CANADIAN JEWISH WOMEN OF TODAY

When the first large-scale examination of Canadian Jewish life, The Jew in Canada, was published in 1926 it fulfilled a growing need to record the accomplishments and contributions of Canada's most visible ethnic minority. Historical and sociological essays were interspersed with biographical data on prominent members of the Canadian Jewish community. In an increasingly multicultural society the need for volumes of this kind has increased, for biographical collections are indispensible tools in the study of the role of ethnic minorities in Canadian life. Such publications offer both the general reader and the serious researcher a wide overview of the composition of the ethnic sub-groups of Canada as well as insights into their ethno-centric interests and their participation in and contributions to the wider community.

Just as past Who's Who in Canada volumes have, for the most part, neglected members of ethnic minorities, so have all such compilations denied equal recognition to the accomplishments of Canadian women. The increasing acknowledgement of the enrichment multiculturalism has provided to Canadian life has coincided with the profound advances of women throughout the Canadian body politic. This volume addresses the need to recognize these advances and to chronicle the activities of Jewish women, both within their ethnic community and in Canadian society as a whole. The focus on Canadian Jewish women is meant to compensate for past oversights and omissions and to provide up-to-date data on noteworthy Jewish women of the 1980's. Introductory articles—by Paula Draper and Yael Gordon-Brym—provide historical and sociological perspectives which will enable the reader to place the biographical data in its proper context. It is hoped that together, these articles and biographies will spur further research in the field of Canadian Jewish women's studies, to be published in succeeding volumes of Canadian Jewish Women of Today: Who's Who of Canadian Jewish Women.

WHO'S WHO OF CANADIAN JEWISH WOMEN 1983

WHY

Close to 20 years have passed since the publication of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry. Out of a listing of approximately 2,100 biographies, only 160 or so were women. Of these, about 110 were leaders or workers in Jewish communal life, 20 in the performing arts, 10 in visual arts, 10 in education and the rest in other fields.

The Who's Who in American Jewry, published in 1980, which provides biographical data on over 6,000 prominent Jewish men and women in the United States and Canada, has listed a total of 167 Canadians of whom only 8 are women. There are no more than 20 Jewish women listed in the 1981 edition of the Canadian Who's Who. Researchers, historians, libraries, public institutions and others have expressed a need for a readily available source of biographical information on noteworthy Canadian Jewish women.

It is with great pride that we present the first edition of Who's Who of Canadian Jewish Women; we believe it to be a much-needed new project in the field of biographical reference books. It is the only work of its kind to be devoted exclusively to the prominent Jewish women of Canada.

WHAT

The combined edition of Canadian Jewish Women of Today: Who's Who of Canadian Jewish Women 1983 is divided into three sections:

1) Two introductory essays, written by Dr. Paula Draper and Yael Gordon-Brym. An additional stimulus for including these essays was the recent bestseller "None Is Too Many", so eloquently written by Irving Abella and Harold Troper. That book chronicles the rigid immigration policy of the Canadian government that virtually barred the entrance of Jews into Canada during the Second World War. What a difference these past 40 years have made. Canadian Jews, including Jewish women, are gradually making it to the top echelons of decision-making in our society. In the academe, Jewish women enjoy appointments in economics, education, political science, journalism and social sciences in universities across Canada. In the professions, there are more and more Jewish women in the fields of medicine and law. Canadian Jewish women are excelling in the visual and performing arts and they are among those receiving the highest honours from the Canadian people and government in recognition of their contributions to Canadian society.
2) Biographical data on close to 300 prominent Jewish women in Canada follows. As in any work of this kind, some readers may be surprised to see certain names missing and others included. We can only say that every possible effort was made to include Canada's most outstanding Jewish women in all walks of life, and that with each edition, appropriate alterations will be made.

3) Finally, there is a section that groups the names of the biographees under their particular professional field, according to choices made by the biographees themselves.

HOW

All biographies have been compiled from information submitted by the biographees themselves, on the basis of questionnaires they completed and/or detailed curriculum vitae they sent along. We are grateful to all for supplying information about their education, career, communal activities, awards and certificates, professional memberships, writings, achievements, hobbies and special interests. We are particularly thankful to those women who sent along a list of recommendations of their peers, associates and colleagues which enabled our collection to be more comprehensive than might otherwise have been possible. Again, it is our hope that in order to make the next edition more complete, you the reader will now submit to us the names and addresses of those whom we may have omitted for our consideration in future editions.

