Who's What in Who's Who in Canadian Jewry 142

Preface

With the new millennium around the corner, one can look at Canada over the last 100 years and easily see the many changes and progress made during this time. This is also true of the Canadian Jewish community. In this third edition of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry you can read articles and essays dealing with issues that face and express the Jewish community today and in the future, as well as bibliographies of prominent community members. In this edition, we have provided you with a broader written record of life achievements, contributions and activities of those included in the book than in the 1983 and 1989 editions also published by J.E.S.L. Educational Products.

In the past, Canadian Jewry consisted mainly of those of recent East European origins. These Jews were the real founders of the Canadian Jewish community at the very end of the 19th century. In previous editions of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry, we traced the history of this migration caused by persecution and pogroms. The first Jews to come to Canada felt that they were unable to express their Judaism freely and until the great migration to Canada between the 1880's and 1914, Jews in Ontario and Quebec were very integrated and assimilated with non-Jews. After the great migration, however, by 1914 the Jewish community evolved from a small group to more than 6% of the populations in the largest immigrant cities, Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg. The Jewish population in other cities and towns had also grown. Jews started to become less integrated with the rest of Canadians and lived as they had in Eastern Europe. Many were peddlers; many were penniless with no marketable skills. Organizations were created to provide economic assistance and moral support and life centred around synagogues and hometown societies. As well, there was the creation of Jewish theatres, newspapers and schools and Jews lived segregated in specific areas that were almost a continuation of their roots.

Today, however, Jews are arriving in Canada from all over the world, and Canadian Jewry has become an independent, strong community with vital institutions in all aspects of Jewish life. At the same time, Canadian Jewry is visible and active in Canadian life and affairs. Canadians are no longer a single people which makes it easier for people to keep their separate religious identity and culture, but at the same time participate in all aspects of Canadian society. The focus of this edition of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry is to look at the present and the future of the generation of Jews who were mainly raised in Canada and compare them to those from the Eastern European immigrant community. Topics that are addressed include the following:

1) Where do we go from here?
2) What changes can we expect to see in the Jewish community?
3) What will the role of the synagogue and community centres and schools be in holding the Jewish community together?
4) What role will parents, grandparents and extended family play in the continuation of traditions?
5) Where will Jews be centred in Canadian cities?

We at J.E.S.L. Educational Products feel that by updating the previous edition of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry we are fulfilling a double purpose. In the recent past, many in the community have approached us requesting that we publish a more recent edition to reflect the changes in Canadian Jewry over the last ten years. As well, we think that we are at a time with the rest of Canada that it is important to consider the future changes that one can either expect or predict will occur, hence we have provided you with the opinions of several prominent academicians and community workers.

The third edition of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry is divided into three sections: essays, biographical data and the division of those included into their respective professional fields.

Every effort was made to include all prominent community members. Prospective participants were contacted by mail and letters were also sent out asking for recommendations of colleagues, friends and any others known to be prominent in the community. Despite our efforts to be all inclusive, however, there are those who chose not to be included in such a publication either due to fear to be listed in a book on Jewry or to other personal reasons. As well, there will be those who may have been overlooked and we would appreciate being contacted about them for future updates.

A recent brochure, issued by the Council of Jewish Museums, announcing the year 2000 Annual Conference in Scottsdale, AZ, the introduction to the theme of the Conference "Converso as Metaphor — A Paradigm Shift" writes :

> "From the time of the Spanish Inquisition, many individuals of Jewish origin concealed their religious and cultural expressions, maintaining secret identities in order to 'pass' in the majority culture. Known as conversos or crypto-Jews, they created hybrid private/public personas merging Hispanic, Catholic and Jewish elements. In the modern era, many Jews have paralleled the converso experience of 'hiddenness' and 'emergence.' For some, explicit manifestations of Jewish identity are seldom expressed in public life, and Jewishness is relegated to the private sphere. Recently, a number have returned to more active and public identification as Jews."

As with previous editions, the criteria for being included in this book were to be living, to be Canadian, to be Jewish and to have made a contribution within a particular area and/or within Jewish communal life.

There was no fee charged to be included in the book with the exception of photography costs to have a photo included with the biography. Information was collected from submissions by the participants on the basis of questionnaires they completed and their curriculum vitae. J.E.S.L. Educational Products is grateful to all for supplying the valuable information that has been included in this publication. We also greatly appreciate the list of recommendations that were sent to us which enabled our collection to be more comprehensive than would have otherwise been possible.

Many people indirectly or directly have contributed to the writing and publication of this book and they deserve our thanks and appreciation. Special thanks are also due to Daniel Albahary for being involved, initially, as assistant to the editor and helped collecting important data; to Risa Vandersluis for her writing, recommendations and critical reading of the entire manuscript; to Margaret Epp and Pip Pearce at Matrix Productions for offering many valuable suggestions; to Meir Klein for all his help in publishing this volume. Meir is an expert in Jewish research and genealogy. He came to Montreal from Israel for his studies. After finishing his studies he moved to Toronto where he is working at UJA Federation as Director of Research and Development and Director of Israeli Outreach Program. Meir dedicated his life to the betterment of Jews everywhere and to improve trade and business between Canada and Israel.

Tracking Demographic Assimilation: Evidence from Canada's Major Cities

Leo Davids
(Associate Professor, Atkinson College, York University, Toronto)

Both scholars and community leaders throughout the Diaspora have long been interested in assessing the demographic as well as educational health of the Jewish community, concerning themselves — in the contemporary phrase — with "Jewish continuity." Jewish continuity has a core of meaning which is very familiar to anyone who worries about the long-term survival of an authentic Jewish community, although the terminology may have shifted. Since it became clear some decades ago that the integration or acceptance of Jews in North American society was no longer the major issue, but that the great challenge had become maintaining a recognizable Jewish collectivity in a free and welcoming society, there has grown a very significant literature on predicting the future size and quality of the Jewish communities in the United States, Canada and other places (e.g. Bayme & Rosen 1994; Goldscheider 1986; Kosmin et al. 1991; Schmelz & Della Pergola 1995). This essay will make a contribution to the discussion of these same concerns, based on detailed information coming out of the 1991 population census of Canada.

Much demographic information on Jews that may be derived from the 1981 and 1991 Canadian Census has already been made available through work by Torczyner and associates as well as in earlier papers by this author (Davids 1985, 1994). However, much of the material published so far has focused on individual characteristics of Jews in Canada (rather than looking at other units, such as families), or has given extensive data with not enough interpretation and explanation. The present essay will deemphasize information based on individual characteristics, but will focus on understanding something about the Jewish quality of the various cities in Canada (as well as the overall national situation), mainly on the basis of differing family types. Those interested in looking at the earlier material, as a context for our discussion in this paper, should read it (Davids 1985 and 1994; Torczyner 1995a and 1995b).

The definition of terms such as "family" and "family structure" is something that Statistics Canada has taken pains to deal with, and we need not repeat these discussions here (See Statistics Canada 1992; Che-Alford 1994: Chap.1). What we shall try to do is to sketch the demographic situation (and prospects) for the Jews of Canada by looking at the major urban areas and comparing them to one another. We shall be looking for local or regional patterns, and then the Canadian "big picture," frequently comparing Jewish data with those from the entire population.

Let us also note that our city data, below, doesn't deal with just the cities in their precise official limits, but with what is called the "Census Metropolitan Area." In common parlance, this would correspond to "Greater Montreal" or "Greater Toronto," since each CMA includes the city centre plus the close suburbs; this CMA gives one a better picture of the entire community rather than only what is contained within specific legal boundaries such as the "City of Ottawa" proper.

We shall not spend much time here in discussing the difference between counting Jews by ethnic origin as compared with Jews by religious denomination. This distinction may be quite important when one wants to do fine analysis of Canadian census data, and it has been discussed elsewhere (See Berkowitz 1994: pp.3-6; Davids 1994: p.2; Torcsyner 1995a: pp.10-11, 66-71). Suffice it to say that the "Jewish" community as measured in this paper refers to anyone who reported their religion as being Jewish, but excludes all those who did not declare themselves of Jewish religion, although they may have had some Jewish ancestry (as is done by Schmelz & Della Pergola, 1995: pp.467-8).

The definition consistently used by Torczyner and his associates, however, includes not only all Jews who are so declared in terms of their religious denomination but also those who reported "no religion" or "atheist" or "agnostic," while having some ethnic ancestry listed as Jewish (Torczyner 1995a: pp.10, 195). This is a broader definition which, I believe, sometimes leads us into questionable descriptions of overall Jewish communities, but the other side of that choice is to face some undercounting of Jews or Jewish behaviour, particularly in the smaller communities and in Canada's West. We ask readers to keep in mind, therefore, that "Jews" in this paper are all those who declared their religious affiliation to be Jewish, without any regard to their ancestry or ethnic origin — which relates to history but hardly speaks of today and tomorrow. Obviously, we include "Jews By Choice" (converts to Judaism) but exclude Jews having joined any other faith community.

