his grandfather, Herod the Great. It quickly became apparent that Agrippa's pleasant reign had been no more than an armistice. Fadus had hitherto borne a reputation for honesty and just dealing, but in his desire to establish his own supreme authority he displayed an ignorance of Jewish susceptibilities that bore harmful results. Fadus soon made an effort to gain control over the Temple and the high priesthood; in this he was balked by the intervention of Agrippa's brother Herod, king of Chalcis, and his son, Agrippa II. These made a successful appeal to Claudius, and the power which Fadus had desired was given to Herod, and passed to his nephew after his death.

The next procurator was TIBERIUS ALEXANDER (48) an apostate nephew of Philo of Alexandria, and son of the alabarch Alexander. Alexander was an ambitious man, who was later to achieve considerable importance in Roman affairs. His abandonment of Judaism must of itself have brought upon him the antagonism of the people he was to govern, while on the other hand his zealous consideration for the welfare of the Roman Empire must have permitted of no scruples in imposing its power. The only details of his brief period of office which have come down indicate that he was no less heavyhanded than his pagan predecessors. At his orders the two sons of Judas of Galilee, James and Simon, themselves also Zealot leaders, were executed by crucifixion.

The disastrous events which occurred under the next procurator, VENTIDIUS CUMANUS (48-52), made the previous troubles appear insignificant in comparison. Disorder followed disorder. The first outbreak occurred during the Feast of Passover, and was occasioned by an insulting act performed by one of the Roman soldiers on guard in the outer court of the Temple. A riot immediately broke out among the vast number of pilgrims who had come to celebrate the holiday. Their demand for satisfaction was ignored by Cumanus, who instead turned the soldiers loose upon them, whereupon thousands were killed. On another occasion, when a number of villages were being pillaged in punishment for the robbery of a Roman official, one of the soldiers caused an uprising by tearing up a Scroll of the Law. This time Cumanus yielded to the demand of the people, and the offender was executed. Again, a war broke out between the Jews and the Samaritans, the latter having murdered pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem, and the former having retaliated by making a bloody attack upon Samaria. Cumanus came to the support of the Samaritans, by whom he had been bribed. Many were slain and crucified. The dispute was brought before the governor of Syria, who sent leaders of both parties to Rome, where the Jews were vindicated, and Cumanus was recalled and sent into exile.

Cumanus' successor, FELIX (52-60), exceeded any of the former governors in their worst traits. Unlike his predecessors, he was not of knightly rank, but had been born a slave; he became a freedman of the emperor's family, and a power at court. Felix was married three times, his third wife being Drusilla, the daughter of Agrippa I, who abandoned her religion on his behalf. As procurator he displayed venality and cruelty. The inevitable result of Felix's tactics was that the extremists were driven to ever greater extremities. Numerous bands of "Sicarii," the members of which carried daggers under their cloaks, detached themselves from the Zealots whom Felix sought to suppress, and attempted to carry out the revolution by secretly performing individual acts of terror against the Romans and the wealthy pro-Roman elements. The most conspicuous of the uprisings was led by an Egyptian Jew, who promised to destroy the walls of Jerusalem at a word. Felix promptly turned his troops upon the would-be prophet and his thousands of followers; the former escaped, but many of the latter were slain.

The following procurator, PORCIUS FESTUS (60-62), a man of higher character, found it impossible to cope with the situation. The entire social structure of the land was in a state of dissolution; the outbreak of revolution was imminent. Against the warring militant elements Festus moved with all severity, but without effect. A dispute occurred between Agrippa II, whose father had been king of all Palestine, and the high priests over a wall which the latter had built to prevent Agrippa from viewing from his heightened castle the proceedings in the Temple. Festus, taking the side of Agrippa, ordered the wall removed, but the priests were permitted to protest to the emperor, and Festus' order was rescinded. After two years of futility Festus died.

He was succeeded by ALBINUS (62-64). This governor was utterly cynical in his attitude, simply selling his power to the highest bidder. There was no crime in his power which he was unwilling to commit for a price, and did. His plunderings were from every source, private and public, outright robbery and wanton taxation.

The final touch was added by the last and lowest of the procurators, GESSIUS FLORUS (64-66). What Albinus committed in secret Florus did openly; where Albinus robbed and slew in disconnected units, Florus did the same in wholesale manner. Whatever was left to be drained from the country he extracted systematically, completely, and with utter ruthlessness. Thus it was inevitable that Florus should aspire to gain possession of the vast treasury of the Temple, in his first attempt seizing seventeen talents. As the procurator had no doubt expected, the people arose in a great protest. His answer was to march into Jerusalem at the head of a body of soldiers, seize and crucify a number of leading citizens, and turn over a part of the city to be plundered by the troops (66 C.E.). On the following day the citizens were forced to give a formal welcome to a new body of troops entering the city. Evidently acting under orders from Florus, the soldiers failed to return the greeting, causing the people to upbraid the procurator. The soldiers attacked the citizenry, who were driven back into the city, but seized the Temple mount, and cut off the fortress of Antonia. Florus thereupon withdrew to Caesarea, and the war against Rome had begun.

After the seven years of war, various other procurators in turn governed Judea. Little is known of them but their names. Later on the rulers of Judea bore such titles as consul, dux and praeses, rather than procurator.

See also: ALEXANDER, TIBERIUS JULIUS; JUDEA; PONTIUS PILATE.

SOL BERNSTEIN.

Lit.: Josephus, Jewish War, book 2; idem, Antiquities, book 18, chaps. 1 to 9; book 19, chap. 9; book 20, chaps. 1, 5 to 11; Tacitus, History, book 5, chaps. 9 and 10; Schürer, E., A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, division 1, vol. 2, pp. 38-149, 166-214; the standard Jewish histories for the period; Krauss, Samuel, in Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10, pp. 206-9.

PROFANATION OF GOD'S NAME, see KIDDUSH HASHEM AND HILLUL HASHEM.

PROFIAT DURAN, see DURAN, PROFIAT.

PROGRESSIVE JUDAISM, see WORLD UNION FOR PROGRESSIVE JUDAISM.

PROHIBITIONS OF THE TORAH, see PRECEPTS, THE 613.

PROLETARIAT, JEWISH. 1. Concept and Origin. The term Jewish proletariat is used in the present article in its technical connotation denoting the Jewish wage earning classes or that part of the Jewish population which, devoid of all means of production, has to resort to laboring for wages as its only means of income. In fact, the use of this term has been a point of contention in the economic, especially the socialistic, literature concerning the Jews. The anomalous position of Jewish economy in modern times was pointed out, and it was contended that the concept of the Jewish proletariat should include the class of artisans and the so-called "Luftmenschen," men without definite occupations, a class which is so numerous among the Jews. Such a broad interpretation of the term, justified though it may be by the circumstances, would be too vague and unsuitable for all technical purposes, and can not, therefore, serve as a basis for a logical and systematic survey.

The Jewish proletariat in this restricted sense is of recent origin. It developed in two countries, prerevolutionary Russia and Austria, under the pressure of economic conditions about the middle of the 19th cent., in the midst of the Jewish populations settled there. In all other countries which have a sizable Jewish proletariat (United States, England, Palestine, and partly also France), it was formed by the masses of immigrants, and its history is closely connected with the history of Jewish immigration into those countries in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. In Russia and Austria the changes wrought by the coming of age of capitalism shook the poorly stabilized economic position of the Jewish masses to its very foundation, and those who saw themselves ruined had to look for new occupations. To Jewish industry, just about to organize itself for the new era, this group offered a numerous and cheap laboring class. The countries of immigration, mostly havens for the utterly poor, very often offered them no other way of earning their livelihood than by working for wages, and a change in the class status was easier in these countries where the inhibitions, so strong and active in the homeland (such as shame, tradition and the like), proved for the most part ineffective. In these countries the process of development of the Jewish wage earning classes was much more rapid and the percentage of the Jewish proletariat much higher than in those where an economic reorientation took place in the very ranks of the settled Jewish population.

The number of Jewish workers in the world before the outbreak of the second World War was estimated at one and a half million, of whom 400,000 were in the United States, 300,000 in the Soviet Union, 300,000 in Poland, 100,000 in Palestine and 400,000 in all other countries (England, France, Germany, Hungary, Roumania, the South American countries and several others). All these figures embrace only physical workers; if employees and officials were to be added, whose number was estimated in the Soviet Union alone at 700,000 and in the United States at 500,000, then the figures given above must be at least doubled.