Only a handful of women protested about having an all-woman volume. As one letter said "Canadian Jewish women who have earned the recognition and distinction of being considered important members of Canadian Jewry should be included in a Who's Who be they men or women", however, the vast majority who wrote have expressed appreciation at the emergence of this kind of book.

Distinguished women from across Canada wished us success with this project. Here are some samples:

> "It is a worthwhile undertaking for the Jewish community, and I shall look forward to its publication."
> "Best wishes to you on your project, which I am sure will be worth all the time and energy you have given it."
> "As a student of cultural anthropology, I am very much interested in your project and congratulate your initiative."
> "As someone interested in and supportive of things Canadian, Jewish and concerning women, I applaud your enterprise . . . I hope that in the mid-1980's, women may stand on their own and be so identified."

All the encouragement was very helpful and much appreciated.

WHO

The question most often asked was "How do people get into Who's Who of Canadian Jewish Women?" The criteria we set for ourselves were: a) to be living, b) to be Canadian, c) to be Jewish, d) to be a woman, and e) to have made a contribution within a particular field of endeavour and/or within Jewish communal life. An individual's desire to be listed was not sufficient reason for inclusion. Nor was there any fee or obligation for having one's biography included. (Although the option of having one's photograph alongside the biography was offered at nominal cost).

Every possible effort has been made to ensure accuracy, but should there be any errors, readers are requested to draw them to the attention of the editors so that corrections can be made in later editions.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In the course of compiling the information and putting together the biographies, I have benefitted from the help and advice of a number of people whose contributions I wish to acknowledge. Many thanks to my daughter Sarah who served as Assistant to the Editor and did much of the research; to my son Jeffrey whose interest and enthusiasm were constant inspirations; to Shirlee Fox in Halifax, Harry Berger, Penni Kolb and Prof. Harold Waller in Montreal, Sylvia Newman and Ben Kayfetz in Toronto, Hy Hochberg in Ottawa, Ann Steindel in Winnipeg, Aaron Eichler in Calgary, Jean Gerber in Vancouver and Joe Eisenberg in Windsor for helpful suggestions and assistance. Special thanks to Harold Alter who is a keen researcher on Jewish interests in Canada. Last but not least my appreciation to Sheryn Weber for her painstaking efforts in analyzing the Biographical Data Forms and for typing the manuscript.

Partial funding of this project by the Secretary of State – Multiculturalism made it possible to include the two introductory essays. This is gratefully acknowledged.

THE ROLE OF CANADIAN JEWISH WOMEN IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

Paula J. Draper

If nothing else, Esther Brandeau had chutzpah. As Canada's first Jewish immigrant (and deportee), Esther Brandeau set a trenchant example for the generations of Jewish women whose more successful acceptance into Canadian life followed her failed adventures. Disguised as a boy, twenty year old Esther landed in New France in 1738. In those years it was distinctly uncommon for women to emigrate unaccompanied; however this was not the central issue. Jews were not permitted to settle in New France and Esther, despite great pressures exerted by government officials, obstinately refused conversion. Her independence and her religious convictions were cause for alarm. On the express orders of the King of France, Esther was deported home, at royal expense. She had remained in Canada for only a year.

An adventurous spirit, Esther broke away from the bonds that tied Jewish women to home and family. Clearly the New World held opportunities unavailable to Jewish women, even in Western Europe. Yet it would take two centuries, and more, before women—Jews and non-Jews alike—could truly strike out on their own paths. Esther Brandeau's tale, unique as it was, illustrated fundamental truths about the status of women and Jews, truths which have only recently seen significant alteration. Esther's defeat came because she was both a woman and a Jews, yet her Jewishness was the determining factor in her expulsion from New France. For Jews, legally sanctioned exclusion and discrimination in Canada slowly gave way to institutionalized discrimination which limited the free expression of the community until well after the Second World War. Yet the history of Jews in Canada has been rich and full, and women have played an important and indeed vital role in their community. As is often the case, however, Canadian Jewish history has been recorded in terms of male immigration, male labour and male contributions to society. Jewish women who succeeded Esther Brandeau entered Canada as daughters, wives and mothers—on the coattails of Jewish men and always in their shadow.

While much has been written about the voluntary participation of Jewish women in community organizations, its importance has been minimized. Their major contributions to family economies have been obscured. Although little has been recorded on the history of Canadian Jewish women, certain trends are nonetheless discernible. Evidence indicates that the changing role of Canadian Jewish women has been, and continues to be, tied to their minority status, both as women and as Jews. Without recognition of this dual impediment, past accomplishments cannot be understood nor can future possibilities be ascertained.