Recent Trends in Canadian Family Living Arrangements

Before we can describe the situation regarding Canada's Jewish communities, one has to know the larger context — i.e., what the family trends are in Canada generally. Statistics Canada has published a number of post-censal reports which deal with this, including their book Families In Canada (Che-Alford 1994; also cf. Statistics Canada 1992). To summarize that picture very very briefly, we know that during the past 25 to 30 years, Canada (as is the case with most other Western countries) has seen a very strong movement to fewer children or smaller families; dual-earner couples; much higher divorce rates, leading to large growth in the number of one-parent families (created not through widowhood but as a result of marriage breakdown); and a significant increase of unmarried cohabitation, often referred to by the legal term "common-law marriage" (see Statistics Canada 1997: pp.123-181).

These tendencies have become quite pronounced during the 1980s, leading to a family scene in Canada which contains fewer conventional couples (particularly those with only one "breadwinner" in the labour force) while the other structural possibilities have become more and more common. Although most families in Canada today still involve a legally-married couple, remember that many more families today are based on a couple who live together without having had any sort of formal wedding, as well as one-parent families — who have become much more part of the Canadian family scene than they used to be in the decades right after World War II (Che-Alford 1994: p.1, Chap.2; LaNovara 1993).

Specifically, in 1991 we find that 9.9% of all census families in Canada were cohabiting families, rather than those legally married; and a larger number yet (13% of all Canadian families) consist of one-parent situations. The literature also points out that whereas one-parent families were certainly not uncommon in the earlier part of this century, those one-parent families were usually caused by the death of a spouse, leaving the surviving spouse as a one-parent case. Today, however, the percentage of one-parent families due to bereavement is much smaller, while the majority of these situations are due to separation and divorce (Che-Alford et al. 1994: p.17).

It is also useful to mention that there are important provincial or regional variations with regard to distribution or proportions of these family types within Canada. While this is not the place to dwell on it, one would expect that the variations among Jewish communities across Canada are to some extent explainable in terms of differences between Canada's provinces, which are far from identical to each other in regard to family demographics (LaNovara 1993: p.13).

The Geography of Canadian Jewry

Which are the major Jewish communities in Canada? Obviously, Canada's largest cities — Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver — also have substantial Jewish communities, with Toronto being much the largest and Vancouver third in the country. When you identify the fourth largest Jewish community in Canada as of 1991, it is in Winnipeg, which is not that large a city in terms of urban Canada generally, but remains a very important Jewish centre. While Winnipeg was the number three Jewish city in previous years, Vancouver had overtaken it by 1991 as the third largest Jewish CMA, leaving Winnipeg as the fourth largest community.

When we speak of major communities, we herein use a threshold of 5,000 Jewish souls as the minimum for entry into that league, while the smaller communities (which have less than 5,000 Jewish inhabitants) can be considered somewhat less significant in the overall Canadian Jewish picture. Using that criterion, there are only six Census Metropolitan Areas (CMAs) which rank as major communities. In descending size places, we have: Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Ottawa, and Calgary.

The population counts of these Jewish communities have been dealt with in earlier work. Very briefly, we know that the number of Jews (by religion) in Toronto exceeds 150,000 souls, while the number in Montreal is (in 1991) a little less than 100,000. In Vancouver, Jews by religion were somewhat over 14,000 in 1991, while in Winnipeg the number was a little above 13,000; the number in Ottawa fell just below 10,000 souls, at that time, and Calgary counted close to five and a half thousand Jews (Davids 1994: Table II; Statistics Canada 1993b: Table 2). Torczyner and his associates, again, argue that this is an undercount of the actual, effective Jewish community in some Canadian cities, which have substantial populations of people who declared some Jewish ancestry in terms of ethnic origin but were of no religion/atheist/agnostic in terms of their current religious denomination (Torczyner 1995b; but see Schmelz & Della Pergola 1995: p.475).

Thus, as we consider specific data on a city by city basis, we shall be dealing only with the "big guys": Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Ottawa, and Calgary. Adding up the number of Jews in these six cities gives us over 90% of the entire Jewish population of Canada in 1991, leaving fairly insignificant (numerically, that is) pockets of Jews in the smaller communities. The work by Torczyner and associates has dealt with approximately a dozen Jewish cities, and those interested in specifics about the smaller Jewish communities in particular may wish to consult that material (Torczyner et al. 1995b).

The data that we shall present and interpret in this paper, then, surveys the distribution of Jewish population in the above-named cities, focusing mostly on the different types of family structure to be found within the Jewish populations in those cities. Although the data were recorded in 1991, herein we use the present tense in describing the picture emerging from that Census.

Concepts and Variables in Jewish Family Demographic

Jewish demographers are obviously interested in phenomena such as mixed marriages or the extent to which Jewish families are one-parent rather than two-parent, because these family structures are a part of the modern scene which — from the standpoint of Jewish survival into the future — presents some major threats. As the studies by Cohen (1982), Goldscheider (1986), Medding (1992) and others have already made clear, when any Jewish community has a significant number of families that do not involve Jews married to other Jews, or that are in a low-fertility situation, then the numbers of its Jewish children are very likely to be smaller. Both exogamous (Jews marrying Gentiles) and one-parent families tend to be of lower fertility, and children who are born in these families also have a higher probability (than those having two Jewish parents) of not being raised as Jews who will identify and affiliate with the Jewish community when they become independent. Thus, leaving aside judgements having to do with culture, morality, or whatever, the demographics alone suggest that mixed marriage as well as one-parent situations pose a threat to the Jewish future simply because they tend to mean fewer Jewish children. Of course, this has been stated and explained at length in other work (See Bayme & Rosen 1994; Della Pergola 1995; Kosmin et al. 1991; Rosen 1995: pp.15, 20-21).

When one examines and interprets the tables that we deal with, below, it is important to remember some factors that are not shown here but which may be important in interpreting their meaning. For one thing, bear in mind the different age structures of the various communities, as we know that the percentage of Jews aged 65 and older in both Montreal and Winnipeg (26% there were seniors) is considerable (See Table II below). Moreover, recent arrival in high-attraction cities (such as Vancouver) can also be significant, when a large proportion of the Jewish population are migrants. These, of course, have an impact on the likelihood of both mixed marriage and one-parent situations — which tend to be found among younger rather than older couples (Medding et al. 1992: pp.8-10).

As well, we know that the population of Jewish ancestry but declaring no religion is much larger in many smaller Canadian cities than it is in Toronto and Montreal (See Torczyner 1995b: pp.245,251), which means some loss of information when one is only counting those who are of the Jewish faith or denomination. Nevertheless, I believe that our tables provide a valid picture of the Canadian scene.

It should be remembered, again, that Jews by religion include born Jews as well as Jews by choice, i.e., Canadians (in this context) who have converted to Judaism and therefore declared their religion on census day as "Jewish," although their origins are from whatever faiths, peoples or tongues.

1991 Statistics: The Facts

Before we present our Jewish data, it is useful to know the overall population size of Canada's largest cities. Particularly for those who are not familiar with the population geography of Canada, the following brief overview will be useful. In 1991, the census found about 3,900,000 people in the Toronto CMA; somewhat over 3,100,000 inhabitants in greater Montreal; 1,600,000 in the Vancouver CMA; while all other cities in Canada had under 1,000,000 inhabitants. Ottawa (without its close neighbour Hull, Quebec) numbers about 700,000 inhabitants; Ottawa-Hull, together, had over 920,000 inhabitants; there were about 840,000 people in Edmonton, 750,000 in Calgary, and just over 650,000 in Winnipeg. Winnipeg is the seventh largest city in Canada, descending from Toronto, at the top of the size list. It is no surprise that when we look at numbers of families, and other information, the largest aggregations will indeed be found in Toronto, followed by Montreal; for Jews, however, Winnipeg is not the seventh population centre but the fourth, as noted earlier, coming right after Vancouver. (Whereas both Edmonton and Calgary are larger cities than Winnipeg within the overall Canadian scheme, they are Jewishly smaller places.)

Let us inspect Table I, which provides an overall picture of Jewish family types in six Canadian cities, ranging from Toronto down to our smallest, Calgary. Table I indicates a total of 44,100 families within Greater Toronto that contain one or two Jewish adults. Thus, as one sees in footnote "b" to this Table, families containing any Jew-by-religion adult (whether a marital partner or lone parent) are included in this total. We then find that 74% of all these families are "conventional" Jewish families; this means, here, a legally married couple in which both partners are reported as of Jewish religion. (These couples have had a formal wedding of some kind, and are religiously homogeneous.)

The remaining 26% of Toronto Jewish families are not "conventional". That is to say, the other 26% consists of 3,775 one-parent families (9% of Toronto's Jewish grand total); plus 7,575 families which were either a Jewish couple living together without any formal marriage, thus cohabitant (or — in the legal phrase "common-law" couples), or "mixed" — i.e., one Jewish and one Gentile partner. (All these are grouped together in Table I to give us an overview of each community, but Table III will "unpack" this part of each CMA's Jewish population to show specifically what the situation is.)