2. Characteristics. The Jewish wage earning classes differ in many ways from the working classes of other peoples. With very few exceptions they are crowded into a limited number of industries run by Jewish businessmen. Access to industries owned by non-Jews is denied to them for a variety of reasons, among which the competition of the sturdier and better-trained non-Jewish laborer and discrimination are the most important. The characteristics of these "Jewish" industries are: smallness of the shop, prevalence of the final stages of production (production of finished goods as compared with the production of the means of production or of half-manufactured goods) and, consequently, little requirement for highly skilled labor and much home industry. These conditions, which were produced by the anomalous economic position of the Jews ever since they first started to work for wages, have been prevailing generally, with only a few exceptions to be mentioned hereafter and in spite of definite efforts for the penetration of the heavy industries by Jewish workmen.

The following figures will corroborate these statements: According to the Russian census of 1897, the percentage of Jews employed in the various stages of industrial production was the following: In basic production activities (mining and foundries, the industries of rocks and earth, forestry and its branches), 7.7 (absolute figure 9,393); in the secondary middle stages (metal, textile and construction industries), 19.7 (absolute, 110,418); in the tertiary middle stages (timber, chemical, leather and paper industries) 31.3 (absolute, 68,319); in the final stages of production (food and beverage industries, manufacture of tobacco, clothing and graphic industries, and the like) 45.5 (absolute, 337,115). For the identical groups in Galicia the figures, according to the Austrian census of 1900, were: Basic production, 9.5 (2,677); secondary stages, 14.5 (8,941); tertiary stages, 23.7 (7,597); final production stages, 47.7 (54,765). Almost the same results were shown by the first census of the population in Poland in the year 1921, where out of every hundred Jewish workers 1.5 were active in the mining industry, 0.6 in the mineral industry, 3.4 in the metal industry, 0.8 in the industry of machines and electrotechnics, 1.6 in the chemical industry, 2.9 in the building industry, 5.8 in the timber industry, and 13.7 in the textile industry; whereas 43.6 were concentrated in the clothing industry, and 12.5 in the food industry, the remainder was scattered over several branches. Over a half of all the Jewish workers were thus active in branches which can be regarded as a typical industry of consumption, and this proportion rises to two-thirds if the textile industry is added, where the Jewish workers in their majority were concentrated in small undertakings and in the home industry.

The immigration countries England and the United States present a similar picture. Here Jewish-owned medium and small capital had to be content with the last stages of production, especially with the clothing industry, which had not been monopolized by big business yet. Here, too, Jewish labor had to adjust itself to the inner structure of Jewish production. In England as well as in the United States more than 60% of Jewish labor is employed in the needle trades.

There are only two important exceptions to this rule. One is Palestine, where the ever larger number of the Jewish workers succeeded in securing positions for themselves in all fields of agriculture and industry, among them also in the heavy industry of that country, represented especially by the works of electricity and the exploitation of the Dead Sea. The second is Soviet Russia where, starting from 1928, the Jewish population participated in the process of industrialization of the country and tens of thousands of Jewish workers were introduced into heavy industry. However, even after those changes the majority of the Jewish workers in that country remained concentrated as before in branches whose character of consumption is evident.

Since the branches of industry which employ Jewish labor had relatively little importance in the economic setups of the respective countries, the social weight of the Jewish laboring masses was but slight and their struggle for better economic and social conditions carried no great weight. Their organization into compact masses was hampered by their being scattered over numerous small shops. In many ways the Jewish labor movement showed characteristics differing from the labor movement of other groups.

3. The Organization of Jewish Labor, Prior to the Second World War. In spite of all difficulties retarding the organization of Jewish labor, its progress has been considerable. In European countries this progress was largely due to the ceaseless efforts of the Jewish socialist parties, which proved the most effective form of organizing the Jewish laboring classes. The Jewish trade unions, too, were gaining in importance before the second World War. In the United States and Palestine the trade unions proved more effective than the political party. Jewish labor also developed cultural associations (which in some countries formed cultural leagues), labor cooperatives (especially in Palestine and Poland) and labor pension funds (especially in the United States). Before the second World War Jewish wage earners were united in various types of organizations, so that the Jewish proletariat appeared as well organized. The power behind the Jewish labor organizations was but little, yet they educated the working masses to class consciousness and cooperation and thus raised their social importance.

4. Developments during the Second World War. The revolutionary changes of the War period and especially the breaking down of free labor in Europe and the sudden phenomenon of forced labor by hundreds of thousands, whose transitory character is evident, can not be discussed here. Neither is it possible to venture any prophecy as to the number and the structure of the Jewish proletariat that may arise in the European countries after the second World War is over.

See also: COMMUNISM; LABOR; LABOR MOVEMENT; SOCIALISM.

ARIEH TARTAKOWER.

Lit.: Lestschinsky, Jacob, Der jüdische Arbeiter in Russland (1906); Niger, Was ist der jüdische Arbeiter? (1907); Borochow, Die jüdische Arbeiterbewegung in Ziffern (1923); Tartakower, A., The Jewish Proletariat in Poland; Schipper, I., Tartakower, A., and Hafftka, A., editors, The Jews in Modern Poland, vol. 2 (1933).

PROOF (re'ayah). I. Civil Procedure. The following forms of proof are recognized in Jewish civil procedure:

1. Confession (hoda'ah). A confession of the opposing party in a civil case must always be accepted as a valid legal obligation, provided that it is made in all seriousness and in proper form. The Talmud emphasizes the weighty nature of a confession by stating as a principle: "The confession of the party to the suit is worth as much as a hundred witnesses" (Git. 40b).

2. Evidence of Witnesses ('edim). The depositions of two competent witnesses were considered as conclusive (Deut. 19:15) if they were uttered before the court in the presence of the opposing party and openly. Written testimony is inadmissible. The personal requirements exacted of witnesses were very high. Witnesses were obliged to obey the summons of a court to testify; they might even be required to take an oath as to whether they could act as witnesses or not (Shebu. 4:1-3; ibid. 30a-36a). A witness might not accept a reward or a bribe. The testimony of witnesses was not confirmed by an oath. On the contrary, it was the prevailing principle that whoever was of such untrustworthy character that he would not be believed unless under oath could not testify at all.

If there is but one witness, he sometimes forces one of the parties to take an oath himself in the character of a witness; in other cases he relieves him of any such obligation.

3. Documentary Evidence (shetar). A document is regarded as valid evidence when it is signed by witnesses or handed over in the presence of witnesses. It must contain the names of the parties, the exact amount of the sum in question, the date and place where it is drawn up; if a previous date has been inserted in the document, it loses all validity.

4. Oath (shebu'ah). The oath was used as a confirmation of testimony, it being assumed that a witness or party would hesitate to profane the name of God by a false oath and would prefer to tell the truth. The oath could be administered only in certain specified cases, and in general was avoided.

II. Criminal Procedure. Proof in criminal procedure can be supplied only by the evidence of two witnesses duly qualified (Deut. 17:6). These witnesses are carefully examined, warned of the consequences of false testimony, and cross-examined. Conflicting evidence of witnesses, or proof that witnesses were not present at the spot they claimed to be, could overthrow their testimony.

Since confession was not sufficient for conviction, Jewish law never used torture as a means of obtaining evidence or a confession. Even admission on the part of the accused himself that he had committed the crime was not sufficient to bring court punishment upon him if there were no witnesses to his act; he was left to the judgment of God. The nearest thing to an ordeal is that of the "water of jealousy" to be drunk by the woman suspected of adultery; however, this did not lead to a trial and a sentence upon the woman thus accused.

Consultation of God by means of oracles, prophets or a divine voice (Bath Kol) are mentioned in the Bible and Talmudic literature, but played no part in the administration of justice (B.M. 59a).

See also: ALIBI; BURDEN OF PROOF; CONFESSION; DOCUMENTS, LEGAL; EVIDENCE; LAW, CIVIL; LAW, CRIMINAL; OATH; PROCEDURE AT LAW; WITNESSES.

MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: The literature on the articles cited above.

PROPERTY, see PROPERTY, PERSONAL; PROPERTY, SALE AND TRANSFER OF; REAL ESTATE.

PROPERTY, OWNERLESS, see HEFKER.

PROPERTY, PERSONAL (mittaltelin). According to Jewish law, there are two sorts of property: things which are definitely fixed in their places, or real estate; and objects that can be moved, personal property or chattels. The security of personal property is not considered as great as that of real estate since it can be stolen. However, considering conditions to be normal, Jewish law makes a further division of personal property into "things," meaning objects which last a long time and are used repeatedly, and "fruits," objects that are consumed and hence can be used only once.