Traditionally the role played by Jewish women has not significantly differed from the general role of women in Western society. Domesticity controlled women, kept them subservient and restricted their opportunities. Denial of education solidified their secondary status. Within the European Jewish family structure, however, there were notable differences. Women were the undisputed household rulers. Traditional Judaism purported to confer separate but equal status to women's control of the home. Certainly many Jewish women were the economic as well as spiritual mainstays of their families, yet opportunities in the public sphere were barred to them. In a world which excluded Jews from property ownership, participation in certain trades, political activity and even from citizenship, the sphere of Jewish women was necessarily limited. Only with Emancipation did Jewish women in Western Europe taste their liberation. Daughters of the well-to-do benefited from a combination of the Enlightenment and traditional Jewish values which prized education. Indeed Jewish women often surpassed their gentile sisters in a society which valued intellectual astuteness as a social grace. Many Jewish women quickly overtook their husbands in the race for acculturation, a race which often led to the inevitable conclusion that only conversion would enable them to obtain complete assimilation. For however well educated and freed from household duties upper class Jews became, strong social and religious barriers remained.

Meanwhile, the growth of the Reform movement in Germany freed Jewish women from many traditional restraints. The movement's ideology opposed many of the barriers which limited female participation in religious ceremonies and efforts to eliminate them began to be implemented. Yet political communal power eluded women. They were still regarded as enablers—their advances worked for the benefit of husbands and sons; their role remained family-centred. Any choices which were directed towards filling a personal psychological need were regarded as selfish, often by men and women alike. It was with this modernized yet still ethnocentric baggage that the first permanent Jewish women settlers arrived in Canada.

The mainstays of the Canadian Jewish community before the First World War were Western Europeans who, because of their wealth and high degree of acculturation, were generally accepted by Canadian society. In the New World, conversion was no longer the only ticket to integration. They also encountered a society in which the role of middle-class women was expanding. During the nineteenth century, women, imbued with a sense that the female's inherent virtue gave her power to overcome all obstacles, became increasingly prominent in Protestant religious institutions. Absorbing male-imposed stereotypes, women accepted the notion that their nurturing qualities made them morally superior to men. As a result religion became increasingly identified as a feminine field. Buoyed by the commonly held religious, biological and sociological views of women as passive and nurturing beings, and armed with their Protestant morality, middle-class women struck out into urban slums to relieve the suffering of the poor. Women had a new focus, and a new vocation—charity.

Tzedakah, always a central theme of Jewish life, tied Jewish women into the widening female sphere. They also held an advantage. The Jewish home provided a position of power from which they could branch out. Indeed the migration of Jews to North America destroyed many traditional communal ties and left open the possibilities for women's departure from their traditional domestic world. In their new striving for social justice, through providing aid and education to the increasing masses of their Eastern European brethren which now flooded the country, Canadian Jewish women had the full blessing of their economically-oriented husbands. The door was open for a new, yet consistently Jewish expression for women—and this door led to the immigrant slums of Canadian cities.

While their husbands were busy building successful merchandizing operations, Jewish women enthusiastically took over the philanthropic demands of Jewish life. Charity as an extension of home duties became a way of life for a whole generation. The zeal of the British and German Jews was also fueled by a desire to Canadianize the immigrants lest their peculiar customs and language become too closely identified with the now outnumbered established community. Yet they failed in their attempts to make these new Canadian Jews over in their own image. Indeed by 1920 the character of Canadian Jewry had been completely transformed. Anti-Semitism reared its ugly head and the position of Jews in Canada suffered irreparable damage. Jews strived to succeed in Canada but found, with each advance, that growing anti-Semitic sentiment curtailed their prospects and in fact hindered their assimilation.

The community turned inward, and women became essential participants in blossoming communal organizations. In their activities, they combined old-world traditional values with new-world feminine ambitions. Since the devotion of Jewish women to social welfare work could not overcome the traditional male dominance of benevolent and communal societies they soon moved to create their own. Eastern European Jewish women plunged into philanthropic work as well, sometimes joining their earlier benefactors, more often forming their own associations. The unique nature of each major women's organization resulted from its ability to fulfil the particular social needs and community orientation of its membership.