Thus, three out of four Toronto Jewish families are the sort that community leaders are perfectly content with, in that the couples are formally married and are both Jews. The other one-quarter of all relevant Toronto families involve situations that, from a demographic standpoint, raise certain concerns, and challenge the organized Jewish community to a response (A.J.C. 1988; Mayer 1991; Mayer & Avgar 1987).

Moving on to Montreal, we see from Table I that there were 28,450 Jewish families there (in 1991) of which, again, 75% were conventional (legally married and endogamous) families, versus one out of four being of any other type. Montreal has a fairly high representation of Jewish one-parent families, which constitute just under 10% of all Jewish families in that city, but Montreal has a very low proportion of mixed and cohabitant Jewish families, which constitute only 15% of the grand total. This, despite the relatively high level of cohabitation in Montreal's over-all population (Statistics Canada, 1992: p.12; LaNovara 1993: p.13).

Vancouver, however, presents a very different picture. We see that Vancouver had 4,900 families involving one or more Jewish adults (at the 1991 census), but only 51% were conventional Jewish families. About 10% were one-parent families, while the other 40% were composed of mixed-religion and/or cohabiting couples. Thus, the Jewish family demographics of Vancouver immediately stand out in strong contrast to what is seen in Toronto and Montreal.

Continuing to the figures for Winnipeg, there were just over 4,000 Jewish families, but the distribution of these families is quite similar to the picture in Toronto and Montreal. Seventy-three percent of the Winnipeg Jewish families were conventional ones, versus 8% one-parent units plus a total of 19% consisting of mixed and cohabiting couples.

The other cities shown in Table I occupy a demographic position between the "traditionalist" central Canada norms (set by Toronto and Montreal) and the exceptionally modernist or assimilated pattern seen in Vancouver. Looking at Ottawa and Calgary, we find that the conventional Jewish families are approximately three out of five in those cities, with a percentage around the 59% to 60% mark. The mixed and cohabiting families in Ottawa and Calgary are in the 32% area, while the percentage of one-parent Jewish families varies somewhat but is, in all cases, under 10% of the Jewish family total for the city.

One would also wish to examine which of these cities had strongly-concentrated Jewish neighbourhoods and which did not, but that would be difficult to pursue here. This is not the place for discussing the impact of residential concentration on long-term Jewish continuity, but this too has been discussed in the literature from Louis Wirth onwards (See Rosenberg 1993: pp.30-34, 43-44).

Before leaving Table I, we again point out that the population of Jewish one-parent families does not reach fully 10% in any of the cities that we're looking at, whereas across Canada, one-parent families are 13% of all families. Thus, one may be interested to study why it is that lone parents of Jewish religion are considerably less common than is the case for the entire Canadian population.[1]

Turning now to Table II, which looks particularly at Jewish children and seniors' populations, and marital status among Jews in Canada's major CMAs, we take note of large variations between these cities. Calgary is the "youngest" of these six Jewish communities vs. Winnipeg being the oldest.

Marital status data on Jews has also been provided by Statistics Canada. Zeroing in on the age group that is normally involved in Jewish parenting, and therefore building the next generation of Jews in their community, let us take a look at the marital status picture for those of Jewish religion who are aged 30 to 49 years. (Few below the age of 30 are already parents, nowadays, while those who are 50 and over are in generations whose direct parenting work has been fully completed.)

Very briefly, the marital status picture across most of the large Jewish communities in Canada — as shown in Table II indicates that approximately 15% to 16% of Jews aged 30 to 49 years are reported as single/never married; between 10% and 11% is the usual proportion of people in this age group who are divorced and separated; while the widowed are a very small fraction, under 1% of people in this category. Thus, those who are currently married range in the 72% to 75% vicinity, in practically all the cities; Toronto is ahead of the others, with the lowest proportions unmarried or divorced or separated, thus the highest percentage in a current union.

However, the picture for Vancouver in this regard is markedly poorer than across the country: the population of single/never married among Jews aged 30 to 49 years is close to 19% there, the divorced and separated are 15%, and the currently married (or cohabitant) are just under 66%.

1 My research on Jewish lone parents, not reported in this paper, provides a reasonable answer. Although post-divorce lone parenting is just as prevalent among Jews as for all Canadians, there is less cohabitation and certainly far less non-marital fertility (among the never married) for Jews than in the general population. Thus, overall, fewer Jewish families have only one parent.

d For the 30–49 age category, this Table does not show "Widowed" — there are so few in that age group, less than 1% in all Canadian cities. The percentages shown for the 30–49 population do not add up to 100%, due to omission of the very small "widowed" category.

Thus, one can see that Vancouver Jews in this very important age category are significantly less likely to be in a current union, so the marital status numbers for this one CMA stand out from the other cities, whose differences in marital status proportions (among people aged 30 to 49 years) are rather slight.

Table III looks at the extent of intermarriage ("exogamy") and unmarried cohabitation in Canada's significant Jewish cities (which between them, again, total over 90% of all Jews in the country). Table III shows the specific information regarding outmarriage and unmarried cohabitation by Jews in Canada, counting endogamous (where both of the cohabiting partners are of Jewish religion) versus the mixed-religion cohabiting couples. Table III shows that cohabitation by Canadian Jews is a significant phenomenon involving thousands of people and of couples, but — in percentage terms — cohabiting is not that popular in the larger centres. (Halifax — not listed in our Tables — has 12% of all its "Jewish families" cohabitant, but none of those involve two Jews; all of Halifax's cohabitant couples involve one Jewish and one Gentile partner.[2])

Vancouver and Ottawa have significant percentages of cohabitants amongst their Jewish families, but these percentages are smaller in other Canadian communities, with only 4% of Jewish families in Toronto involved in cohabitation. (For all Canada, as shown in our Table IV, cohabitants are some 5% of all Jewish families.) This, of course, contrasts with the 9.9% of all Canadian families which were cohabiting couples in 1991.

Furthermore, Table III gives us a ratio between the exogamous couples (listed in column "b") as compared to the number of conventional couples (shown as column "a"). This ratio indicates that mixed couples are proportionally least common in Montreal, (with its ratio of 18) but rise to a peak in Vancouver, where the ratio is 75. This, of

* Where husband or wife is reported as being of Jewish religion, the partner is not. This excludes cases where a conversion to Judaism has occurred prior to the 1991 Census. It includes some couples where the partner not declaring their religion as "Jewish" may be, partly or entirely, of Jewish ethnic origin. Many of these should not be counted as intermarriages.

 Not that the religiously-mixed are a percentage within the endogamous Jewish counts, but that we divide the mixed total for each city by its endogamous total to get a convenient comparison basis concerning the relative extent of intermarriage per city. This mixed couples count, however, incudes both cohabitant and formally married couples, with one Jewish partner, but the other not.

N.B.: For all Canada, (= all groups/faiths), cohabiting couples are 9.9% of 1991 families. (However, in Quebec they are 16% of all 1991 families.) 42% of all Canadian cohabitant couples are parenting in 1991, vs. 58% with no children at home. For Jews, however, it's 25% parenting vs. 75% without children at home. (Some are empty nesters, of course.)

course, dovetails with what we have seen in Table I, where Vancouver exhibited the lowest percentage of conventional Jewish families among all the major communities in Canada, while fully 40% of Vancouver's Jewish families involved cohabitation or exogamy. Looking at Table III, one can see that the mixed-marriage couples are the largest part of that 40%, and that within Vancouver's 1,875 religiously-mixed couples there are 420 cohabiting couples.

Overall, Table III indicates that the very largest communities (Toronto and Montreal) have a quite low percentage of out-married Jews, although the actual count of mixed couples in the two big cities is obviously considerable. On the other hand, with the exception of Winnipeg (and Hamilton), whose rates or ratios regarding exogamy are quite similar to what we found in the two big cities, out-marriage is a very important phenomenon in most of the intermediate-sized and smaller Canadian communities, with at least a third of the couples which contain any Jew, in these communities, involving one Jewish and one non-Jewish partner.

At the same time, note that in some communities there is a very large coincidence in regard to religious out-marriage and cohabitation (i.e., the same couples are both mixed and not formally wed), while in others this connection does not appear.[3]

Before discussing or reflecting on what the statistics teach us, let us pause to see the over-all Canadian Jewish "national" family situation. Having clearly observed the major differences between the various cities, and the general contrast between central Canada and the western CMA's, we will not be deceived into thinking that Table IV's totals represent a fairly homogeneous, standard reality across the country. Rather, we know that Table IV is mainly a reflection of the two numerically — predominant communities (of Toronto and Montreal), and the "national" averages they create do not hold true in Vancouver, Calgary, and smaller cities.