The first sort of objects can be borrowed and returned in their original form, but the latter can not; so when these are borrowed return must be made by means of similar "fruits" of the same value. This difference also finds expression in the law of acquisition. There is also a special category for things that can move of their own accord, such as slaves or animals. Animals are acquired by causing them to begin moving; and a three-year undisturbed possession of them is required to establish a presumptive right of ownership (Hazakah). Money is not reckoned as personal property, since it is not its true value but its value in circulation that determines its status. Accordingly, it can not be purchased by payment in kind or given away, but is considered a means of payment.

The Talmudic conception of rights and claims is a very unique one. Thus statements made in writing, or "letters" as they are called, are not subject to any of the usual forms of acquisition. On the other hand, the Talmud recognizes the legal validity of documentary proof of the title to land or money; in such cases their value is in proportion to the solvency of the drawee. In the case of the documents themselves, Jewish law recognizes a special kind of acquisition by means of a written receipt of the transfer and the handing over of the original, which must take place through a conscious act of the one who delivers them. Both the Bible and the Talmud regard slaves as personal property and analagous to objects that can move of their own accord. Since, however, a slave is able to think for himself, he is subject to other special provisions.

The law of Bererah applies both to personal property and to real estate. See REAL ESTATE.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Mechirah; Shulhan Aruch, Hoshen Mishpat 197 et seq.

PROPERTY, SALE AND TRANSFER OF (kinyan—from kanah, "acquire"—"legal acquisition," "act of acquisition"). We find in all ancient laws the steady tendency to make acquisition easier, in order to facilitate commerce and trade. The same evolution took place in Jewish law. In Biblical law, property could be acquired only by actual transference of possession, i.e., it was based on a transaction involving real objects, such as loaning, borrowing, or guardianship. It also mentions a symbolical transfer, the handing over of the shoe in Ruth 4:7.

Talmudic law enabled the Jewish people to free themselves from the strict requirements in transference of ownership; they considered a recognition on the part of the dedicator as sufficient grounds for the transfer of property. This brought about a complete freedom of form, even going beyond the agreement by mutual consent in Roman law, as in purchase, hire, and the like, and made possible the entering of an obligation without following any forms. This development in Jewish law was theoretically based on the principle that a court has full powers of decision when it comes to a question of property rights. The first statement of this is, "If a court decrees that a piece of property is ownerless, it is ownerless" (Git. 36b; Yeb. 89b). Thus the development of the extremely important institution of Kinyan in Jewish law is revealed as the free and independent development of these forms of acquisition to replace the old ways which had hampered economic development; the principle mentioned above made it possible to interpret the Biblical laws so as to produce this development. There is no doubt that commercial law and usages of trade also had a particular influence on this legal institution. The evolution embraced not only the act of acquisition itself, but the things that might be acquired. At first only the possession of concrete things might be transferred; eventually this became possible for rights and claims as well.

The institution of Kinyan is important both for the knowledge of the development of Jewish law, and for the understanding of the different sorts of acquisition. The following forms of acquisition may be distinguished, depending upon the various objects that are to be acquired:

A. Forms of Acquisition for Real Estate. 1. Payment of the Purchase Price (kinyan kesef). If a piece of ground is transferred in return for a certain sum, acquisition is brought about by the payment of the purchase price. It is sufficient to pay a part if the remainder becomes a loan, or if the seller does not require the purchaser to pay the entire amount at once (B.M. 77a; Hoshen Mishpat 190:15). Otherwise the purchase is completed only when the full amount is paid, and the seller can withdraw at any time until this is done. Thus the purchaser has the disadvantage to a certain extent, since the seller can elect either to annul the agreement completely or demand a reduction in the price of the object sold in proportion to the amount that has been actually paid (Kid. 26a; B.M. 77b; Hoshen Hishpat 190:10, 17).

This payment of the purchase price can be made in currency, that which has a money value, or any object which has a definite value to its owner.

If the purchaser has handed over a part of the total price as security ('erabon), i.e., a sum placed in deposit to guarantee his intention to purchase, and which therefore is forfeited to the seller in case the purchaser fails to live up to his agreement, and adds the formula: "May my security acquire the whole object," this has the same validity as a partial payment. If this formula is omitted, however, the purchaser acquires only an equity which corresponds to the amount of the security (Isserles to Hoshen Mishpat 190:10, 17).

2. Giving of a Document (kinyan shetar). Acquisition can also be made if the seller draws up a document and gives it to the purchaser (cf. Jer. 32:9-12). This document must contain the formula: "My field is sold to you" (Kid. 26a; Hoshen Mishpat 191 and 243). The purchaser can then effect a new valid sale and can transfer the property by merely handing over this document; he need not draw up a new document. This regulation, first effected by Asher ben Jehiel (Hoshen Mishpat 66:14), shows that such documents of purchase acquired the character of bills of exchange at a very early period, and thus facilitated the transfer of capital.

3. Seizin (kinyan hazakah). Real estate can be acquired by a purchaser or donee by performing an action which can be regarded as the declaration that he has acquired the property. In contrast to the tradition of the Roman law, this act of acquisition must take place upon the actual piece of ground. The dedicator must transfer the piece of ground to the appropriator with the formula: "Take it in possession and acquire," unless the seizin takes place in the presence of the dedicator. Talmudic law mentions the following acts as examples of such seizin: repairing a hedge, driving a nail, or taking away the keys. In contrast to Roman law, handing over the keys is not considered as traditio, but merely as a substitute for the above mentioned formula of acquisition (Hoshen Mishpat 192:3; Tosafoth to Pes. 4a). This Kinyan is valid both for the original and secondary acquisition of ownerless property (Hoshen Mishpat 275:13 et seq.).

4. Seizing the Cloak (kinyan sudar, also designated briefly as kinyan alone). This form of acquisition was that most used in Talmudic times. The other three forms show traces of the former actual transfer; but in later times a fictitious transfer of a real object, for the purpose of the transfer of property and rights by a symbolical act of acquisition, was effected and became an additional form of acquisition. This form of Kinyan was connected with the drawing off of the shoe in Ruth 4:7 (B.M. 46a-47b). The Palestinian Talmud (Yer. Kid. iii, 60) infers that this was an original form of acquisition, which later fell into disuse, and for this reason was probably not mentioned in the Mishnah (Kid. 1:1-6) at all. In the time of the Amoraim this form of Kinyan (shelifath hamin'al, "drawing off of the shoe") was again introduced. However the shoe, as the original symbol of ownership (as the hand in Roman and German law) was replaced by the introduction of the cloak as a symbolical counterperformance. Thus this form received the name of "seizure of the cloak" or "acquisition by means of exchange" (kinyan halifin). This "seizure of the cloak" was valid both for real estate and personal property. The acquirer hands over an object to the assigner with the formula: "Acquire this in exchange for the object x, which you transfer to me." As soon as the assigner draws the thing to himself, the object to be transferred passes immediately into the possession of the one who is to acquire it, no matter where it is. As in the case of all the Kinyans, no witnesses are necessary for this act. The object used need not represent any real value. Since an object owned by another person can also be handed over, the custom gradually developed of using the cloak of the witness for the "seizure of the cloak" (Tur Hoshen Mishpat to Hoshen Mishpat 195:3); eventually it sufficed if part of the cloak was seized, and even the later return of the object could be reserved. This form of acquisition, originally the fiction of a Kinyan, was thus completely developed and was extended not only to the transfer of objects and rights, but also to the establishment of agreements for hiring and loaning (Hoshen Mishpat 195:10; other opinions in the Tosafoth).

B. Forms of Acquisition for Personal Property. 1. Actual Grasping of the Object. In accordance with the form of acquisition for real estate, various similar forms, which serve the purpose of an actual or symbolic seizing of the property, were created for immovables. These are:

a) hagbahah ("lifting up" an object), which is valid for all personal property.

b) meshichah ("drawing" the object "towards one's-self"), which cannot be performed on another's property nor in the public square.

c) mesirah, a symbolic transfer, especially in the case of large objects, such as ships. There is a dispute as to whether this form of acquisition is also valid for domestic animals (Kid. 25b; Maggid Mishnah 2:5; Hoshen Mishpat 197). Mesirah can only be performed in a public place.