The National Council of Jewish Women was formed by upper-middle-class British and German Jews whose advanced level of acculturation made them the most progressive women's organization. While the advancement of women was a major focus of the ideology of their American counterparts, within the Canadian chapters of the National Council feminist aspirations were muted. Instead its social service activities focused on education, family services and the general integration of Jewish immigrants. Hadassah appealed to women one step down on the socio-economic ladder, who were more comfortable with the traditional Jewish woman's role. Concentrating on building a Jewish homeland, Hadassah members felt little concern for the issues revolving around the liberation of women. Its counterpart was the Pioneer Women. Composed of politicized, religiously unaffiliated immigrant women, this was a working-class organization created out of dissatisfaction with the male-dominated Poale Zion. Left out of major decision-making by their Labour Zionist husbands these women could not turn to Hadassah or the National Council of Jewish Women where their leftist leanings and lack of English proficiency made them misfits. Thus they created their own society promoting the social, cultural and economic advancement of women in Palestine and Canada.

The experience of Pioneer Women differed from their more established coreligionists because volunteerism served merely as an adjunct to the drudgery of employment. For middle-class Jewish women, however, volunteerism became a vocation. In synagogues they took over education and fundraising yet remained barred from conducting religious ceremonies and from political power. They raised funds and staffed social service agencies, youth centres and senior citizen's homes, yet when salaried positions became available they went to men. Women's organizations provided unparalleled services to the community, yet few Jewish women recognized that their new skills entitled them to become professional wage-earners at a decision-making level. While the activities of women volunteers became the life-blood of every organized aspect of Jewish life in Canada, the failure of women to question traditional views of femininity left them impotent when opportunities for real changes in status arose.

Although women took over the voluntary aspects of Jewish life and made significant contributions to its quality and advanced organizational structure, their true importance went unheralded. For women, and therefore volunteerism, have not been held in high esteem. Social service activity marked a real departure from domesticity yet rather than free women from traditional bonds, volunteer work served to further reinforce stereotypes. Women remained subservient in every sphere of Jewish life yet provided the enthusiasm and funding to maintain its structural base. For the first half of the twentieth century anti-Semitism curtailed possibilities for all Jews in Canada but afforded Jewish women the opportunity to build their strength within the community. Yet only a handful managed to obtain leadership positions. The mainstream of Jewish women may have lost their chance. The modern push towards professionalism in Jewish life has redefined and curtailed their participation in the very institutions they created.

A North American survey conducted in 1977 by the National Conference of Jewish Communal Services reinforces this conclusion. In a field where only forty-six percent of employees were male, twenty-nine percent of men in Jewish community service were executives, while only one percent of women held positions of power. Whereas one out of four men earned over $30,000 only one out of five hundred women took home such substantial salaries. The survey concluded that entrenched discrimination against women existed at every level from training stages to top positions in Jewish communal services. While there will always be a place for women who can afford to work without pay, the economic and social realities of post-war Canada make it incumbent on the Jewish community to assure a remunerative role for women—or they will take their hard-earned skills elsewhere.

Just as Jewish women were deeply affected by the feminization of religion in North America, so has the movement for women's liberation spelled significant alteration in their self-perception. The educational aspirations, upward mobility and strong political awareness of Canadian Jewry has resulted in Jewish women embracing feminism on a scale unparalleled by other ethnic groups. The Reform movement has accepted women as cantors, rabbis and synagogue presidents yet mainline religious leadership remains closed to them. Increased ritual participation in Conservative and Orthodox observances has come slowly. Some women, utilizing their long careers as voluntary workers, have managed to climb to important lay positions in community organizations. Yet all of these remain in a minority. While it is indisputable that women have made great gains in a short time, they have not been particularly welcomed in remunerative terms. As young, well-educated women increasingly find their major interests outside of the family they are ceasing to accept a role as cheap labour for the Jewish community. Women's organizations will also have to address themselves to the changing needs of women, for those with paying jobs are clearly less able to assume heavy voluntary responsibilities. By offering a meaningful role to Jewish women through combining challenging work and equal salaries the community can retain the committed workers which it sorely needs. Otherwise the trend away from Jewish involvement will continue.