3 Figures, not show in this Table, for Edmonton and Hamilton indicate that — like Halifax — all Jewish cohabitants there have gentile partners, as the number of known Jew-Jew cohabitant couples there is nil!

Table IV also examines the fertility of different family types, in a somewhat indirect way. The data here show 18,820 mixed couples, of which 4,070 (22% of all the mixed) were cohabiting, while the other 78% were formally married. However, 76% of the cohabitant mixed couples have no children in the home (in 1991), versus only 40% without children among the legally married exogamous couples. In Table IVb, one sees that a tiny fraction of Jew-Jew couples were cohabiters (under 2% of the 68,765), but these also indicated much less child-bearing than among the endogamous legally married: 68% of Jew-Jew cohabiters had no child present in their home, versus 43% among conventional couples.

One can also find here that only 21% of all Canadian Jews in a union or current couple (married or cohabitant) had a non-Jewish partner, and some of those were no-religion ethnic Jews (or part Jews, additionally), i.e., those who reported Jewish ancestry. Effectively, this suggests about 80% inmarriage among Canadian Jews — including some converts to Judaism — up to 1991, versus about 2 in 10 who were in a mixed-religion couple. (On a current basis, about 70% of Jews marrying during 1995 were marrying other Jews, versus about 30% marrying out. This is consistent with data from the 1980's, and it indicates a future rise in the "stock" of mixed couples.)

Table IV also demonstrates that cohabitation is a low-fertility situation, whether religiously-mixed or Jew to Jew. On the other hand, marriage is associated with procreation, whether it involves endogamous or exogamous couples. Among the legally married, 60% of the exogamous couples have a child at home, vs. 57% of endogamous couples; that is hardly a significant difference.

Finally, Table IV gives a reassuring picture of Canadian Jewry strongly favouring legal marriage over cohabitation, and childbearing predominantly among the legally married. Our earlier Tables help us keep this in proper perspective: from the Jewish demographic viewpoint, Montreal is on "another planeti' than Vancouver, and one should never generalize from a national average to particular cities at least not in contemporary Canada (See Shahar 1996: pp.12-15).

Discussion and Conclusions

What broad conclusions might one draw from these statistical facts? Yes, Jews in different communities are influenced or affected by the larger social environment, yet the Jewish statistics remain significantly different in a number of respects from the general Canadian pattern. This is most evident in Toronto and Montreal, but still appears even in the smaller communities across the country.

However, we see that Vancouver stands out within the Jewish demographic context of Canada as a city which has much higher proportions of "unconventional" families, i.e., cohabiting and mixed-religion. Why? Can other Census-based information help explain the differences we have found?

One thing we have to say at this point is that community size alone is not the answer, although it does count. In other words, it is quite true that the largest communities (Toronto and Montreal) are Jewishly stronger, while small communities by and large show poorer Jewish demographics — no doubt connected with the fact that their synagogues, Jewish schools, and other identity-maintaining institutions do not rival the ones that the large communities are able to maintain. However, seeing that the Vancouver demographics are generally less favourable than those of most communities in Canada, which are much smaller in Jewish population than Vancouver, indicates that other variables are playing important parts. That is what we're looking for, in these next few paragraphs.

One variable that gives us good clues to understanding the differences between one community and another (aside from proximity to other strong communities, and total size) is marital status, which we have examined in our Table II. That Table showed clearly the unfavourable conditions for conventional Jewish family life in Vancouver, where many students and other young adults stay outside a union, or at least a marriage, even at the age bracket of 30-49. However, this is not the case in all the other major communities, where approximately 3 out of 4 Jews in the 30-49 category are married — thus, likely to be parents.

Another type of explanatory data would be information from the Jewish school system in each city. One would want to know, for example, what percentage of the Jewish children are in Jewish all-day schools rather than supplementary education (which gives a few hours of Jewish study after normal attendance in a public school). As well, what is the proportion of Jewish children who are enrolled in Jewish schools at the secondary level, i.e., after the age of Barmitzvah? However, the data available to me now on Canadian Jewish schools is fragmentary, and not suitable for any presentation in this paper. Suffice it to say that it is highly desirable to examine such statistics (See Rosen 1995 on this: pp.15-18).

We do know that the Jewish school systems in Toronto and Montreal are strong, showing a rising proportion of their enrollment in Jewish high schools, rather than the old pattern of almost everyone going to high school in the public system, including those who had gone to Jewish day school at the elementary level. Berkowitz (1994: p.8), however, indicates a weak enrollment percentage for Jewish schools in Vancouver, agreeing with Kutnick's assessment on comparing Winnipeg (strong commitment to Jewish education) vs. Vancouver (weak commitment) in this regard (1989: p.148).

Next we should say a little about the retention of Jewish languages, which here means, of course, Hebrew and Yiddish. While we cannot go into language data in any great detail here, it is correct to say that — outside of Toronto and Montreal — neither Yiddish nor Hebrew are today viable spoken languages among Canadian Jews. The Jewish language reality has certainly been transformed, over the past 50-60 years (See Rosenberg 1993: pp.256-259).

In Montreal, as one can see in our Table V, 44 per 1,000 Jews use Yiddish on a regular basis as their language at home; an additional 19 per 1,000 Jews in Montreal use Hebrew as their normal family tongue. In Toronto, the numbers are a bit lower, but we do find that 29 Jews per 1,000 use Hebrew as their normal language of the home, while 13.4 per 1,000 are using Yiddish.[4] Language retention is a crude measure of 4 This is not the place for a substantial discussion of Yiddish and Hebrew demographics, but the census produces rich language data on mother tongue and home language (in reports such as Statistics Canada 1993a). I have reported earlier analyses on this elsewhere (e.g. Davids 1989).

ethnic-community cohesion/strength and separateness from the larger society; a fully-assimilated group would speak only the dominant society's tongue(s), not that of their own ancestors. (In North American Jewry generally, language is not a "marker" of Jewishness nowadays, and the identity/ continuity literature hardly mentions Yiddish at all.)

All other cities in Canada have home language counts for Yiddish and Hebrew which are much smaller, thus indicating that to all intents and purposes Yiddish and Hebrew there are classroom or scholarly languages only, and not actually used at home by any significant population. This is not the place to discuss the significance of Yiddish and/or Hebrew as an indicator of community/ identity, but it is fairly obvious that the maintenance of a strong, distinct ethno-religious culture may be measured at least approximately by data on the use of the special languages that are (or were) current among Jews but not among any other part of the Canadian population. Here, again, we find a great difference between the Jewish cultural ambience in Toronto and Montreal versus all other Canadian cities (See Davids 1989: pp.4-5; Shahar 1996: pp.6-7).

Internal migration to Vancouver is also a part of the demographic problem there (See Torczyner 1995b: pp.246-248). That city appears to have more rootless/transient Jews than other Canadian cities do. It is obvious that still other data would be relevant and interesting in this context as well, but one cannot incorporate all such material herein.

It should now be very clear, as we conclude this paper: It is not valid to simply present "national averages" of Jewish demographic realities in Canada, because such all-Canada demographic data hides too much. That is, the variations between one city and another are too large and significant to allow anyone to simply review national averages and then assume that the variations from one place to another within Canada are insignificant. On the contrary, we have seen that Canadian Jewry is certainly not homogeneous, and therefore it is necessary (even if one starts with some very broad "national" picture of demographic realities as a preface or introduction) to study each CMA, or a relatively homogenous stratum of them (e.g. Calgary — Edmonton — Ottawa), and the specific family data which characterize that Jewish community.

We have discovered that there is an enormous difference between Montreal, on the one extreme, and Vancouver, on the other. Some of this has been illuminated, if not necessarily accounted for, by information on marital status, Yiddish and Hebrew use, as well as Jewish population size; the demographic "outputs" in various communities are not totally unpredictable or random, but no doubt the product of cultural, religious and educational "inputs".

No comparisons to other countries have been presented here, but the literature indicates that the underlying dynamics are quite similar for Jews in other English-speaking societies.

Although individual perceptions and behaviours are shaped and limited by social environment, so that the Jewish identity and family data are typically patterned as stronger or weaker in each particular city, one must not deny each person's choice/freedom. That is, macro-level consistency in the variables we have been reviewing here should not lead to the fallacious fatalism of saying that Vancouver Jews must be this way, or Winnipeg Jews that way. One would also believe that real change cannot be planned and accomplished, because "that's the way things are."

No, let us remember that individuals and groups constantly make choices, yet are influenced by the stream of events and forces around them. The dynamism of identity in modern life means that we should not accept any determinism, but acknowledge the environmental/communal realities as they have been, while trying to improve them. This may involve longer Jewish schooling for adolescents, trips to Israel, family Shabbat programs, and many other strategies. Following success in these actions, we can look forward to better statistics next time around! (Cf. Mayer 1991; Rosen 1995: pp.10-11, 22-25; Kutnick 1989: pp.148-150).