2. Taking Possession. By this is meant the case when the object is brought into the private property (reshuth) of the acquirer, which causes it to pass into his possession. The following ways of taking possession are featured in Jewish law:

a) kinyan hatzer ("court"), acquisition by bringing the object into the territory of the acquirer, if it will be kept there for the acquirer, or if the latter lives close by.

b) 'arba 'ammoth ("four cubits"). Not only may one acquire what is brought into his court, but a rabbinical enactment gives him the legal capacity of acquiring anything that comes to lie within a circle of four cubits about him. The only limitation is that he must be in the side streets and not in the public square. Originally this regulation was valid only in reference to ownerless property, and in order to avoid disputes as to finds, etc.; eventually it was extended to every sort of acquisition (Maimonides, Hilchoth Abedah 17:8, 9; Zechiah 4:9; Hoshen Mishpat 268:2; 243:22).

c) kelav ("his vessels"). Acquisition can also take place when an object is put into a vessel belonging to the acquirer, e.g., wine into his cask, provided that the vessel has a right to be at the place where it is placed (Hoshen Mishpat 200:3).

d) acquisition of personal property as an addition (kinyan 'agab). Personal property can also be assigned to the acquirer if it is transferred together with real estate. In this case the acquisition must include not only the things that lie on the ground (tzibburim "heaps"), but also other personal property found there, which must be assigned by the special formula: "Acquire the personal property by dint of acquiring ('agab) this piece of ground" (Kid. 27a; B.B. 44b; in Beth Joseph to Tur Hoshen Mishpat 202:7; Maimonides, Hilchoth Mechirah 3:8; Hoshen Mishpat 202; 113:2). This institution, which greatly facilitates commerce, and is called Kinyan Agab for short, is valid by reason of the rabbinical law (Tosafoth to B.K. 12a). The piece of ground need not be of any special size. In the time of the Posekim (post-Talmudic rabbis), in connection with the idea that every Jew had a claim to four cubits of land in Palestine, the fiction was set up that every assigner had at least four cubits (cf. Tosafoth to B.B. 44b, where the fiction is given a basis).

3. Seizing the Cloak (kinyan sudar). Personal property can be acquired by seizing the cloak in the same manner as real estate. On the other hand, in contrast to the older law, personal property cannot be acquired by means of documents, or the payment of the purchase price.

C. Forms of Acquisition for Claims. 1. Conveyance of a Document. Originally a claim was not recognized as a concrete thing, and the oldest law only provided for the transfer of the latter. The Talmud still designates documents as "words," things that have no concrete nature. Eventually, however, the development of Jewish law led to the permission for the transference of claims or property rights based on a document, either through superscription, or the actual transfer of the documents. This was done by means of a special document with the formula: "This document is transferred to you, and with it all the rights contained in it." According to one view (Terumath Hadeshen, cited by Isserles in Hoshem Mishpat 66:1), the document, which is drawn up as a commercial paper payable to bearer, can also be transferred either by handing it over or by seizure of the cloak. Later on, through the institution of the Mamrem, or bill of exchange under Jewish law, such a transfer was made still easier.

Even after the remunerated transfer of the claim, which has taken place in this fashion, the original creditor can always renounce his claim upon the debtor; however, he is responsible to the cessionary, since he has indirectly caused him damages (Hoshen Mishpat 66:32). This fact meant a definite and essential defect in the transfer of documents relating to debts. A well-developed commerce required some means for the transfer of "oral" claims, for which no document existed.

2. Cession (ma'amad shelashtan). The defect in this first form of acquisition, as has been sketched above, was avoided, even in Talmudic times, by the institution of the Maamad Shelashtan, or presence of a third party. This made possible the transfer of claims for money or objects, whether oral or contained in a document, by transferring these claims in exchange for something of equal value, or by making a gift of them. This institution is already clearly described in the Talmud (Git. 13a; Hoshen Mishpat 126). The creditor, in the presence of a third person, demands that the debtor make the payment. This declaration is irrevocable; the cessionary becomes owner of the claim or object, and the original creditor can no longer renounce his claim. The assigner must be present in person, and can appoint no agent (Hoshen Mishpat 126:20), nor can he arrange the transfer in writing (Hoshen Mishpat 126:21). Claims may be transferred even against the express desire of the debtor (Rabbenu Tam, in Tosafoth to Git. 13a; Hoshen Mishpat 126:17). In Hoshen Mishpat, this institution is connected with the power of attorney (Harshaah); actually, however, it is based on the obligation of the debtor to make payment to the third party (Maimonides, Hilchoth Mechirah 6:8; Zechiah 3:3; Malveh 16:4; Hoshen Mishpat 126). Cession is designated in the Talmud as a "Halachah without a basis" as it goes beyond the customary limits of forms of acquisition (Git. 14a).

D. Forms of Acquisition According to the Customary Law. As a result of the customary uses of merchants and local practices, still other forms of acquisition became legal in post-Talmudic times, and have as great a validity as the forms established by the rabbis.

1. Payment on Account (arrha of the Roman law). Originally personal property could not be acquired by money, but this form of acquisition by payment on account, giving a certain part of the price at once, was valid for real estate in the time of the Talmud. It was made legal for personal property as well on the grounds that it was the customary law of merchants (B.M. 74; Hoshen Mishpat 201:2).

2. Handshake. In connection with Prov. 6:1; 17:18, it was made a rule that a thing can be acquired by a handshake (Rabbi Hananel to B.M. 74). This handshake originally meant only a moral obligation, and Rabbenu Tam expressly states that it is more binding than an oath (Hoshan Mishpat 129:5a, 207 and Yoreh Deah 239; Kezoth Hahoshen 86:29). Later this handshake became a formal act of acquisition on the basis of the customary laws of merchants.

3. Handing over the Keys. Ordinarily, real estate is not actually acquired when the keys are handed over; but this act is valid, if it is a customary law (Hoshen Mishpat 201:2).

4. Sealing of an Object. This is also considered to be an act of acquisition, if it is in accordance with the usage of the merchants (B.M. 74a, Rashi ad loc.; Maimonides, Hilchoth Sechiruth 6:7). In other cases the act is invalid, but he who breaks his word comes under the curse formula "mi shepara" (Hoshen Mishpat 201:1).

E. Acquisition without Forms through Fictitious Acknowledgment (kinyan 'uditha). As early as the Talmudic period, the acknowledgment of the owner in the presence of two witnesses is also permitted as a form of acquisition, although this was probably only in the latter part of the period; it was still unknown to the Mishnah (B.B. 149a; cf. Tosafoth to the passage and Tosafoth to B.M. 46a). Originally this act signified nothing more than the acknowledgment of an actual debt or the claim of another, and had to correspond to the actual conditions. Later, however, the acknowledgment was made fictitiously in order to use this fiction to establish or transfer new rights. This first statement of the use of this fiction is found in Kezoth Hahoshen, in the 18th cent. (Hoshen Mishpat 194).

This survey of the forms of acquisition in Jewish law shows how the latter was capable of development and accommodation to the social and economic needs of the time. The law gradually freed itself from the strictness of the original forms, finally arriving at the fictitious acknowledgment as a form of acquisition.

It should be noted, however, that the promise of a gift, and donations to the Temple, the poor, and benevolent institutions needs no form of acquisition (Maimonides, Hilchoth Ishuth 23:13; Zechiah 146:14; Eben Haezer 51). In such cases a verbal promise is a sufficient basis for the transfer of ownership. "A promise for the sake of a higher purpose has the same validity as actual transfer in the case of profane things" (Kid. 28b). Thus the mere promise of a sum for benevolent purposes is in itself an obligation for its own fulfillment.

MARCUS COHN.

Lit.: Maimonides, Hilchoth Mechirah, Malveh, Zechiah, and Mattanah; Shulhan Aruch, Hoshen Mishpat, 39 et seq., 126, 189 to 212, 241 et seq., together with the commentaries; Auerbach, Leopold, Das jüdische Obligationsrecht (1871); Bloch, Moses, Der Vertrag nach mosaisch-talmudischem Rechte (1893), section 64 et seq.; Gulak, Asher, Yesode Hamishpat Haibri, vol. 1 (1922).

PROPHETS AND PROPHECY. The second division of the Holy Scriptures, according to the Jewish tradition, bears the name Prophets (Hebrew, nebi'im), and is subdivided into two groups of books: (1) nebi'im rishonim (Latin, prophetae priores, Earlier Prophets); (2) nebi'im aharonim (prophetae posteriores, Later Prophets). The former group, containing principally historical texts, tells the history of Israel from the death of Moses to the downfall of the kingdom of Judah and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (586 B.C.E.). These books—Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings—are called prophetic because their collectors considered them written by prophets or divinely inspired men: Joshua, Samuel, Jeremiah (B.B. 14b). The latter series consists mainly of the orations, but also at times of a description of incidents in the lives of the three major prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. Within the Hebrew canon each of the major prophets is counted as one book, whereas the Minor Prophets combined form a single book.