The feminist movement has provided Jewish women with new outlets for their talents and aspirations. These opportunities lie far beyond the traditional sphere. The decline of institutionalized anti-Semitism has enabled women to move quickly up ladders which took decades for Jewish men to climb. Jewish women have attained prominence in professional, cultural, academic and business fields. They have embraced, wholeheartedly, zero population growth—focusing on the quality of their Jewish lives rather than the quantity of their families. Clearly there are dangers to Jewish survival inherent in these new trends. Will the family remain central to Canadian Jewish women? Will they retain their Jewishness and fulfil their traditional role of imbuing Judaism in their children? If Canadian Jewry is to survive the community must redefine the role women can play in it. Successful business and professional women must be encouraged to greater communal leadership. Women's organizations must make room for part-time volunteers and Jewish service agencies must promote women to executive positions. If the community is to retain its importance in Jewish life and stem assimilation then women's role must be remunerative and respected.

Clearly there are many hurdles yet to be overcome by Jewish women, both inside their own community and within Canadian society at large. In this difficult and challenging world Canadian Jewish women would do well to emulate Esther Brandeau. A little chutzpah couldn't hurt.

THE CHANGING ROLE OF CANADIAN JEWISH WOMEN

Yael Gordon-Brym*

It is well known that the structure of the Canadian Jewish community changed substantially during and after the Second World War. What follows is an examination of the impact of Canadian Jews' upward mobility upon the role and status of Canadian women who maintain a Jewish identity.

A. THE FORMATION OF THE JEWISH COMMUNITY IN CANADA

Many historians date the beginning of real Jewish settlement in Canada to 1760, when New France came under British rule. For only since then has it been possible for Jews to take an active and sustained role in the country's life without concealing or changing their religion. However, no substantial Canadian Jewish community existed until the 1880's, at which time Jews fleeing persecution in Russia and Eastern Europe began arriving in large numbers. By 1931 there were over 150,000 Jews in Canada, up from just over 100 in 1831. The greatest rate of increase occurred between 1946 and 1958, during which time the Jewish population rose from over 175,000 to approximately 245,000. Today the Jewish population of the country is well over 300,000, making it the sixth largest Jewish community in the world.

Throughout the 19th and 20th centuries Jews in Canada erected synagogues, Sepharadic and Ashkenazic, wherever there were enough Jews to warrant a congregation. Most of the other community organisations were mutual-benefit societies for new immigrants. Many Jewish women were involved in these aid societies. There was much work to be done since almost all new immigrants, whether they came from shtetls or from large cities, needed assistance upon arrival. Women were active in raising funds through door-to-door canvassing and organising balls, concerts, and picnics. Hebrew Ladies' Aid Societies offered a variety of relief services: doweries for brides, cash for groceries, medical and child care, and classes for learning English.

Most Jewish immigrants in the late 19th and early 20th centuries were artisans, small merchants, unskilled workers, and people with no fixed occupation, the last two categories fading in numerical significance over time. The skills which these immigrants brought with them were in great demand, for at that time Canadian industry was developing quickly. The 1931 census clearly revealed that the community was decidedly urban and engaged overwhelmingly in business and blue-collar jobs. In that year over 24% of gainfully employed Jews in Canada were independent businesspeople and managers, over 30% were clerks and salespeople, over 40% were blue-collar workers, and only 5% were professionals.

Women formed an exceedingly important part of the household economy, but their contributions derived from jobs less rewarding than those held by Jewish men. Most adult Jewish women did 'only' housework, of course. Over half the employed Jewish women were clerks and salespeople, while less than a quarter of Jewish men in the labour force were so employed; under 6% of employed Jewish women were independent businesspeople and managers, compared to over 30% of employed Jewish men.

Equal proportions of Jewish men and women were blue-collar workers in 1931. But within the working class, too, there were gender inequalities. Many of the women employed in clothing manufacture, seamstresses for instance, might take quantities of sewing home with them, where they would simultaneously have to sew, tend to the children, cook, and so forth. Women also tended to receive lower pay, to work in less skilled jobs, to be subjected to sexual harassment by their employers, and to occupy relatively few important positions in the trade union hierarchy. Moreover, the special problems faced by female workers were played down—often they were ignored altogether—by male trade unionists.

B. UPWARD MOBILITY

Working conditions in the needle trades and in other types of blue-collar work were abominable for both men and women, and working hours were long (although the situation was not as bad in Toronto, Montreal, and Winnipeg as it was in the sweatshops of New York). This 'push factor', plus the pull of opportunities opened up by the rapidly expanding Canadian economy of the 1940's, and an ingrained desire for 'self-improvement', caused Canadian Jewish women to struggle up the socio-economic hierarchy.