Further research on Jewish Canada will have to continue looking both at the overall picture for the entire country and, more importantly, at specific realities in each of the separate communities which are building their Jewish tomorrow in their distinct ways.

Looking to the Future

Jay Broadbar

It is said that since the destruction of the Temple, prophecy is reserved for children and fools.

It has been a long time since I have been mistaken for the former, and I do not relish the latter designation; thus I ought to resist the temptation to prognosticate. So what you will find here is neither prophecy nor prognostication but rather a series of qualified guesses and questions about what our Jewish community might look like in the coming century.

If you are the kind of person who chuckles at five-day weather forecasts, then you have the necessary skepticism required to read on.

Most demographic forecasts use as their basis census data of some sort or another. For any year that we have data, the information is critical. But when these numbers are used for prediction, no one is infallible.

I have in my files a report by UJA Federation's top planner in the late '80s surmising that Greater Toronto's population by "the turn of the century could approach 150,000". Little did he know that in fact the community had reached that landmark even while he was writing his forecasts and now, as we shall see, some estimates put our population as over 200,000.

This forecast was not alone in dramatically underestimating the growth of our community. Why? Population numbers change for basically three reasons: births, deaths and migration. The last is especially hard to estimate, since it is sensitive to economic and political factors such as war, economic depression, immigration policies and political movements that occur on both national and global arenas.

The vast proportion of our dramatic growth (for example, 34,000 from 1981 to 1991) was due to high immigration. Toronto draws immigrants, and Jewish immigrants are no exception. Interestingly, our community's recent growth is due about equally to people moving here from abroad and to those coming from other parts of Canada.

It is also important to take into account, not just the total numbers, but how those numbers distribute themselves throughout the GTA (Greater Toronto Area). Here again, there are factors beyond our control, like the type and cost of housing, the development of transportation infrastructure, and the location of schools, synagogues and health and recreational facilities.

For example, the presence of Jewish seniors in York region is very small. But that can change, depending on the nature of housing and services that become available, as well as such factors as more integrated mass public transportation system throughout the GTA.

In spite of the fact that we can't anticipate the kinds of political and economic events that might dramatically increase immigration to Toronto or emigration out of Toronto, all things being equal, there are certain safe bets for the immediate and longer-term future. These include the continued dramatic growth in the number of frail elderly (those over 75), as well as the dramatic growth in the overall senior population as the baby boom generation ages. Certain differences in the characteristics of various geographic areas are also likely to remain.

For example, York Region is disproportionately home to young families, and as suggested earlier, unless housing stock (such as apartments, and condominiums and assisted living) is adequate, mass transit expands and elder services are increased, this trend is likely to continue.

What will the GTA look like in terms of overall population numbers? The GTA task force several years ago commissioned some projections for its own purposes. Based on assumptions of flat fertility levels, a complicated scenario of shifting mortality rates, and due to its historical volatility, fairly complicated immigrant scenarios, the task force estimated a series of projections until the year 2031 based on the 1991 census.

If we apply similar assumptions to the Jewish population of the Toronto Census Metropolitan Area (CMA), which is fairly equivalent for our purposes, to the GTA, we come up with the following projections:

2011 — 234,287
2021 — 263,397
2031 — 294,780

The task force also projected alternative low and high scenarios. Even by the former, our community would reach just under a quarter of a million persons by 2031; by the latter, it would reach close to a staggering 360,000.

When we look at the amount of change for various age groups between 1991 and 2021, we can see the impact of the baby boom in successive peaks of increases in the older groups as we move into the future. This has all the implications discussed in the widely read book by David K. Foot Boom, Bust and Echo.

The most dramatic changes will follow the baby boomers. For example, in 1991 there were under 7,000 Jews in the 70 to 74 age group; by 2031 that number is predicted to be close to 17,000.

When we look into the future, we also need to take into account the Greater Toronto Area Jewry, as noted earlier, does not have a uniform look across the whole metropolis. Different sectors have different flavours with different characteristics and needs. In terms of defined geographic areas, there are probably three we should focus on: York Region, downtown and the demographic centre.

York region has been an area of tremendous growth for both the general and the Jewish community. If treated separately, this area, with estimates of close to 60,000 Jews would be the third largest Jewish community in Canada (after Toronto and Montreal). The vast majority of Jews live in the Thornhill sections of the cities of Vaughan and Markham, with pockets in Richmond Hill.

An important characteristics of Jews in this area is that they are young: In 1991, one out of every three was under 15 years old. It is likely that for the foreseeable future, the educational and recreational needs of this age range will be paramount, both as it moves through time (and gets older), and with the influx of new young families due to continued real estate development.

It will be interesting to see if senior-related services and housing materialize in the future. It's a bit of the chicken and egg question. Some people believe that there will be a need based on people wanting to be close to their families and grandchildren, but it is also dependent on the ability of the region to meet this age group's needs.

The downtown area for our purposes is quite large: the area south of St. Clair from the Humber River to the Beaches. With over 15,000 Jews, it is the smallest in number, but to give us some perspective, it is equivalent in size to the entire Jewish population of Ottawa.

There are a number of qualities that are characteristic of Jews living in this area: They are much more likely to be single, not young or old, nor immigrants. The downtown has the highest proportion of Jews living in one parent families.

When we compare Jews in this area with those in the other two areas of higher Jewish density, it is clear that the basis and nature of Jewish identity is different. For example, whereas only four percent of Jews in the higher density Jewish areas identified themselves in 1991 as Jews by ethnic ancestry with no religious affiliation, 20 percent of those living downtown identified themselves in that manner. In addition, close to 42 percent of Jews in the downtown area live in families where at least one spouse and/or parent is Jewish.

There has been a lot of activity in recent years, as manifested by the formation of the Downtown Jewish Community Council, an association of 21 downtown organizations, and as seen in the role of the Bloor JCC as the magnet institutions.

There are growing attempts to meet the needs of this group through the creation of greater options for Jewish education and an emphasis on the cultural programming that seems to be a key focus of identification for Jews in this area.

In some ways, this group may be hardest for which to forecast: I suspect that the success of these efforts at maintaining and revitalizing the content of Jewish life will go a long way to assure a continued Jewish presence in Toronto's downtown.

The demographic centre of the community is in North York. This area should continue to be an important core of Jewish activity. A fair portion of that area (especially along the Bathurst corridor) is composed of empty nesters, the elderly and immigrants. There could, therefore, be a diminution of Jewish life if immigration takes a significant downturn and the exodus north continues. On the other hand, given the wealth of religious, recreational and social services available, this area ought to continue as an important centre.

Finally, there is a fourth area that it is most problematic because it is not geographically distinct. This involves the 20 percent or so of Jews who do not live in the other three areas. They are dispersed throughout the GTA, live in very low-density Jewish neighbourhoods, and unlike the Jews of downtown whom they often resemble, do not have a defined identity or a growing Jewish infrastructure to serve them.

In future terms, these might be the Jews most vulnerable in terms of maintaining an identification with the community. Part of the challenge in finding how this group, particularly today's youth, can maintain a meaningful connection.

We have considered forecasts for the over-all population as well as the characteristics of specific areas. I would like to end with what I see three key questions that will affect the future of our community.

The first may be seen as a strictly demographic issue: Will our community remain residentially concentrated? In the 1991 census, nearly 90 percent of the Jewish community lived where 20 percent of Toronto CMA lived. Most are located in the three areas featured above. This residential concentration is fairly unique for communities of our size in North America. It gives us a tremendous advantage in service delivery and in maintaining community cohesion. Should dramatic dispersion occur, this could have a major negative impact on the vitality and viability of our community and of Jewish identity.

The second question is only partially demographic: What will be the impact of immigration, both from abroad and other parts of Canada?

The factor, more than any other, is responsible for the doubling of our community in the last 30 years. As suggested earlier, immigration is difficult to predict because it is affected by so many external factors out of our control. However, one aspect is not hard to predict: Not only the number of immigrants but how they are responded to and how they respond are critical to the future of our community.

Immigrants can come in droves, but unless they are integrated into the Jewish community, their impact is greatly diminished. Whether they be from the former Soviet Union, South Africa, Israel, North Africa or the United States, they can easily disappear as Jews in the future.

This leads us to the third question: What will be the quality of Jewish life in the new century? The future of the Jewish community is not only, or probably chiefly, a demographic issue.

Will we continue to take care or our less fortunate members, modelling Jewish values such as g'milut chasadim or tzedakah? Will our Jewish educational system meet the needs of a diverse Jewish community with quality and flexibility? Will it address the needs of both children and adults? Will the creativity and richness of our Jewish culture bloom? Will our diversity be a source of richness and strength or of divisiveness and weakness? Will that diversity include an option of choices to make it possible for a broad range of people to continue identifying with a community, a people and a tradition that are both ancient and contemporarily relevant?

Of course, this last set of questions can be asked of Jewry throughout the world, especially outside of Israel. Our community has an advantage: Demographically, in terms of numbers and geographical concentration, it is strong. The institutional infrastructure represented by our social service agencies, synagogues, schools, and cultural providers is rich and multifaceted. This augurs well for the future.