The Christian churches have a different division of the Holy Scriptures. In particular, they often follow the Alexandrinian canon in adding Daniel to the Major Prophets. The authorized King James Version, of which most of the non-Catholic denominations in the United States avail themselves, does not sever the historical books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah and Esther from the Early Prophets.

Prophecy (nebu'ah) is a phenomenon which is met at the very beginning of Israel's religious and political history. Moses, who is characterized by the oldest tradition as the founder of the nation, is simultaneously the father of all the later prophets. Standing at the outset of the period of national development, he excels all who came after him by the strength of his prophetic gift which, according to Jewish tradition, renders him the greatest of human beings. The certainty of this rank is deeply ingrained in Jewish feeling, so deeply that the position of Moses became one of the tenets in Moses Maimonides' system of the thirteen articles of faith (7 and 8). For tradition does not recognize any evolution, not at least in a vital issue of religion. The full content and might of the prophetic spirit are supposed to have been in force from the first, so that what happened subsequently could be at best the resplendence of the original light.

The Prophet Isaiah, as conceived by G. P. Tiepolo. From a ceiling fresco in the palace of the archbishop of Udine

The historical point of view differs from this traditional opinion by pointing out that there are phases to be distinguished in a long evolutionary process of prophecy. There is no question that other oriental religions, too, had brought forth this phenomenon. The Bible itself acknowledges non-Israelite seers and ecstatic personalities. They are, also, supposed to believe in their missions, to which the Baalim or other heathen deities had destined them (I Kings 18:21-29). The ecstatic origin even of Israelite prophecy is still apparent in the post-Exilic period (cf. Ezekiel); and several great figures in the pre-Exilic time (Elijah, Hosea and Isaiah) are not free of this characteristic. Earlier we hear of bands of prophets. Rapt and excited, they swept through the country, weird and uncanny fellows who sometimes infected impressionable minds by their odd and savage demeanor (II Kings 9:11; Hosea 9:7; I Sam. 10:10-13). Yet no matter whether the institution of such seers was taken over from other religions or emerged out of the very ground of the Biblical people, it is certain that the originality of the Israelite prophets does not rest with its primitive initial stages, but is based upon the great personalities from Elijah on.

The people themselves were convinced that from the very outset of Israel's life on, God spoke through the mouths of such men and that in His special care for His people he selected His enthusiastic servants for political and religious guidance. And, indeed, those figures, whom their amazed fellow countrymen saw roaming in companies through wilderness, towns and villages, spluttering odd words and performing strange deeds in God's name, had one purpose in common with the great personalities of later times, namely, to shape the entire national, social and political life in accordance with their God's commandments. They conceived themselves to be authorized preservers and guardians of the genuine Israelite piety which was not to be falsified or defiled by idolatry, by the smuggling in of foreign custom, by glittering trumpery and alien cult and culture. In all likelihood, it is in the solitude and aloofness which the southern desert offered to such men as Moses, Elijah and Amos that the higher religion of Israel and with it prophecy were born.

None the less, since cult was linked with the whole of tribal life, the prophets were protected against spiritual narrowness and dull fanaticism. As unbounded as their passionate religious fire was the love with which they embraced their people. Thus we find that the great prophetic personalities were altogether the first great personalities who grew up on the spiritual soil of Israel. They were the first to detach themselves from the gray monotonous background of a corporate tribal life, and became the earliest individualities with clear-cut spiritual contours that we meet in the Bible.

They are above all, if not exclusively, concerned about the national destiny. They see Divine Providence in the ups and downs of Israel's existence. God as experienced by and revealed to them is the God Who is shaping the fate of His people. The individuals, who are not yet fully recognized by God for their personal value, are subject to the divine government primarily as the children of their people. All have to experience and to bear the common lot. None the less we are able to distinguish the traces of an individualistic piety in early times, understanding by such a religiosity that the single soul and the conscience of the individual are stirred in their depths. The prophetic personality itself is the first and strongest pattern thereof. The prophet, listening to the voice of God which appeals to him and thus chooses him from among numberless others, senses in this call that God is imposing upon him a unique task. As an inspired proclaimer of God's word he is aware of a special relation to the deity. And even though this word relates to the people alone, he, the prophet, as the herald of the destiny of Israel, is selected from among all with whom he has to carry the burden.

Yet he is to carry and to undergo infinitely more than are those to whom he is sent. He knows what will happen; and his specific knowledge and suffering, the echo with which the sound of the historic events makes his soul quiver, bring forth in him a singular individuality resting with himself alone and unlike any other. Finally, the nation itself becomes a full and incomparable personality of singular character. The more, by the very evolution of the prophetic spirit, the tribal belief in the One God of Israel changes into true monotheism, the more the uniqueness of this people is impressed upon their minds. To be sure, the political occurrences, particularly the growing power of Assyria, opened a vast stage to the eye and revealed the part which Israel in all likelihood was to play in the vista of events which thenceforth were to shake the world. This powerful phenomenon was anticipated and interpreted by a spirit which saw the nations fulfilling in their specific roles a grandiose divine plan. To each of them a finite place is assigned, and they are to fill it in accordance with God's Providence.

As a matter of fact, full love, affection and tenderness are devoted by God and by His messengers to one people alone. Their innermost interest, whether it express itself in fiery wrath or in passionate attachment, belongs to Israel. But signs of true understanding, even of admiration, not to speak of justice to, or compassion upon, others are not lacking (Isa. 18:2, 7; 41:25-29; Amos 2:1-4). The prophets experience their God in the whole of history, in His way of rendering tribes and nations tools of His holy plan.

There is still another reason why these men attract our particular attention. They speak to us, as it were, face to face; for they are the only persons represented in the Bible whose very words and deeds have been handed down to posterity unbroken by the medium of a literary tradition. Thus they speak to us as actual personalities, not overlaid with a golden splendor of saintliness, yet as human beings who, though sometimes odd and strange to our understanding, show the sharp contours of historic reality. It is possible that the sentences ascribed to earlier prophets, such as Moses and Samuel, Nathan and Ahijah, Elijah and Elisha and others, contain some original words faithfully preserved from generation to generation. But unquestionably in the books of Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and the like we are standing on true historic ground. Additions made by later scribes are not lacking; yet as a whole we are entitled to consider these writings as fragments of autobiographies which lay bare human souls in their innermost depths.

The great prophets were not linked up with any specific religious office. Moses and Samuel were of priestly stock, as were Jeremiah and Ezekiel. But in their careers priesthood played a minor or no part, and they criticized priests and cult as well as censured the deeds of laymen. Representing the conscience of the nation, they felt independent of any human power, responsible to their God alone. And this position was recognized by the mighty, even by those kings who felt the weight of their condemnation most strongly (II Sam. 12; Jer. 26). Although they acted in deep humility toward God, they were proud of their mission and passionately refused to eat the king's bread (Amos 7:14-15). In older times the line was not definitely drawn between these great personalities and soothsayers and diviners or magicians who offered their services for wages (I Sam. 9:8). Accordingly, both groups sometimes have in common the names nabi, ro'eh, hozeh, tzofeh. The great prophets performed miracles and bore rightfully their title "revealers of future (or secret) matters," but their spiritual character far exceeds the ordinary seers whom we meet everywhere.

Full of the divine spirit (Amos 3:7; 7:15; Isa. 6; Jer. 1; Ezek. 1), they are convinced that it is not a new truth which they are sent to proclaim. Their task is to restore the old doctrine of Israel's God, which Israel has forsaken and so destroyed the covenant with its God. What are the contents of this covenant? God is holy, and so man, particularly the people who have received His word, ought to live in holiness, which means, in justice and love. Such a demand seems to express the natural feeling of human conscience. And indeed, the prophets know and sometimes point out that a firm instinct of right and fairness is deeply set in any creature's heart (Isa. 1:3; Jer. 2:10-11; 18:13-17). God has planted wisdom and ethical knowledge in the soul of man. None the less, despite an inborn power which everybody possesses, the true and original source of that experience is and continues to be God. He manifests Himself to His messengers in miraculous revelations which shake them to the very depths of their existence.