After a day of hard work, some women, especially the unmarried, attended evening classes where they were taught English, typing, bookkeeping, and other skills useful in middle-class jobs. Others contributed to their husbands' modest savings in an effort to amass enough capital to start a small business. Such efforts usually paid off. As Mordecai Richler recalls: 'The awful truth is that for many of us to look back on the [Second World] war is to recall the first time our fathers earned a good living... For my generation the war was to hear of death and sacrifice but to see with our own eyes the departure from cold water flats to apartments in Outremont, duplexes and homes in the suburbs... In Canada we had never had it so good'.*

Jewish families thus moved from poor, downtown cores to the more affluent suburbs, and from smaller to larger communities. By the 1960's the majority of Jews lived in suburban areas and were the most highly urbanised of all ethnic groups in Canada. The system of higher education became a major route leading to upward mobility for both men and women.

Canadian Jewish women became the matriarchs of Jewish suburbia. Their role was greatly affected by the desire to succeed and the obsession to provide for the future and make life better and easier. Their ideas and values came to predominate in certain spheres of life. The type of schooling to be received by children was one such area. So was the question of congregational affiliation. Indeed, women began to assume prominent roles in the many new and attractive synagogues dotting the suburban landscape; and this was just one aspect of their growing involvement in a whole range of voluntary organisations. Hadassah, Pioneer Women, Mizrachi, and other organisations experienced surges in membership during the 1940's and 1950's. Jewish women also campaigned for non-Jewish causes, raising money for the March of Dimes, the fight against muscular dystrophy, and so forth.

Middle-class Jewish women of the 1950's and 1960's read the 'best sellers' —particularly those on Jewish themes. They were involved in study classes sponsored by synagogue Sisterhoods and by organisations such as Hadassah. They developed a growing interest in learning some Hebrew as part of their heightening identification with the state of Israel. Their synagogue served them as House of Prayer, House of Study, and House of Assembly.

These philanthropic and educational pursuits had important status implications for Canadian Jewish women. The Jewish community as a whole praised the humanistic significance of their activities. Many women derived great satisfaction from the hard work they did in their volunteer roles. But seldom did real political power in the Jewish community derive from participation in women's voluntary activities. Women's organisations had little power themselves; nor did they serve as stepping-stones to power in the wider community.

The Hadassah organisation is perhaps exceptional. Indeed, Canadian Hadassah has come a long way since its first meeting at the Zionist Institute in Toronto in 1916, when it was agreed that fund raising should take the form of a house-to-house campaign to raise relief funds for Palestinian refugees in Egypt. At the time, Hadassah women were frequently and condescendingly referred to as 'diaper Zionists'. In contrast, the 17,000 members of Hadassah are now well respected for contributions to the state of Israel and involvement in the struggle for human rights and freedom of emigration.

However, Hadassah is an organisation for women only. In organisations containing both men and women virtually all important decision-making positions are monopolised by well-to-do businessmen and, less frequently, male professionals. Occasionally, independently wealthy women or women married to wealthy men are admitted to the governing bodies of major Jewish institutions. But for the most part, upward mobility did not bring community power to Jewish women. Most of them continued to participate in relatively uninfluential voluntary organisations.

In the work world, to be sure, Canadian Jewish women benefited economically and otherwise from their own and, if they were married, their husbands' upward mobility. There can be no doubt that over the past several decades Canadian Jewish women have attained higher levels of education, higher status jobs, and higher personal and family incomes than non-Jewish women in Canada as a whole.* However, socio-economic inequality still exists between Jewish men and women in this country.

Table 1 is helpful in considering these facts. It is clear that major changes have taken place in the Jewish occupational structure over the past half century in Canada. First, and most obviously, the Jewish blue-collar work force is a much less important component of the Jewish community than it once was. Moreover, Jewish women have moved out of this economic location more completely than Jewish men. In 1931 over a third of all Jewish men in the labour force, and about the same proportion of Jewish women, were blue-collar workers. By 1971, less than a fifth of Jewish males in the labour force and, remarkably, less than 6% of Jewish women were blue-collar workers.