It is likely that the impressive numbers predicted for the next 30 years will materialize. But what these projections don't tell us is to what extent tens of thousands of persons who may indicate on a census that they are Jewish by ethnic ancestry or religion live Jewish lives.

This is particularly true as our community loses the direct influence of people whose Yiddishkeit was nurtured in the traditions of pre-war East European Jewry. To impact on that course of events, the only thing we can do is to continue to develop a vital Jewish community, with an institutional backbone that is both strong and flexible: a Jewish life that is meaningful culturally and spiritually. Numbers alone are lifeless; they must breathe Jewish souls.

Grandparents' Contributions in Transmissions of Culture

Rachel Aber Schlesinger
Associate Professor, York University,
Division of Social Science & Graduate Faculty of Education

My maternal grandmother lived with us. I learned from her that grandmothers have great power. They represent a relationship that, like a parent's, demands respect and provides love, but is different. Omama was a "queen", she kept religious standards high, passed on a sense of family history and told wonderful stories. She helped give us a sense of who we were, and what we stood for. I was able to understand my mother, in her role as a grandparent, because of the influence of my grandmother. Both women were unique, daughters and wives of distinguished rabbis, they had a strong sense of self, of Jewish values, and of family "Yehus".

Now I am a grandmother. I am a living ancestor! My stories will be different, I live in another land, in another time. Can I transmit to my children's children the tastes, the smells, the environment, the understanding of the values that shaped me?

The bond between grandchild and grandparents may be the strongest, and of the longest duration, next to the parent bond. There is an ongoing debate in the research about grandparents. Can grandparents transmit values, or is this difficult due to the age gap between the first and third generation, differences in life experience, and competition from the outside world?

If we want to perpetuate ourselves and our culture, what is it that we want to pass on? Jewish transmission of values include Jewish heritage, feeling of peoplehood, religious knowledge, faith, observances, Jewish friends and community as well as language retention, family customs and traditions, holiday celebrations, attitudes toward education and memories or stories of a distant homeland. Do we really have the ability to pass on all of these Jewish aspects to our grandchildren?

I recently interviewed grandmothers who identified themselves as either Ashkenazi or Sephardi. My students and I wanted to know their thoughts about cultural transmissions to grandchildren . In this study, the respondents themselves chose the designation of Sephardi or Ashkenazi.

The women spoke many languages in addition to their mother tongue. Ashkenazi women spoke one or more of the following languages: Polish Hebrew, Russian, Lithuanian, German, Yiddish, Swedish, French, Italian and English. The Sephardi women spoke one or more of the following languages: French, Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish, Turkish, Persian, Ladino and English.

In each case these women who were born in another country all spoke a minimum of two languages. Will our children or grandchildren be able to communicate in so many languages?

The grandparents originated from Poland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Lithuania, Russia, Austria, Morocco, Lebanon, Syria, Tunisia, Turkey, Iran, Algeria and Egypt. They are all now living in Toronto, Canada.

The Sephardi women felt that the home is the only place to reinforce their Sephardi culture, since the outside, mainstream Jewish community stresses Ashkenazi traditions.

Said one respondent ... "Family traditions ... are very important. They are mostly French traditions, like table manners, classical music, French literature. Yes, in my country, it was our way." (Mrs. L.) She reflects a culture that combines Jewish and secular culture, a civilized world view, formed by Continental culture in an Arabic setting ... far removed from the north Toronto setting she now inhabits.

Another woman adds: "I want to give them an idea of the way we lived. My father taught me wisdom, my mother's family had been in Iraq for millennia, maybe since Abraham."(Mrs. P.)

"I have to tell them about our life ... It's like a dream, different climate, social, political, demographic, religious context, ... Here, there is no Turkish atmosphere, no Turkish synagogue, no Turkish bath, no Turkish schools ... so I have to transmit our way of life, and it is not always possible ... It's like a dream." (Mrs. F.)

Values grow out of a culture. Grandmothers want to pass on respect and obedience to elders, for "they know more than us, they have a whole life behind them. Respect, it's like breathing. It comes naturally, we are born with it." (Mrs. C.)

"I want to teach them about my culture ... which is Egyptian, Arab, French, English, Muslim, Jewish, Christian, all the languages, all the food, all the customs ..." is the refrain of Mrs. A. reflecting an attitude that it was the outside world, as well as the Jewish, private world that has changed, in coming to Canada.

As they age, and as the old world recedes, the two groups of women are more similar than different. Older women use memory, they remember and create bridges from memories to realities, from themselves to their younger family members.

There are memories of a country and a culture and a way of life that has passed. They live their lives as survivors ... those who still remember all older persons share memories. This cohort has holocaust memories, depression memories, relocation memories.

These women share silences, gaps in memory. They are broken by the young.

While Jews from Eastern Europe also had close associations with their home countries, when they talk of bringing grandchildren "home" it is to teach what can happen to Jewish communities. It is to put the holocaust into personal terms. Or, it is to put the Russian experience into perspective.

"I tell my grandchildren how I survived in the gulag, but today I read with them Puskin, talk of the days of the kolkhoz when I had one meal a day, a bowl of soup, and worked for fourteen hours a day. And they can't even imagine my life!"(Mrs. Z.)

Grandparents from Europe have memories of wars and upheavals. These women don't reflect on dreams, but often on nightmares. They are survivors, of their generation, of the holocaust, of war. Many families return to visit the death camps, but the group of grandmothers that I spoke with did not want their grandchildren to associate only with death and destruction. They understand that many return to Poland with high school groups. They would like, instead, to pass on the joys of their youth in Europe, not only the sorrows.

The location for transmission of ideas is often the kitchen. Grandmothers report pleasure in preparing special dishes for the family and with grandchildren's help. They typically bake hallah (a traditional twisted egg bread) together, and turn over some Passover cooking chores to the children and grandchildren; such as making charoset, matzo balls for the soup, and special deserts that continue to appear at joint family celebrations.

Recipes are passed on, from generation to generation. They are part of the oral tradition. In terms of religious observances, and even foods, the Sephardi feel a degree of cognitive dissonance. The foods they ate at home are not common in Canada. A great deal happens in the kitchen. Grandmothers come from a world of observation and doing. They watched their mothers, and then they copied what they did. Today, grandmothers complain that children do not have Ato kasher their meat, they buy it already kashered. They feel that children are missing out on the oral culture of ideas and observances that were shared in the kitchen.

In our families we model our beliefs. Religious observance is an area we articulate, often loudly and judgementally. The grandmothers speak of learning, religious rituals and observances. Not all grandparents are as religious as their grandchildren. Mrs. G., from Russia reports: "I learned from my granddaughter. One day, she told me, Bubba, everyone says you're so smart, how come you can't say a bracha?" (prayer) (Mrs. G.)

One respondent shared that she had been unable to follow her religion in her home country. "In Latvia I couldn't be religious, here I want to be, but my husband is still afraid. My granddaughter helps me." (Mrs. W.)

As religion is both private in belief and public in observance, so is our concept of space, and what having living space means. Many of the interviewees were often raised with little private space. They grew up in small spaces, and some in warm climates used the outdoors to extend living space. In Canada, we live more indoors, and older women report that they find it difficult to understand issues of privacy, and doors. They are told by grandchildren not "to intrude on my space".

Other grandmothers live alone or with husbands. Space is also an issue for them. They tend to live apart from the extended family, yet, they reflect on the large homes their children inhabit. One notes: "My grandchildren have too much space. Imagine, a room for themselves, they don't know how to share." (Mrs. F.) Unspoken is the feeling that in large homes, families tend to be separated, not spending time with the grandparent. Geographical space is also a barrier to close communication. Families are spread out, older persons winter in warmer climates. New tools of communication are used such as the internet, in addition to telephone calls. Letters are more rare. In my generation we saved the letters sent to us. Today, email is the instant mode of communication.

What traditions can we, as grandparents pass on to our children? How do we do this? One generation passes on stories, songs, foods, celebrations and pictures. They tell family stories to their grandchildren with regularity, often highlighting the contributions made by the family members to the community, as well as stories about themselves when they were growing up. Stores that include family members as the main characters are remembered by young children. They like to view family history from the perspective of a parent or grandparent.

Our women indicated that they have contributions to make to the family in terms of ideas, responsibilities, child care, and even financial assistance. Many of the respondents hope that they are role models, as indeed their grandparents had been to them. They note that it is important to be seen as representing the old culture, providing continuity of family traditions, while still being close to their grandchildren.