We are not entitled to infer from their words that they want to proclaim ethical and religious laws evident to any mind, "rational" precepts alone, and that they overlook the transcendent mysterious ground upon which their experience of the divine is based. As prophets in the ordinary meaning of this word—foretellers—they are not inspired to bring new divine commandments to Israel; for these have been known long since. They shall prophesy, they shall forebode the heavy visitations, punishments and catastrophes, finally the definitive doom and the collapse of the national existence which are to overcome the wicked people persisting in its disobedience. The foretellings which, like a lightning flash on a fair day, break into the carelessness and gaiety of the naïve nation made by and large a deep impression. There were, to be sure, exceptions. Frivolous unbelievers and pleasure-seeking materialists sneered at or ignored their reproach (Amos 7:12; Isa. 28:7-13), regarding their words as outworn phrases of professional preachers who suspected sin in every joy. Nevertheless, their authority was great and increased in course of time down to the period of the Exile. People and king, even when defying their demands, believed that an inscrutable mystery lay behind those uncanny figures; and they themselves often felt with terror and strongest repugnance the burden of their weird tasks.

All of them announce a terrible doomsday on which the entire people would suffer retribution for its iniquities. They preach a return to the ancient simplicity and piety.

The prophets represent the healthy conservative powers in Israel, as revealed particularly by their struggle against the excrescences and overrefinement of city civilization (Amos 5:11; 6:4; Hosea 8:4; Isa. 2:5-11; 3:16 to 4:1; 22:15-19; 31:1; Jer. 2:18-19; 22:13-19; 19). Both in Israel and in Judah, especially in the Northern Kingdom, the political development had effected a decline of the ancient agricultural or pastoral economy in favor of commerce, which had made the poor poorer and the wealthy wealthier. As early as in the time of Elijah we meet this situation. When he fought the Phoenician Baal, it was a war for the old cultural ideals that were threatened by powerful influences from abroad.

Of course, they backed the cause of the needy and oppressed, of the small people, and of the hard-working peasants who were about to be crushed by the disintegration of the traditional social order. Yet it is primarily a religious ideal which underlies their moral criticism: the ancient plain worship and, bound up with it, the faithful allegiance to God's ethical law. Their minds harbor a romantic longing for the return of the good old days. Modern interpreters, therefore, often thought about them as advocates of a way of life which by the very facts seemed to be gone for ever. This would be also in accordance with their warning not to interfere with international politics. For it was, indeed, the imperial aims of world powers such as Egypt, Assyria, and later Babylonia, and of would-be powers as Israel and even little Judah, that had led to the dissolution of the ancient social and economic order. Thus the primitive democracy of olden days had been undermined. War had enriched unscrupulous sharks at the expense of the overwhelming majority who were living in distress and despair. There is no doubt that Amos and Micah, among others, saw the situation particularly in this light.

There are other motives of prophetic criticism. Isaiah, in his struggle against social injustice, luxury and corruption, is inspired by a profound religious impulse. God alone is powerful; and His holiness is defiled by any created being which attempts to exalt its own imagined greatness. Only God is great, and man should not conceal the nothingness of his nature. He ought not to disguise the emptiness of his unimportant personality, shaped of clay, destined to perish, with the shining glitter of earthly splendor and might. For, says Isaiah, near is the day of judgment on which all that is high and lofty is to render account for its haughtiness and pride: the strong cedars of Lebanon, the castles on rocky mountains as well as the daughters of Jerusalem who stretch out their jewelry-covered necks and stride about dressed in overrefined raiment—all will see who is Master alone (Isa. 3:16-26). No matter whether or not wealth is acquired by violation of justice and decency, the very fact that a created being boasts of something foreshadows its fall. The day has arrived on which God alone will be recognized, since nothing else can exist before Him (Isa. 2:5 to 4:1).

The Prophet Jeremiah depicted mourning the destruction of Jerusalem. From a painting (1630) by Rembrandt Harmensz van Rijn

Here we are confronted with a new idea of the divine, more sublime than an ordinary mortal had understood before. God's greatness and might exceed everything nature may bring forth or the human mind contrive. He is beyond the world, transcendent, awe-inspiring by His mysteriousness. This concept of God is an outstanding source of the later absolute monotheism which as a theoretical system still lay outside of prophetic thought. Another factor, too, is involved in that view. If God alone is powerful, truly existent, not only the fountain of all human gifts and achievements, but also the very accomplisher of everything that happens, particularly of all the tremendous historic events, what is then left to be done by man? He is God's creature, molded as a vessel of clay is shaped by a potter. Therefore he ought to be conscious of his nature, forsake and forget his ambition and his own will. He can not act without or even against his Creator. Piety is obedience and silence (Isa. 30:15).

God is spirit and man is flesh. As spirit Israel's God becomes the unrestricted Lord of the universe. Thus glory and homage are due to Him alone. Yet although beyond the world and entirely different from any created thing, He takes care of the world which He has created. He is the supreme Ruler of both nature and history, which He guides according to His holy though inscrutable will. As God is the only true owner and governor of the world, mankind may hope for its restoration to purity and brotherly love. The Messiah, who is to found a perfectly moral order among all peoples and to reestablish the miraculous splendor of the beginning, can be sent only by the Ruler of the universe.

These ideas subsequently took firmer shape and were molded into a kind of dogmatic system, or they formed the basis of a theological doctrine. In the fiery minds of the prophets these concepts are still rather felt than clearly thought; they are experienced yet as growing and liquid, born by immediate intuition. The divine touches the prophetic soul which watchfully observes what God instills in it.

A new religion emerges from the hearts of the prophets. That is why we should be somewhat careful in adopting their opinions and judgments which reflect the situation of past and present days; for they can not help seeing the history of Israel in the light of actual revelation. That is particularly true of the war they wage against sacrifices and Temple. Nearly all the pre-Exilic prophets seem to be opposed to cult and rite. Sometimes this attitude is explained and motivated by the assertion that in olden times, when God led His people through the wilderness, He had never required the slaughtering of bullocks and rams, but love and obedience, righteousness and compassion (Amos 4:4-6; 5:21-26; Hosea 6:6; Isa. 1:10-20; 58:3-8; Micah 2:2; 6:6-8; Jer. 6:20; 7:8-10). Is it truly correct that the religion of old Israel knew nothing of sacrifices and ceremonies or did not highly esteem them? It would be rash to draw this conclusion. The meaning of the polemic and its historic justification rather lie in the conviction that God, as He reveals Himself through His prophets from Moses on, is in His innermost nature a God of justice and love, whereas ceremonies and rights are implements which the Israelite and Canaanite religions have in common. Finally, such external customs are regarded as characteristic of heathenish, but not of genuine religiosity as demanded by the true God, all the more so as such observances seem to stifle the basic laws of love and justice. None the less, it is dangerous to use such extravagant expressions as those of Amos 5:25 and Jer. 7:22 as evidence that in Israel's oldest times sacrifices and holy rites were never known or considered as acceptable in God's eyes.

The prophets were not dogmatists nor were they fanatic advocates of a faith without external ceremonies. At least in the pre-Exilic period they did not have any inclination toward theological speculation. Yet approximately as old as religion is the struggle between the two tendencies of worship: spiritual and moral adoration on the one hand, and specific divine "service" on the other. There has always been a conflict between these two concepts. The enthusiastic spirit went so far as to deny that religious symbols and rites had any raison d'être. Yet this did not remain the last word. The prophets were neither rationalists nor moralists. Their God, mysterious and holy, abhors the bloody sacrifices of the wicked; He perseveres in love and righteousness; but finally He does not refuse to accept the pious gifts and prayers of faithful worshippers.

The truly divine and the universally human coincide. God has revealed Himself to Israel, His chosen people. Yet, in manifesting Himself as the Holy One, He is from the first more than a tribal God; even when speaking to Israel alone He is universal and understandable to all. If God requires love and justice because His character is basically love and justice and because He governs His world in accordance with these principles, then the boundaries between nation and nation must disappear.

The monotheism of the prophets is the fruitage of their religious feeling. They love God, and the more they love Him, the more they feel the burden which is laid upon God's chosen people. For Israel's position as God's first-born son can not be shaken. The prophets never give up this claim. Their national pride in this fact unites with their pure love for the One God.

Yet the result of this union is truly tragic: the just and universal God who is not to be bribed to partiality and tenderness must destroy His own, His selected people, for its sins. The prophet, the most faithful son of his people and adherent of his God, is horrified at the effect of divine justice. He believes in it; he can not help longing for a terrible doomsday although he knows that nobody will suffer more at the hands of God than he, His faithful servant himself, when He comes to judge His people.