Where did the offspring of Jewish blue-collar workers go? As is well known, most became businesspeople and professionals. The 1971 census shows that over 75% of gainfully employed Jewish men in Canada, and over 88% of gainfully employed Jewish women, were neither blue-collar workers nor primary producers such as farmers. However, over 15% of Jewish men were located in the top socio-economic category (managers, administrators, etc.), while only 5% of Jewish women were so employed. This indicates socio-economic inequality between the sexes. So does the fact that under 40% of the men were white-collar workers (clerks, salespeople, etc.), while among women 63% were so employed. Only within the 'professional' category were there roughly equal proportions of Jewish men and women: about a fifth of the total. None the less, closer inspection reveals that within this category, the higher-paying, higher-prestige jobs tended overwhelmingly to be occupied by men. Thus, Jewish men in the health professions had a propensity to become dentists, physicians, and surgeons, while Jewish women in the health professions tended to be nurses, dental assistants, and physiotherapists. Jewish men in the teaching professions tended to be university professors and high school teachers, while Jewish women in the teaching professions were more frequently primary school teachers. Altogether, about 20% of Jewish male professionals in 1971 were in the teaching occupations, but a full 46% of Jewish female professionals were so employed. Similarly, in the 1971 'Clerks, salespeople, etc.' category, 68% of Jewish women were clerks, compared to only 24% of the men; but 76% of Jewish men, compared to 32% of Jewish women in that category, were in more prestigious business occupations where earnings were higher.

Is the degree of socio-economic inequality between the sexes greater or less in the Jewish community than among other ethnic groups in Canada? A highly sophisticated, government-sponsored survey conducted between 1977 and 1979 shows that in Toronto, where roughly 40% of the Canadian Jewish population lives, Jews manifest the third highest degree of socio-economic inequality between employed men and women among the nine major ethnic groups in the city (see Table 2). There is no reason to believe that the picture is much different in Montreal and Winnipeg, where an additional 40% or so of the Canadian Jewish population lives.

Apart from the factors that are usually adduced to explain inequality between the sexes, certain additional factors must be mentioned in connection with Jews in general and Canadian Jews in particular. As far as Canada is concerned, gender inequality among Jews is probably due in part to the fact that, compared to, say, the United States, a much higher proportion of Canadian Jews are immigrants and/or of Eastern European origin, and therefore are comparatively orthodox in their religious affiliations and practice. Fewer Eastern European Jews migrated to Canada than to the USA, but in Canada the Eastern Europeans were more numerous relative to the resident Jewish population. After the Second World War, when Canada began to admit immigrants who survived the Holocaust, the relative orthodoxy of the community was reinforced since most of these immigrants were again Eastern Europeans.

Being orthodox has a big impact on the status of Jewish women. Although the role of an orthodox woman can be very rewarding since she is usually a key figure in the family and can manage a variety of domestic skills, her status derives at least in part from traditional, Talmudic beliefs and Halachic dicta. According to Talmudic sayings women are temperamentally light-headed, and they bring anxiety to their fathers because they have no wisdom. The only area in which they can excel is housework. Therefore, a woman deserves respect only insofar as she follows the prescribed course of devoted wife and mother. Jewish laws concerning the rights of women basically regard married women as their husbands' possessions. True, over the years many laws—especially those concerning marriage and divorce—were modified so as to increase women's rights. Nevertheless, orthodox practice does not yet grant women legal equality, but accords them second-class status.

The Chassidic movement showed more respect for women and many Chassidic tales describe women's intelligence. However, it was only with the Emancipation of the early 19th century and the beginning of Reform Judaism that religious doctrines were modernised and major changes introduced in the status of women.

The proportion of Jews in the Reform movement is much higher in the USA than in Canada. The German Jews who came to the United States with their dynamic leader, Isaac Mayer Wise, were anxious to elevate the status of women, and thereby retain the loyalty to Judaism of those who were repelled by the orthodox tradition. In addition, among the 250,000 German Jews who came to the United States between 1840 and 1880, there were quite a few single women. In many ways, it was particularly those spinsters (and occasionally childless wives) such as Henrietta Szold, Rebecca Gratz, and Emma Lazarus who left their mark upon the history of American Jewish women in the 19th century. These women were achievers who did not depend on men for their accomplishments.

It is, however, worth pointing out that even Reform Jews are only beginning to grant women real equality. In theory and in many resolutions adopted by the Reform movement, women are granted full participation. But in practice, only a small percentage of all Reform congregations have women serving as leaders. There are two main reasons for this. First, the established leadership is by no means trying vigorously to implement the theories and resolutions encouraging women's participation. Second, centuries of gender inequality have created strong psychological barriers in the minds of women, preventing even the most progressive among them from demanding the full implementation of their rights.