Grandparents viewed themselves as a family resource. When asked about specific contributions they have made, the following were mentioned, in alphabetical, not numerical order:

- Babysitting
- cultural / religious transmission

- continuity of family life
- emotional support
- historian
- informational resource
- keeps traditions alive
- listener
- loving
- meditor and mentor
- open house
- provider
- role model
- teacher

The busier the lives of families are, the more grandparents, if able, help out. Older persons feel that there is a lack of respect and reverence accorded to this generation of seniors, and they wish to imbue their grandchildren with this feeling of respect towards others. They realize that this can cause some distance. They define "respect" in terms of behaviour, such as good manners. They agree, however, that their grandchildren do respect their views and opinions, often coming to them before going to parents to ask for advice.

There is also the notion of reciprocity. While grandparents try to teach about roots, and pass on their values, the grandchildren in turn teach them about Canadian life. The younger generation has a great influence on seniors. They introduce them to their music, the mass media, dating and socialization customs. They engage grandparents in discussion of values and ethics, and often teach more to their grandparents than they realize. The seniors who we interviewed acknowledged their debt to youth in helping them cope with life in Canada.

Conclusions

Some customs and values are transmitted from generation to generation, regardless of where we originate. Our sample of elderly Jewish women, coming from many lands indicated the following family issues and values they wished to retain: family closeness, respect, love, warmth and giving, Jewish and general education, the concept of shalom bayit (family harmony), and a sense of responsibility and connection as grandparents.

Some fear they do not have a place in their grandchildren's lives now, but hope this will develop with time. Factors that impede communication and closeness include physical location, distance, family mobility and family fragmentation. Interviewees also noted difficulties resulting from "mixed cultural marriages".

Grandparents often have less formal education than their children or grandchildren, and some feel that this educational gap creates barriers. Other grandparents report feeling "inferior", not modern enough." They feel inadequate because they can only transmit what is most common to their own life and experience, for example the country, the customs and traditions, and history. However, by virtue of being newcomers here, all that is lost, replaced by strange new ways. It is difficult to transmit a culture when you move from one country to another. So grandparents try to transmit their culture into a new setting, and that is often a difficult task. The challenge is to find the common threads, and Jewish traditions may provide this. Grandparents preserve family histories and stories, rituals and family scripts.

Today we are living longer, experiencing family changes and grandchildren may have many sets of grandparents. Even the words we use have changed. In Jewish tradition an older person was a "zakena", a person of wisdom. In modern Hebrew, the terms Saba and Safta are used to denote grandparents, the father of my father. What has happened to the concept of wisdom?

Family traditions, such as living together in extended households, and the respect that elder were given is missing today. They admit that this respect caused them to be distant from their own grandparents, but they miss it. Hospitality was very important, open doors, being a generous host. They talked about their own grandparents with reverence. "My grandfather was very strict, he sent all of his sons to France to be educated."

The second generation imitates, but it's not the real thing, and the third generation have lost the cultural identity, but build a different Jewish religious one, the women claim. Older Jewish women live with distance, space, in frequent contacts as well as with frequent contacts.

In sociological studies, immigrant generations were seen as moving in several directions, physically and psychologically. They left older ways, adapted to newer ones, yearned for the familiar but adapted to the new. Now their grandchildren want to discover 'roots.' They have been there all along, it helped them grow, but they were obvious, or unseen underground. Now grandparents help expose the roots. This causes friction at times with the parent generation who have outgrown these roots, taken flight from them. They lost the language, the customs and the values only to find that their children want to reclaim them.

The women we interviewed had to find a voice, or maintain silences. They reframed their past, and they struggled to adjust to the present world of the grandchildren.

Time has made great changes. The longer they are in Canada, the greater the understanding and acculturation. Can I transmit values to my grandchildren? Hopefully, yes. I can provide the smells of hallah baking, I can surround them with pictures of family members, of places and events. I can record voices for them to listen to, I can even use videos to pinpoint places and people. Modern technology helps, but being there, talking, being willing to listen, trying to explain our perspective and respecting our own children and grandchildren may be the keys to future communications and continuity. Our grandchildren are not mind readers, contact, open communication and understanding are also necessary ingredients to cultural and value transmission.

L'chol Dor V Dor, from generation to generation ... we need our older family members. My grandmother once told me, "listen carefully to what I will tell you ... then you will tell this story to your children, and they will tell it to their grandchildren. And my words will be heard for two hundred years!" We are links in a long chain ... which stories will our great-grandchildren repeat?

The Outlook From Here

by Ben G. Kayfetz

We are surrounded these days on every side by talk and speculation about what is called the Millennium, by 'round ups' of the event of the slice of time it represents, by appraisals of the last two millennia, by reprints of "significant" newspaper headlines of the past, by estimates of human aspiration as well as human degradation.

And "wie es christelt sich, so judelt sich" says a saying from Jewish folklore that was open to Henrich Heine. The Jewish community has not lagged far behind with self-appraisals of the progress and non-progress made in the Millennium especially the most recent segments.

In the self-appraisals that come from Jewish sources rarely does one see any one confronting the fact that the entire "millennial" operation is basically a Christian institution, a Christian device to keep track of the year, to measure and mark historical movement and passage of time. What could be more Christ-centred and Christological than marking the years by dating them from the birth of the founder of Christianity? As it happens, there seems to be a numerical discrepancy at the very outset which serves to confuse the chronicler. Jesus seems to have been born not in the year One but in the year Four i.e. he was not born until four years after his birth, a dating that this writer has not succeeded in coming to terms with. Does it mean, that Jesus was not born in the years attributed to his birth but four years later? What is more, the year round calendar, the succession of solar and lunar months, is itself directly derived from the pagan Romans but sanctified none less than a Pope (hence the names Gregorian and Julian calendar). And we Jews have secularized the practice by substituting BCE, i.e. Before the Common Era.

All this by way of introduction to the point made: that we are so much a product of our larger milieu that we function virtually totally in a system whose theological basis we do not accept. The one case where this writer has seen some effort made to cope with this discrepancy is in a publication put out by a group of Williamsburg chassidim where in addition to indicating the Jewish month and year on the luach the initial cipher is lopped of and 1975 is referred to as 975, a purely token kind of gesture with no further religious significance as the rest of the figure, the 975 segment, is still very much part of the Christian Anno Domini. The usage CE or BCE for the Common Era is becoming more acceptable but still reminds the speaker or reader of its historical origin, since some may read it as Christian Era. Only a few years ago there was a flurry of letters o the editor of the Biblical Archaeological Review complaining vociferously of the banishment of the traditional AD and BC.

Does this mean that this writer is advocating a new system of time reckoning? Far from it — he is merely trying to clarify a point that concepts differ widely and our own usage covers up concepts that in another country and another time have widely different meanings. In interbellum Poland and Czarist Russia a Jew who had little Yiddish and less Hebrew but whose Jewishness was confined to and expressed in Polish or Russian would be considered 'assimilated.' Would anyone use the word 'assimilated' to refer to Jews in Canada where English is the Number One language for Jews creatively, colloquially and commercially and where a concerted attack on cultural and religious assimilation is carried on, using the English language to deter assimilation. Where does the Jewish community stand on the eve of this 2000th year? In fact we are barely 69 years away from the anniversary of the destruction of Jewish sovereignty — a historic date with adequate contemporary confirmation.

I have been reading and re-reading a sheaf of old Menorah Journals, a publication that was very much in the vanguard of Jewish thinking in the 1920s. It represented the second generation of the mass migrations that intensified in the 1880s some of whom like Maurice Samuel, Ludwig Lewisohn, dropped out only to return later. They, too, were earnestly concerned about hemshech, Jewish continuity. remember this was the time when Polish and East European Jewry was still the bulwark of Yiddishkeit, however we interpret that word, when the shtetl however destabilized by incursions of the outside world by ideologies like Zionism, Socialism, Communism was still a reservoir of intense Jewish identity either in religion or in ethnicity. The great mass of Russian Jewry had been fractured into diverse political segments with parts going to Rumania to newly established Baltic states and Poland and Soviet Russia the latter two in control of several million. In North America racism had won the day and the open door was shut and barricaded. America was no longer the haven for immigrants. The younger intellectuals the Elliot Cohens, the Lionel Trillings, the Delmore Schwartzes were trying to find themselves. In Canada by whatever standards or measurements we apply, the situation looked more favourable. Back in 1939, the Canadian census taken eight years earlier, revealed that 95% of Canada's Jews had Yiddish as their mother tongue (giving a certain reality to the expression mame-loshen). By the census 1961 the figure had drastically declined to only 33% out of 100 Canadian Jews stated that they understood Yiddish. But this deems to have little bearing on the creativity in that language which seems to function like a law of physics — the kind we were taught in high school (call it Ravitch's law or Rachel Korn's law) — that the output of books, plays and poems in Yiddish are in inverse proportion to the number using or commanding that tongue, i.e. the fewer the number of Yiddish readers, the greater the number of books published in that language. A recent letter to the editor of the Gazette in Montreal from Chava Rosenfarb announcing that from now she will write in English. This, I am sure, will by no means mean the end of Yiddish writing.