This vehement emotionalism is the travail of the universalistic religion. By a very peculiar evolution the God of Israel becomes the Lord of the universe. It is not by the weakening or extinction of the national feeling that a kind of cosmopolitanism emerges and Yahveh is promoted from His position as a tribal deity to the rank of almighty Creator and Governor of the world. Israel, far from being degraded, rises up to Heaven. Although all these men announce its fall, although Amos, overflowing with bitterness and disappointment, declares that God is not concerned with Israel any more than with the Ethiopians in far off Africa (Amos 9:7), the greater this God becomes, the more elevated is His people. True, His love and grace have changed into wrath and the will to destruction. Yet the passion of His anger and the fire of His tenderness have their common origins. God loves Israel, whom He has chosen in its ancestors, although for the sake of His justice He is bound to chastise it or even to destroy it completely (Amos 2:9-16; Hosea 14:2-9; Jer. 31:20).

God is God of the nations. His Providence and moral order reveal themselves in history. The peoples are the tools of divine will, and history thus becomes the fulfillment of God's majestic plan (Amos 1:3 to 2:16; 6:2; Isa. 7:17-20; 10:5-12; 13; 14:24-27; 17:12-14; 28:27-29; 29:1-9; 31:1-9; 41:1-7; Jer. 18; Ezek. 25 to 29). That does not mean that the uniqueness of Israel is lost. It continues to be God's own nation, the heart of mankind from which in the end of days the Messiah will arise. He is a mighty king, "a shoot out of the stock of Jesse" (Isa. 11:1), and he will realize the ideals of equity and righteousness all over the globe. The fruit of justice will be everlasting peace between the nations, each of which is to maintain its individuality and character. For even in the Messianic period humankind means nothing but the peaceful unity of various peoples who, like Israel, will then live in obedience to the divine order (Isa. 2:2-4; Micah 4:1-3).

Thus far we have pursued the line of development which led from tribal particularism to all-encompassing universalism. Yet we have already pointed out that the prophetic mind, although primarily engrossed in the fate of nations, is simultaneously the source of religious individualism. The prophets experience themselves as individualities while standing before God and receiving their missions at His hand. But is the people which they seem to condemn as a whole an indiscriminate crowd? When they blame Israel for injustice and oppression, exploitation and bribery, they have to distinguish at least between the victims of corruption and the perpetrators of those social crimes, between the class of the masters and that of the suppressed. We meet such a distinction as early as Amos (Amos 5:10-13). The profound religious spirit of Isaiah goes further. He abandons the pessimistic conviction that the whole people, as a mass incurably corrupt, is to perish. He is not only the herald of God's destroying ire, but also expresses hope and confidence that a "remnant will return" (Isa. 7).

The Old Prophet, wrought in bronze by Enrico Glicenstein

At the beginning this "remnant" is a small group of personal friends and adherents. Yet it is soon regarded as the seed of God's true people which in future will be born and will survive any catastrophe to which the bulk of the nation may succumb. This "remnant" receives at the prophet's hands the word of the Lord as an everlasting bequest for all the coming generations (Isa. 4:2-6; 6:11-13; 7:11-17; 10:21; 11:11). That apparently involves the idea of a religious congregation. Such a community is based upon common spiritual conviction, independent of any natural tie. Religious feeling in the congregation thus becomes the pledge that whatever may occur to the national community, its spirit will outlive any catastrophe as the "root" of a lasting renewal (Isa. 6:13).

The way to personal and individualistic piety is cleared. Jeremiah and Ezekiel continue to walk on this path, although in their minds the nation as a whole does not cease to be a clearcut personality. They feel and preach the responsibility of every single individual, who as such stands before God with all his virtues and vices. None the less, the characteristic unity of Israel is not atomized. Its individuality is and continues to be sharply distinguished from that of any other group; yet within this people each person is recognized and viewed by God, and has to render account for his deeds. It is for his own soulful profundity that Jeremiah discovers the uniqueness of the individual. Ezekiel is guided by a kind of moralistic dialectics to assert that each person is endowed with free will and ethical knowledge. He is to be regarded as determining his own fate, which is independent of the behavior, responsibility and fate of family, tribe and nation. In God's eyes he is a self-sufficient being and is treated by God's Providence in accordance with his responsibility (Jer. 31:29-30; Ezek. 18).

Both ways have never been abandoned in Israel's spiritual development. Both worked together to secure the maintenance of the religion after the collapse of the national existence. Thus the foundation had been laid upon which a spiritual community could arise. This congregation fostered the old ideas and handed them down to posterity throughout the generations. True, the prophetic lore met substantial changes at the hands of the later scribes and rabbis. Judaism began to center about the pivot of the religious law, which to a considerable extent was ritual and ceremonial doctrine. Yet even then, and particularly then, the spiritual character with which the prophets had inspired both the individual and the national community remained preserved.

These ideas, although differently shaded and accentuated, are the common ground of pre-Exilic prophecy and that of Deutero-Isaiah. The post-Exilic development often shows the languor and stagnation of decadence. The sorrows of daily life, petty provincialism and jealousy were the atmosphere in which the small community of Jerusalem was living. Narrow-mindedness crippled the ancient enthusiasm. Sometimes universalism and all-embracing Messianism were superseded by thirst for revenge and the fervent hope that God would punish the other nations for the evils which they were inflicting upon the true God's faithful and persevering adherents (Mal. 1:2-14; Isa. 63:1-6; Haggai 2:6-9). Israel will thrive in its country, blessed with miraculous fertility (Isa. 60:1-18). A new Heaven will shine over the earth (Isa. 60:19-20; Zech. 14:6), and Israel will be redeemed for ever. A new spirit is emerging: prophecy goes over into apocalypse. Yet even then the ideas of the great prophets have not disappeared. Ever and anon ethical enthusiasm breaks through narrow particularism and proclaims the universal God and the solidarity of mankind (Mal. 1:11).

Christian art from early times on has loved to present figures of the prophets and scenes of their lives. Sarcophagi were adorned, for instance, with the picture of Jonah, who was swallowed up by a great fish and vomited out upon the dry land after three days (Jonah 2). The Roman catacombs often show this incident, which was regarded by the church as a hint at Christ's resurrection. The den of lions from which Daniel was rescued was often painted (Dan. 6). It became a symbol of redemption by Christ.

In the architectural sculpture of later times prophets appear in cathedrals (Chartres, Strasbourg and Munich, 13th cent.). On the Moses foundation in Dijon the figure of Moses is accompanied by those of David, Jeremiah, Zechariah, Daniel and Isaiah (about 1400). The Sistine Chapel is decorated with the frescoes of the prophets and other figures; Isaiah was painted by Raphael.

The museum of the Berlin Jewish community possessed two modern pictures by Jewish artists: the Jeremiah of Lesser Ury, and the Prophet of Jacob Steinhardt.

See also the articles on the individual prophets.

MAX WIENER.

Lit.: Buttenwieser, Moses, The Prophets of Israel from the Eighth to the Fifth Century (1914); idem, The Faith and Message of the Prophets, No. 30 of the series Popular Studies in Judaism, published by the Tract Commission of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and of the Central Conference of American Rabbis; Smith, W. Robertson, The Prophets of Israel, 2nd ed. (1919); Skinner, John, Prophecy and Religion (1922); Cohon, Beryl D., The Prophets, Their Personalities and Teachings (1939); Wiener, Harold M., The Prophets of Israel in History and Criticism (1923); Graham, W. C., The Prophets and Israel's Culture (1934); Lods, Adolphe, The Prophets and the Rise of Judaism (1937); Hoschander, Jacob, The Priests and Prophets (1938); Blank, Sheldon H., "Studies in Deutero-Isaiah," Hebrew Union College Annual, vol. 15 (1940-41); Morgenstern, Julian, "Amos Studies," ibid. (separately reprinted, 1941); Obbink, H., "The Forms of Prophetism," ibid., vol. 14 (1939) 23-28; Welch, Jeremiah, His Time and His Work (1928); Ahad Haam, Priest and Prophet; Smith, George Adam, Isaiah (2 vols., 1927); Duhm, B., Theologie der Propheten (1875); idem, Israels Propheten (1916); Wiener, Max, Die Anschauungen der Propheten von der Sittlichkeit (1909); Sellin, Der alttestamentliche Prophetismus (1912); Kommentar zum Alten Testament (1928); idem, Das Zwölfprophetenbuch (1929-30); Eissfeldt, Otto, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1934); Heschel, A., Die Prophetie (1936); Birkeland, Harris, Zum hebräischen Traditionswesen: Die Komposition der prophetischen Bücher des Alten Testaments (1938); Cohen, Hermann, "Prophetismus und die Sociologie," Neue Jüdische Monatshefte, vol. 22 (1917); Ehrenstein, T., Das Alte Testament im Bilde (1923); idem, Das Alte Testament in der Sculptik (1936).