Another important explanation for the existence of gender inequalities among Jews—and this applies not just to Canada—is the degree to which Jewish women themselves feel that issues such as the Holocaust and the survival of the state of Israel ought to be emphasised to the virtual exclusion of other pressing matters. Undoubtedly, it is extremely difficult not to remain preoccupied with the destruction of over a third of the world's Jews and the partial redemption of Jewish pride in the creation of the state of Israel. Even women who agree that the time has arrived for implementing far-reaching changes in their status frequently hold themselves back from making the point too strongly because of their own desire to maintain a unified front at all costs. Contemporary outbursts of anti-Semitism reenforce this tendency.

C. PROSPECTS

What is likely to happen to Canadian Jewish women with respect to their economic and political situation?

Several factors are likely to decrease economic gender inequality among Jews and non-Jews alike. First, the tendency for more women to participate in the labour force and become full-time workers out of sheer necessity will almost certainly continue. Second, laws preventing sexual discrimination and guaranteeing equal pay for work of equal value are now being passed and, increasingly, enforced by Canadian governments. Third, although some women remain utterly opposed to the women's movement and others have reservations about it, many have already come to accept many of the movement's assumptions and are likely to ensure that it remains strong; this will help advance women's struggle for economic equalisation.

Rising economic status and increased economic independence are bound to facilitate the increased participation of women in the governing bodies of the Canadian Jewish community. As a result of increasing participation, Jewish women will be better able to translate into action the urgency many of them feel about Jewish issues. And my strong impression is that many Jewish women in Canada are greatly concerned not just about the Holocaust and assistance to Israel, but also about the powerful forces hampering the transmission of Jewish culture from one generation to the next.

Now, the roots of assimilation stretch back to the fundamental changes in Jewish belief and identification that were brought about by the Enlightenment and Emancipation in Europe. They were stimulated further by migration to, and settlement in, the New World. Even so, as late as the pre-Second World War period in Canada, it was still largely the case that being Jewish encompassed all spheres of life: typically, a Jew lived in a Jewish neighbourhood, worked with other Jews, spoke Yiddish, read a Yiddish-language newspaper, was a member of a family suffused with Jewish religious belief and practice, and prayed frequently in synagogues located near home with neighbours, family members, and workmates. Not so today—or at least not so to the same degree. Today, Jewishness for most Canadian Jews is not a way of life but merely one of life's several components, and not necessarily the most important. Jewishness tends to be relegated to High Holy Days in the synagogue, perhaps Pesach and Chanukah at home. It tends only in rare cases to involve the use of a Jewish language as a means of daily discourse or a means of acquiring familiarity with Jewish culture. Rates of intermarriage are probably as good an indicator of assimilation as we can hope to have, and they summarise the story well. As can be seen in Table 3, there has been a substantial increase in intermarriage rates among Canadian Jews over the past half century, and especially since the Second World War.*

It is unlikely that these tendencies towards assimilation will cease to exert a powerful impact upon the Canadian Jewish community. Many Jews will continue drifting away from the community, and no group within it—not women, not educators, not Rabbis—can prevent this. On the other hand, it is evident that many families remain committed to Jewish life and are even increasing their level of commitment to, and participation in, philanthropic organisations, synagogues, and so forth. Given this setting, the Canadian Jewish community would be ill advised to hold women back and prevent them from realising their full potential as community workers and leaders. Indeed, I feel a good case can be made for the view that Jewish women, even more than Jewish men, possess skills that can enhance the continuity of Jewish culture from one generation to the next. Years of volunteer work raising money at the grass roots level, helping organise and teach in the Jewish educational system, standing up for the human rights of Jewry worldwide, founding mutual aid societies, easing the absorption of new immigrants, and so forth, have made Canadian Jewish women experts in understanding the needs of their community and have enabled them to demonstrate their keen sense of commitment to its vigour and cohesion. Certain women have made outstanding contributions in this regard—the names of Anna Selick, Lillian Freiman and Ida Siegel spring immediately to mind—but it is the work of thousands upon thousands of Canadian Jewish women that leads to an inescapable conclusion. Greater economic and political equality between the sexes is not just a question of what Jewish women deserve on moral grounds—these, I assume, we can take for granted—but of what the community needs in order to help ensure its survival.

* Incidentally, it seems that one of the major factors which explains differences between men and women in the rate of Jewish outmarriage is the sex ratio in the Canadian Jewish community. There are more unmarried men than unmarried women in the 20-34 age group. The resultant scarcity of unmarried Jewish women may encourage unmarried Jewish men to look outside the ethnic group for spouses.