Canada's Jews were monolithic in one respect. They stemmed for the most part from Eastern Europe and directly or indirectly they were in the main of Ashkenazic heritage. The events of the past 60 years have made us truly a kibbutz galuyot with communities from North Africa, others of Iraqi origin, some from Iran whose community hark back to Queen Esther's day, and from the Indian subcontinent. The Moroccan Jews have integrated well maintaining their traditions and sharing the life and values of their predecessors. Even the Russians are radically different from the Russian Jews who arrived in earlier pre-Soviet days and the South Africans tempered by their sojourn in that land. Most intriguing and promising are the internal newcomers so named because they are internal migrants — the baalei t'shuva, the young men and women who have caught the chassidic fever who are raising their families in the letter and spirit of that code. In general, the Orthodox have done better than hold their own. One need only step into a shul in an ordinary Erev Shabbath to see their numbers and their youthful age. This strong showing does not seem to apply to the various factions of Zionism. Their sessions are assemblies of zkeynim — oldsters. Nor have the radicals of a previous age, who found their haven in the Arbeter Ring whose ideal was for a sheneren morgen "a better tomorrow," fared well. In addition there are feminists some of the right and some of the left, the egalitarians and the Reconstructionists, and those open to gays and lesbians. This is Jewish multiculturalism with a vengeance.

The developments in the next centennial should be interesting to watch. Will the new elements be fashioned into a pluralistic centripetal force bringing the various segments together to form a true many coloured mosaic or will the cracks and fissures turn into centrifugal forces that will fly off in all directions?

Canadian Jewish Families in the Sandwich Generation

Benjamin Schlesinger, PhD., F.R.S.C.
Professor Emeritus – University of Toronto,
Faculty of Social Work and
Research Associate, Robarts Centre, York University

The Jewish family today is undergoing major structural, demographic and social changes. In years gone by, the family moved through a series of developmental stages in which children were born, reached adolescence and were launched. In the past, middle-aged parents looked forward to the empty nest as a period in which they could spend more time together, rediscover each other and meet their own individual needs. This empty nest syndrome however is becoming a situation of the past. Middle-aged Jewish parents are finding themselves caught in a phenomenon sociologists have labelled the "sandwich generation."

The term "sandwich generation" has been coined to describe those parents sandwiched between their adult children and ageing parents, with commitments and responsibilities to both. The bottom layer represents young adult sons and daughters who remain in the parental home or who return home after having been away for a period of time (Boomerang Children). The top layer represents elderly parents/parents-in-law, who are in part dependent on the middle generation, whether or not they are residing in the same household. The middle layer represents middle-aged couples who are the children of the elderly parents and the parents of growing children.

The sandwich generation is becoming a normative element of our society. As more adult children continue to live with parents in response to difficult economic conditions, longer periods of education, delayed marriage and high divorce rates, middle-aged couples may find themselves experiencing a new stage, which also demand that they care for their parents.

The burden of caring for both younger and older generations often places a great deal of stress on the middle generation. The financial, psychological and physical toll of caregiving on this group, may in fact limit their attempt at meeting their own need for growth and development. Research has widely found "the woman in the middle" as being responsible for the majority of the caretaking burden. While a very small body of literature explores the care for older and younger family members, most literature points to the personal and career losses suffered by the women caretakers in order for them to meet the needs of their family.

Some facts about the Sandwich Generation (Canada)

Young Adult Children:

- Of all women in the 20-34 year ages group, 23 percent live at home with their families. For men in the same age group, 33 percent live at home in 1996.
- If we examine full-time students in the 20-29 year category, 71 percent of unmarried women live at home, and 66 percent of unmarried men are still at home.

Seniors:

- 12 percent of population is 65 years and older (3.6 million).
- By the year 2041, the senior population will almost double to 23 percent of the population.
- Life expectancy is 75 years for male and 81 years for female.
- 26 percent of seniors were born outside of Canada.
- 75-85 percent of care received by seniors is provided by family members and friends.

The Sandwich Generation: The Women in the Middle:

- More than 7 out of 10 persons providing informal care to seniors are women.
- Nearly 9 out of 10 women will be helping their parents, children or both at the same time in their lives.

- Most women today are working outside the home (8 out of 10 women).
- More than half of all working women also care for elderly relatives.
- Four out of ten women are still raising children.
- In Canada, 3.4 million persons belong to the mid-layer (Sandwich Generation).

The Jewish Woman in the Middle

It is usual that the "woman in the middle" takes on the "caregiving" to the children and elderly parents and parents-in-law. In a Canadian study, Professor Gottlieb of the University of Guelph found that "caregiving" had the following effects on women:

- prevented them from being involved as they wished to be in volunteer work, community organizations, and continuing education;
- left them with less time to spend alone with spouses;
- forced them to take time away from their jobs;
- prevented them from making desired changes in their lives;
- interfered with their social life;
- made it difficult for them to plan or go on vacations;
- forced them to give up things they usually wanted to do; and
- kept them from paying more attention to other family members.

A Canadian Study

A Canadian study of 66 "women in the middle" completed at the Faculty of Social Work, which included Jewish women, found out the following portrait of the "woman in the middle."

The "sandwiched" woman in the middle is a little over 51 years old, and her husband is close to 54 years old. They have been married for almost 30 years, and are likely to have one or two young adult children (over 18) living at home. The "live in" young adult is 22 years old and the woman has also one young adult child living away who is in the late 20s. The family lives in a metropolitan urban area and usually owns a house on which the mortgage is paid. The woman is most likely employed in a highly skilled occupation, and her husband is a professional.

The woman's elderly mother is almost 80 years old, and her father is 82 years old. Her mother-in-law is 80 years old and her father-in-law is 83 years old. Her parents/parents-in-law are likely to live in the same urban location. The woman in the middle has some responibilities to two sets of parents.

In the Canadian study we asked what advice would you give to a woman in the middle such as yourself? The most common responses were "always make time for yourself," insist that everyone helps with the elderly, do the best you can and put yourself first.

Other responses included the following: have a sense of humour, try to be fair to everyone, be considerate, be a good listener, establish priorities and do only what is important, set limits and live by them, put your family first, put elderly first because they won't be around long, maintain a positive mental attitude, gradually lessen the time spent with the elderly, encourage the elderly to be independent, share your feelings with your husband, develop good support systems, educate kids about responsibility to parents, don't feel guilty, develop good relationships with elderly and older children living at home, don't write elderly off prematurely, be grateful, ask for help if you need it, be supportive always, encourage older children to be more independent.

Suggestions for Coping in the Sandwich Generation

In the book "The Family Squeeze: Surviving the Sandwich Generation," Ben Schlesinger and Suzanne Kingsmill (University of Toronto Press, 1998), discuss this phenomenon. They offer some practical suggestions for the "woman in the middle." Among many others, the following stand out:

- Relax, and find some things that you really enjoy doing.
- Make time to read all those books you've been wanting to read.
- Develop new friends, and touch base with old ones.
- Get regular exercise
- Eat well – make time for three square meals a day.

- Use any services that are available to you to help make your life easier, and lobby for more services.
- Learn to manage relations and emotions.
- Don't hold anything in. If you are angry, frustrated, or hurt, or feel guilty or betrayed, talk to friends or to your spouse about your feelings. You are in charge, and you must maintain a good quality of life.
- Build support systems of friends and family, or attend local support groups. If you need more, seek counselling with professional social workers or psychologists, who can act as objective observers and offer new perspectives on your problems. Get help to deal with any feeling of guilt and anger over your role as primary caregiver. Confront any guilt over feeling that caring for your elders is burden, and realize that all caregivers feel that way at times.

Positive Aspects

There are positive aspects of the "sandwich generation." Grandchildren have longer contact with their grandparents. There is mutual reciprocal help given among the generations. The elderly help the grandchildren, the middle generation help the elderly, and the elderly in many cases reciprocate. Family caring, loving and sharing continues over time. The elderly provide the roots of the Jewish family, by sharing family history, memories, and family geography.

Conclusion

As we move towards the millennium, we will have more senior Jewish persons, and less of their middle-age children to care for them. We will also see more adult children staying at home for longer periods of time. Our Jewish communities will have to find creative ways to help the "sandwich generation" cope in the 21st century.

Benjamin Schlesinger is the co-author with Suzanne Kingsmill of The Family Squeeze: Surviving the Sandwich Generation.

WHO'S WHO IN CANADIAN JEWRY

Canadian Jewry at Year 2000 and Beyond is the third edition of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry, divided into three sections:

- essays by academics and community workers;
- biographical data of prominent members of the community;
- list of those included by professional field.

The focus of this edition of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry is to look at the present and the future of the generation of Jews who were mainly raised in Canada and compare them to those from the Eastern European immigrant community. Topics that are addressed include the following:

- What changes can we expect to see in the Jewish community?
- What will be the role of the synagogue, community centre and school in holding the Jewish community together?
- What role will parents, grandparents and extended family play in the continuation of traditions?
- Where will Jews be centred in Canadian cities?