PROPHETS, FALSE. The pages of the prophetic books of the Bible are filled with accounts of the contrast and the disputes between the prophets whose messages are given there and others whom they designate as false or lying prophets, who do not derive their message from the inspiration of God, but merely repeat their own desires and vain dreams (Jer. 23:9-32; I Kings 22:24 et seq.). During the period of the First Temple, in particular, the profession of prophet was an honored one, and kings would frequently consult prophets for advice as to their future course. This furnished an opportunity for various individuals to gain advancement by uttering favorable predictions, proclaiming a national God who would crush the enemies of the king, or soothing the people with promises of a better future.

The Prophet Elijah. From a bronze plaque by Boris Schatz

The Biblical prophets, beginning with Micaiah ben Imlah in the time of Ahab (8th cent.), deliberately disassociated themselves from the professional prophets. Micaiah attributed the unanimously favorable prediction of the other prophets to the machinations of an evil spirit; Amos refused to take the name of a prophet (Amos 8:14-15). Jeremiah in particular drew the line between the true and the false prophets, branding the latter as wrongdoers and abettors of wrongdoing who promised peace to everyone. The true prophet is filled with the fire of God, the false prophet with vain dreams; what has the chaff to do with the wheat? (Jer. 23:28-29). A characteristic encounter is that between Jeremiah and Hananiah (Jer. 28) who differ as to the future of the dominion of Nebuchadrezzar. The fall of the First Temple established the truth of the words of the Biblical prophets, and from that time on no more is heard of the "false prophets."

Lit.: Buttenwieser, M., The Prophets of Israel; the Biblical commentaries to I Kings and Jeremiah; Schapirio, D., "Les faux prophètes: étude historique et psychopathologique," Revue littéraire juive, vol. 2 (1928) 34-68.

PROPHETS, THE TWELVE (Aramaic, tere 'asar, "the twelve"), general term for twelve small prophetic books of the Hebrew Bible, which from at least the 3rd cent. B.C.E. have been grouped together into one book. They are also called Minor Prophets, not because they are of less importance but because they are of smaller compass than the larger prophetic books. The usual order of the twelve is Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. In modern Hebrew Bibles they follow Ezekiel; but B.B. 14b placed them after Isaiah and the Septuagint before the larger prophetic books, giving the order of the first six books as Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonah. These different orders may correspond to different ideas as to the chronological order of the prophets, none of which is correct. The dates of the prophecies in this section range from the 8th cent. B.C.E. on—in the opinion of some critics—as late as the Maccabean period (2nd cent. B.C.E.). The division into twelve is somewhat artificial and seems to have been deliberately intended; for Jonah is a story and not a book of addresses, like the others, and Malachi has been artificially separated from Zechariah. The last three verses (Mal. 3:22-24) are not part of any of the books, but a pious appendix intended as a summary of the whole and an admonition to repentance.

See the articles on the individual books.

Lit.: The Biblical commentaries and introductions.

PROPHETS, READING OF, see HAFTARAH.

George Wolf

THE UNIVERSAL JEWISH ENCYCLOPEDIA

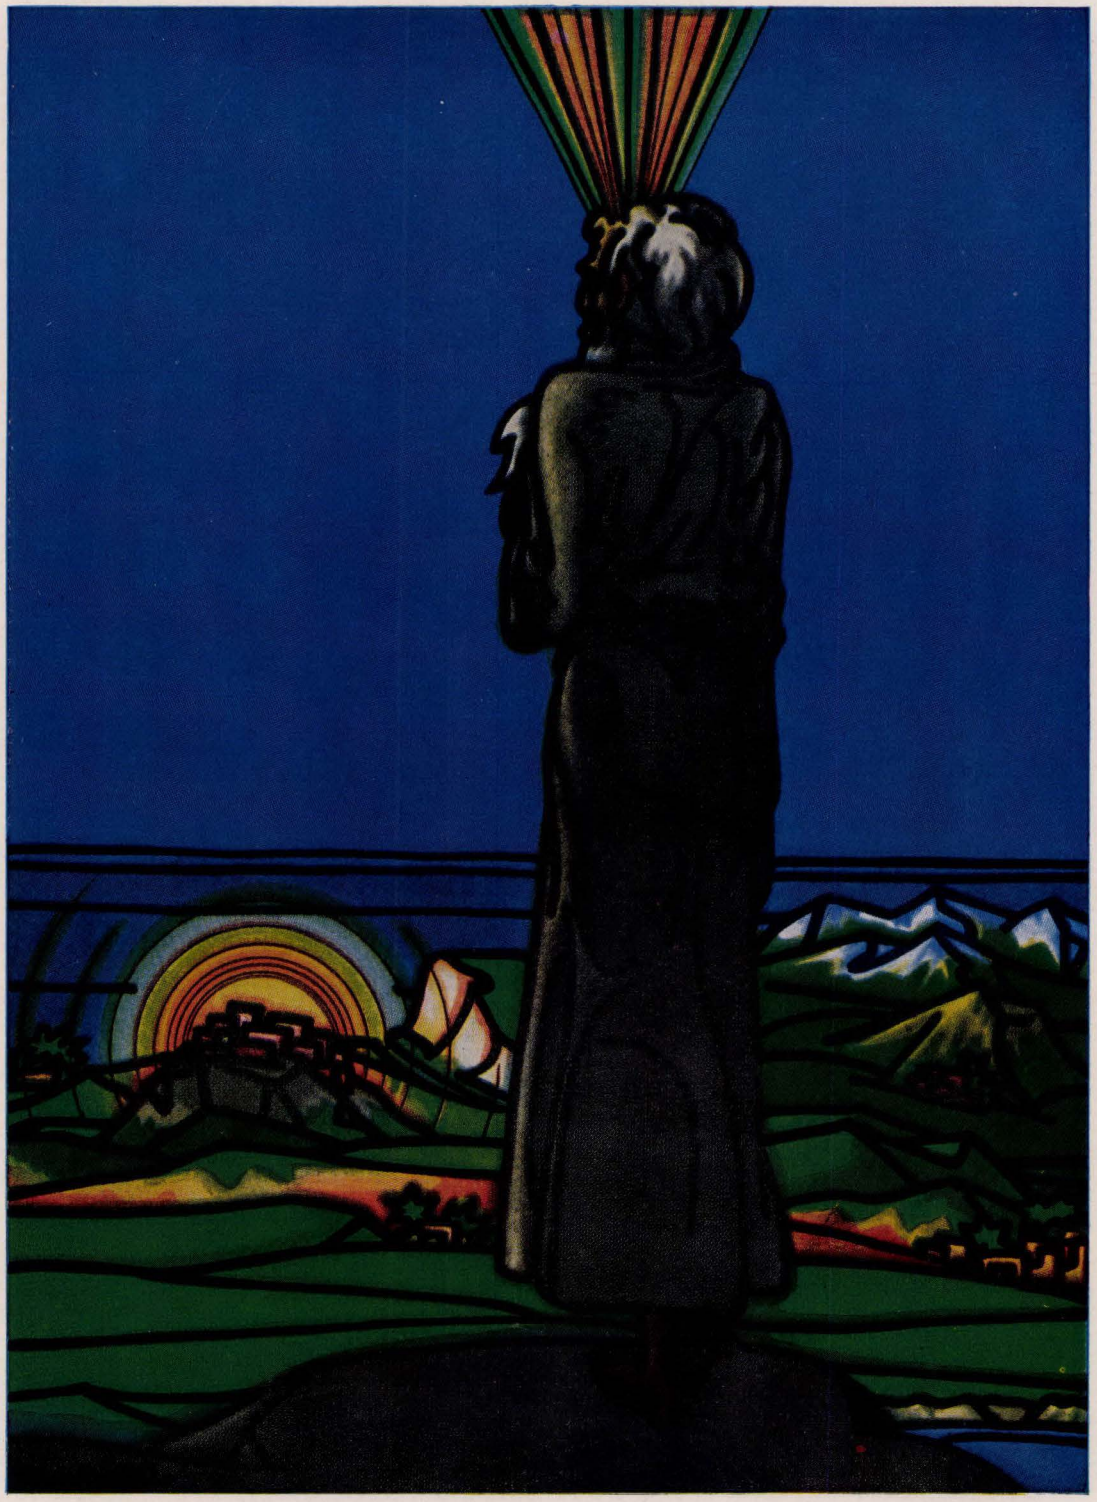
הרב גדליהו בן צבי וואלף
NEW YORK
RABBI
GEORGE WOLF



By Uriel Birnbaum

MOSES ON MOUNT NEBOH